Les consuls, vice consuls, et agens commerciaux ou ceux, qui seraient dûement autorisés à les suppléer, auront le droit, comme tels, de servir de juges et d'arbitres dans les differens qui pourraient s'élever entre les capitaines et les équipages des bátimens de la nation, dont ils soignent les intérèts, sans que les autorités locales puissent y intervenir, à moins que la conduite des équipages ou du capitaine ne *troubleroit l'ordre ou la tranquillité du pays ou que lesdits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux ne requerraient† leur intervention pour faire exécuter ou maintenir leurs décisions. ARTICLE 13. Dans le cas ou quelque bâtiment de l'une des hautes parties contractantes aura échoué, fait naufrage ou souffert quelque autre dommage, sur les côtes de la domination de l'autre, il sera donné toute aide et assistance aux personnes naufragées, ou qui se trouveraient en danger, et il leur sera accordé des passeports pour retourner dans leur patrie. Les bâtimens et les marchandises naufragés, ou leur produit, s'ils ont été vendus, seront restitués à leurs propriétaires ou ayant cause, s'ils sont reclamés dans l'an et jour, en payant les frais de sauvetage que payeraient les nationaux dans les mêmes cas. Et les compagnies de sauvetage ne pourront faire accepter leurs services que dans les mêmes cas et après les mèmes délais, qui seraient accordés aux capitaines et aux équipages nationaux. Les Gouvernemens respectifs veilleront d'ailleurs à ce que ces compagnies ne se permettent point de vexations ou d'actes arbitraires.

Bien entendu que les stipulations contenues dans les articles précités seront toujours censées ne rien changer aux conventions conclues de part et d'autre, avec d'autres nations dans l'intervalle écoulé entre l'expiration dudit traité de 1783, et la remise en vigueur desdits articles par le traité de commerce et de navigation conclu, par les hautes parties actuellement contractantes à Stockholm, le 4 Septembre, 1816.

ARTICLE 18.

ARTICLE 16. Vû l'eloignement des pays respectifs des deux hautes parties contractantes, et l'incertitude qui en résulte sur les divers événemens qui peuvent avoir lieu, il est convenu, qu'un bâtiment marchand appartenant à l'une d'elles qui se trouverait destiné pour un port supposé bloqué au moment du depart de ce bâtiment ne sera cependant pas capturé ou condamné pour avoir essayé une première fois d'entrer dans le dit port, à moins qu'il ne puisse être prouvé que ledit bâtiment avoit pû et dû apprendre en route que l'état de blocus de la place en question durait encore: mais les bâtimens qui, après avoir été renvoyés une fais essayeraient pendant le même voyage d'entrer une seconde fois dans le même port bloqué, durant la continuation de ce blocus, se trouverant alors sujets à être détenus et condamnés.

ARTICLE 19.

*Substituer aux mots soulignés les suivans : "des neuf premières années."

ARTICLE 17. Le présent traité sera en vigueur pendant dix années, à partir du jourde l'échange des ratifications, et, si avant l'expiration* de ces dix années, l'une ou l'autre des hautes parties contractantes n'avoit pas annoncé à l'autre, par une notification officielle, son intention d'en faire cesser l'effet, ce traité restera obligatoire une année au delà, et ainsi de suite jusqu'à l'expiration des douze mois qui suivront une semblable notification, à quelque époque qu'elle ait lien.

ARTICLE 20.

ARTICLE 18. Le présent traité sera ratifié par les hautes parties contractantes, et les ratifications en seront échangées, à Washington dans l'espace de neuf mois après la signature ou plutôt si faire se peut.

No. 4.

J. J. Appleton to the Count of Wetterstedt.

STOCKHOLM, le 24 Juin, 1827.

Le soussigné, après avoir examiné le contre-projet de traité que votre excellence lui avoit remis, à la conférence du 20 de ce mois, a en l'honneur de lui dire à celle du 22, qu'il l'adoptoit avec quelques modifications qui découloient naturellement des principes sur lesquels il avoit été rédigé. Votre excellence admit ces modifications sauf une qui consistoit à retrancher l'exception de l'importation du sel en Suède par bâtimens Americains, et aux Etats Unis par bâtimens Suédois des dispositions générales du traité. Le soussigné s'efforça alors de déterminer votre excellence à ne pas persister dans une exception qui seroit au moins aussi désavantageuse à la Suède qu'aux Etats Unis, mais il ne put y parvenir. Persuadé cependant qu'après avoir examiné de nouveau la question, votre excellence reconnoitra la justesse des raisonnemens du soussigné, il croit devoir les lui reproduire en citant des faits à l'appui auxquels il n'avoit pu référer que d'une manière générale.

Si le soussigé ne se méprend pas sur les motifs qui ont porté les deux Gouvernemens à vouloir placer leur navigation sur la base d'une parfaite égalité, ils naissent d'une conviction que cette égalité en facilitant les échanges commerciaux entr'eux les augmentera et que la navigation de l'un et l'autre, employée à les effectuer s'accroitra dans une proportion correspondante. L'adoption de l'exception proposée par votre excellence, porterait atteinte à cette égalité et restrein droit les avantages généraux qu'on s'en propose sans aucun avantage particulier pour la Suède ainsi que le soussigné va le démonstrer.

La Suède tire la presque totalité de ses sels du Portugal et de la Méditerranée; cette importation sert de fret de retour à ceux de ses bâtimens qui fréquentent ces parages et qui par suite peuvent l'apporter dans ses ports à un trés bas fret. Les Etats Unis au contraire ne sont ni voisins de la Suède ni des lieux d'où elle tire le sel, le transport de cette marchandise en Suède seroit donc pour leurs bâtimens l'occasion d'un voyage spécial plus frayeux que lucratif, parce que leurs frais d'armement, salaire et nourriture des équipages leur reviennent, pour le temps nécessaire pour effectuer un tel voyage, à plus du double du fret qu'ils pourroient obtenir (un bâtiment Americain de 220 tx. coûte 2— écus de banque par mois) il est donc évident qu'ils n'entreprendront jamais ces voyages pour la perspective du fret à y faire. Ils ne les entreprendront pas non plus pour le fret à faire en retournant de Suède dans le midi de l'Europe parce qu'il n'est par plus avantageux, et ils ne les entreprendront pas non plus pour celui à faire de Suède aux Etats Unis parce qu'il est moins élevé que celui de Portugal ou de la Méditerranée aux Etats Unis, pour lesquels, ils trouvent toujours à charger dans ces parages, parce qu'outre une quantité considèrable de vins, huile, spiritueux, leur patrie en tire annuellement 1,653,130 boisseaux de sel du poids de 56 chaque, ce qui fait le chargement d'environ 400 navires de 100 tx. La concurrence pour l'importation du sel en Suède ne pourroit donc s'établir que par les bâtimens Americains qui se rendroient en Suède des ports de France ou d'Angleterre mais comme elle ne tire que très peu de sel de ces pays, elle ne doit pas craindre cette concurrence.

S'il est une marchandise que les Suédois peuvent porter avec plus d'avantage qu'aucune autre nation, c'est le sel, parce que c'est un objet d'un grand volume pour peu de valeur, et, comme ils tiennent les frets généralement plus bas que les autres nations; c'est un des articles qu'ils trouveront toujours à charger le plus facilement, parce que l'augmentation de la prime d'assurance qui résulte quelquefois dans les autres pays de l'emploi de leurs bâtimens sera toujours plus que compensée par le bas taux du fret.

La faculté de porter du sel aux Etats Unis en concurrence avec les nationaux donnera de l'extension à la navigation Suédoise, car ce qui empéchoit ses bâtimens de s'y rendre, c'étoit l'impossibilité de trouver du fret pour y aller, les négocians Suédois ne voulant pas y envoyer du fer pour leur compte et les négocians Américains employant de préférence leurs bâtimens, mais quand les bâtimens Suédois seront traités aux Etats Unis, quelque soient leurs chargemens, comme les nationaux, il n'en sera plus ainsi, et le sel entr'autres marchandises, sera, pour eux, un grand objet d'importation parce que la certitude de trouver aux Etats Unis des frets pour l'Europe leur permettra de le porter à aussi bas prix que les nationaux avec lesquels les bâtimens étrangers entrent déja en concurrence pour un dixième dans une importation qui est annuellement de 5,127,657 boisseaux de sel de 56 (le chargement d'environ 1,500 navires de 100 tx.) dont 4,006,302 viennent d'Europe et 892,813 des colonies Anglaises avec lesquelles le commerce est maintenant interdit par bâtimens Anglais et Americains; c'est le droit d'entrer en concurrence dans un commerce aussi immense que la Suède refuse, crainte de voir importer en Suède quelques cargaisons de sel par bâtimens Americains.

En résumant ce qui précède, le soussigné n'hésite pas à dire que la crainte, devoir les bâtimens Américains entrer en concurrence avec ceux de Suède pour importer du sel dans ce Royaume, est imaginaire, et que les Suédois refuseraient, pour leur navigation, l'avantage le plus positif que leur présente le principe de l'égalité, en se privant de la faculté de porter du sel aux Etats Unis. Il ne doute pas que votre excellence partagera cette conviction et se désistera de l'exception qu'elle avoit proposée et que le soussigné n'a combattue que parce que ce serait une atteinte aux principes généraux de la libre navigation que les Etats Unis s'efforcent de promoter dans tous leur traités et auxquels ils n'hésitent pas à sacrifier souvent des avantages particuliers qu'ils pourraient recueillir, comme dans le cas présent, de restrictions à ces principes.

Le soussigné saisit avec empressement cette occasion pour renouveler à votre excellence les assurances de sa considèration la plus distinguée.

J. J. APPLETON.

No. 5.

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ.

Comme l'importation des productions des Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège dans le Grand Duché de Finlande, et celle des productions de Finlande en Suède et en Norvège, sur les bâtimens des pays respectifs, par suite des rapports entre ces pays limitrophes et les anciennes liaisons, qui existent eux, se trouve reglée par des stipulations spéciales d'un traité encore en vigueur et dont le renouvellement forme un objet de negociation actuelle entre les Cours de Suède et de Russie, sans que les dites stipulations soyent lieus aux règlemens existens pour le commerce étranger en général, les deux hautes parties contractantes voulant écarter de leurs relations toute espèce d'équivogue ou de motif de discussion, sont tombis d'accord que les Art. 9 et 10 du présent traité ne seront point applicables aux exceptions dans les tarifs generaux des douanes et dans les règlemens de navigation qui sont ou pourront être faites dans les Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, uniquement à l'égard du commerce de côte et de frontière sus mentionné.

No. 6.

NOUVEL ARTICLE.

Les deux hautes parties contractantes ayant par suites des principes sus mentionnés manifesté leur déser d'entretenir une bonne harmonie avec toutes les nations, par suite d'une politique franche et également amicale envors elles, s'engagent mutuellement de n'accorder aucun avantage spéciale à une autre nation, par rapport au commerce et à la navigation sans que cet avantage ni devienne immediatement réversible à l'autre partie contractante, que en jouera librement se la concession est gratuite, ou que en donnera une compensation équivalente se la concession est conditionelle.

No. 7.

Acte additionel au traité de paix de Fredrieshamn entre sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvège et sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies fait et conclù à St. Petersbourg le 10 Septembre—29 Août, 1817.

ARTICLE 1. Les batimens de commerce Suédois et Norvégiens, ainsi que les bâtimens Russes et Finnois, pourront importer en Finlande toutes sortes d'objets de manufactures, denrées et productions Suédoises et Norvégiennes, qui sont le produit du sol ou de l'industrie Suédoise et Norvégienne, dont l'entrée est permise en général, en ne payant que la moitié des droits, auxquels ces mêmes objets seraient assujétis, s'ils venaient d'un autre pays sur des bâtimens nationaux. Le même avantage est accordé en Suède à toutes sortes de marchandises, denrées et productions Finnoises, qui viennent directement de ce pays et qui sont importées sur des vaisseaux Suédois ou Finnois.

Les objets, qui pourront exiger des modifications, ou exceptions spéciales, au principe général établi ci-dessus, seront réglés par des tarifs réciproques, dont les deux hautes parties contractantes se reservent de convenir incessanment.

ARTICLE 2. Toutes les productions du sol ou de l'industrie Suédoise et Norvégienne, dont l'entrée est en général défendue en Finlande, pourront néanmoins y être admises, lorsqu'elles viendront de Suède et de Norvège, et sans qu'elles soient assujéties à des droits plus forts, ou autres, que dix pour cent. de la valeur de la marchandise.

Les denrées et manufactures Finnoises, venant directement de Finlande, jouiront du même avantage en Suède.

L'eau-de-vie et le salpêtre sont cependent exceptés de cette permission générale d'importation, et ces deux articles ne pourront être importés, ni de Suède en Finlande, ni de Finlande en Suède.

ARTICLE 3. Les bâtimens Suédois, ouverts ou pontés, pourront fréquenter tous les ports de Finlande, sans payer d'autres droits de port et de batiment, que ceux qui existaient lorsque la Finlande était réunie à la Suède.

Il y aura à cet égard réciprocité parfaite en Suède, pour les batimens Finnois, ouverts ou pontés, et ces batimens pourront exporter d'un port de Suède, pour importer en un port de Finlande, le sel, le vin, les epiceries et les marchandises colonéales, dont l'importation est en général permise en Finlande, sans que pour lesdits articles et marchandises, il soit perçu, ni à leur sortie de Suède, ni à leur entrée en Finlande, des droits de douane plus forts ou autres, que si ces denrées venaient sur des batimens nationaux, directement du lieu même de leur production.

Il est expressément entendu, que les bâtimens ouverts, avant de pouvoir disposer de la cargaison, devront se présenter à une chambre de douane maritime, pour y acquitter les droits de douane, et qu'il ne sera fait aucune différence, dans ces droits, entre les batimens ouverts ou pontés.

Le goudron et la poix venant de Finlande pourront être importés en Suède et ré-exportés, sans payer aucun droit de douane.

Pour ce qui regarde les droits de pilote et de fanal, ils seront acquittés, d'après les ordonnances particulières, qui sont déja, ou pourront étre à l'avenir, en vigueur dans les deux pays.

Article 4. Les propriétaires de forges en Finlande pourront faire acheter et exporter annuellement de Suède, les mémes quantités de minerai et de fer de fonte, qui leur ont été accordées jusqu'ici, en observant toujours ce qui a été établi et usité, tant pour le contrôle à l'exportation, que pour le choix et la qualité de ces matières premières, c'est à dire, que l'exportation du fer de fonte, n'étant jamais permise, au de là de la quantité de neuf mille neuf cent quarante six et demi skeppund de Suède, par an, les propriétaires de forges seront aussi obligés de s'en tenir aux qualités que portent leurs privilèges, qui serviront de règle à cet égard; et pour l'exportation du minerai, elle ne dépassera jamais la quantité de vingt trois mille sept cent soixante sept skeppund, par an, et il sera pris des endroits et districts, où ce minerai a été puisé auparavant, savoir des mines de Sudermanie, dixneuf mille cinq cent cenquante six skeppund et de celles de Roslagen, quatre mille deux cent onze skeppund, ainsi que cele a été pratiqué jusqu'ici.

S'il arrive que les propriétaires des forges Finnoises ne trouvent pas convenable de faire usage chaque année, pendant la durée du présent traité, de la faculté qui leur a été accordée ci-dessus, jusqu'à la pleine concurrence des quantités stipulées, et que, par conséquent, ils fassent exporter moins de fer de fonte ou de minerai, qu'il n'a été indiqué ci-dessus, ce ne sera pas une raison pour eux d'augmenter, l'année suivante, l'exportation de ces matières premières, en faveur de la Finlande, mais il faudra toujours qu'on s'en tienne, pour chaque année, aux quantités ci-dessus déterminées.

Article 5. L'importation du bois de chauffage de Finlande en Suède restera permise, et les droits d'entrée et de sortie, soit à l'exportation de la Finlande, ou à l'importation en Suède, ne pourront un rix daler de banque de Suède, pour une corde de bois de bouleau, et trente deux schellings pour une corde de pin et de sapin.

Article 6. Les vaisseaux et bâtimens de commerce appartenant aux sujets de chacune des deux hautes parties contractantes, pourront importer du sel dans tour les ports de la domination de l'autre, en payant les mémes droits que les indigènes. Les bâtimens de commerce Suédois et Norvégiens auront en outre le droit d'entrepôt, pour cette marchandise, dans le port de St. Petersbourg et dans ceux de Livonie et de Courlande, sans étre assujétis por cela à aucun droit particulier.

Article 7. Les droits d'entrée pour l'importation en Suède du lin, du chanvre et des toiles qui viennent de Russie, seront réglés d'apriès les mémes principes qu'on adoptera en Russie, à l'égard de l'importation du sel, qui vient de Suède.

Article. 8. Le hareng, la morue sèche, l'alun et le rouge souffré pourront étre importés de Suède et de Norvège, dans les ports Russes de la Baltique, en ne payant que la moitié des droits fixés dans le tarif des douánes Russes pour lesdites marchandises.

La méme diminution de droits est accordé en Suède pour l'entrée du suif, et la Suède permet en outre l'importation des chandelles (de suif) moyennant un droit, tel qu'il sera fixé dans la taxe.

Article 9. Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvège aura le droit de faire exporter annuellement des ports du Golfe de Finlande ou de la mer Baltique, sous la domination de sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, jusqu'à la concurrence de deux cent mille tschetverts de blé, libre de tout droit de sortie, et sans qu'il soit fait aucune restriction ou exception, pour les années, où l'exportation seroit en général prohibée. Ceux qui feront les envois de devront étre munis, comme par le passé, des preuves nécessaires, pour justifier, que les achats ont été faits, pour le compte de sa Majesté Suédoise ou en vertu de son autorisation.

S'il arrivait, que la quantité stipulée ci-dessus n'eût pas été exportée, avant la fin de l'année, cela ne pourra pas servir à augmenter l'exportation dublé en faveur de la Suéde, pour l'année suivante.

Article 10. Le commerce Russe aura le droit d'entrepôt à Stockholm, à Christiania et à Hammerfest, outre celui, dont il jouira, aux mémes conditions, que les autres nations, à Carlshamn, à Gothembourg et à Landscrona. En revanche, le commerce Suédois et Norvégien jouira du droit d'entrepôt à St. Petersbourg, Riga, Revel Abo et Helsingfors.

Article 11. Les rapports de proximite et d'anciennes liaisons, qui existent entre la Suède et la Finlande, ayant rendu nécessaire de permettre, ainsi qu'il est statué ci-dessus, soit l'entrée de différentes marchandises, qui sont d'ailleurs prohibées, soit une diminution de droits pour d'autres, dès qu'elles sont d'origine Finnoise, ou qu'elles viennent de Suède ou de Finlande, les Gouvernemens respectifs des deux pays se réservent d'établir les contrôles et la qualité des certificats nécessaires pour prévenir les abus et constater l'origine des marchandises, qui devront jouir des avantages stipulés.

Article 12. La Norvège pourra exporter des ports de la Mer Blanche, jusqú'à la concurrence de vingt cinq mille tschetverts de blé, en laissant à Archangel la cinquième partie en sus, de ce qu'elle aura exporté, sauf à exiger, d'après la facture, le remboursement des frais d'achat et de transport.

Article 13. Les vaisseaux Russes, venant de la Mer Blanche dans les ports de la Laponie, pourront vendre leurs marchandises à bord de leurs bâtimens, pendant quatre semaines, dans les villes, non seulement aux paysans, mais aussi aux bâtimens Norvégiens, et dans tout autre port de la Laponie aux bâtimens Norvégiens, pendant quinze jours.

Article 14. Les bâtimens de commerce Russe de la Mer Blanche pourront mettre leurs marchandises en entrepôt à Hammerfest en Norvège, sans payer aucun droit de douáne à l'importation, et en ne payant que deux pour cent de la valeur de la marchandise à la sortie.

Article 15. L'huile de Baleine, importée de Norvège dans les ports de l'Empire Russe, ne payera que la moitié des droits fixés dans le tarif Russe.

Article 16. Les deux hautes parties contractantes sont convenues, de limiter la durée du présent réglement commercial, au terme de huit ans, à dater du commencement de l'année prochaine 1818.

Article 17. Les ratifications du présent reglement de commerce seront échangées à Moscou, dans l'espace de deux mois, ou plutôt, si faire se peut.

En foi de quoi nous soussigné, en vertu de nos plein pouvoirs, avons signé le present acte additionnel au traité de Fredrieshamn, et y avons apposé le cachet de nos armes. Fait à St. Pétersbourg, [29 Août,] 10 Septembre, l'an de Gráce mil huit cent dixsept.

Particulière.] STOCKHOLM, le 1 Juillet, 1827.

MONSIEUR: Ce n'est qu'après avoir pu conférer demain avec mes collègues que je pourrai vous envoyer, monsieur, la rédaction définitive de l'article séparé. Vous recevrez celui pour l'extradition des matelots aujourd'hui; de manière que nous pourrons de suite commencer à copier le traité.

J'ai beaucoup refléchi depuis hier à l'omission de l'invocation généralement usitée à la tête des traités: "Au nom de la Très Sainte et Indivisible Trinité" et je crains, qu'en l'omettant, nous ne nous fassions attribuer des motifs plus personnels, que d'un interêt général. Il ne s'agit point ici ni du signataire, ni même de celui qui ratifie, il s'agit de la totalité d'un pays qui traité avec un autre. Pourquoi s'écarter alors d'un usage généralement reçu par les Puissances Chretiennes, usage consigné, à l'égard des Etats Unis d'Amérique dans le traité de 1816, contresigné alors par le President d'aujourd'hui. Si cette formule pouvort heurter quelques dogmes nouveaux, son omission, pour cette cause, ne manqueroit pas d'en blesser d'autres, qui pourroient s'appuyer sur des cas précédens et sur les convenances. Plus la liberté se propage dans les opinions religieuses, plus la tolérance doit être son guide, car sans cela, elle peut s'égarer aussi facilement dans sa marche indépendante que la servile superstition au milieu de ses bûchers. N'innovons rien, par consequent, surtout dans un acte, où l'individu qui le signe ne proclame aucune profession de foi, ne renonce à aucune opinion tout en conservant une ancienne formule, et, où il parle au nom de la generalité de ses concitoyens, des trinitaires comme des unitaires. Vouloir substituer à cette formule, une autre, qui pactisât avec les diverses croyances religieuses, seroit nous placer sur une ligne turque, qui ne convient nullement ni à la Scandinavie constitutionnelle, ni à la libre Amérique.

Pardonnez cette petite digression théologique, portant comme je l'espère, l'empreinte de la doctrine tolérante que je professe, mais, surtout ayant été dictée par la considèration très distinguée que je vous ai voué, monsieur, et dont je vous prie de recevoir les nouvelles assurances.

MONSIEUR LE COMTE: Je viens d'avoir l'honneur de recevoir votre lettre particulière, et je n'attends pour commencer à copier le traité que l'article pour l'extradition des matelots, sur les principes duquel nous sommes tombés hier d'accord, et que votre excellence se propose de me remettre dans le courant de la journée.

Sans me rendre entièrement pour ce qui regarde mon pays, aux raisons que votre excellence fait valoir pour que l'invocation usitée jusqu'ici ne soit point omise en tête du traité. J'ai trop le désir de réciproquer l'esprit de conciliation qui a animé votre excellence pendant tout lecours de la negociation pour me refuser le plaisir de vous en donner une preuve en me désistant de ma demande, et je m'y prête d'autant plus volontiers que le traité n'ayant point été redigé sous les yeux de mon Gouvernement, ce n'est point sur lui, mais sur son negociateur que pourra peser la responsabilité de tout ce qui ne tient qu'à sa forme.

Croyez, monsieur le Comte, que personne n'attache un plus haut prix que moi à votre estime, et que rien ne sauroit désormais ajouter au profond respect, avec lequel j'ai l'honneur d'être de votre excellence.

Le très humble et obeissant serviteur,

PROVISIONS OF NINTH ARTICLE OF TREATY WITH SPAIN, OF FEBRUARY 22, 1819, RELATIVE TO LOSSES BY THE INVASIONS OF FLORIDA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 18, 1827.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject had been referred, made the following report:

By the resolution of this House, passed on the 11th instant, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to "inquire whether any further provisions by law be necessary to carry into effect the ninth article of the treaty, concluded on the 22d February, 1819, between his Catholic Majesty and the United States; and, further, to inquire into the propriety of extending the provisions of the act of the 3d of March, 1823, so as to embrace the losses occasioned by the invasions of Florida in 1812 and 1814." They have performed that duty, and are of the opinion that no further legislation is necessary to carry into effect the ninth article of said treaty; and that it is inexpedient to extend the provisions of the act of the 3d March, 1823, so as to embrace the losses occasioned by the invasions of Florida in 1812 and 1814. In this opinion the committee derive great confidence from the reasoning contained in the report (made March 10, 1826, No. 112) from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom this subject, by the order of the House at the 1st session of the 19th Congress, was referred, to which report they beg leave to refer.*

Wherefore, resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the said resolution, and that the persons interested have leave to withdraw their papers and vouchers.

CONVENTION OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION, WITH THE FREE HANSEATIC REPUBLICS OF LUBEC, BREMEN, AND HAMBURG.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 24, 1827.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, for their consideration and advice, a convention of friendship, navigation, and commerce, between the United States and the free Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, and Hamburg, signed by the respective plenipotentiaries of the parties on the 20th instant at this city. A copy of the convention is likewise enclosed.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 24, 1827.

CONVENTION OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION, BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE FREE HANSEATIC REPUBLICS OF LUBEC, BREMEN, AND HAMBURG.

The United States of America, on the one part, and the Republic and free Hanseatic city of Lubec, the Republic and free Hanseatic city of Bremen, and the Republic and free Hanseatic city of Hamburg, (each State for itself separately,) on the other part, being desirous to give greater facility to their commercial intercourse, and to place the privileges of their navigation on a basis of the most extended liberality, have resolved to fix, in a manner clear, distinct, and positive, the rules which shall be observed between the one and the other, by means of a convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation.

For the attainment of this most desirable object, the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on Henry Clay, their Secretary of State; and the Senate of the Republic and free Hanseatic city of Lubec, the Senate of the Republic and free Hanseatic city of Bremen, and the Senate of the Republic and free Hanseatic city of Hamburg have conferred full powers on Vincent Rumpff, their Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States of America: who, after having exchanged their said full powers, found in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The contracting parties agree that whatever kind of produce, manufacture, or merchandise of any foreign country can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into the United States in their own vessels, may be also imported in vessels of the said free Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, and Hamburg, and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage or cargo of the vessel shall be levied or collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the United States or of either of the said Hanseatic Republics. And, in like manner, that whatever kind of produce, manufacture, or merchandise of any foreign country can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into either of the said Hanseatic Republics in its own vessels, may be also imported in vessels of the United States; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage or cargo of the vessel shall be levied or collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one party or of the other. And they further agree that whatever may be lawfully exported or re-exported by one party in its own vessels to any foreign country, may, in like manner, be exported or re-exported in the vessels of the other party. And the same bounties, duties, and drawbacks shall be allowed and collected, whether such exportation or re-exportation be made in vessels of the one party or of the other. Nor shall higher or other charges of any kind be imposed in the ports of the one party on vessels of the other than are, or shall be, payable in the same ports by national vessels.

ARTICLE 2. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the produce or manufacture of the free Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, and Hamburg; and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into either of the said Republics of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States, than are, or shall be, payable on the like article being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any other or higher duties or charges be imposed by either party on the exportation of any articles to the United States or to the free Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, or Hamburg, respectively, than such as are, or shall be, payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the importation or exportation of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States, or of the free Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, or Hamburg, to or from the ports of the United States, or to or from the ports of the other party, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE 3. No priority or preference shall be given, directly or indirectly, by any or either of the contracting parties, nor by any company, corporation, or agent, acting on their behalf, or under their authority, in the purchase of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of their States, respectively, imported into the other on account of or in reference to the character of the vessel, whether it be of the one party or of the other, in which such article was imported; it being the true intent and meaning of the contracting parties that no distinction or difference whatever shall be made in this respect.

ARTICLE 4. In consideration of the limited extent of the territories of the Republics of Lubec, Bremen, and Hamburg, and of the intimate connexion of trade and navigation subsisting between these Republics, it is hereby stipulated and agreed that any vessel which shall be owned exclusively by a citizen or citizens of any or either of them, and of which the master shall also be a citizen of any or either of them, and provided three-fourths of the crew shall be citizens or subjects of any or either of the said Republics, or of any or either of the States of the Confederation of Germany, such vessel, so owned and navigated, shall, for all the purposes of this convention, be taken to be and considered as a vessel belonging to Lubec, Bremen, or Hamburg.

ARTICLE 5. Any vessel, together with her cargo, belonging to either of the free Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, or Hamburg, and coming from either of the said ports to the United States, shall, for all the purposes of this convention, be deemed to have cleared from the Republic to which such vessel belongs, although, in fact, it may not have been the one from which she departed; and any vessel of the United States and her cargo, trading to the ports of Lubec, Bremen, or Hamburg, directly or in succession, shall, for the like purposes, be on the footing of a Hanseatic vessel and her cargo making the same voyage.

ARTICLE 6. It is likewise agreed that it shall be wholly free for all merchants, commanders of ships, and other citizens of both parties, to manage, themselves, their own business in all the ports and places subject to the jurisdiction of each other, as well with respect to the consignment and sale of their goods and merchandise, by wholesale or retail, as with respect to the loading, unloading, and sending off their ships; submitting themselves to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, to which native citizens are subjected; they being, in all these cases, to be treated as citizens of the Republic in which they reside, or at least to be placed on a footing with the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 7. The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise; and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases; and if, in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years to dispose of the same as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all duties of detraction on the part of the Government of the respective States.

ARTICLE 8. Both the contracting parties promise and engage formally to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, of all occupations, who may be in the territories subject to the jurisdiction of the one or the other, transient or dwelling therein, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice for their judicial recourse on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or citizens of the country in which they may be; for which they may employ, in defence of their rights, such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors, as they may judge proper, in all their trials at law; and such citizens or agents shall have as free opportunity as native citizens to be present at the decisions and sentences of the tribunals in all cases which may concern them, and likewise at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ARTICLE 9. The contracting parties, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE 10. The present convention shall be in force for the term of twelve years from the date hereof; and further, until the end of twelve months after the Government of the United States, on the one part, or the free Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, or Hamburg, or either of them, on the other part, shall have given notice of their intention to terminate the same; each of the said contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at the end of the said term of twelve years; and it is hereby agreed between them, that, at the expiration of twelve months after such notice shall have been received by either of the parties from the other, this convention, and all the provisions thereof, shall, altogether, cease and determine, as far as regards the States giving and receiving such notice; it being always understood and agreed that, if one or more of the Hanseatic Republics aforesaid shall, at the expiration of twelve years from the date hereof, give or receive notice of the proposed termination of this convention, it shall, nevertheless, remain in full force and operation, as far as regards the remaining Hanseatic Republics or Republic which may not have given or received such notice.

ARTICLE 11. The present convention being approved and ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the Senates of the Hanseatic Republics of Lubec, Bremen, and Hamburg, the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within nine months from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the contracting parties, have signed the present convention, and have thereto affixed our seals.

Done, in quadruplicate, at the city of Washington, on the twentieth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, in the fifty-second year of the Independence of the United States of America.

CONVENTION D'AMITIE, DE COMMERCE, ET DE NAVIGATION, ENTRE LES REPUBLIQUES LIBRES ET ANSEATIQUES DE LUBEC, BREMEN, ET HAMBOURG, ET LES ETATS UNIS D'AMERIQUE.

La République et ville libre et Anséatique de Lubec, la République et ville libre et Anséatique de Bremen, et la République et ville libre et Anséatique de Hambourg, (chacun de ces Etats pour soi séparément,) d'une part; et les Etats Unis d'Amérique, d'autre part; désirant accorder plus de facilités à leurs relations commerciales, et établir les privilèges de leur navigation sur les bases de la liberalité la plus étenduc; sont convenus d'arréter d'une maniere claire, distincte, et positive, par une convention d'amitié, de commerce, et de navigation, les règles qui doivent être observées entre eux.

Pour atteindre ce but désirable, le Sénat de la République et ville libre et Anséatique de Lubec, le Sénat de la République et ville libre et Anséatique de Bremen, et le Sénat de la République et ville libre et Anséatique de Hambourg, ont muni de pleins pouvoirs, Vincent Rumpff, leur Ministre Plénipotentiaire près les Etats Unis d'Amérique; et le Président des Etats Unis d'Amérique a muni de pleins pouvoirs Henri Clay, leur Secrétaire d'Etat; lesquels, après avoir échangé leurs dits pleins pouvoirs, trouvés en bonne et due forma, ont arrété les articles suivans:

ARTICLE 1. Les parties contractantes conviennent que toutes sortes de productions, manufactures, ou marchandises, provenant de quelque pays étranger que ce soit, qui, de temps à autre pourront être légalement importées dans l'une desdites Républiques Anséatiques de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg par leurs propres bâtimens, pourront aussi y être importées par les bâtimens des Etats Unis; et qu'il ne sera imposé ni perçu sur le tonnage ou la cargaison du bâtiment, d'autres, ni de plus forts droits, soit que l'importation ait lieu par bâtimens de l'une desdites Républiques, soit par ceux des Etats Unis. Et pareillement, que toutes sortes de productions, manufactures, ou marchandises, provenant de quelque pays étranger que ce soit, qui, de temps à autre, pourront être légalement importées dans les Etats Unis, par bâtimens desdits Etats, pourront également y être importées par les bâtimens desdites Républiques Anséatiques; et qu'il ne sera imposé ni perçu, sur le tonnage ou la cargaison du bâtiment, d'autres, ni de plus forts droits, soit que l'importation ait lieu par bâtimens de l'une des parties, soit par ceux de l'autre. Elles conviennent, en outre que tout ce qui pourra étre légalement exporté ou ré-exporté, pour quelque pays étranger que ce soit, par les bâtimens de l'une des parties contractantes, pourra également en être exporté ou ré-exporté, par ceux de l'autre partié; et les mémes droits, primes et remboursemens de droits seront perçus et alloués, soit que l'exportation ou la ré-exportation ait lieu par bâtimens de l'une des parties, soit par ceux de l'autre. Il ne sera imposé dans les ports de l'une des deux parties, sur les bâtimens de l'autre, aucuns droits ou charges, de quelque nature qu'ils puissent étre, plus forts ou autres que ceux qui seront imposés dans les mémes ports sur les bâtimens nationaux.

ARTICLE 2. Il ne sera imposé d'autres, ni de plus forts droits sur l'importation dans les Républiques libre set Anséatiques de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, des articles provenant du sol ou des manufactures des Etats Unis; et il ne sera imposé d'autres ni de plus forts droits sur l'importation dans les Etats Unis des articles provenant du sol ou des manufactures desdites Républiques, que ceux qui sont, ou seront imposés sur les mémes articles provenant du sol ou des manufactures de tout autre pays étranger. De méme, il ne sera imposé, par l'une des parties, sur l'exportation de quelque article que ce soit, pour les Républiques libres et Anséatiques, de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, ou pour les Etats Unis, respectivement, d'autres, ni de plus forts droits que ceux qui sont ou seront imposés sur l'exportation des mémes articles pour tout autre pays étranger. De méme, il ne sera imposé sur l'importation ou sur l'exportation des articles provenant du sol ou des manufactures des Républiques libres et Anséatiques de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, ou des Etats Unis, à l'entrée ou à la sortie des ports des Républiques Anséatiques, ou de ceux de l'autre partie, aucune prohibition que ne soit pas également applicable à toute autre nation.

ARTICLE 3. Il ne sera accordé, ni directement, ni indirectement, par l'une ou par l'autre des parties contractantes, ni par aucune compagnie, corporation, ou agent agissant en son nom, ou par son autorité, aucune priorité ou préférence quelconque, pour l'achat d'aucune production du sol ou de l'industrié de leurs Etats respectifs, importée, dans le territoire de l'autre, à cause, ou en consideration de la nationalité du navire qui aurait transporté cette production, soit qu'il appartienne à l'une des parties, soit à l'autre: l'intention bien positive des deux parties contractantes étant qu'aucune différence ou distinction quelconque n'ait lieu à cet égard.

ARTICLE 4. En considération de l'ètendue limitée des territoires des Républiques de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, et de l'intime liaison commerce et de navigation subsistante entre ces Républiques; il est ici stipulé et convenue, que tout navire appartenant exclusivement à un ou plusieurs citoyens de l'une ou des autres desdites Républiques, et dont le capitaine sera aussi citoyen de l'une desdites Républiques; pourvu que les trois quarts de l'equipage se composent de citoyens ou sujets d'une ou de plusieurs desdites Républiques, ou d'un ou de plusieurs des Etats de la Confédération Germanique; ledit navire sera considéré, pour tous les objets de cette convention, comme navire appartenant à Lubec, Bremen, ou Hambourg.

ARTICLE 5. Tout bâtiment, ainsi que sa cargaison, appurtenant à l'une des Républiques Anséatiques de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, et venant de l'un des ports des susdites Républiques aux Etats Unis, sera considéré, pour tous les objets de cette convention, comme venant de la République à laquelle il appartient, quoique, dans le fait, ce port ne soit pas celui d'où il aurait fait voile: et tout bâtiment des Etats Unis, ainsi, que sa cargaison, trafiquant, directement, ou successivement, avec les ports de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, sera placé, pour ces mémes objets, sur le méme pieds qu'un bâtiment Anséatique, et sa cargaison, faisante le méme voyage.

ARTICLE 6. Il est, en outre, convenu, que les négocians, capitaines de navires, et autres citoyens des deux parties, pourront, eux-mémes, diriger librement leurs propres affaires, dans tous les ports et places soumis à la juridiction de chacune d'elles, tant pour ce qui a rapport à la consignation, et à la vente, engros et en détail, de leurs denrées et marchandises, que pour ce qui regarde le chargement, déchargement, et expédition de leurs bâtiments; en se conformant aux lois, décrets et usages y établis, auxquels les citoyens de l'etat sont assujettis; ils seront, dans tous ces cas, traités comme sujets de la République dans laquelle ils résideront; ou, du moins, ils seront placés sur le méme pied que les citoyens ou sujets de la nation la plus favorisée.

ARTICLE 7. Les citoyens de chacune des parties contractantes pourront disposer de leurs biens personnels, dans les limites de la juridiction de l'autre, par vente, donation, testament ou autrement; et leurs héritiers, étant citoyens de l'autre partie, succéderont auxdits biens personnels, soit en vertu d'un testament, soit ab intestato; ils pourront en prendre possession, soit en personne, soit par d'autres agissant en leur place; et ils en disposeront, à leur volonté en ne payant d'autres droits que ceux auxquels les habitans du pays où se trouvent lesdits biens, sont assujettis en pareille occasion. Et si, dans le cas de biens immeubles, lesdits héritiers ne pouvaient entrer en jouissance de l'héritage, à cause de leur qualité d'etrangers, il leur sera accordé un délai de trois ans, pour en disposer à leur gré, et pour en retirer le produit sans obstacle, et exempt de tous droits de détraction, de la part des Gouvernemens des Etats respectifs.

ARTICLE 8. Les deux parties contractantes promettene, et s'engagent formellement d'accorder leur protection spéciale aux personnes et propriétés des citoyens de chacune d'elles, quelles que soient leurs occupations, qui pourraient se trouver dans les territoires soumis à leur juridiction, soit pour y voyager, soit pour y séjourner; leur accordant pleine liberté de recourrir aux cours de justice, pour leurs affaires litigieuses, aux mêmes conditions qui seront accordées, par l'usage, au citoyens du pays où ils se trouveront; et d'employer, dans leurs procés, pour la défense de leurs droits, tels avocats, avoués, notaires, agens ou mandataires qu'ils trouveront convenable de choisir; et lesdits citoyens, et leurs agens, jouiront de la méme liberté que ceux du pays d'assister aux decisions, et sentences des tribunaux, dans tous les cas où ils s'y trouveront intéressés, ainsi qu' à l'examen des témoins qui seraient appelés dans lesdits procés.

ARTICLE 9. Les parties contractantes désirant vivre en paix et harmonie avec toutes les nations de la terre, en observant envers chacune, également, une politique franche et amicale; s'engagent mutuellement à n'accorder aucune faveur particuliere à d'autres nations, en fait de commerce et de navigation, qui ne devienne aussitôt commune à l'autre partie; et celle ci jouira de cette faveur gratuitement, si la concession est gratuite, ou en accordant la méme compensation, si la concession est conditionnelle.

ARTICLE 10. La présente convention sera en vigueur pendant douze ans à dater de ce jour; et audela de ceterme, jusqu'à l'expiration de douze mois après que l'un ou l'autre des Gouvernement des Républiques Anséatiques de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, d'une part, ou le Gouvernement des Etats Unis, d'autre part, aura annoncé à l'autre son intention de la terminer; chacune des parties contractantes se réservant le droit de faire à l'autre une telle déclaration, au bout des douze ans susmentionnés; et il est convenue entre elles, qu'à l'expiration de douze mois après qu'une telle déclaration de l'une des parties aura été reçue par l'autre, cette convention, et toutes les stipulations y contenues, cesseront d'être obligatoires, par rapport aux Etats qui donneront ou recevront cette déclaration: bien entendu et convenu que si l'une ou plusieurs desdites Républiques Anséatiques, à l'expiration de douze ans, à dater de ce jour, donnent ou reçoivent la déclaration de la cessation proposée de cette convention, ladite convention restera, néanmoins, en pleine force et effet par rapport à cella ou à celles des Républiques Anséatiques, qui n'aura, ou qui n'auront, ni donné ni reçu cette declaration.

ARTICLE 11. La présente convention étant approuvée et ratifiée par les Sénats des Républiques Anséatiques de Lubec, Bremen, et Hambourg, et par le President des Etats Unis, par, et avec l'avis et le consentement du Sénat desdits Etats, les ratifications en seront échangées à Washington dans l'espace de neuf mois, à dater de ce jour, ou plutôt, si faire se peut.

En foi de quoi les plénipotentiaires des parties contractantes ont signé la présente convention, et y ont apposé leurs sceaux.

INDEMNITY FOR SLAVES CARRIED AWAY BY THE FORCES OF GREAT BRITAIN IN 1815.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, DECEMBER 31, 1827.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, requesting a communication of the instructions to the American Minister at London for the negotiation of the convention of November 13, 1826, with Great Britain, for indemnity to the claimants under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, together with the letters of the minister accompanying and explaining the said convention, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, together with the documents desired.

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1826.

SIR: I have received instructions to make known to the Government of the United States the intentions of his Majesty's Government with regard to some points arising out of the commission under the convention of St. Petersburg of the 12th July, 1822.

I have to express the sincere regret of his Majesty's Government at finding themselves under the absolute impossibility of accepting the terms of compromise offered by the envoy from the United States in London in satisfaction of all claims arising under the abovementioned convention. The terms of that compromise are considered as wholly inadmissible; and for the grounds of that opinion I have only to refer you to the correspondence which has taken place between his Majesty's Government and Mr. King.

I am directed to declare to the Government of the United States that his Majesty's Government cannot consent to allow that the question of interest upon arrears of moneys which may be awarded to claimants should be referred to the arbitration of the commission, and also that the demand of interest itself is resisted, as it is not contained in the convention, and declared to be unfounded by the law officers of the Crown.

It is the earnest desire of his Majesty's Government that the labors of the commission should terminate speedily and amicably, convinced that, by adhering strictly to the convention, full and impartial justice will be administered to every claimant upon the British Government.

I have the honor to request that you will accept the assurances of my highest consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Vaughan.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 15, 1826.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of the letter, under date the 12th instant, which you did the honor to address to me; and having submitted it to the President of the United States, I have his directions for the answer which I am now to communicate.

The proposal of a compromise, made by Mr. King, proceeded from a belief that the interests of both Great Britain and the United States would be promoted by fixing upon a gross sum, to be paid in lieu of the amount of the awards of a commission, whose progress had been attended with much difficulty, and whose duration was altogether uncertain. It was also believed that a compromise was conformable to the wishes of Great Britain. If the commission would proceed to execute, according to its true intent and meaning, the convention of St. Petersburg, the Government of the United States would prefer the aggregate amount of their adjudications to any sum on which the two Governments might have agreed by way of compromise, because that amount would express exactly the measure of indemnification which is due to the citizens of the United States under the decision of his Imperial Majesty, whilst a substituted sum could only be an estimate of it somewhat uncertain. In declining the proposal of Mr. King it would have corresponded with the friendly spirit in which it was conceived and brought forward if the British Government had stated what were its views of admissible terms of compromise. From the nature of the subject, in considering the terms of any compromise, absolute precision as to the exact amount of indemnity due is unattainable. The opinion of each party necessarily depends upon the view which he happens to take of the facts and principles involved, and may be also effected, without his consciousness, by the bias of his own wishes and interests. It therefore often, if not always, happens that no compromise, in any case, can be effected until the parties have exchanged proposals, and thus attempted to reconcile conflicting interests. In contenting itself, as the British Government has done, with a simple negative of the offer of Mr. King, after having invited him to make it, without putting forward any other proposal, the Government of the United States has been disappointed in the fulfilment of a just expectation.

The declaration which you have been directed to make, that his Britannic Majesty's Government cannot consent to allow that the question of interest should be referred to the arbitration of the commission, has been received with surprise. By the fifth article of the convention it is provided that, "in the event of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, or of their disagreement upon any question which may result from the stipulations of this convention, then and in that case they shall draw by lot the name of one of the two arbitrators, who, after having given due consideration to the matter contested, shall consult with the Commissioners, and a final decision shall be given conformably to the opinion of the majority of the two Commissioners, and of the arbitrator so drawn by lot. And the arbitrator, when so acting with the two Commissioners, shall be bound in all repects by the rules of proceeding enjoined by the fourth article of this convention upon the Commissioners, and shall be vested with the same powers, and be deemed, for that case, a Commissioner."

The Commissioners have disagreed in several cases, in which the American Commissioner has offered to designate an arbitrator in the mode provided by that article, and the British Commissioner has refused his concurrence. One of those cases is the question of interest to which you refer; but it is not the only case. The scheme of the commission is, that, in all decisions whatever arising under the convention, there shall be at least two voices, that is to say, those of the two Commissioners themselves if they can agree, and, if they cannot, those of one of the Commissioners and one of the arbitrators. The convention nowhere gives any countenance to the idea that the decision of one Commissioner in any case under examination is to be absolute and definitive. But if the refusal of the British Commissioner to give effect to the fifth article by casting lots for the arbitrator is upheld and justified, the decision of that Commissioner is, in effect, final and conclusive, and the commission is no longer mixed, (American and British,) but becomes simply and purely a British commission. If, as you are instructed to declare, interest is not contained in the convention, it needed no declaration of the law officers of the Crown that it was unfounded. Whether it be comprehended in the convention or not, as a part of the indemnity for which it stipulates, properly belongs to the Commissioners to determine. They are divided on that question—one entertaining the opinion that it is, and the other that it is not, a part of the indemnity. Here is the precise contingency for which the office of arbitrator is created in the convention. We are prepared to show, if it were proper now to enter on the discussion, that interest is a fair and just component part of the indemnification which the convention stipulated, and that, without interest, it would fall far short of the intention of his Imperial Majesty's decision. If the refusal of the British Commissioner to co-operate in the designation of an arbitrator is to be sanctioned in this instance, his refusal in every other case of disagreement between him and the American Commissioner may be equally supported, which would be equivalent to the dismission altogether of the American Commissioner, and an exclusive transfer of the whole business of the commission to the sole determination of the British Commissioner. It is therefore necessary to inquire whether the British Government means to assume, as a general principle, that the British Commissioner has a right, in all cases of disagreement between him and his associate, to refuse his concurrence to the appointment of an arbitrator; and if not, what is the principle for which they do contend, with its limitations; and, also, whether they mean to justify his refusal in cases of disagreement which have actually occurred other than that on the point of interest.

Concurring entirely in the sentiment expressed by you, that the labors of the commission should be speedily brought to an amicable conclusion, the American Government has seen, with approbation, the readiness which their Commissioner has displayed, in every instance in which he has unfortunately disagreed with his associate, to proceed to the appointment of an arbitrator. Should other disagreements arise between them in the future progress of the commission, he will, no doubt, continue to manifest the same disposition. And the hope is confidently indulged that, upon reconsideration, the good faith which ought ever to characterize the execution of national engagements will induce the British Government to cause the fulfilment of the fifth article according to the plain import of both its spirit and the terms in which it is expressed.

I pray you to accept assurances of my high consideration.

H. CLAY.

Right Hon. CHARLES R. VAUGHAN,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain.

WASHINGTON, April 17, 1826.

SIR: I had the honor on the 12th instant to acquaint you with the decision of his Majesty's Government upon certain points arising out of the convention of St. Petersburg. I should have confined myself to that communication, which I made in compliance with instructions from his Majesty's Government, but I cannot refrain from taking notice of some observations contained in your note of the 15th instant.

I cannot acquiesce in the latitude which you are disposed to give to the powers of the Commissioners under the convention of St. Petersburg, and I do not think that the refusal of the British Commissioner to have recourse to an arbitrator has been exercised in a manner to justify the apprehension which you express of the course of investigation likely in future to be followed by the commission. Upon inquiry I find that the British Commissioner has, in three instances only, refused to have recourse to drawing lots for an arbitrator. In the one instance, the commission was required to admit a claim after the definitive list was closed; in another, he refused to submit to arbitration the claim for slaves carried from Dauphin island; and on the third occasion he would not consent to allow the claim for interest to be decided by arbitration in the commission, in which he has been justified by the decision of his Majesty's Government.

I am led to believe, from your note of the 15th instant, that you are under an impression that the offer of compromise lately made by Mr. King, in satisfaction of all claims arising under the convention of St Petersburg, had been invited by his Majesty's Government. On a reference to the correspondence with Mr. King on that occasion you will not find any manifestation of a wish on the part of his Majesty's Government that such an offer should be made, which, as it appears to me, originated in a conviction, very justly entertained by Mr. King, that it would be equally agreeable to both Governments.

I request that you will do me the honor to accept the assurances of my highest consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Vaughan.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 19, 1826.

SIR: Although there is not much utility in prolonging the correspondence recently commenced between us, if, as I have understood you, the instructions which you have received from your Government are restricted to the single object which you communicated in your former note, to prevent any misinterpretation of my silence the note which you did the honor to address to me on the 17th instant demands some remarks.

Far from being disposed to expand the powers of the Commissioners under the convention of St. Petersburg, the Government of the United States only desires a strict and faithful execution of its positive stipulations. It cannot consent that one party, in a tribunal so constituted as that the voices of both ought to be equally heard, should assume the sole power of deciding any particular case under its examination. Such an assumption would have been inadmissible if the convention had not foreseen the possibility of a disagreement between the two members of that tribunal; but, anticipating the contingency, it has, with a wise forecast, made ample provision for it. That provision is a reference to the arbitration of the convention of their disagreement upon any question resulting from its stipulations. In the refusal, therefore, to refer the question of interest, and the other questions on which the Commissioners have divided, to arbitration, the Government of the United States has seen, with regret, an attempt to contract the stipulations of the convention within limits inconsistent with its plain and manifest import. The convention, expounded according to its true intention, carries within itself the means of its certain and unobstructed execution. When the Commissioners happen, unfortunately, to disagree in any case under their consideration, the remedy is specified. But if the Government of the United States could acquiesce in the course which has been pursued, the effect would be to remit the parties back to the state in which they stood when the appeal was made to the umpirage of the Emperor of Russia, and to revive discussions which, having then led to no reconcilement of their views, were supposed to be terminated by the imperial decision, and the convention made to give it complete operation. If, as you suppose, the number of instances is not great in which the British Commissioner has refused to consent to the reference to the arbitration of the convention, one of them, nevertheless, comprehends every claim to indemnity which can arise under the convention, and another includes all the slaves belonging to citizens of Louisiana, to which the highest average price has been affixed. What may be the future course of the British Commissioner can only be anticipated from the past; and the American Government is not prepared to express its willingness that the execution of the convention should proceed upon the unequal condition of allowing that the British Commissioner may, at any moment, arrest its progress by interposing his refusal to give effect to the fifth article. But it is prepared to say, and I am directed by the President to repeat to you, that the American Commissioner is ready diligently to proceed with the labors of the commission, and, in the event, which has happened, and which, unfortunately, may again happen, of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, or of their disagreement upon any question which may result from the stipulations of the convention, to cast lots for an arbitrator in the mode for which it expressly provides. And the hope is yet indulged that the British Government, faithful to its solemn engagements, and respectful to the memory of the august and lamented personage out of whose decision they sprung, will concur with that of the United States in communicating to the Commissioners the wish that they would refer all cases of disagreements. But if his Britannic Majesty's Government should adhere to the declaration which you have announced, I must then repeat the inquiry contained in my last note, whether the British Government means to assert, as a general principle, that the British Commissioner has a right, in all cases of disagreement between him and his associate, to refuse his concurrence to the appointment of an arbitrator; and if not, what is the principle for which they do contend, with its limitations? And also whether they mean to justify his so refusing in cases of disagreement which have actually occurred other than that on the point of interest?

My former note was not intended to convey the idea that a compromise was invited, in the first instance, by the British Government; but it was intended to say, and the correspondence between Mr. Canning and Mr. King fully bears out, that the British Government did expressly invite the American Minister to specify a sum which would be satisfactory to the United States by way of compromise. He promptly, and without condition, suggested a sum. And I must continue to think that a spirit of frank and friendly negotiation required that, in rejecting as inadmissible the sum so specified, the British Government ought to have stated a sum which would correspond with its own views.

I have the honor to renew assurances of my distinguished consideration.

H. CLAY.

Right Hon. CHARLES R. VAUGHAN,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain.

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, September 20, 1826.

SIR: The correspondence which took place between us in the month of April last, relative to the refusal of the British Government to admit the claim of interest upon the sums which may be awarded by the Commissioners under the convention of St. Petersburg, having been submitted by me to the consideration of his Majesty's Government, I have been lately put in possession of the view which has been taken of some of the leading points contained in that correspondence, which I think that it is my duty to communicate to you.

In the first place, his Majesty's Government has observed that in the notes which I have had the honor to receive from you, dated the 15th and the 19th of April last, an erroneous construction has been put upon the conduct of the British Commissioner at Washington, and upon the motives of the Government for approving that conduct.

His Majesty's Government do not think it necessary to reply to the alleged assumption by the British Commissioner of the sole right of deciding in certain cases proposed for arbitration within the commission by his American colleague, as no such right is assumed by the British Commissioner.

I have to assure you that his Majesty's Government are prepared to execute, in all their extent, the stipulations of the convention of 1822, and to admit the reference to arbitration by the commission of all points which fall within the provisions of that instrument. It is because the points proposed by the American Commissioner do not fall within the provisions of the convention that the British Government decline to acquiesce in the proposed reference of those points to arbitration.

The words of the convention are, (article 5,) "In the event of the disagreement of the two Commissioners upon any question which may result from the stipulations of this convention," &c.

Now, the question of interest on moneys awarded as indemnity under the convention cannot be said to fall within this description, which evidently applies only to such questions as are either specified in the convention, or are essentially part of its stipulations.

The question of interest certainly is not specified in the convention; as little can it be affirmed to be of the essence of the convention, to which, in fact, it is totally extraneous.

The commission under the convention of St. Petersburg was established for one specific purpose, namely, the adjudication of certain prescribed objects, and within certain prescribed limits. Neither the one party nor the other can be permitted to exceed those limits by assuming to himself the power of introducing into such instrument an arbitrary extension of its objects, nor can the British Government admit, as if it were a mere construction of doubtful terms, the interpolation of a claim totally new, and notoriously never in the contemplation of the framers of that instrument.

The mode of reasoning adopted in your correspondence would go to bring within the jurisdiction of the commission, and to subject to reference to decision by a commission of arbitration, any the most unforeseen and extravagant demand that could be set up by one party against the other.

It seems quite clear to the British Government that the Commissioners are competent to act only under the instrument by virtue of which they are appointed, and that nothing can be subject of reference to arbitration under the commission which is not of the jurisdiction of the commission.

Each Commissioner must undoubtedly judge for himself what subjects are, and what are not, of the competence of the commission. It is a power which both Commissioners have exercised; for, if in the instance now in question, the British Commissioner has objected to a reference to arbitration proposed by his colleague, the American Commissioner has done the like with respect to the proposal of the British Commissioner to refer to arbitration the question of the propriety of submitting, or not submitting, to the inspection of the public the list of deported slaves furnished by the British Admiralty.

It is thought to be a sufficient reply to the interrogations contained in your notes that each party has equally claimed and acted upon what you term the "assumption by the British Commissioner of the sole right of deciding on certain points."

With regard to the demand of the Government of the United States respecting slaves taken away from Dauphin island, reference need only be made to the terms of the convention of July 12, 1822, and to those of the treaty of Ghent, to show that demand to be totally unfounded.

The award of the Emperor of Russia, prefixed to the convention, runs thus: "The United States are entitled to claim from Great Britain a just indemnification for all the slaves that the British forces may have carried away from the places and territories of which the treaty of Ghent stipulates the restitution."

Now, that treaty provides that "all territories, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, shall be restored without delay, and without carrying away any slaves or other private property."

The places herein alluded to can, of course, be such possessions only as essentially belonging to, not merely occupied by, one party were captured by the other; no other construction is to be sustained.

To maintain, therefore, this claim, it must be shown that Dauphin island was an American possession at the moment of its capture by the British forces. But it is notorious that it was not so, and that it did not become so until the year 1819, when it was formally ceded to the United States by Spain.

To show that Dauphin island was, in 1814, considered by us as Spanish, it is only necessary to advert to the instructions issued in July of that year to the British officers engaged in hostilities against the United States, especially enjoining them not to infringe the neutrality of that territory so long as the Spanish Government should remain at peace with the United States.

The British forces did, in fact, take possession of the island, not as belonging to the United States, but merely as a position occupied at the time by the American forces.

To show that that territory was equally considered Spanish by the Americans themselves, it is only necessary to refer to the papers of some of the claimants presented to the Board of Commissioners, in which they actually urge as an aggravation of their grievances "that in going to Pensacola (in West Florida) to demand restoration of their slaves from the British commander they considered themselves in a neutral territory, and subject to the protection of the Spanish Government."

No subsequent transfer of the spot so occupied by Spain, its lawful owner, to the United States, can affect retrospectively the undoubted title of Spain at a period previous to such transfer.

The convention provides compensation for matters taken from places which were American property at the time of such taking, not from any places which may subsequently have become so.

I have thought it my duty to announce to you the opinions entertained by his Majesty's Government upon certain points treated of in the correspondence which I had the honor to hold with you in the month of April last upon the subject of the convention of St. Petersburg. I am particularly instructed, when doing so, to assure you that his Majesty's Government entertain an unabated and anxious desire to bring to as speedy a termination as possible the commission under that convention, and a confident hope is entertained that, in furtherance of this object, any differences of opinion which may arise between the respective parties, as to references to arbitration, may be set aside for consideration hereafter, and may not be suffered to obstruct the course of the investigation, or to preclude the settlement of the claims successively presented to the board.

I have the honor to request that you will accept the assurances of my highest consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Vaughan.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 12, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note, under date the 20th ultimo, communicating the view which has been taken by the British Government of some of the leading points of the correspondence between us, in the month of April last, relating to the execution of the convention at St. Petersburg, in 1822, for carrying into effect the decisions of his Imperial Majesty the late Emperor of Russia.

The President learns, with extreme regret, that the British Government perseveres in its approbation of the refusal of the British Commissioner to refer the controverted question of interest to the arbitration for which the convention provides, as proposed by the American Commissioner; and that it, moreover, not only approves of his rejection of the claim to indemnity for the slaves taken away from Dauphin island, but sanctions his refusal also to refer to the same arbitration the decision of that claim as was likewise proposed by the American Commissioner. And the President finds himself altogether unable, from the observations contained in your note, to reach the conclusions to which the British Government has brought itself. If, as stated, any erroneous construction had been put by him upon the conduct of the British Commissioner, and upon the motives of his Britannic Majesty's Government in approving it, the President would have been happy to have been made sensible of it, and he would instantly have corrected it. It never was contended on our part, in the correspondence referred to, that the British Commissioner assumed, in terms, the sole power of deciding cases brought before the commission, but that such was the effect of his refusal to submit them to arbitration upon the allegation of their not being comprehended within the convention. And if, as has happened, he has refused to refer every case on which he and his colleague have differed to arbitration, and his Government sanctions this non-execution of the convention, the result is not that his sole voice decides all such cases, provided there is acquiescence on our side, it is difficult to understand what is the result.

The British Government now professes to be willing to admit the reference to arbitration of all points which fall within the provision of the convention, and alleges that the reference is refused of those proposed to be referred by the American Commissioner because they do not fall within that instrument. And it seeks to justify, in respect to the particular question of interest, the refusal to arbitrate it because it is alleged that interest on moneys awarded as indemnity under the convention cannot be said to fall within the description which evidently applies only to such questions as are either specified in the convention or are essentially part of its stipulations. And it asserts that the question of interest is not specified in the convention, nor is it of the essence of the convention, to which, in fact, it is extraneous.

The American Government, no more than that of his Britannic Majesty, desires the reference of any question arising on any point that does not come within the convention; and it is upon the full conviction that interest is so included that it cannot admit the propriety of the refusal to arbitrate it. It is certain that the subject of interest, eo nomine, is not specified in the convention, but neither is principal. The convention was framed to secure the just indemnity awarded by the imperial decision, but neither that instrument nor the imperial decision proceeds to what, perhaps, was considered unnecessary to enumerate the items which should compose that just indemnity. His Imperial Majesty confided, and, no doubt, thought he had safely confided, to the justice and intelligence of the representatives of two highly commercial nations the ascertainment of the component parts of a just indemnity for long-standing injuries. If a justification for the rejection of one of those component parts is to be found in the omission of the convention expressly to specify it, the same justification exists for the rejection of every other component part.

It is true that the commission, under the convention of St. Petersburg, was constituted for a specified purpose, which was to give effect to the imperial decision in favor of the claim of the United States to "a just indemnification for all private property which the British forces may have carried away; and, as the question relates to slaves more especially, for all the slaves that the British forces may have carried away from places and territories of which the treaty stipulates the restitution in quitting these same places and territories." In ascertaining the rights of the United States and the duties of the commission we must, therefore, look both to the imperial decision and the convention of St. Petersburg. The decision is the substratum; the convention is the instrument or means only of effectuating it. And if, as is readily admitted, neither party is entitled to exceed the limits which the decision and the convention, its offspring, prescribe, so is neither party authorized to curtail or circumscribe those limits. In determining whether the imputation to the United States of a wish to interpolate a claim totally new be just or not, there must be a solution of the question, of what is a just indemnification, according to the true intent of the imperial decision? And before the British Government could be justified in making such an imputation, it ought to have been prepared to show that the sufferers in the loss of productive property transported now nearly twelve years ago in contravention to the provisions of the treaty of Ghent, will have received a just indemnification for their losses by now obtaining the value of their property, at the moment of its illegal transportation, without interest or any compensation in the nature of damages. This has been neither shown nor can be proved. In lieu of proofs, the British Government contents itself with asserting that the claim of interest was notoriously never in the contemplation of the framers of the convention. This assertion, whether founded upon their intention as deducible from the instrument, or extraneous to it, cannot be admitted.

Your note proceeds to allege that the mode of reasoning adopted in those which I had the honor to address to you in April last, would go to bring within the jurisdiction of the commission, and to subject to reference to decision by a commission of arbitration, any the most unforeseen and extravagant demand that could be set up by one party against the other. What part of the reasoning of those notes deserves to be thus characterized it is not easy to understand. They claimed only the fair execution of the convention. It was stated in them, and the offer was made to prove, whenever the British Government should be willing to enter on the discussion, that interest was fairly demandable. And any wish on the part of the Government of the United States was disclaimed to extend the provisions of the convention beyond its fair import. If, indeed, any unfounded claim should be preferred under the convention by a citizen of the United States, the British Government has adequate security for its rejection in the integrity and intelligence of the tribunal which is to pronounce upon it. The probability is much greater of the loss of just demands, by the defect of proof from the lapse of time and the difficulty in substantiating them, than that the British Government should be subjected to the payment of any that are unjust.

The doctrines contained in your note would lead to withdraw from the jurisdiction of the commission every claim, however just, and however manifestly it might fall within the meaning of the convention. According to these doctrines, whenever the British Commissioner rejects a claim, if he also refuse to refer it to arbitration, there is an end of it. The ready suggestion is always at hand, that it does not fall within the terms of the convention. If, as may be asserted, the United States have a security against injustice in the intelligence and uprightness of the British Commissioner, the answer is, that whatever may be the degree of the confidence of their Government in his profession of those qualities, that was not the only security which had been stipulated. It was a security resulting from a tribunal of two or three, according to contingencies, and not one for which the convention provides.

The Government of the United States has never objected to the right of each Commissioner judging for himself what subjects are, and what are not, within the competence of the commission. It has objected only to the assumption of a right, on the part of the British Commissioner, to judge both for himself and for his American colleague, and to his making his sole decision final and conclusive without resorting to the arbitrator who was to be called upon "in the event of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, or of their disagreement upon any question which may result from the stipulations of the convention." With respect to the instance adduced to prove that each Commissioner has exercised the right to refuse a reference to arbitration, it is to be observed that the proposal of the British Commissioner to refer the question of the propriety of submitting, or not submitting, to the inspection of the public, the list of deported slaves, was an abstract proposal, there being then no case under examination to which it attached itself. At a subsequent period of the proceedings of the board, the American Commissioner offered to refer that, and every other question on which he and his colleague might disagree, to the arbitration of the convention. So that it is perfectly true that the British Commissioner has, in every case in which his colleague has proposed a reference, refused it; whilst that colleague has been ready to co-operate in referring every question of disagreement that has arisen or may arise between them.

In respect to the question of the slaves taken away from Dauphin island, it is with unaffected surprise that the President perceives that the British Government has extended its approbation of the conduct of the British Commissioner to his refusal to refer the disagreement between him and his associate in respect to those slaves. Had the American Commissioner refused, upon the offer of his colleague, to refer the question whether that island was or was not an American possession, or a part of the territory of the United States, he would have been as much justified as in refusing to refer a question raised about our title or possession of Tangier island, in the Chesapeake bay, or any other portion of the acknowledged territory of the United States. The provision of the treaty of Ghent to which the imperial decision refers is correctly quoted by you. That provision gives to one party the right to demand, and makes it the duty of the other to surrender, all territories, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken during the war. There is no qualification or limitation in respect to title upon which the surrender was to depend. The concurrence of two facts was all that was necessary: first, that it was a territory, place, or possession; and secondly, that it was taken by one party from the other during the war. The usual language employed in stipulations in treaties of peace, founded on the status quo ante bellum, is, that the surrender of territory for which they provide shall be of those places belonging to one party which have been captured by the other during the war. That language is liable to the objection that, in executing the stipulation, it leaves open to controversy the question whether a particular place, taken during the war, does or does not belong to the party from whom it was taken and who demands the surrender. It is perfectly well known to the American negotiators of the treaty of Ghent that the phraseology of the first article of the treaty of Ghent was carefully and expressly arranged to cut off all subsequent controversies about the right of the United States to the territories, places, and possessions of which it stipulates the surrender; and if it be not competent to effect that purpose, the English language does not supply words which could accomplish it. It is, therefore, not conceded that the places alluded to can be, of course, such possessions only as essentially belonging to, not merely occupied by, one party were captured by the other. If the possessions mentioned in the treaty are to be expounded as meaning those only to which the party claiming their restoration had a right, how can Great Britain, after having restored, in virtue of that stipulation, the establishment at the mouth of the Columbia river, on the Pacific Ocean, now set up any title to it?

It is sufficient, therefore, in vindication of the claim to indemnity for the slaves taken away from Dauphin island, to show, without any regard whatever to the title to that island, that it was in the possession of the United States and taken from them during the war; and this is expressly admitted by your note.

In respect to our title, the British Government appears to entertain some misconceptions about its source, the correction of which, it is hoped, will lead to the immediate acknowledgment of the validity of the demand to indemnity, which they now contest. Our title, then, is not derived, as appears to be supposed, from the treaty of Washington, concluded with Spain in 1819, but from the treaty with France of the 30th April, 1803, by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States. The limits of Louisiana extended east as far as the river Perdido, between the bay of Mobile and the bay of Pensacola, comprehending, of course, the bay of Mobile with all its waters, islands, and dependencies. Dauphin island is situated at the mouth of the bay of Mobile. As far back as in February of the year 1804 the Congress of the United States legislated on the subject, and authorized the President of the United States to erect the shores, waters, and inlets of the bay and river Mobile, and of the other rivers, creeks, inlets, and bays, emptying into the Gulf of Mexico, east of the river Mobile, and west thereof to the Pascagoula, inclusive, into a separate district for the enforcement of the revenue laws of the United States.

Under this act possession of the bay of Mobile was taken by the President of the United States, Fort Boyer was erected at the mouth of the river Mobile, and Dauphin island was also occupied by the forces of the United States. That fort was reduced, and the island taken possession of, by the British arms during the late war; and both were surrendered to the United States in virtue of the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

This explanation, which it is hoped cannot fail to prove entirely satisfactory to the British Government, accounts for the expressions referred to by your note, in the papers of some of the claimants presented to the Board of Commissioners, in which they state that, in going to Pensacola, they considered themselves in a neutral territory and entitled to the protection of the Spanish Government. Pensacola, being situated east of the river Perdido, was no part of Louisiana, but belonged to Spain as a part of Florida, until the cession of it to the United States by the treaty before mentioned of 1819. To the reasoning of your note, which is founded on the error of which the correction is now made, it is not necessary to reply.

In conclusion, you will perceive from these views, entertained on the two points of which your note treats, that the Government of the United States believes—

1st. That the interest, which is claimed as a part of the indemnity, to which the imperial decision extends, is not extraneous to the convention of 1822, but is essentially comprehended within it; and,

2d. That both the possession and the right to Dauphin island were with the United States; that the possession was taken from them by the British forces during the war, and was restored on the return of peace; and, consequently ,that there is no pretext for withholding compensation for those slaves which were carried away from it in violation of the treaty of Ghent.

The President indulges, therefore, the hope that the good faith which should ever characterize the fulfilment of all national engagements will induce the British Government to remove the impediments which have hitherto obstructed the execution of the convention of St. Petersburg, by directing a reference to the arbitration for which it provides of all questions on which the two Commissioners have already disagreed or may hereafter disagree.

I avail myself of this occasion to tender you the homage of my high consideration.

H. CLAY.

Rt. Hon. C. K. VAUGHAN, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain.

WASHINGTON, October 13, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note in answer to the statement which I made to you of the opinions entertained by his Majesty's Government upon some points of the correspondence which took place between us, in the month of April last, respecting the commission under the convention of St. Petersburg.

I have nothing to add to the opinions which I have already laid before you, as those which are entertained by his Majesty's Government with regard to the claim for interest, nor do I feel myself competent to decide upon the validity of the claim to indemnification for slaves taken from Dauphin island, which you state to have been taken possession of, together with a certain portion of the province of West Florida, by the United States in 1804. You seem to be of opinion that it is sufficient, in vindication of that claim, to show that the island was in possession of the United States, and taken from them during the war without any reference to the validity of the title to that territory, in the possession of which, by the United States, it is generally understood, that Spain did not acquiesce; and that it did not pass into the dominion of this country until the cession of the Floridas in 1819.

I cannot acquiesce in your declaration that the doctrines contained in my note tend to withdraw from the jurisdiction of the commission any claim, however just, because the British Commissioner may refuse to submit it to arbitration, "the ready suggestion" being always at hand, that it does not fall within the terms of the convention.

I must remind you that both Commissioners have exercised their discretion in refusing to refer disputed points to arbitration. In the two instances in which the British Commissioner refused, he did so because he was convinced that the terms of the convention did not authorize the commission to decide either upon the claim of interest or upon the indemnification for slaves taken from Dauphin island; and the British Government coincided in the view which he had taken of the powers with which the commission was invested by the convention.

In the instance which has been given of refusal on the part of the American Commissioner to refer to arbitration the propriety of submitting to the inspection of the public the list of deported slaves furnished by the British Admiralty, you are pleased to consider the proposal as an abstract one, no case being then under examination. That question, however, was agitated in the commission at the moment when the claimants were arranging the evidence in support of their demands. The instances are three in number in which the Commissioners have refused arbitration, and I cannot assent to the blame which, it seems to me, is implied by your observation that the British Commissioner has in every case refused to arbitrate, while the American Commissioner has been ready to refer every question of disagreement to arbitration that has arisen or may arise between them.

I regret that there should be any difference of opinion upon the manner in which our respective Governments are inclined to understand the convention of St. Petersburg.

It appears to the British Government that it was not in the contemplation of the framers of the convention to grant interest upon the sum which might be awarded as compensation, nor do I think that any usages of commerce are to be made applicable by inference to political engagements. I am sure that you will agree with me in acknowledging that no allusion is made to the granting of interest in any part of the convention. I was justified, therefore, in observing that the admission of that question to decision by the commission would subject equally to their decision any other unforeseen and extravagant demand. I agree with you that neither party is at liberty to extend or circumscribe the limits of the convention. In ascertaining those limits strict adherence must be observed to the words of the convention; nor can I admit any latitude in construing the powers of the commission by a reference to what may be supposed to be the meaning of the decision of the Emperor of Russia.

I have ventured to offer these observations upon the remarks which you have made upon my last note; and I request that you will do me the honor to accept the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

Mr. Clay to Mr. King.

No. 9.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 15, 1825.

SIR: Your predecessor, in conformity with a resolution of the House of Representatives, and instructions consequent upon it, opened a negotiation with the British Government for the purpose of obtaining a cession of a part of the island of Abaco, to enable the Government of the United States to erect a light house. In July, 1824, Mr. Rush had an interview with Lord Melville and Mr. Huskisson on that subject; in the course of which they stated the unwillingness of their Government to cede any part of the island of Abaco, but professed no indisposition to exist on the part of Great Britain to establish any necessary aids to navigation in that quarter if the United States would designate the proper sites, and provided their vessels would pay the necessary fees towards keeping them up, in all cases where their vessels derived benefit from them, whilst making voyages in that direction. Mr. Rush justly supposed that great if not insuperable difficulties would arise in the collection of those fees, but engaged to refer the proposal to his Government. A promise was made to him to reduce it to writing, that he might in that more precise form transmit it; but it has never been received in that shape.

The very great and often afflicting disasters which occur in the navigation of the seas near the Cape of Florida and the Bahamas, and which are in some degree owing to the want of the proposed light and other facilities, induce the President to wish that you would again bring this matter before the British Government. These disasters are not limited to the vessels of the United States, but are experienced by those of other nations trading in the Gulf of Mexico. Several have recently occurred to French vessels, as well as to those of the United States. Shortly after the acquisition of East Florida the attention of the Government of the United States was directed to the object of affording to navigation all the assistance which could be rendered by lights erected at suitable points and distances on the Florida coast, and other proper aids. Accordingly lights have been directed to be built at the Dry Tortugas, Sambo keys, and at Carysford reef. The channel between the Tortugas and the main land has been directed to be indicated by buoys. Other lights are contemplated at proper points on the coast near Cape Florida and Cape Carnaveral. When all these works shall be completed, there will be a chain of lights along the Florida coast, so that a vessel may almost constantly have one in view. Their effect may be more distinctly seen by glancing at the accompanying map, on which you will see marked, in red colors, the lights, either in a progress of execution or contemplated within the jurisdiction of the United States, which the interests of navigation require. Vessels bound out of the Gulf, after making the Dry Tortugas, generally steer along the Gulf Stream, near the coast of Florida, and to these the lights and other facilities constructed, or contemplated by the American Government, will afford material advantage. When they are bound into the Mexican Gulf they are compelled to avoid the Gulf Stream on account of its force, and they almost invariably endeavor to make the point of Abaco island, designated on the map as "the Hole of the Rock," or, as it is more commonly called, "the Hole in the Wall." The land lies low, and the approach to it is difficult, especially in the night, or in wet or hazy weather, so that vessels are often compelled to lie on and off for some time before it can be discerned. Much time is consequently lost, and many wrecks have taken place near that spot. The advantages, therefore, of a light erected there are evident; and somewhere about the spot which is colored in yellow would, it is believed, be a suitable site. That would, however, be best determined by a previous survey.

After a vessel has made "the Hole in the Wall" she directs her course to the Stirrup key, (also noted in the map.) At that point it would be very serviceable to have a floating light placed. Having reached it, she next steers along the banks for Orange key. It is desirable that there should be buoys or beacons erected to mark the channel along those banks. At the Orange key, also, there should be placed a light-vessel. On this subject I refer you more particularly to a letter from the Governor of Bahama to Commodore Porter, of April 24, 1824, which accompanies the report from this Department, addressed to the House of Representatives, hereafter mentioned.

You will make these explanations to the British Government. It is presumed that when they take into consideration what has been done by that of the United States, at their expense, the benefits of which are shared, free from charge, by the vessels of all nations navigating those seas, they will cause the proposed light at the Hole in the Wall, floating lights at the Stirrup key and Orange key, and the buoys or beacons along the banks between the Stirrup key and the Orange key, to be built at their own expense. Their own vessels are interested no less than those of the United States in the erection of the works. But they are called for so imperiously by the safety of commerce, and by the feelings of humanity, that the President does not wish them to be defeated or delayed by any disagreement between the two Governments about the inconsiderable expense of accomplishing the object. If, therefore, the British Government should continue to decline making the cession contemplated by the resolution of the House of Representatives, (which you will not press,) and should continue to insist upon the United States sustaining a part of the burden of building and keeping up the works now suggested, you are authorized to assure it that the Government of the United States will defray such reasonable proportion of the expense as shall be hereafter mutually agreed upon between the two Governments. What that should be cannot, it is supposed, be ascertained and determined until the works are finished, or at least until proper estimates are made.

To put you further in possession of the subject of this note, I transmit herewith a copy of a report from this Department, of the 23d December, 1824, with the accompanying documents; and also a copy of a report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, 20th January, 1825, founded upon the negotiation which had previously taken place between Mr. Rush and the British Government.

I am your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

Extract of a letter from Mr. D. Brent to Mr. Gallatin, dated June 27, 1826.

"Herewith I have the honor to transmit to you, by direction of Mr. Clay, the copy of a letter which he wrote to Mr. King, on the 15th of November last, concerning a negotiation which Mr. Rush had been instructed to open with the British Government, for the purpose of obtaining a cession of a part of the island of Abaco, to enable the Government of the United States to erect a light-house upon it, together with the copy of a report from this Department to the House of Representatives, dated 23d December, 1823, and of one from the Committee of Foreign Affairs to the same House, of the 20th January succeeding, on the same subject, which will make you acquainted with it in all its parts. It is the wish of the Secretary that you should prosecute this interesting business to a conclusion, taking it up where it may have been left by Mr. King, and which you will ascertain from Mr. John A. King. I regret that we cannot furnish you with a copy of the sketch or map with which Mr. King was furnished; though I presume you will find the original with the papers of the legation at London."

"Constant attendance to the subjects of the pending negotiations has not left me time, since Mr. Canning's return to London, to make an official application respecting the light-houses on the British side of the channel of Bahama. In a private conversation with Lord Melville he said that the British Government was quite disposed, and thought it just, to erect, at their own expense, all such as might be deemed necessary. Of this they must judge for themselves; but our suggestions will have considerable weight; and I beg that if there is any additional information on that subject, it may be transmitted as soon as possible."

"I have the honor to enclose the copy of a note I addressed yesterday to Mr. Canning, respecting the light-house and other contemplated improvements on the British side of the Strait of Florida."

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Canning.

[Enclosure.]

JANUARY 3, 1827.

The undersigned, minister of the United States, has been instructed to call again the attention of his Majesty's Government to the subject of the light-house, floating-lights, and buoys, which are necessary for the safety of the navigation through the channel between Florida and the Bahama Banks.

Light-houses have been directed by the United States to be built at the Dry Tortugas, at Sambo keys, and at Carysford reef. The channel between the Tortugas and the main land has been directed to be indicated by buoys. Other light-houses are contemplated at proper points on the coast near Cape Florida and Cape Carnaveral. When all these works shall be completed, there will be a chain of lights along the Florida coast, so that a vessel may, almost constantly, have one in view.

To vessels bound from the Gulf of Mexico, northward, those improvements will be of material advantage; but vessels bound from the north to the Gulf of Mexico are compelled, in order to avoid the Gulf Stream, to sail along the eastern side of the channel, and close by the several banks, keys, and low lands which bound it on that side. The improvements, heretofore suggested as necessary there, were a light-house on the point of Abaco island, called "the Hole of the Rock," or "the Hole in the Wall," floating lights at the Stirrup key and Orange key, and buoys or beacons along the banks between those two keys.

Whether these or other places shall, on further investigation, be deemed most eligible, the great and general utility of lights and other facilities in that most frequented and dangerous channel to the navigation of the United States, of Great Britain, and of the whole commercial world, is universally acknowledged.

The Government of the United States, at the same time that they were making provision for lighting their own side, had, in the first instance, applied to that of Great Britain for a cession of a part of the island of Abaco, on which to erect a light-house at their own expense. This was declined; but a disposition was evinced, on the part of his Majesty's Government, to establish the necessary aids to navigation in that quarter; and Mr. Rush had some conversation on the subject with Lord Melville and Mr. Huskisson, in which the question appears to have been agitated, whether the United States should contribute to the expense of erecting and supporting those improvements.

It is presumed that on a question of this kind, taking into consideration what has been done by the United States, the benefits of which are shared, free from charge, by vessels of all nations navigating those seas, Great Britain will feel disposed to erect and support, at her own expense, the light-house and other improvements necessary on her side of the channel; and the undersigned, in a transient conversation with Lord Melville, understood this to be his lordship's opinion.

Nothing definitive has as yet been concluded; but those works are called for so imperiously by the safety of commerce, and by the feelings of humanity, that neither Government can permit them to be defeated or delayed by any disagreement about the inconsiderable expense of accomplishing the object.

The undersigned prays, therefore, Mr. Canning, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to take this subject into his consideration, and to have the goodness to communicate to him the decision of his Majesty's Government upon it.

The undersigned has the honor, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

FOREIGN OFFICE, January 11, 1827.

Mr. Secretary Canning presents his compliments to Mr. Gallatin, and, in acknowledging the receipt of his note of the 3d instant, on the subject of the lights necessary for the safety of the navigation between Florida and the Bahama Banks, has the honor to acquaint Mr. Gallatin that a copy of his note has been transmitted to the Admiralty for the consideration of that department. Mr. Canning, in making this communication to Mr. Gallatin, requests that he will accept the assurance of his high consideration.

No. 84.] LONDON, June 8, 1827.

SIR: Although the Admiralty, as I was informed near three months ago by Lord Melville, had made a favorable report on the subject of lights necessary for the safety of the navigation of the Bahama Banks, no official communication has been made to me of the intentions of the Government on the renewed application of the United States. This may be accounted for by the change of ministry. It was, at all events, necessary to call again the attention of the Foreign Department to the subject; and I have accordingly addressed to Lord Dudley the note dated yesterday, of which a copy is enclosed. Although, in writing to him officially, I must take it for granted that he was well acquainted with the grounds of the application, fearing that, holding the office only ad interim, he might not have paid, or pay, sufficient attention to the subject, I have, in the private note, (also enclosed,) given him a brief outline of the object in view, and suggested the reason why a speedy decision was desirable. I understood Lord Melville's opinion to be, that the lights on British ground ought to be erected at the sole expense of Great Britain; but when he informed me that the report was made, and in favor of erecting the lights, he added, that he had not there touched the question of expense, which he did not consider as having been referred to him, or belonging to his department.

I have the honor, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Gallatin to Viscount Dudley.

UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, June 7, 1827.

The undersigned, minister of the United States of America, had the honor to address a note, on the 3d of January last, to his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the lights necessary for the safety of the navigation between Florida and the Bahama Banks.

An answer was given, dated 11th of the same month, informing the undersigned that a copy of his note had been transmitted to the Admiralty for the consideration of that department.

No subsequent communication having been made to the undersigned, relating to his note above mentioned, he begs leave to bring it again under the consideration of Lord Viscount Dudley, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and to pray that he may be made acquainted with the view entertained of the subject by his Majesty's Government.

The undersigned requests Lord Dudley that he will accept the assurance of his high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Gallatin to Viscount Dudley.

[Enclosed in Mr. Gallatin's No. 84.]

Private.] UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, June 7, 1827.

Mr. Gallatin presents his compliments to Lord Dudley, and begs to call his attention to the official note which he had the honor to address to him this day on the subject of certain light-houses.

The whole navigation, whether British or American, bound to either North America or Europe, from Jamaica, Cuba, and every part of the main, north, west, and south of those islands, must pass through the Straits of Florida, and will enjoy the benefit of the lights erected, and ordered to be erected, along the coast of that peninsula by the United States.

The British navigation bound to the same places in the Gulf of Mexico, from the British North American colonies and from the United States, will participate in the benefit of the lights on Abaco and the Bahama Banks, for the erection of which, by Great Britain, the application is now made.

It is a subject of common interest, and which seems to call for as speedy a decision as consists with due deliberation, every season of delay being attended with numerous shipwrecks and with losses of lives as well as of property. Mr. Gallatin was informed, near three months ago, that the Admiralty had made a favorable report.

Mr. Gallatin prays Lord Dudley to accept the assurance of his high regard and distinguished consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose Lord Dudley's answer to my notes on the subjects of light-houses and buoys on the Bahama Banks. You will perceive that the British Government concurs with that of the United States in the expediency of erecting light-houses, floating lights, and buoys, on the British side of the channel, between the Bahama Banks and Florida, and that directions have been given for taking the preliminary steps towards carrying that measure into effect.

I have the honor, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Lord Dudley to Mr. Gallatin.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 11, 1827.

The undersigned, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acquaint Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, that, upon the receipt of his note of the 7th of June, the undersigned lost no time in forwarding it to the Departments to which Mr. Gallatin's former notes on the same subject had already been referred.

The undersigned has now the honor to inform Mr. Gallatin that his Majesty's Government concur with the Government of the United States in the expediency of erecting light-houses, floating lights, and buoys, on the British side of the channel, between the Bahama Banks and Florida, and that directions have already been given for taking the necessary preliminary steps towards carrying the proposed measure into effect.

The undersigned requests Mr. Gallatin to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

FREE NAVIGATION OF THE RIVER ST. LAWRENCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 7, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th of last month, I transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State, and the correspondence with the government of Great Britain, relative to the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence.

N. Protocol 24.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, dated Department of State, Washington, June 23, 1823.

"With regard to the right of that portion of our people to navigate the river St. Lawrence to and from the ocean, it has never yet been discussed between us and the British Government. I have little doubt that it may be established upon the sound and general principles of the law of nature; and if it has not been distinctly and explicitly asserted in negotiation with the British Government hitherto, it is because the benefits of it have been, as the committee remark, tacitly conceded, or because the interest, now become so great, and daily acquiring additional moment, has, it may almost be said, originated since the acknowledgment of our independence by the treaty of 1783.

"The memorial from the committee of the inhabitants of Franklin county, New York, is perfectly correct, when it asserts this right upon the principles asserted at the period when our right to the navigation of the Mississippi was in question; and so far as the right, by the law of nature, was maintained on the part of the United States, in that case, so far is the Government of the United States bound to maintain, for the people of the Territory of Michigan, and of the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and Vermont, the natural right of communicating with the ocean, by the only outlet provided by nature, from the waters bordering upon their shores.

"We know that the possession of both the shores of a river at its mouth has heretofore been held to give the right of obstructing or interdicting the navigation of it to the people of other nations inhabiting the banks of the river above the boundary of that in possession of its mouth. But the exclusive right of jurisdiction over a river originates in the social compact, and is a right of sovereignty. The right of navigating the river is a right of nature, preceding it in point of time, and which the sovereign right of one nation cannot annihilate as belonging to the people of another.

"This principle has been substantially recognized by all the parties to the European alliance, and particularly by Great Britain, at the negotiation of the Vienna Congress treaties. It is recognized by the stipulations of those treaties which declare the navigation of the Rhine, the Necker, the Main, the Mozelle, the Maese, and the Scheldt, free to all nations. The object of those stipulations, undoubtedly, was to make the navigation of those rivers effectively free to all the people dwelling upon their banks, and to abolish all those unnatural and unjust restrictions by which the people of the interior of Germany had, before that time, been deprived of their natural outlet to the sea, by the abuse of that right of sovereignty which imputed an exclusive jurisdiction and property over a river to the State possessing both shores at its mouth. There is no principle of national law upon which those articles of the Vienna Congress treaties could be founded which will not apply to sustain the right of the people of this Union to navigate the St. Lawrence river to the ocean.

"These ideas are suggested to you to be used, first, in conference with the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, and afterwards, if necessary, in correspondence with him. The manner and the time of presenting them will be best judged of by your discretion. By the two acts of Parliament, of 3d Geo. 4, chs. 44 and 119, the navigation of the St. Lawrence from our territories to the ocean is, in fact, conceded to us. By the first, from the ocean to Quebec; and by the second, from any part of our territories to the same port. But a discretionary power is given to the colonial Government in Canada to withdraw the latter of these concessions by excepting any of the Canadian ports from those to which our vessels are by the act made admissible; and the duties imposed by the act upon all those of our exports which could render the trade profitable are prohibitory."

Extract of a despatch (No. 10) from Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, dated London, August 12, 1824.

"The act of Parliament of the 5th of August, 1822, having immediate relation to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British continental possessions in their neighborhood, I naturally regarded it, as your instructions to me had done, in connexion with the act of June 24, 1822. This brought under consideration our claim to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence. Between this question and the questions of commercial intercourse under the act of June, 1822, the British plenipotentiaries were constantly unwilling to acknowledge any connexion. Nevertheless, looking to your instructions, and as well to the reason of them as to their authority, I treated the two questions as belonging to one and the same general subject. They asked whether, taking the two acts of Parliament together, the United States did not already enjoy the navigation of this river? I said that they did; by the act of June 24, 1822, they enjoyed it from the ocean to Quebec; and by that of August 5, 1822, from any part of the territories of the United States to Quebec. But from the fact of the colonial Governments in Canada being invested with a discretionary power to withdraw the latter of these concessions, by excepting any of the Canadian ports from those to which our vessels were made admissible, it followed that our enjoyment of the navigation of this river was rendered contingent upon British permission. This was a tenure not reconcilable, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, with the growing and permanent wants of their citizens in that portion of the Union or with the rights of the nation. It was due to both these considerations that it should stand upon a different tenure, and the time had arrived when it was desirable that the two nations should come to an understanding upon a question of so much importance.

"The British plenipotentiaries next asked whether any question was about to be raised on the right of Great Britain to exclude altogether vessels of the United States from trading with British ports situated upon the St. Lawrence or elsewhere in Canada? I replied that I was not prepared absolutely to deny such a right in Great Britain, to whatever considerations its exercise might be open. I remarked, also, that it seemed already to have been substantially exercised by this act of the 5th of August, 1822, for, by its provisions, only certain enumerated articles were allowed to be exported from the United States into Canadian ports, and duties were laid upon these articles which might be said to amount to a prohibition. I added, that although the foregoing act had not laid any duty on the merchandise of the United States descending the St. Lawrence with a view to exportation by sea, yet that an act of the preceding year did, viz: upon their timber and lumber, which made it highly expedient that the relative rights of the parties to the use of the waters of this great stream should be ascertained. I here went into a review of the footing upon which the trade between the United States and the Canadas stood, under the stipulations of the treaty of 1794. The memorial from the inhabitants of Franklin county, in the State of New York, and the report of the committee of the House of Representatives upon that document, furnished me with the necessary lights for executing this duty, as well as for pointing out the injurious and burdensome operation of the act of the 5th of August, 1822. The latter act had superseded all the former conditions of this intercourse. With these conditions the citizens of the United States had been, I said, content, and it was believed that they had been found, on experience, satisfactory on both sides. The treaty stipulations of 1794 were among the articles of that instrument declared, when it was made, to be permanent; and so mutually beneficial had appeared to be their operation, that both parties continued, in practice, to make them the rule of their conduct for some years after the war of 1812, until, by the acts of Parliament just recited, Great Britain chose to consider the intervention of that war as putting an end to their validity. This state of things, by remitting each party to their anterior and original rights, rendered it manifestly incumbent upon the Government of the United States now to attempt to settle, by convention or in some other manner, with Great Britain, the true nature of the tenure by which they held the navigation of this stream. Such was the character of the remarks by which I illustrated the propriety of adding to the two articles which I had offered for the regulation of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, whether continental or insular, a third article relating exclusively to the navigation of the St. Lawrence. A third article will be found, accordingly, in this connexion, as part of our projet, already referred to as annexed to the protocol of the third conference. Its stipulations were, that the navigation of the St. Lawrence, in its whole length and breadth, to and from the sea, should be at all times equally free to the citizens and subjects of both countries, and that the vessels belonging to either party should never be subject to any molestation whatever by the other, or to the payment of any duty for this right of navigation. After this unequivocal provision, it concluded with a clause that, regarding such reasonable and moderate tolls as either side might claim and appear to be entitled to, the contracting parties would treat at a future day, in order that the principles regulating such tolls might be adjusted to mutual satisfaction.

"I deemed it most advisable to ingraft upon the article this principle respecting tolls, although it was not particularly mentioned in your despatch. In pursuing into their details some of the general principles which you had laid down, I was left under the impression that our title to navigate this river, independently of the consent of Great Britain, could be made out with more complete and decisive strength under the qualified admission of the claim to toll. The writers on public law had generally so treated the subject, and in some of the modern treaties of high authority in our favor on the general question the admission was also to be seen. I refer particularly to the fifth article of the treaty of peace of the 30th of May, 1814, between the allied Powers and France, where, after providing for the free navigation of the Rhine to all persons, it is agreed that principles should be laid down, at a future Congress, for the collection of the duties by the States on its banks, in the manner most equal and favorable to the commerce of all nations. In adverting to the claim of toll as a question only for future discussion, and one that might be of like interest to both parties, (the British navigation of this river being obliged, in some parts, to pass close to our bank,) and, moreover, where the claim, if advanced on either side, was to be made dependent on sufficient cause being shown for it, I did not believe that I was losing sight of any principle of value to the United States in this controversy. The clause, I hope, will be found to have been too guarded in its terms to be open to such a risk.

"There was another point on which I felt more uncertainty. The navigation of this stream, although I believed it could be demonstrated to be the just right of the people of the United States, could not draw after it all its benefits to them without a concurrent right of stopping at some point or port where both of its banks fell within the colonial territory of Great Britain. Upon what footing was I to treat this latter and subordinate question? Your instructions had not dealt with it, and I felt myself at a loss. It could scarcely be doubted but that, our right to navigate the river being established, Britain would, as matter of international comity, and as an arrangement advantageous also to herself, allow us a place of entry for our vessels and deposit for our produce somewhere on its shores. She has so largely of late years been extending the warehousing system to all other nations for their convenience and her own, that it might well be presumed she would not exclude the United States from a participation in it at Quebec or elsewhere at a suitable port in Canada. Yet I felt it to be a point of some delicacy, and therefore thought that it would be most judicious to leave it wholly untouched in my proposal. Another reason operated with me for this silence. As far as I was able to carry my investigations into the point, I found much ground for supposing that the right to the navigation of a river, under the strong circumstances which marked that of the United States to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, would involve, as an incident, the right of innocent stoppage somewhere on the shores—an incident indispensable to the beneficial enjoyment of the right itself. By the seventh article of the treaty of Paris, of 1763, the free navigation of the Mississippi was granted to Great Britain, but without any clause securing to British vessels the privilege of stopping at New Orleans, then a French port, or at any other port or place on any part of the shores. Yet the historical fact appears to have been, that Britain did use New Orleans as a place for her vessels to stop at, and this without any subsequent arrangement with France upon the subject. The case becomes still stronger, if afterwards, when New Orleans fell into the hands of Spain, the British continued to use it for the same purpose, contrary, at first, to the remonstrances of the Spanish Governor of that town, which is also believed to have been the fact. I abstained, however, from asserting in this negotiation the subordinate right in question.

"On the principal question of our equal right with the British to the entire and unobstructed navigation of this river I dwelt with all the emphasis demanded by its magnitude. I spoke of it as a question intimately connected with the present interest of the United States, and which assumed an aspect yet more commanding in its bearing upon their future population and destinies. Already the immense region which bordered upon the lakes and northern rivers of the United States were rapidly filling up with inhabitants, and soon the dense millions who would cover them would point to the paramount and irresistible necessity for the use of this great stream as their only natural highway to the ocean. Nor was the question one of magnitude to this part of the Union alone. The whole nation felt their stake in it; the middle and the north more immediately; but all the rest by the multiplied ties and connexions which bound up their wants, their interests, and their sympathies with the middle and the north. It was under such a view of the immediate and prospective value of this navigation to us that I first presented it to the notice of the British plenipotentiaries as a question of right. I told them they must understand this to be the sense in which I had drawn up the article upon the subject, and that it was the sense in which I felt myself bound, as the plenipotentiary of the United States, to urge its adoption.

"I approach an interesting part of this negotiation when I come to make known in what manner the British plenipotentiaries received this disclosure. They said that, on principles of accommodation, they were willing to treat of this claim with the United States in a spirit of entire amity; that is, as they explained, to treat of it as a concession on the part of Great Britain, for which the United States must be prepared to offer a full equivalent. This was the only light in which they could entertain the question. As to the claim of right, they hoped that it would not even be advanced; persisted in, they were willing to persuade themselves it would never be. It was equally novel and extraordinary. They could not repress their strong feelings of surprise at its bare intimation. Great Britain possessed the absolute sovereignty over this river in all parts where both its banks were of her territorial dominion. Her right, hence, to exclude a foreign nation from navigating it was not to be doubted, scarcely to be discussed. This was the manner in which it was at first received. They opposed to the claim an immediate, positive, unqualified resistance.

"I said that our claim was neither novel nor extraordinary. It was one that had been well considered by my Government, and was believed to be maintainable on the soundest principles of public law. The question had been familiar to the past discussions of the United States, as their State papers, which were before the world, would show. It had been asserted, and successfully asserted, in relation to another great river of the American continent flowing to the south, the Mississippi, at a time when both of its lower banks were under the dominion of a foreign Power. The essential principles that had governed the one case were now applicable to the other.

"My reply was not satisfactory to the British plenipotentiaries. They combatted the claim with increased earnestness, declaring that it was altogether untenable, and of a nature to be totally and unequivocally rejected. Instead of having the sanction of public law, the law and the practice of nations equally disclaimed it. Could I show where was to be found, in either, the least warrant for its assertion? Was it not a claim plainly inconsistent with the paramount authority and exclusive possession of Great Britain? Could she for one moment listen to it?

"I remarked that the claim had been put forward by the United States because of the great national interests involved in it; yet that this consideration, high as it was, would never be looked at but in connexion with the just rights of Great Britain. For this course of proceeding both the principles and practice of my Government might well be taken as the guarantee. The claim was, therefore, far from being put forward in any unfriendly spirit, and would be subject to a frank and full interchange of sentiments between the two Governments. I was obviously bound, I admitted, to make known, on behalf of mine, the grounds on which the claim was advanced—a duty which I would not fail to perform. I stated that we considered our right to the navigation of this river as strictly a natural right. This was the firm foundation on which it would be placed. This was the light in which it was defensible on the highest authorities, no less than on the soundest principles. If, indeed, it had ever heretofore been supposed that the possession of both the shores of a river below had conferred the right of interdicting the navigation of it to the people of other nations inhabiting its upper banks, the examination of such a principle would at once disclose the objections to it. The exclusive right of jurisdiction over a river could only originate in the social compact, and be claimed as a right of sovereignty. The right of navigating the river was a right of nature, preceding it in point of time, and which the mere sovereign right of one nation could not annihilate as belonging to the people of another. It was a right essential to the condition and wants of human society, and conformable to the voice of mankind in all ages and countries. The principle on which it rested challenged such universal assent that, wherever it had not been allowed, it might be imputed to the triumph of power or injustice over right. Its recovery and exercise had still been objects precious among nations, and it was happily acquiring fresh sanction from the highest examples of modern times. The parties to the European alliance had, in the treaties of Vienna, declared that the navigation of the Rhine, the Necker, the Mayne, the Moselle, the Maese, and the Scheldt, should be free to all nations. The object of these stipulations was as evident as praiseworthy. It could have been no other than to render the navigation of those rivers free to all the people dwelling upon their banks; thus abolishing those unjust restrictions by which the people of the interior of Germany had been too often deprived of their natural outlet to the sea by an abuse of that right of sovereignty which claimed for a State happening to possess both the shores of a river at its mouth the exclusive property over it. There was no principle of national law upon which the stipulations of the above treaties could be founded which did not equally apply to the case of the St. Lawrence. It was thus that I opened our general doctrine. It was from such principles that I deduced our right to navigate this river, independent of the mere favor or concession of Great Britain, and, consequently, independent of any claim on her side to an equivalent.

"I abstain from any further recapitulation to you of the principles which I invoked, or of the authorities to which I referred, for a reason to be now mentioned. It will be seen by the first protocol that our agreement had been to carry on the negotiation by conference and protocol. This, the more usual mode at all times, was conceived to be peculiarly appropriate where the subjects to be handled were so various and their details in some instances so extensive. It was recommended, also, and this was of higher sway with me, by the example of the negotiation of 1818, in the course of which some of the same subjects had been discussed with this Government. Nevertheless, each party had reserved, under this agreement, the right of annexing to the protocol any written statement that might be considered necessary as matter either of record or of explanation. In your instructions to me respecting this claim to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, a question wholly new as between the two nations, you had adverted to my presenting it in writing if necessary, and I determined, under all the circumstances, that I should not properly come up to my duty unless by adopting this mode. The question was not only new, but of the greatest moment. I saw also, from the beginning, that it would encounter the most decided opposition from Great Britain. In proportion as her plenipotentiaries became explicit and peremptory in denying it, did it occur to me that it would be proper on my part to be unequivocal in its assertion. This could be best done upon paper. This would carry the claim distinctly to the archives of this Government, rather than trust it to foundations more uncertain and fugitive. It would explain, as well as record, the sense in which it was inserted on the protocol. Another motive with me for this course, and scarcely a secondary one, was, that it would serve to draw from Great Britain, in the same form, a precise and full avowal of the grounds on which she designed to oppose the claim. On a question so large, and which, from all that I perceived to mark its first opening between the two Governments, could hardly fail to come under discussion again hereafter, it appeared to me that it would be more acceptable to my Government to be in possession of a written document which should embody the opinions of this Government, than to take the report of them from me under any form less exact or authentic.

"I accordingly drew up a paper on the subject, which, under the right reserved, I annexed (marked B) to the protocol of the eighteenth conference, and so it stands amongst the papers of the negotiation. The British plenipotentiaries continued to urge their animated protests against this proceeding on my part; not that they could divest me of my privilege of recording my sentiments in the shape of this written statement, but that they earnestly pressed the propriety of my abandoning altogether any claim to the navigation of this river as a claim of right, which shut them out from treating of it upon other bases. But having taken my determination under other estimates of my duty, I did not depart from it.

"The paper which I drew up aimed at presenting a broad but intelligible outline of the principal reasons in support of our claim. These were such as you had set before me, and as I judged to be immediately deducible from them. Under the latter I included the argument on the Mississippi question, used by an illustrious individual, then the organ of our Government in its intercourse with foreign States. I considered this argument as virtually comprehended in your instructions by the reference which they contained to it; the questions in both cases, so far as each drew support from the deep foundations of the law of nature, being the same. Of this luminous State paper I followed the track, adopting its own language, whenever this could be done, as the safest, the most approved, the most national. The only view of the subject not elicited on that occasion, which I ventured to take up, was one pointed out by the locality of the St. Lawrence. I will briefly explain it.

"The exclusive right possessed by Great Britain over both banks of this river was won for her by the co-operation of the people who now form the United States. Their exertions, their treasure, their blood, were profusely embarked in every campaign of the old French war. It was under this name that the recollection of that war still lived in the United States—a war which, but for the aid of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, if of no more of the States, would probably not have terminated when it did, in the conquest of Canada from France. If these States were at that epoch a part of the colonial empire of Great Britain, it was, nevertheless, impossible to obliterate the recollection of historical facts, or exclude the inferences that would attach to them. The predecessors of the present inhabitants of those States had borne a constant and heavy burden in that war, and had acquired, simultaneously with the then parent State, the right of descending this stream on the hypothesis, assumed for the moment, of their not having possessed it before—a right of peculiar importance to them from their local position and necessities. It was to this effect that I noticed a title, by joint acquisition, as also susceptible of being adduced for the United States to the navigation of this river. There was at least a strong natural equity in it which would come home to the people of the United States, impressing them with new convictions of the hardship of now refusing them the use of this stream as an innocent pathway to the ocean. But as I had not your elucidations of this view of the subject, I was careful to use it only in subordination to the argument of natural right. The latter I treated as sufficient in itself to make out our title, and repudiated the necessity of resorting to any other. I will own, however, that my disposition to confide in the argument founded upon joint acquisition was increased by the analogy which it appeared to me to bear to the course of reasoning pursued with Great Britain by my predecessor in this mission in relation to the fisheries. If our title to a full participation with Britain in the fisheries, though they were within the acknowledged limits and jurisdiction of the coasts of British America, was strengthened by the fact of the early inhabitants of the United States having been among the foremost to explore and use the fishing grounds, why was the analogous fact of their having assisted to expel the French from the lower shores of the St. Lawrence to be of no avail? I had believed in the application and force of the argument in the one instance, and could not deny it all the consideration that it merited in the other.

"The necessity of my recounting to you the British argument in answer to our claim is superseded by my being able to transmit it to you in their own words upon paper. It is sufficiently elaborate, and was drawn up with great deliberation. It is annexed (marked N) to the protocol of the twenty-fourth conference. The intention avowed by the British plenipotentiaries, at the nineteenth conference, of obtaining for its doctrines, before it was delivered to me, the full sanction of their highest professional authorities on matters relating to the law of nations, may serve to show the 'gravity and importance,' to repeat their own expression, which the question had assumed in their eyes. I have, otherwise, reasons for knowing that their argument was prepared under the advice and assistance of five of the most eminent publicists of England. With all the respect due to a paper matured under such auspices, I am not able to look upon it as impugning the argument which, under your direction and following the course of others before me, I had become the organ of making known on behalf of the United States.

"In several instances the British paper has appealed to the same authorities that are to be found in mine. It is in the application of them only that the difference is seen. In other parts the difference is made to turn upon words rather than substance. But an error that runs throughout nearly the whole of their paper consists in attributing to mine a meaning which does not belong to it. This applies especially to the particular description of right which we claim; how far it is one of mere innocent utility; how far a right necessary to us and not injurious to Britain; how far a right which, if not falling under the technical designation of absolute, is, neverthless, one that cannot be withheld. These are all qualifications which were not overlooked in my exposition of the doctrine—a light, however, in which the British paper does not appear to have regarded it. But as each document is now of record, and will be judged by the terms which it has used, and the construction that justly attaches to them, I will not enlarge upon this head.

"The British paper deals with our claim as standing upon equal footing with a claim to the use of the roads, canals, or other artificial ways, of a country; forgetting that the case in dispute is that of a natural stream, forming the only natural outlet to the ocean—the stream itself being common, by nature, to both countries. Commenting upon the acquired title of the United States which I had put forward under the restriction described, their paper argues that the same ground would justify a correlative claim by Great Britain to the use of the navigable rivers and all other public possessions of the United States which existed when both countries were united under a common Government! By a like misapplication of obvious principles, it argues that our claim would also justify Britain in asking a passage down the Mississippi or the Hudson, though neither the one nor the other touch any portion of the British territories; or that it might equally justify a claim, on her side, to ascend, with British vessels, the principal rivers of the United States as far as their draught of water would admit, instead of depositing their cargoes at the appointed ports of entry from the sea! On doctrines such as these, I could only say to the British plenipotentiaries that I was wholly unable to perceive their application to the argument, unless the United States had been advancing a claim to the navigation of the river Thames, in England.

"Their argument also assumes that the treaty stipulations of 1794 exclude all idea of a right, on our side, to the navigation of this river, forgetting that if, under those stipulations, vessels of the United States were interdicted the navigation of British rivers between their mouths and the highest port of entry from the sea, so, on the other hand, British vessels were interdicted the navigation of the rivers of the United States beyond the highest ports of entry from the sea; and, also, that the whole terms of the international intercourse in that quarter were, by this compact, such as at the time satisfied both parties, without impairing the rights which either possessed independent of the compact, and which only remained in suspense during its existence. This observation suggests another to which their argument is open, in parts which they press as of decisive weight. It alleges that because, by the general treaty of Vienna, the Powers whose States were crossed by the same navigable rivers engaged to regulate, by common consent, all that regarded their navigation; because Russia held by treaty the navigation of the Black Sea; and because of the many instances, capable of being cited, where the navigation of rivers or straits that separated or flowed through the territories of different countries was expressly provided for by treaty; that, because of these facts, the inference was irresistible, that the right of navigation, under such circumstances, depended upon common consent, and could only be claimed by treaty. Here, too, it seems to have been forgotten that it is allowable in treaties, as well as oftentimes expedient for greater safety and precision, to enter into stipulations for the enjoyment or regulation of pre-existing rights; that treaties are, in fact, expressly declared, by the writers upon the laws of nations, to be of two general kinds: those which turn on things to which we are already bound by the law of nature, and those by which we engage to do something more. In their quotation, also, of the note from the first volume of the Laws of Congress, containing an intimation that the United States could not be expected to yield the navigation of the Mississippi without an equivalent, they seem wholly to have overlooked, besides the other points of that note, that it was made at a period when it was well known that no part of that river touched the territories of a foreign Power, and when, therefore, its exclusive navigation belonged to the United States, as much so as the Delaware or the Potomac.

"The foregoing are some of the remarks upon the British paper which I submitted at the conference after receiving it. The first impressions that I had of my duty in regard to it, and, consequently, my first determination, was to reply to it at large, in writing, annexing my reply to the protocol. But, on more reflection, I deem it most proper to abstain, at present, from this step. As a view of the whole subject, given out under the immediate eye and authority of this Government, and with extraordinary care, it appeared to me that the British paper ought to come under the knowledge of my own Government before receiving a formal or full answer from any source less high. If it be thought to require such an answer, a short delay could be nothing to the advantage of its being afforded, either through me or my successor in this mission, under the light of further instructions from home. The pause seemed the more due, not only from the newness of the discussion between the two Governments, but because I may not, at this moment, be sufficiently apprised of all the modifications under which mine may desire it to be presented in a second and more full argument. I hope that this forbearance on my part will be approved, as having been, under the exigency, the most circumspect and becoming course. I gave the British plenipotentiaries to understand that the written argument on the side of the United States must not be considered as closed, but, on the contrary, only as opened."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Gallatin.

No. 1.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 19, 1826.

"3. The navigation of the St. Lawrence from the territories of the United States to the sea.

"The Government of the United States have seen, with very great surprise and regret, the manner in which the assertion of this right of navigation through Mr. Rush, during the former negotiation, was met and resisted by the British plenipotentiaries. The President has respectfully and deliberately examined and considered the British paper which was delivered in by them, and which is annexed to the protocol of the twenty-fourth conference, and he has been altogether unable to discern, in its reason or its authorities, anything to impeach the right of the United States, or to justify the confidence with which the exclusive pretensions of Great Britain are brought forward and maintained. What is the right claimed by the United States? The North American lakes are among the largest inland seas known on the globe. They extend from about the 41st to the 49th degree of north latitude, stretch over sixteen degrees of longitude, and thus present a surface, altogether, of upwards of eighty-three thousand square miles. Eight States of this Union (three of them among the largest in it) and one Territory border on them. A population already exceeding two millions, and augmenting beyond all example, is directly and deeply interested in their navigation. They are entirely enclosed within the territories of the United States and Great Britain, and the right to their navigation, common to both, is guarantied by the faith of treaties, and rests upon the still higher authority of the law of nature. These great lakes are united by but one natural outlet to the ocean, the navigation of which is common to all mankind. That outlet, along a considerable part of its course, forms a common boundary between the territories of the United States and Great Britain, and to that extent the right of navigating it is enjoyed by both. The United States contend that they are invested with a right to pass from those lakes, the incontested privilege of navigating which they exercise, through that natural outlet to the ocean—the right of navigating which by all nations none presumes to question. The right asserted, in other words, is, that their vessels shall be allowed, without molestation, to pursue their trackless way on the bosom of those vast waters, gathered together, in no inconsiderable degree, in their own territory, through that great channel of the St. Lawrence, which nature itself has beneficently supplied, to the ocean, in which they are finally deposited. They ask that the interests of the greater population and the more extensive and fertile country above shall not be sacrificed, in an arbitrary exertion of power, to the jealousy and rivalry of a smaller population, inhabiting a more limited and less productive country below. The United States do not claim a right of entry into British posts situated on the St. Lawrence against British will, and to force their productions into the consumption of British subjects. They claim only the right of passing those ports and transporting their productions to foreign markets or to their own open and willing to receive them; and, as incident and necessary to the enjoyment of that right, they claim the privileges of stoppage and transhipment at such places within the British jurisdiction, and under such reasonable and equitable regulations, as may be prescribed or agreed upon.

"Such is the right, the assertion of which shocked the sensibility of the British plenipotentiaries. The impartial world will judge whether surprise most naturally belonged to the denial or to the assertion of the right.

"If the St. Lawrence is regarded a strait, as it ought to be, connecting navigable seas, there would be less controversy. The principle on which the right to navigate straits depends is, that they are accessorial to those seas which they unite, and the right of navigating which is not exclusive, but common to all nations, the right to navigate the seas drawing after it that of passing the straits. Let that principle be applied to the present case. The United States and Great Britain have, between them, the exclusive right of navigating the lakes. The St. Lawrence connects them with the ocean. The right to navigate both (the lakes and ocean) includes that of passing from one to the other through the natural link. Is it reasonable or just that one of the two co-proprietors of the lakes should altogether exclude his associate from the use of a common natural bounty, necessary to the enjoyment of the full advantages of them? But if that vast mass of water, collected from a thousand tributary sources in the immense reservoirs of the North American lakes, and cast by them into the Atlantic Ocean through the channel of the St. Lawrence, is to be considered, in its transit through that great channel, as a river, the name which accident has conferred, and not a strait, the right of the United States to navigate it is believed to be, nevertheless, clearly and satisfactorily maintainable. In treating this subject, there is, throughout the whole of the British paper, a want of just discrimination between the right of passage, claimed by one nation, through the territories of another, on land, and that on navigable water. The distinction, it is true, is not always clearly adverted to in the writers on the public law, but it has a manifest existence. In the former case the passage can hardly ever take place, especially if it be of numerous bodies, without some detriment or inconvenience to the State, or its citizens, whose territory is traversed. If the country be in a forest state there is a destruction of timber, if not of soil. If in a cultivated, the fields are trodden down and dilapidated, and the use of the roads more or less impairs them. In both there is danger of collisions between the native and foreign citizens. But a passage on land through the territory of another, whenever it is innocent, cannot be lawfully refused. It is to be granted by a neutral to a belligerent army, if no serious injury is likely to accrue to him. As the right of judging whether the passage be or be not innocent must abide somewhere, expediency suggests that it should be exercised by the sovereign of the soil. But his judgment and decision must be regulated by reason and justice, and, of course, the passage cannot be rightfully refused upon grounds merely arbitrary. How stands the case of a passage on navigable water? In that, no injury is done to timber or soil, to cultivation or to roads; no dangerous collisions between the inhabitants and the foreigners arise; not a trace is left by the passenger behind. In the passage of the St. Lawrence, for example, the vessel is wafted on the same water which first floats it from the territories of the United States to the ocean. It is true, as is alleged by the British paper, that this water washes the quays of Montreal and Quebec, passes under the walls of a principal fortress, and, also, through the finest settlements of Canada, and extends along a space of near six hundred miles within the dominions of his Britannic Majesty. But when the American vessel shall have arrived at the ocean, to which she is supposed to be bound, she will have inflicted no injury upon those quays; the guns of the fortress will have been silent; those fine settlements of Canada, and that space of six hundred miles (not exactly, as is asserted, extending through the heart of a British colony) will have remained unmolested. She will have left no traces of injury behind her; her voyage itself will not have made on the inhabitants the impression of a passing dream; and, like the water on which she was borne, she will have sought her trackless and innocent course to the ocean, to reach which Great Britain would be as much justified in claiming a power to prevent the one as the other.

"Nor ought the cases of rivers which rise and debouche altogether within the territorial limits of the same nation to be confounded with those which, having their sources and navigable portions of their bodies in States above, finally discharge themselves within the limits of other States below. In the former instance there is no basis on which a right in common can rest. The navigation of those rivers, ordinarily, can only be desired for purposes of commerce or intercourse with the nation to whose territories, in their whole extent, they are confined. And as every nation, strictly, has a right to interdict all foreign commerce, and to exclude all foreigners from its territories, as is done in a considerable degree by China, it follows that every one has a right, generally, to prohibit an entry into such rivers, or the use of its artificial roads. This right of prohibition exists where the direct object of the visit of foreigners is social or commercial. The end being forbidden, the means necessary to its accomplishment may be rightfully withheld. But if an innocent passage is demanded for purposes unconnected with the commerce or society of the State through which it is required, it cannot justly be denied. In the enjoyment of this right of passage, the use of the territories in which it is exerted is merely collateral. If it be for purposes of lawful war, the end carries the means, and the neutral cannot deny the passage without weighty considerations.

"But the right of the inhabitants of the upper bank of a river to the use of its navigation in its passage to the sea, through the territories of another Sovereign, stands upon other and stronger ground. If they were to bring forward the pretension to trade, or open other intercourse with the nation inhabiting the banks below, against its consent, they would find no support or countenance in reason, or in the law of nature. But it is inconceivable upon what just grounds a nation below can oppose the right of that above to pass through a great natural highway into the sea, that it may trade or hold intercourse with other nations by their consent. From the very nature of such a river, it must, in respect to its navigable uses, be considered as common to all the nations who inhabit its banks, as a free gift flowing from the bounty of Heaven, intended for all whose lots are cast upon its borders; and in this latter respect it is clearly distinguishable from canals and works of art, from the use of which, being erected at the expense of one, all others may be excluded. The right to prohibit the use of natural channels, deduced, in the British paper, from that of the exclusive nature of those of an artificial kind, would establish the power, if it were practicable, to forbid the enjoyment of the showers of rain, which are equally dispensed by the Author of all Good, because the gardener may lawfully deny the employment of his watering vessels in the irrigation of any grounds but his own. The land may be divided through which a river passes, or which composes its bed, by artificial lines of demarcation, but the water itself is incapable of such a division. It is confluent and continuous; and that portion of the floating mass which is now in the territorial dominion of the lower nation was yesterday under that of the nation above, and, contemning alike the authority of all, will, to-morrow, be in that ocean to which the presumptuous sway of no one has as yet been lawfully extended. The incontestable right which one nation has to trade with others, by their consent, carries along with it that of using those navigable means necessary to its enjoyment which the bounty of nature has provided for all, in respect to seas, and in regard to rivers, for the nations who inhabit them.

"The British paper inquires if the American Government can mean to insist on a demand involving such consequences as it describes, without being prepared to apply, by reciprocity, the principle on which the demand rests in favor of Great Britain. The American Government has not contended, and does not mean to contend, for any principle the benefit of which, in analogous circumstances, it would deny to Great Britain. Accordingly, with respect to that branch of the Columbia which rises north of the parallel 49°, (should that parallel be mutually agreed to as the boundary between the territories of the two Powers,) a case analogous to that of the St. Lawrence will be presented. And you have been hereinbefore instructed, in the event of that branch being navigable within the British territory, to stipulate for the right of navigating the Columbia to the ocean in behalf of British subjects. In regard to the Mississippi, (the example put by the British plenipotentiaries,) if further exploration of the country shall develop a connexion between that river and Upper Canada similar to that which exists between the United States and the St. Lawrence, the American Government, always faithful to principles, would be ready to apply to the Mississippi the doctrines which it now holds in regard to its great northern rival. It is not necessary to discuss all the extreme cases which may be fancifully suggested, such as a foreign claim to pass the Isthmus of Darien, to drive a trade between Europe and distant India through two oceans; or that of passing through England to trade with France or other portions of the European continent. Examples of that kind belong to the species of sophistry which would subvert all principles by pushing their assumed consequences into the regions of extravagant supposition.

"The British paper denies that the engagements of Paris in 1814, and at Vienna in the following year, between the Powers of Europe, in respect to the navigation of rivers, give any countenance to the natural right asserted by this Government. It is difficult to conceive what other principle than that of a strong sense of the injustice of withholding from nations whose territories are washed by rivers the privilege of their navigation dictated those engagements. The clause cited in the paper under consideration is not in the nature of an original grant, but appears to be founded on a pre-existing (and which could be no other than a natural) right. 'The Powers whose States are separated or crossed by the same navigable river engage to regulate, by common consent, all that regards its navigation.' The regulation is not of the right, but of the use of the right of navigation. And if the consent of the local sovereign is necessary to give validity to the regulation, so is that of the Sovereign, above or below, whose territories are crossed by the same river; and it is not stipulated that their use of the right of navigation was to remain in abeyance until the manner of its enjoyment was regulated by the consent of all the interested Powers. On the contrary, it cannot be doubted that it was the understanding of the great Powers at Vienna that all the States concerned in the navigation of the Rhine, and the other enumerated rivers, were to be forthwith let into the enjoyment of them, whether it was previously regulated or not by common consent. Without such an understanding, it is manifest that any one of the States, by withholding its assent to proposed regulations, upon real or ostensible grounds of objection, might indefinitely postpone, if not altogether defeat, the exercise of the recognized right. The fact of subjecting the use of a right to treaty regulations, as was proposed at Vienna to be done with the navigation of the European rivers, and as was also done in the case of the Danube, and other instances cited, does not prove that the origin of the right is conventional, and not natural. It often happens to be highly convenient, if not sometimes indispensable, to guard against collisions and controversies by prescribing certain rules for the use of a natural right. The law of nature, though sufficiently intelligible in its great outlines and general purposes, does not always reach every minute detail which is called for by the complicated varieties and wants of modern navigation and commerce; and hence the right of navigating the ocean itself, in many instances, principally incident to a state of war, is subjected, by innumerable treaties, to various regulations. These regulations (the transactions at Vienna relative to the navigation of the European rivers, and other analogous stipulations) should be regarded only as the spontaneous homage of man to the superior wisdom of the paramount Lawgiver of the Universe, by delivering his great works from the artificial shackles and selfish contrivances to which they have been arbitrarily and unjustly subjected.

"The force of the example in the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, between Great Britain and the United States, by which they stipulated that the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall forever remain free and open to both parties, is not weakened by any observations in the British paper. A stronger case need not be presented of the admission of the principle that a State, whose territories are washed by a river, cannot be justly excluded from its navigation to the ocean by an intervening Power. Spain held the entire right bank of the Mississippi from its source to the ocean, and the left bank from the ocean up to the 31st degree of north latitude, from which point, to its source, the residue of the left bank, it was supposed, belonged to the United States and Great Britain in severalty. Spain, with respect to the mouth of the Mississippi, thus stood, in 1783, in the same relation to the United States and to Great Britain as Great Britain now does in regard to the mouth of the St. Lawrence to the United States. What was the law of that position of Spain, as solemnly declared by both the present contending parties? It was, that the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall forever remain free and open to them both. If Great Britain, by the success of the war terminated in the treaty of 1763, was enabled to extort from France a concession of the free navigation of the Mississippi, as is asserted in the British argument, her condition was not the same in 1783. Yet, amidst all her reverses, without consulting Spain, she did not scruple to contract with the United States for their reciprocal freedom of navigating the Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, through Spanish territory, and passing the finest settlements and the largest city of Louisiana, as well as all the Spanish fortresses of the lower Mississippi. Is Great Britain prepared to promulgate a law for Spain to which she will not herself submit in analogous circumstances?

"It is not thought to be necessary further to extend observations on the British paper upon which I have been commenting. If others, in the course of your negotiation, should be required, they will readily present themselves to you. It is more agreeable to turn from a protracted discussion which, although we are entirely confident of having the right on our side, if we are to judge from the past, may terminate by leaving each party in possession of the same opinion which he entertained at its commencement to the consideration of some practical arrangement which, if possible, shall reconcile the views of both. A river, it is manifest, may pass through the territories of several Powers in such manner as that, if each were to interdict the others its navigable use within his particular jurisdiction, every one of them might be deprived of all the advantages of which it could be susceptible. And if the United States were disposed to exert within their jurisdiction a power over the St. Lawrence similar to that which is exercised by Great Britain, British subjects could be made to experience the same kind of inconvenience as that to which American citizens are now exposed. The best and, for descending navigation, the only channel of the St. Lawrence between Barnhart's island and the American shore is within our limits; and every British boat and raft, therefore, that descends the St. Lawrence comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The trade of the upper province is, consequently, in our power, and a report to the Legislature of New York, under the date of March 28, 1825, (of which a copy is now put into your possession,) concludes by recommending an application to Congress to exercise the power thus possessed by us in retaliation for the act of the British Parliament of August 5, 1822, entitled 'An act to regulate the trade of the provinces of Lower and Upper Canada.' If the recommendations of that report were not adopted by the General Assembly of New York, and if Congress has hitherto forborne to place Canadian navigation under any restrictions in their transit through our territory, it has been because of an unwillingness to follow an unfriendly example, and from a hope that mutual and candid explanations with Great Britain might remove all existing causes of hardship and complaint. Prior to the passage of the British act of Parliament of 1822, and from the first settlement of the territory of the United States bordering on the lakes and the St. Lawrence, their citizens had met with no difficulty in the disposal of the surplus produce of their industry, consisting chiefly of pot and pearl ashes, lumber, salted provisions, and flour, at the markets of Montreal and Quebec. It was there sold, not for domestic consumption, but for subsequent exportation, by sea, to distant markets, principally British West India colonies. This trade was reciprocally beneficial; the American citizen finding his advantage in a ready sale of his produce, the British subject his in the commission, storing, and other incidental transactions; and British navigation enjoying the exclusive benefit of re-transporting the produce to its final destination. This trade had increased to such an extent that the single article of lumber, transported down the St. Lawrence in the year 1821, amounted, in value, to $650,000, without bringing into the estimate the portion of that article which found its way through Lake Champlain and the Sorrel to Montreal and Quebec. This beneficial and innocent trade, so far as it dealt in the principal articles of flour and lumber, was almost entirely destroyed by the duties imposed in the act of Parliament of August, 1822, which in effect, if not in form, are prohibitory.

"Should not the mutual interests of the two countries, in respect to this trade, independent of any considerations of right in the navigation of the St. Lawrence, produce an arrangement satisfactory to both parties? It is a little remarkable that the opposition to such an arrangement proceeds from the party having the greatest interest in making it; that the United States, as has been already stated, is simply to sell a surplus produce of labor. The place of its consumption is the West Indies. If it can be disposed of short of that place, at Montreal or Quebec, the citizens of the United States would be content. But, if they cannot sell it in those cities; if Great Britain, by the imposition of duties, which it will not bear, prevent a sale, they then desire to exercise the privilege of passing out the St. Lawrence, and seeking a market wherever they can find it. Some portion of the produce which would take that natural direction is now transported through the great canal which unites the Hudson and Lake Erie. When the canal designed to connect the great canal with the St. Lawrence, at or near Oswego, which is in considerable progress, shall be completed, other portions of American produce will seek the market of the city of New York, instead of that of the Canadian capitals. If another canal, which is projected, shall ever be cut, that which is proposed to unite the St. Lawrence to Lake Champlain, the interest of this country in the navigation of the St. Lawrence will be still further diminished. Contrast this state of our interest in the trade in question with that of Great Britain. It will not be denied that the two British cities of Montreal and Quebec would be much benefitted by the prosecution of the trade. The British tonnage enjoys, and if the navigation of the St. Lawrence were freely thrown open to us, would probably continue to enjoy, the monopoly of the exportation of our produce, either as British or American property, to foreign possessions. That produce serves to swell the list of articles of general commerce in which Great Britain, more than other nation, is concerned, and ministers directly to the wants of British colonies. If it enters somewhat into competition with similar produce of Canadian origin, that consideration should be neutralized by the fact that the British West India colonist enjoys the benefit of the competition. For it cannot be supposed to be a part of British policy to shut up the American supply, that one British colonist may thereby sell to another British colonist, at a price somewhat higher than he otherwise could do, without the remotest prospect of its reduction from [for] any length of time that the exclusion and the monopoly might exist. Without extending the comparison further, it must be evident that Great Britain is more, or at least as much, interested in the trade as we are. Our loss is not that of the entire value of the articles which are prevented from reaching a market under the operation of the British laws, but of the difference only in value, if there be any, between those articles and the substitutes on which our labor exerts itself in consequence of the existence of that impediment. With this view of the matter, I have prepared two articles, which accompany these instructions, under the designation of A and B, and which may be successively proposed by you during the progress of the negotiation. By the first, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, up and down, from and to the ocean, is declared to belong to the citizens of the United States; and the ports of Montreal and Quebec are open to the importation and disposal of their lumber, pot and pearl ashes, flour, and salted provisions brought from the lake and St. Lawrence country. The privilege is limited to these articles, because they are all produced in that quarter, which it is important should have that vent; and which, not being supposed to be wanted in those cities for the consumption of either Canada, are subsequently exported from those places of entrepot to foreign countries. From that cause, it would be unreasonable that they should be liable to pay any higher or other duties than similar articles of Canadian origin. There is another reason for the limitation: we could not insist upon a general and indiscriminate admission into those ports of all produce and manufactures of the United States free of duty, without being prepared to allow, as the equivalent, an admission into our northern territories of all British produce and manufactures on the same terms. But such an admission of British produce and manufactures, if not unconstitutional, would be very unequal as it respects the lake country and other parts of the United States. The first article also provides for a right of deposit at Montreal and Quebec, or such other place as the British Government may designate. Possibly the British Government may require a reciprocal privilege of introducing from the Canadas into the United States free from duty, and there disposing of Canadian lumber, pot and pearl ashes, flour, and salted provisions. Such a privilege would be of essential benefit to the upper province, in opening to it, through the canals of the State of New York, the market of the city of New York. Should such a stipulation be required, you may agree to it, with a provision that the inhabitants of Canada shall be subject to the payment of the same tolls, ferriages, and other charges, in all respects, as citizens of the United States from time to time are or shall be liable to pay. You may also agree to add furs and peltries to the list of articles which each party may introduce into the territories of the other free from duty. This would be a stipulation very advantageous to Great Britain, in opening a shorter and better route to the ocean for those articles than that through the St. Lawrence.

"By the second article, our rights of navigation, and to a place of deposit simply is stipulated, without the privilege of introducing into the Canadas any articles whatever of American produce. Both articles secure to British subjects the right freely to navigate the St. Lawrence, where the channel is within our exclusive jurisdiction. The first would secure all that we can ask; the second the least that we can take.

"We could not rightfully object to a refusal to allow sales of American produce free of duty within British jurisdiction, however unfriendly it would be. But, in that case, there ought to be no limitation of the articles of our export or import trade. On the supposition of such a refusal, the Canadas would be strictly entrepots, and not places of consumption of the objects of our trade, in either of its directions; and, therefore, there should be no restriction as to what we should or should not export or import.

"Between the maximum and the minimum, which those two articles present, there are several intervening modifications, of which I will now specify some that present themselves, and to which, if you cannot do better, you are authorized to agree:

"1. It may be proposed to limit the right of deposit to Quebec;

"2. The sale of our produce may be limited to the port of Quebec; and,

"3. The list may be increased of the articles which we may be allowed to sell at either or both of those cities, free of duty, so as to include all or other articles of the growth, produce, or manufactures of the United States, with the permission to import into the United States similar produce of Canadian origin, without any corresponding privilege of introducing into them British, European, or other foreign manufactures.

"If you should find the British Government unwilling to agree to either of the two preceding articles, with or without the modifications, or some of them, above mentioned, you will decline entering into any arrangement upon the subject of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and take any counter proposals which they may offer for reference to your Government. Neither the third article of the treaty of 1794, nor that which was proposed by either party at the negotiation of the convention of 1815, nor that which was offered by Lord Castlereagh in March, 1817, would serve as a proper basis to regulate the right which we claim to the navigation of the St. Lawrence. Without adverting to any other, decisive objections to the third article of the treaty of 1794 are that it comprehended the Indians on both sides of the boundary between the territories of the United States and Great Britain, and left Great Britain at full liberty to impose whatever duties her policy might dictate upon our produce entering the Canadian ports. The act of Parliament of August, 1822, would not be contrary to the stipulations of that article. The latter objection equally applies to both the American and British projects of an article, which were proposed, but neither of which was agreed to, in the negotiation of 1815, as well as to that of Lord Castlereagh. Nor, would the United States find any protection against the exercise of the power of imposing duties, by agreeing to the ordinary stipulation in commercial treaties, restricting the duties imposed to the rate at which similar articles are liable when imported from other countries. Because, in point of fact, no article similar to those which are imported from our northern territory into Canada is introduced there from any foreign country. No foreign country stands in a similar relation to Canada that the northern parts of the United States do. And Great Britain would not, therefore, be restrained from imposing duties upon our produce, which should even be prohibitory in their effect, by their operation upon similar produce of other countries.

"Whilst Great Britain may be unwilling to enter into any treaty stipulations acknowledging our right to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, she may not be indisposed to consent, by her own voluntary act, to repeal all prohibitory and other duties imposed on American produce, so as to admit it into the ports of Montreal and Quebec on the same terms as the same kind of produce is received from Upper Canada. Such an equal admission of our produce would, in a great measure, supersede the necessity of discussing and settling at this time our right to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and of considering the regulations which the interests of both parties might require in the practical exercise of the right. Our citizens would enjoy in those cities a ready and certain market for their produce, to obtain which, would be the primary object of securing to them the navigation of the St. Lawrence. It is because we cannot demand such an admission and privilege of selling our produce as a matter of right, and because Great Britain may decline the concession of it, although manifestly beneficial to herself, that we desire to have this interest placed upon some solid and permanent foundation. But, if you should be unable to obtain the British assent to either of the articles proposed, with or without any of the modifications of them which have been suggested, it would then be satisfactory to have the assurance of the British Government that our produce, or, at least, the principal articles of it which have been mentioned, shall be received at Montreal and Quebec on the same terms as the like kinds of Canadian produce are there received. And you may, in turn, assure the British Government that the President will recommend to Congress to reciprocate any British acts of liberality and good neighborhood in regard to the admission and sale of American produce in the Canadas, by acts of equal liberality and good neighborhood on our side, in respect to the admission and sale of Canadian produce in the United States. It is within the competency of the mutual legislation of the two countries to remove many of the existing causes of complaint, without either party conceding or renouncing rights which there might be an unwillingness to admit or surrender.

"By an act of the British Parliament, passed on the 5th of July, 1825, entitled 'An act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad,' inland importation is allowed into the Canadas from the United States, in vessels, boats, or carriages belonging to them, of any goods which might be lawfully imported by sea; but such goods must be brought to a port or place of entry, and are to pay the same duties as if they were imported by sea. They may be warehoused at Quebec, only, for exportation, without paying duty, under certain restrictions; but then the collectors and comptrollers of the port are empowered to declare, in a written notice, to be by them promulgated, 'what sorts of goods may be so warehoused.'—(See 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 32d, 33d, and 34th sections, &c., of the act.) Under this authority, it would be competent to those officers to exclude, at their pleasure, from the privilege of warehousing our most valuable productions. If, by British legislation, (on the supposition that you cannot prevail on the British Government to regulate by compact, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, in the manner which has been herein proposed,) the privilege of warehousing our produce was placed on a more stable footing, and we were allowed to export it in our own vessels, it would be a considerable improvement of the existing state of things.

"During the negotiation between Mr. Rush and the British plenipotentiaries, a desire was manifested by the latter to couple together the disputed points under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, and the right asserted by the United States to the free navigation of the St. Lawrence; and, on the supposition of those two subjects being so blended, the British plenipotentiaries stated that they were even prepared to make offers of compromise and settlement, founded 'on a most liberal and comprehensive view of the wishes and interests of the United States.'—(See pages from 80 to 86 of the pamphlet, and protocols of the seventeenth and eighteenth conferences.) These offers were to be made on the basis of the United States waiving their right to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, which, however, Great Britain was willing to grant to them on a full equivalent; and that equivalent, it is to be inferred, was expected, by the British plenipotentiaries, to be furnished in the disputed territory to which the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent relates. What those offers were they declined to communicate to Mr. Rush, although invited to do so, in order that he might transmit them to his Government. The Government of the United States cannot consent to renounce a right which they conceive belongs to them by the highest species of title. If, as the British Government professes to believe, the right has no just foundation, why does it insist upon its renunciation? Nor can this Government agree to barter away any portion of the territorial sovereignty of Maine, or the proprietary rights of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, for the navigation of a river in which neither of them has any direct interest. If the question of the navigation of the St. Lawrence could be accommodated in a manner satisfactory to both parties, so as to let the citizens of the United States into the practical and beneficial enjoyment of it, their Government would be willing that the arrangement should be equally silent in regard to the admission on the one side, or the abandonment on the other, of the right as claimed and denied by the parties, respectively. It is not easy to comprehend why the British plenipotentiaries withheld the communication to Mr. Rush of the very liberal offers which, according to their account of them, they were charged to make. When they appeared disposed to yield to the separation of the two subjects, as urged by Mr. Rush, they still declined to make this proposal of compromise in respect to the northeastern boundary. Under a belief that no prejudice can result to either party from a full communication and a fair consideration of those offers, in respect to either or both questions, you will invite a disclosure of them for reference home. It is obvious that no instructions adapted to them can be given until they are known; nor can we come under any preliminary obligation as the price of their communication. If they are ever intended by Great Britain to be brought forward, the sooner it is done the better for the economy of time and the speedy settlement of the questions, should they prove acceptable to this Government. Had they been communicated to Mr. Rush the delay would have been avoided, which must now take place from your transmitting them to the United States and receiving from hence the necessary instructions, if the offers should be made known to you."

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain, dated Lexington, August 8, 1826.

"Your letter, under date of New York, on the 29th of June last, having been duly received at the Department of State, and submitted to the President, was subsequently transmitted to me at this place, and I now have the honor to address you, agreeably to his directions.

"He is very desirous of an amicable settlement of all the points of difference between Great Britain and the United States on just principles. Such a settlement alone would be satisfactory to the people of the United States, or would command the concurrence of their Senate. In stating, in your instructions, the terms on which the President was willing that the several questions pending between the two Governments might be arranged, he yielded as much to a spirit of concession as he thought he could, consistently with the interests of this country. He is, especially, not now prepared to authorize any stipulations involving a cession of territory belonging to any State in the Union, or the abandonment, express or implied, of the right to navigate the St. Lawrence, or the surrender of any territory south of latitude forty-nine on the Northwest Coast."

"III. The navigation of the St. Lawrence.—Both the articles, A and B, unquestionably assume that the United States have the right to the navigation of that river, independent of Great Britain. Nor can the President consent to any treaty by which they should renounce that right, expressly or by implication. If a sense of justice should not induce Great Britain to acknowledge our right, some hope has been indulged that she might find a motive to make the acknowledgment, in the power which we possess, on her principles, of controlling the navigation of the St. Lawrence within our limits. If she could be brought to consent to neither of those articles, your instructions did not look to any other treaty stipulations on the subject of the navigation of the St. Lawrence; and what they say with respect to practical arrangements, in other forms, was intended to refer to separate acts of the two parties. You are, indeed, authorized to take for reference any counter proposals which may be made by Great Britain, because it is possible that some other reconciliation of the interests of the two Powers, than any which has occurred here, may present itself to the British Government; and because, if that were not very likely, such a reference would be still due in courtesy to the other party. Although it is desirable, at present, for the inhabitants of the United States, on the St. Lawrence, to enjoy the liberty of trading at Montreal and Quebec, in their lumber and other articles of produce, charged with no higher duties than similar Canadian commodities, it would be unsafe to assert that, at no time, now or hereafter, would the right of freely navigating the St. Lawrence, with a convenient place of deposit, be available without the liberty of trading with either of those places. Such a right would open to our navigation a new theatre of enterprise, and if the British colonial markets should be shut against us in consequence of high duties, others equally advantageous might be sought and found. If the British Government should decline agreeing to either of the two articles, A and B, but be willing to receive our produce at Montreal or Quebec, either free of duty, or with such reduced rates as might enable it to sustain a competition with Canadian produce, two modes of accomplishing this object present themselves—one by treaty, and the other by acts of separate regulation. Between them there is no very decided preference. The latter was suggested in your instructions as being that which would be most likely to be attainable, and because it would not involve any abandonment of the rights of either party. If it be liable to the objection that either party may, at pleasure, put an end to it, the mutual interest which recommends its adoption would afford a guarantee of its durability. But you are authorized to consider your instructions enlarged so as to comprehend both modes of effecting the object, taking due care that, if that by treaty should, in the progress of the negotiation, seem to you best, the treaty stipulation shall either expressly reserve the right of the United States to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, in its whole extent, or at least shall be so framed as not to be susceptible of the interpretation that they have abandoned that right. It is believed that the British Government may be made to comprehend that the privilege of introducing the produce of Upper Canada, as proposed in your instructions, into the United States, and thereby securing the shorter and better route through the State of New York, will be an equivalent for that which we desire in the enjoyment of the markets of Montreal and Quebec. With respect to the right to the navigation of Lake Michigan, on which you suppose the British may insist, the President can see no legitimate purpose for which they should desire it. It cannot be wanted by them either to reach their own dominions or those of any foreign country, and stands, therefore, on other grounds than that on which we claim the right to navigate the St. Lawrence; and they are not allowed to trade with the Indians situated within our limits. The same observations are applicable to Lake Champlain."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay, dated London, September 21, 1827.

"The British plenipotentiaries will not entertain any proposition, respecting the navigation of the St. Lawrence, founded on the right claimed by the United States to navigate that river to the sea.

"Although it may prove hereafter expedient to make a temporary agreement without reference to the right, (which I am not authorized to do,) I am satisfied that, for the present at least, and whilst the intercourse with the British West Indies remains interdicted, it is best to leave that by land or inland navigation with the North American British provinces to be regulated by the laws of each country, respectively. The British Government will not, whilst the present state of things continues, throw any impediment in the way of that intercourse if the United States will permit it to continue."

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay.

LONDON, October 1, 1827.

SIR: I had, at an early stage of the negotiations, ascertained, not only that no arrangement, founded on a recognition of the right of the river St. Lawrence to the sea, was practicable, but that there was a sensibility on that subject which rendered it preferable not to approach it till all others, and particularly that of the colonial intercourse, had been disposed of. It was, therefore, only after it had been distinctly ascertained, at the interview of the 13th instant, [ultimo,] with Mr. Huskisson and Lord Dudley, that there was no chance left of the intercourse with the British West Indies being opened, and after the principles of the convention respecting the northeast boundary had been substantially agreed to, that I brought forward the question officially at our conferences. I did it without any hope of succeeding, but because this negotiation being the continuation of that of 1824, I apprehended that to omit altogether this subject might be construed as an abandonment of the right of the United States.

To my first suggestion, the British plenipotentiaries replied that, however well disposed Great Britain might be to treat with the United States respecting the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence as a question of mutual convenience, yet the views of the British Government being the same now as they were in 1824, and they being prohibited by express instructions from entering into any discussion respecting the free navigation of that river, if claimed as heretofore by the United States on the ground of right, they could not entertain any proposition to that effect if now made by me.

It is sufficiently obvious that the determination of the British plenipotentiaries not to enter into any discussion of the subject was applicable to themselves, and could not prevent my offering any proposition, or annexing to the protocol any argument in the support of it, which I might think proper. But it appeared to me altogether unnecessary, if not injurious, to commit my Government, by presenting any specific proposal with the certainty of its being rejected; or to make this Government commit itself still further, by reiterating its positive refusal to treat on the ground of a right on the part of the United States. I therefore made the entry which you will see in the protocol of the twentieth conference, and which is sufficient for the object I had in view. You had, by your despatch of August 8, 1826, in conformity with my own wishes, so far enlarged my instructions as to authorize me to judge which method would be the most eligible for the purpose of obtaining, at all events, the admission of American produce at Quebec or Montreal free of duty—whether that by treaty or that by acts of separate legislation. The alternative was not within my reach, as any provision reserving the right of the United States to the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, either expressly or by implication, was, in the present temper of this Government, out of the question. But had it been in my power to select the mode, I would have resorted to that suggested in the original instructions, being fully satisfied that we may with confidence rely on the obvious interest of Great Britain to remove every restriction on the exportation of American produce through Canada, and need not resort to any treaty stipulation short of at least a liberty, in perpetuity, to navigate the river through its whole extent.

Whatever motives may have induced the measures which gave rise to the first complaints of our citizens, a different policy now prevails. In consequence of the extension of the warehousing system to the ports of Quebec, Montreal, and St. John's, places of deposit are, in fact, allowed for every species of American produce free of duty in case of exportation, which is all that in that respect we could ask as a matter of right. The navigation between Montreal and Quebec, either to the sea or from the sea, has not been granted; and it is precisely what cannot now be obtained by a treaty stipulation without what would be tantamount to a disclaimer of the right.

But I do not think that, in practice, this will be much longer denied. There is certainly a disposition, not evinced on former occasions, to make the navigation free, provided it was not asked as a matter of right, and generally to encourage the intercourse between the United States and the adjacent British provinces. This change of disposition is undoubtedly due, in part, to the wish of obtaining supplies for the West India colonies, whilst the intercourse between these and the United States remains interdicted. But it also must be ascribed to more correct views of what is so clearly the interest, and ought to be the policy, of Great Britain in that quarter. It is certainly an extraordinary circumstance, that the great importance of the American inland commerce to her own navigation and to the prosperity of Canada should not have been sooner strongly felt and particularly attended to; that the obstacles to an intercourse, by which American produce is exported through Quebec in preference to the ports of the United States, should have arisen on the part of Great Britain and not of the United States.

It is therefore to that mode of attaining the object in view that I have turned my attention. The considerations which recommend the policy of removing, by their own acts, the practical inconveniences which still embarrass the intercourse have been stated, generally, to the British plenipotentiaries, but with more force and more in detail to Lord Dudley, and to other members of the Cabinet. In an interview I had to-day with his lordship, after having expressed my regret that no arrangement could at this time be made on that subject, and after having urged the other reasons which should induce Great Britain no longer to prevent the navigation of the American raft, boats, and vessels between Montreal and Quebec; that if she persisted in denying it, although I had no authority to say such was the intention of my Government, yet it seemed a natural consequence, and ought not to be considered as giving offence, that the United States should adopt corresponding measures in regard to the navigation of the river St.

Lawrence within their own limits. Lord Dudley, who had appeared to acquiesce in my general remarks, made no observation on the last suggestion.

But what is somewhat remarkable is, that he and several of the other ministers with whom I have conversed have expressed a doubt whether I was not mistaken in asserting that the navigation of the river was interdicted to our boats between Montreal and Quebec.

Upon the whole, I have great hopes that, setting aside the abstract question of right, and though no arrangement by treaty should take place, our citizens will ere long, and through the acts of Great Britain alone, enjoy all the benefits of the navigation which they could obtain even if the right were recognized. Should this expectation be disappointed, it is probable that a sufficient remedy will be found in the power to retaliate above St. Regis.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, Washington.

American paper on the navigation of the St. Lawrence—18th Protocol.

The right of the people of the United States to navigate the river St. Lawrence to and from the sea has never yet been discussed between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain. If it has not been distinctly asserted by the former in negotiation hitherto, it is because the benefits of it have been tacitly enjoyed, and because the interest, now become so great and daily acquiring fresh magnitude, has, it may almost be said, originated since the acknowledgment of the independence of the United States in 1783. This river is the only outlet provided by nature for the inhabitants of several among the largest and most populous States of the American Union. Their right to use it, as a medium of communication with the ocean, rests upon the same ground of natural right and obvious necessity heretofore asserted by the Government in behalf of the people of other portions of the United States in relation to the river Mississippi. It has sometimes been said that the possession by one nation of both the shores of a river at its mouth gives the right of obstructing the navigation of it to the people of other nations living on the banks above; but it remains to be shown upon what satisfactory grounds the assumption by the nation below of exclusive jurisdiction over a river thus situated can be placed. The common right to navigate it is, on the other hand, a right of nature. This is a principle which, it is conceived, will be found to have the sanction of the most revered authorities of ancient and modern times; and if there have been temporary occasions when it has been questioned, it is not known that the reasons upon which it rests, as developed in the most approved works upon public law, have ever been impugned. As a general principle, it stands unshaken. The dispute relative to the Scheldt, in 1784, is, perhaps, the occasion when the argument drawn from natural right was most attempted to be impeached. Here the circumstances were altogether peculiar. Amongst others, it is known to have been alleged by the Dutch that the whole course of the two branches of this river which passed within the dominions of Holland was entirely artificial; that it owed its existence to the skill and labor of Dutchmen; that its banks had been reared up at immense cost, and were in like manner maintained. Hence, probably, the motive for that stipulation in the treaty of Munster, which had continued for more than a century, that the lower Scheldt, with the canals of Sas and Swin, and other mouths of the sea bordering upon them, should ke kept closed on the side belonging to the States. But the case of the St. Lawrence is totally different. Special, also, as seemed the grounds which the Dutch took as against the Emperor of Germany in this case of the Scheldt, and although they also stood upon a specific and positive compact of long duration, it is nevertheless known that the public voice of Europe on this part of the dispute preponderated against them. It may well have done so, since there is no sentiment more deeply and universally felt than that the ocean is free to all men, and the waters that flow into it to those whose home is upon their shores. In nearly every part of the world we find this natural right acknowledged, by laying navigable rivers open to all the inhabitants of their banks; and wherever the stream entering the limits of another society or nation has been interdicted to the upper inhabitants, it has been an act of force by a stronger against a weaker party, and condemned by the judgment of mankind. The right of the upper inhabitants to the full use of the stream rests upon the same imperious wants as that of the lower; upon the same intrinsic necessity of participating in the benefits of this flowing element. Rivers were given for the use of all persons living in the country of which they make a part, and a primary use of navigable ones is that of external commerce. The public good of nations is the object of the law of nations, as that of individuals is of municipal law. The interest of a part gives way to that of the whole; the particular to the general. The former is subordinate; the latter paramount. This is the principle pervading every code, national or municipal, whose basis is laid in moral right, and whose aim is the universal good. All that can be required under a principle so incontestable, so wise, and, in its permanent results upon the great fabric of human society, so beneficent, is, that reasonable compensation be made whenever the general good calls for partial sacrifices, whether from individuals in a local jurisdiction, or from one nation considered as an integral part of the family of nations. This is, accordingly, done in the case of roads, and the right of way in single communities, and is admitted to be just, in the form of moderate tolls, where a foreign passage takes place through a natural current kept in repair by the nation holding its shores below. The latter predicament is not supposed to be that of the St. Lawrence at this day, since it is not known that any artificial constructions, looking simply to its navigation, have yet been employed, either upon its banks or in keeping the channel clear. This has been the case, in connexion with other facilities and protection afforded to navigation, with the Elbe, the Maese, the Weser, the Oder, and various other rivers of Europe that might be named, and the incidental right of toll has followed. It may be mentioned, however, as a fact, under this head, that the prevailing disposition of Europe defeated an attempt once made by Denmark to exact a toll at the mouth of the Elbe, by means of a fort on the Holstein side which commanded it. The Sound dues have been admitted in favor of Denmark, but not always without scrutiny, and only under well established rules. We know that under some circumstances and with due precautions a right is even allowed to armies to pass through a neutral territory for the destructive purposes of war. How much stronger and more unqualified the right to seek a passage through a natural stream for the useful and innocent purposes of commerce and subsistence! A most authentic and unequivocal confirmation of this doctrine has been afforded, at a recent epoch, by the parties to the European alliance, and largely, as is believed, through the enlightened instrumentality of Great Britain, at the negotiation of the treaties at the Congress of Vienna. It has been stipulated in these treaties that the Rhine, the Necker, the Mayne, the Moselle, the Maese, and the Scheldt, are to be free to all nations. The object of these stipulations undoubtedly has been to lay the navigation of these rivers effectively open to all the people dwelling upon their banks or within their neighborhood, and to abolish those unnatural and unjust restrictions by which the inhabitants of the interior of Germany have been too often deprived of their outlet to the sea by an abuse of that sovereignty, rather than its right, which would impute an exclusive dominion over a river to any one State not holding all its shores. These stipulations may be considered as an indication of the present judgment of Europe upon the point, and would seem to supersede further reference to the case of other rivers, and, from their recent as well as high authority, further illustration of any kind. They imply a substantial recognition of the principle that, whatever may sometimes have been the claim to an exclusive right by one nation over a river, under the circumstances in question, the claim, if founded in an alleged right of sovereignty, could, at best, only be supposed to spring from the social compact; whereas the right of navigating the river is a right of nature, pre-existent in point of time, not necessary to have been surrendered up for any purpose of the common good, and unsusceptible of annihilation. There is no principle of national law and universal justice, upon which the provisions of the Vienna treaties are founded, that does not apply to sustain the right of the people of the United States to navigate the St. Lawrence. The relations between the soil and the water, and those of man to both, form the eternal basis of this right. These relations are too intimate and powerful to be separated. A nation deprived of the use of the water flowing through its soil would see itself stripped of many of the most beneficial uses of the soil itself; so that its right to use the water, and freely to pass over it, becomes an indispensable adjunct to its territorial rights. It is a means so interwoven with the end that to disjoin them would be to destroy the end. Why should the water impart its fertility to the earth if the products of the latter are to be left to perish upon the shores.

It may be proper to advert to the footing, in point of fact, upon which the navigation of this river stands at present between the two countries, so far as the regulations of Great Britain are concerned. The act of Parliament of the 3d of George IV, chapter 119, August 5, 1822, has permitted the importation from the United States, by land or water, into any port of entry in either of the Canadas at which there is a custom-house, of certain articles of the United States enumerated in a schedule, subject to the duties which are specified in another schedule. Under the former schedule many of the most important articles of the United States are excluded; and under the latter the duties are so high as to be equivalent to a prohibition of some that are nominally admitted. The foregoing act lays no impositions on the merchandise of the United States descending the St. Lawrence with a view to exportation on the ocean, but an act of Parliament of 1821 does, viz: upon the timber and lumber of the United States. Such, in general terms, is the footing upon which the intercourse is placed by the British acts, and it may be alike proper, in connexion with this reference to it, to mention the conditions of intercourse which it has superseded. To whatever observations the duties imposed on the products of the United States, imported for sale into the ports of Canada, may otherwise be liable, as well as the exclusion of some of them altogether, it will be understood that it is only the unobstructed passage of the river, considered as a common highway, that is claimed as a right. By the treaty stipulations of November, 1794, between the two countries, the United States were allowed to import into the two Canadas all articles of merchandise, the importation of which was not entirely prohibited, subject to no other duties than were payable by British subjects on the importation of the same articles from Europe into the Canadas. The same latitude of importation was allowed into the United States from the Canadas, subject to no other duties than were payable on the importation of the same articles into the Atlantic ports of the United States. Peltries were made free on both sides. All tolls and rates of ferriage were to be the same upon the inhabitants of both countries. No transit duties at portages or carrying places were to be levied on either side. These provisions were declared in the treaty to be designed to secure to both parties the local advantages common to both, and to promote a disposition favorable to friendship and good neighborhood. The waters on each side were made free, with the exception, reciprocally, at that time, of vessels of the United States going to the seaports of the British territories, or navigating their rivers between their mouths and the highest port of entry from the sea, and of British vessels navigating the rivers of the United States beyond the highest ports of entry from the sea. These treaty regulations are found among the articles declared, when the instrument was made, to be permanent. Both countries continued to abide by them until Great Britain passed the acts above recited, by which it appears that she has considered the intervening war of 1812 as abrogating the whole treaty of November, 1794. The United States have continued to allow, up to the present time, its provisions, regulating this intercourse, to operate in favor of the Canadas. By the act of Parliament of the 3d of George IV, chapter 44, taken in conjunction with the act of the same year, chapter 119, above mentioned, the right of the vessels of the United States to the whole navigation of the St. Lawrence appears to be taken for granted: by the first, from the ocean to Quebec; and by the second, from any part of the territories of the United States to Quebec. But a discretionary power is given to the Colonial Governments in Canada to do away the effect of the latter permission, by excepting any of the Canadian posts from those to which the vessels of the United States are by the act made admissible; whilst the duties which it imposes upon such of the exports of the United States as could alone render the trade profitable are prohibitory. But it is the right of navigating this river upon a basis of certainty, without obstruction or hindrance of any kind, or the hazard of it in future, that the United States claim for their citizens.

The importance of this claim may be estimated when it is considered that the people of at least as many of the States as Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Vermont, Maine, and New Hampshire, and the Territory of Michigan, have an immediate interest in it, not to dwell upon the prospective derivative interest which is attached to it in other portions of the Union. The parts of the United States connected directly or remotely with this river, and the inland seas through which it communicates with the ocean, form, indeed, an extent of territory, and comprise, even at this day, an aggregate of population which bespeak the interest at stake to be of the very highest nature, and one which, after every deduction suggested by the artificial channels which may be substituted for the natural one of this great stream, make it emphatically an object of national concernment and attention.

Having seen the grounds of necessity and reason upon which the right of so great and growing a population to seek its only natural pathway to the ocean rests, it may be expected that they should be supported by the established principles of international law. This shall be done by the citation of passages from the writings of the most eminent publicists, always bearing in mind that the right under discussion becomes strong in proportion to the extent which the country of the upper inhabitants, in its connexion with the stream, bears to the country of the lower inhabitants. Vattel, in book 2, ch. 9, sec. 127, lays down the following as a general position: "Nature, who designs her gifts for the common advantage of men, does not allow of their being kept from their use when they can be furnished with them without any prejudice to the proprietor, and by leaving still untouched all the utility and advantages he is capable of receiving from his rights." The same author, same book, ch. 10, sec. 132, says: "Property cannot deprive nations of the general right of travelling over the earth in order to have a communication with each other for carrying on trade and other just reasons. The master of a country may only refuse the passage on particular occasions, where he finds it is prejudicial or dangerous." In section 134, he adds: "A passage ought also to be granted for merchandise; and as this may, in common, be done without inconvenience, to refuse it, without just reason, is injuring a nation, and endeavoring to deprive it of the means of carrying on a trade with other States; if the passage occasion any inconvenience, any expense for the preservation of canals and highways, it may be recompensed by the rights of toll." Again, in book 1, ch. 22, sec 266, we are told that, if "neither the one nor the other of two nations near a river can prove that it settled first, it is to be supposed that they both came there at the same time, since neither can give any reason of preference; and, in this case, the dominion of each will be extended to the middle of the river." This is a principle too relevant to the doctrine under consideration to be passed over without remark. It relates, as will be seen, to dominion, and not to right of passage simply. Now, if simultaneous settlement confers coequality of dominion, by even stronger reason will simultaneous acquisition confer coequality of passage. Without inquiring into the state of the navigation of the St. Lawrence as between Great Britain and France prior to the peace of 1763, it is sufficient that, in the war of 1756–'63, which preceded that peace, the people of the United States, in their capacity of English subjects, contributed, jointly with the parent State, (and largely, it may be added with historical truth,) towards gaining the Canadas from France. The right of passage, therefore, of this river, admitting that it did not exist before, was, in point of fact, opened to the early inhabitants of New York and Pennsylvania at an epoch at least as soon as to British subjects living, afterwards, in the newly-conquered possessions. A title thus derived is not invoked as resting upon the same ground with the title derived from natural right, but it serves to strengthen it, and is of pertinent application, as against Great Britain, in this instance. Let it be looked at under either of the following alternatives which present themselves: If Great Britain possessed the navigation of this river prior to 1763, so did the people of the United States, as part, at that time, of her own Empire. If she did not, but only first acquired it when the Canadas were acquired, the people of the United States, acting in common with her, acquired it in common, and at as early a date. It will not be said that the right which necessarily inured to the colonies as part of the British Empire was lost by their subsequently taking the character of a distinct nation, since it is the purpose of this paper to show that the right of passage may, as a natural right, be claimed by one foreign nation against another, without any reference whatever to antecedent circumstances. But the latter, when they exist, make up part of the case, and are not to be left out of view. The peculiar and common origin of the title of both parties, as seen above, is calculated to illustrate more fully the principle of common right, applicable to both now. The antecedent circumstances show that the natural right always appertaining to the early inhabitants of the shores of this river, above the Canadian line, to navigate it, has once been fortified by joint conquest, and by subsequent joint usufruction. One other quotation is all that will be given from the same author. It relates to a strait, and not a river; but the reasoning from analogy is not the less striking and appropriate. "It must be remarked," he says, "with regard to straits, that when they serve for a communication between two seas, the navigation of which is common to all or many nations, he who possesses the strait cannot refuse others a passage through it, provided that passage be innocent, and attended with no danger to the State. Such a refusal, without just reason, would deprive these nations of an advantage granted them by nature; and, indeed, the right of such a passage is a remainder of the primitive liberty enjoyed in common." If we consult Grotius, we shall find that he is equally or more explicit in sanctioning, in the largest extent, the principle contended for. He even goes so far as to say, after laying down generally the right of passage, that "the fears which any Power entertains of a multitude in arms passing through its territories do not form such an exception as can do away the rule, it not being proper or reasonable that the fears of one party should destroy the rights of another."—(Book 2, chap. 2, sec. 13.) In the course of the same section he declares that, upon "this foundation of common right, a free passage through countries, rivers, or over any part of the sea which belong to some particular people, ought to be allowed to those who require it for the necessary occasions of life, whether those occasions be in quest of settlements, after being driven from their own country, or to trade with a remote nation." The reasons which Grotius himself gives, or which he adopts from writers more ancient, for this right of innocent passage, (and he is full of authorities and examples, as well from sacred as profane history,) are of peculiar force. He denominates it "a right interwoven with the very frame of human society." "Property," he says, "was originally introduced with a reservation of that use which might be of general benefit, and not prejudicial to the interest of the owner." He concludes the section in the following manner: "A free passage ought to be allowed, not only to persons but to merchandise; for no Power has a right to prevent one nation trading with another at a remote distance—a permission which, for the interest of society, should be maintained; nor can it be said that any one is injured by it, for, though he may thereby be deprived of an exclusive gain, yet the loss of what is not his due, as a matter of right, can never be considered as a damage or the violation of a claim." After authorities of such immediate bearing on the point under consideration, further quotation will be forborne. The question of right is conceived to be made out, and if its denomination will be found to be sometimes that of an imperfect, in contradistinction to an absolute right, the denial of it is, nevertheless, agreed to be an injury, of which the party deprived may justly complain. The sentiments taken from these two writers, and they are not the only ones capable of being adduced, (though deemed sufficient,) have the full support of coincident passages in Puffendorf, book 3, chap. 3, secs. 4, 5, 6, and in Wolfius, sec. 310.

Finally, the United States feel justified in claiming the navigation of this river on the ground of paramount interest and necessity to their citizens—on that of natural right, founded on this necessity, and felt and acknowledged in the practice of mankind, and under the sanction of the best expounders of the laws of nations. Their claim is to its full and free navigation from its source to the sea without impediment or obstruction of any kind. It was thus that Great Britain claimed, and had, the navigation of the Mississippi, by the seventh article of the treaty of Paris of 1763, when the mouth and lower shores of that river were held by another Power. The claim, whilst necessary to the United States, is not injurious to Great Britain, nor can it violate any of her just rights. They confidently appeal to her justice for its enjoyment and security; to her enlightened sense of good neighborhood; to her past claims upon others for the enjoyment of a similar right; and to her presumed desire for the advantageous intercourse of trade and all good offices, now and henceforth, between the citizens of the United States and her own subjects bordering upon each other in that portion of her dominions.

N.

British paper on the navigation of the St. Lawrence—24th Protocol.

The claim of the United States to the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence wears a character of peculiar importance when urged as an independent right.

The American plenipotentiary must be aware that a demand, rested upon this principle, necessarily precludes those considerations of good neighborhood and mutual accommodation with which the Government of Great Britain would otherwise have been anxious to enter upon the adjustment of this part of the negotiation.

A right claimed without qualification on the one side affords no room for friendly concession on the other; total admission or total rejection is the only alternative which it presents.

On looking to the objects embraced by the American claim we find them to be of no ordinary magnitude. The United States pretend to no less than the perpetual enjoyment of a free, uninterrupted passage, independent of the territorial sovereign, through a large and very important part of the British possessions in North America. They demand, as their necessary inherent right, the liberty of navigating the St. Lawrence from its source to the sea, though, in the latter part of its course, which lies entirely within the British dominions, and comprises a space of nearly six hundred miles, that river traverses the finest settlements of Canada, communicates by the south with Lake Champlain, and washes the quays of Montreal and Quebec.

A pretension which thus goes to establish a perpetual thoroughfare for the inhabitants, vessels, and productions of a foreign country through the heart of a British colony, and under the walls of its principal fortress, has need to be substantiated on the clearest and most indisputable grounds. It requires, indeed, an enlarged view of what is owed in courtesy by one nation to another to justify the British Government in entering, at this late period, on the discussion of so novel and extensive a claim.

There will, however, be little difficulty in showing that the claim asserted by the American plenipotentiary rests, as to any foundation of natural right, on an incorrect application of the authorities which he has consulted. With respect to the claim derived from an acquired title which he has also alleged, that ground of claim will remain to be examined hereafter; but it may be observed, in the outset, that the natural and acquired title depend on principles essentially distinct; that the one cannot be used to make good any defect in the other; and, although they may be possessed independently by the same claimant, that they can, in no degree, contribute to each other's validity.

Proceeding to consider how far the claim of the United States may be established on either of these titles, it is first necessary to inquire what must be intended by the assertion that their claim is founded on natural right. "The right of navigating this river," says the American plenipotentiary, "is a right of nature, pre-existent in point of time, not necessary to have been surrendered up for any purpose of common good, and unsusceptible of annihilation." The right here described can be of no other than of that kind which is generally designated in the law of nations a perfect right. Now, a perfect right is that which exists independent of treaty; which necessarily arises from the law of nature; which is common, or may, under similar circumstance, be common to all independent nations; and can never be denied or infringed by any State without a breach of the law of nations. Such is the right to navigate the ocean without molestation in time of peace.

Upon these principles, now universally received, it is contended for the United States that a nation possessing both shores of a navigable river at its mouth has no right to refuse the passage of it to another possessing a part of its upper banks, and standing in need of it as a convenient channel of commercial communication with the sea. Applying the same principles to the case of the St. Lawrence, the American Government maintain that Great Britain would be no more justified in controlling American navigation on that river than in assuming to itself a similar right of interference on the high seas.

To this extent must the assumption of a perfect right be carried, or such claim is no longer to be considered in that character; but, falling under the denomination of an imperfect right, it becomes subject to considerations essentially and entirely different.

The first question, therefore, to be resolved is, whether a perfect right to the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence can be maintained according to the principles and practice of the law of nations?

Referring to the most eminent writers on that subject, we find that any liberty of passage to be enjoyed by one nation through the dominions of another is treated by them as a qualified occasional exception to the paramount rights of property. "The right of passage," says Vattel, "is also a remainder of the primitive communion in which the entire earth was common to men, and the passage was everywhere free according to their necessities." Grotius, in like manner, describes mankind as having in their primitive state enjoyed the earth and its various productions in common until after the introduction of property, together with its laws, by a division or gradual occupation of the general domain. Among the natural rights which he describes as having in part survived this new order of things are those of necessity and of innocent utility; under the latter of which he classes the right of passage. Following his principle, this natural right of passage between nation and nation may be compared to the right of highway, as it exists in particular communities, between the public at large and the individual proprietors of the soil, but with this important difference, that, in the former case, commanding and indispensable considerations of national safety, national welfare, and national honor and interest, must be taken especially into the account.

It is clear that, on this principle, there is no distinction between the right of passage by a river flowing from the possessions of one nation through those of another to the ocean, and the same right to be enjoyed by means of any highway, whether of land or of water, generally accessible to the inhabitants of the earth. "Rivers," says Grotius, "are subject to property, though neither where they rise nor where they discharge themselves be within our territory." The right to exclusive sovereignty over rivers is also distinctly asserted by Bynkershoek, in the ninth chapter of his treatise "on the dominion of the sea." Nor is this by any means the full latitude to which the principle, if applied at all, must in fairness be extended. "All nations," says Vattel, "have a general right to the innocent use of the things which are under any one's domain." "Property," says the same author, "cannot deprive nations of the general right of travelling over the earth, in order to have communication with each other, for carrying on trade, and other just reasons." The nature of these other just reasons is explained by Grotius in the following sentence: "A passage ought to be granted to persons, whenever just occasion shall require, over any lands or rivers, or such parts of the sea, as belong to any nation;" as, "for instance, if, being expelled from their own country, they want to settle in some uninhabited land, or if they are going to traffic with some distant people, or to recover, by a just war, what is their own right and due."

For other purposes, then, besides those of trade, for objects of war as well as for objects of peace, for all nations no less than for any nation in particular, does the right of passage hold good under those authorities to which the American plenipotentiary has appealed. It has already been shown that, with reference to this right, no distinction is drawn by them between land and water, and still less between one sort of river and another. It further appears, from Vattel, that the right in question, particularly for the conveyance of merchandise, is attached to artificial as well as to natural highways. "If this passage," he observes, "occasion any inconvenience, any expense for the preservation of canals and highways, it may be recompensed by rights of toll."

Is it then to be imagined that the American Government can mean to insist on a demand involving such consequences without being prepared to apply, by reciprocity, the principle on which it rests in favor of Great Britain? Though the sources of the Mississippi are now ascertained to lie within the territory of the United States, the day cannot be distant when the inhabitants of Upper Canada will find convenience in exporting their superfluous produce by means of the channel of that river to the ocean. A few miles of transport over land are of little consequence when leading to a navigable river of such extent. Even at the present time a glance upon the map is sufficient to show that the course of the Hudson, connected as it now is with the waters of the St. Lawrence, would afford a very commodious outlet for the produce of the Canadian provinces. The comparative shortness of this passage, especially with reference to the West Indies, would amply compensate for any fair expense of tolls.

It would also be, in some instances, convenient and profitable for British vessels to ascend the principal rivers of the United States as far as their draught of water would admit, instead of depositing their merchandise, as now, at the appointed ports of entry from the sea. Nor is it probable that other nations would be more backward than the British in pressing their claim to a full participation in this advantage. The general principle which they would invoke, in pursuance of the example given by America, and a partial application of such principles no country can have a right to expect from another, is clearly of a nature to authorize the most extraordinary and unheard of demands. As for the right of passage from sea to sea across any intervening isthmus, such, for instance, as that of Corinth or of Suez, and more especially from the Atlantic to the Pacific, by the isthmus of Panama, that right of passage follows as immediately from this principle, as any such right claimed from one tract of land to another, or to the ocean, by water communication.

The exercise of a right which thus goes the length of opening a way for foreigners into the bosom of every country must necessarily be attended with inconvenience, and sometimes with alarm and peril, to the State whose territories are to be traversed. This consequence has not been overlooked by writers on the law of nations. They have felt the necessity of controlling the operation of so dangerous a principle, by restricting the right of transit to purposes of innocent utility, and by attributing to the local Sovereign the exclusive power of judging under what circumstances the passage through his dominions is or is not to be regarded as innocent. In other words, the right which they have described is, at best, only an imperfect right.

It is under the head of innocent utility that Grotius has classed the right of passage, as before laid down in his own expressions.

"Innocent utility," he adds, "is when I only seek my own advantage without damaging anybody else." In treating of the same right, Vattel remarks that, "since the introduction of domain and property, we can no otherwise make use to it than by respecting the proper right of others." "The effect," he adds, "of property is to make the advantage of the proprietor prevail over that of all others."

The same author defines the right of innocent use or innocent utility to be "the right we have to that use which may be drawn from things belonging to another, without causing him either loss or inconvenience." He goes on to say that "this right of innocent use is not a perfect right like that of necessity; for it belongs to the master to judge if the use we would make of a thing that belongs to him will be attended with no damage or inconvenience."

With respect to the assertion of Grotius, as quoted by the American plenipotentiary, "that the mere apprehension of receiving injury from the exercise of this right is not a sufficient reason for denying it," the author, it must be observed, is addressing himself to the conscience of the Sovereign through whose territories a passage may be demanded—impressing upon his mind that he cannot fully discharge his moral obligations in giving such refusal, unless he be well convinced that his fears originate in just causes. But it would be absurd and contrary to the general tenor of his argument to suppose that a well founded apprehension was not to have its due effect, or that the advantage, or even necessity, of a foreign nation could be justly recognized by him as paramount, in the one case, to the leading interests in the other to the safety of his own.

It is further to be observed that Grotius, in the argument referred to, had clearly in view an occasional liberty of passage, not of that perpetual, uninterrupted kind which the regular activity of modern commerce requires. But the doctrine of Grotius applied to merchandise, and, taken in the sense ascribed to it by the American plenipotentiary, is distinctly contradicted by other eminent writers on the law of nations. Puffendorf, for instance, in his great work on that subject, expresses himself as follows: "We may have good reasons for stopping foreign merchandise as well by land as on a river, or on an arm of the sea, within our dependence. For besides that a too great affluence of foreigners is sometimes prejudical or suspicious to a State, why should not a Sovereign secure to his own subjects the profit made by foreigners under favor of the passage which he allows them?" "I admit that in allowing foreigners to carry their merchandise elsewhere, even without paying for the passage, we do not sustain any damage, and that they do us no wrong in pretending to an advantage of which we might have possessed ourselves before them. But, at the same time, as they have no right to exclude us from it, why should we not try to draw it to ourselves? Why should we not prefer our interest to theirs?"

The same author observes in the next section of his work that "a State may fairly lay a duty on foreign goods conveyed through its territory by way of compensation for what its subjects lose by admitting a new competitor into the market."

To appreciate the full force of these opinions it must be borne in mind that Puffendorf appears to speak of a foreign nation so situated as to depend exclusively on the passage in question for the sale of its superfluous produce and the importation of supplies from abroad. This part of the subject may be closed with the following decisive words of Barbeyrac, in his Notes on Grotius: "It necessarily follows from the right of property that the proprietor may refuse another the use of his goods. Humanity, indeed, requires that he should grant that use to those who stand in need of it, when it can be done without any considerable inconvenience to himself; and if he even then refuses it, though he transgresses his duty, he doth them no wrong, properly so called, except they are in extreme necessity, which is superior to all ordinary rules."

But the American plenipotentiary maintains that the right of passage, as understood by him in opposition to his own authorities, that is, independent of the Sovereign's consent, and applied to the single predicament of the St. Lawrence, has been substantially recognized by the Powers of Europe, in the treaties of general pacification concluded at Paris in 1814, and in the following year at Vienna.

It is true that in the solemn engagements then contracted by them the Sovereigns of the leading States of Europe manifested a disposition to facilitate commercial intercourse between their respective countries by opening the navigation of such of the principal rivers as separated or traversed the territories of several Powers. This policy was applied more particularly to the Rhine, the Necker, the Mayne, the Moselle, the Maese, and the Scheldt. But neither in the general nor in the special stipulations relating to the free navigation of rivers is there anything to countenance the principle of a natural, independent right as asserted by the American plenipotentiary. We find, on the contrary, that in the treaty concluded at Paris, between France and the allied Powers, the Rhine was the only river at once thrown open to general navigation. With respect to the other rivers, it was merely stipulated that the means of extending that arrangement to them should be determined by the Congress about to assemble at Vienna. In the instance of the Rhine it was natural for France, in giving up possessions which she had for some time enjoyed on the banks of that river, to stipulate a reserve of the navigation. The stipulations relating to river navigation in the general treaty of Vienna commence in the following manner: "The Powers whose States are separated or crossed by the same navigable river engage to regulate by common consent all that regards its navigation." They close with an agreement that the regulations, once adopted, shall not be changed, except with the consent of all the Powers bordering on the same river.

It is evident, therefore, that the allied Governments, in concurring to favor the circulation of trade through the great water communications of continental Europe, did not lose sight of what was due to the sovereignty of particular States; and that, when they referred the common enjoyment of certain navigable rivers to voluntary compact between the parties more immediately concerned, they virtually acknowledged the right of any one of those parties, till bound by its own engagements to withhold the passage through its dominions from foreign merchant vessels. As freedom of navigation in favor of all nations, and not merely of those which border on the rivers thus opened by treaty, was the immediate object of the above-mentioned stipulations, it must be presumed that the Powers assembled in Congress, if they had felt themselves borne out by the practice or general opinion in Europe, would not have hesitated to proclaim the measure which they adopted as one of natural, independent right. Their silence alone on this point might have been taken as strongly indicative of their belief that the prevailing usage of Europe would authorize no such declaration. But the principle of mutual consent is surely irreconcilable with the contrary supposition, and must, at least, be understood to give a special character to the engagements contracted under it, confining them to the rivers enumerated in the treaty; and, however laudable, as an example to other States, whose circumstances may allow of their imitating it without danger or detriment, expressive of no obligation beyond the occasion for which the treaty was framed.

It would take up too much time to demonstrate, by a detailed investigation of every case to which the American argument applies, the negative proposition that no nation exercises the liberty of navigating a river through the territories of another, except by permission or express concession under treaty. It is rather for the American Government to present a single instance in which the liberty claimed for the United States is exercised explicitly as a natural, independent right.

The case of the Scheldt, though referred to by the American plenipotentiary, is certainly not one of this kind. The leading circumstances relating to that river were, first, its mouths, including the canals of Sas and Swin, lay within the Dutch territory, while parts of its upper channel were situate within the Flemish provinces; secondly, that the treaty of Westphalia had confirmed the right of the Dutch to close the mouths of the river; thirdly, that the exercise of this right was disputed, after a lapse of more than a hundred years, by the Emperor of Germany; and fourthly, that the dispute between that monarch and the Dutch Republic terminated in 1785, by leaving the Dutch in possession of the right which had been disputed. It is true that at that period the Dutch founded their claim, in part, on the expense and labor which they had undergone in improving the river; but it is true, at the same time, that they also grounded it on the general law of nations. Above all, they rested it on the treaty of Westphalia. But if the right of the Dutch Republic had been countenanced by the law and practice of nations, why, it may be asked, should it have been thought necessary to confirm that right by the treaty of Westphalia? The reply is obvious; that confirmation was the resort of the weak against the strong: of the former dependents of Spain against the encroachments of a haughty Power still Sovereign of Antwerp and the neighboring provinces, and not having yet renounced its claim of sovereignty over Holland itself. It was natural for the Dutch, under such circumstances, to fortify their right by the general sanction of Europe; but it was not natural for the principal parties in the pacification of Munster to lend their sanction to a measure in direct contradiction to acknowledged principles; or, if their scruples as to the admission of such a measure had been removed by special motives, it is strange that they should not have taken the obvious precaution of recording those motives. During the discussions about the Scheldt, in 1785, the Empress of Russia was the only Sovereign who officially declared an opinion in favor of the house of Austria. But the United States can derive no great advantage from a declaration couched in such terms as these: "Nature herself hath granted to the Austrian Low Countries the use and advantage of the river in dispute; Austria alone, by virtue of the law of nature and nations, is entitled to an exclusive right to the river in question. So that the equity and disinterestedness of Joseph II can only impart this right to other people, it belonging exclusively to his States."

The opinions proclaimed on this subject by the Russian Government are more remarkable, as there is no country which has a greater interest than Russia in the disputed question. It is well known that the only approach to the Russian ports on the Black Sea, from the Mediterranean and Atlantic, is by the passages of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus. These canals are, in fact, salt-water straits, communicating from sea to sea; passing, it is true, between the Turkish territories in Europe and Asia, but with no great length of course, and leading to a vast expanse of inland water, the shores of which are occupied by no less than three independent Powers.

There is manifestly a wide difference between such a case and that of the St. Lawrence, nor can the marked difference in principle between rivers and straits be overlooked; and yet, as matter of fact, the navigation of the Black Sea and the adjacent canals is enjoyed by Russia—by that Power which has so often dictated its own conditions to the Porte—in virtue of a treaty founded, like other treaties, on the mutual convenience and mutual advantage of the parties. Even the navigation of the Danube, downwards to the ocean, was first accorded to Austria by the Turkish Government as a specific concession made at a juncture when the Porte, involved in a quarrel with the most formidable of its neighbors, was compelled to propitiate the good will of other Christian Powers.

The case of the Mississippi is far from presenting an exception to this view of the subject. The treaty of 1763, which opened the navigation of that river to British subjects, was concluded after a war in which Great Britain had been eminently successful. The same motives that prevailed with France to cede Canada must have restrained her from hazarding a continuance of hostilities for such an object as the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi. The agreement respecting that river makes part of the general provisions as to the western boundary of the British possessions in America, by which the whole left side of the Mississippi was ceded to Great Britain, with the exception of the town and island of New Orleans. This reservation was admitted on the express condition that the navigation of the whole channel should be open to British subjects. The very fact of its having been thought necessary to insert this stipulation in the treaty, in consequence of France having retained possession of both banks of the river at a single spot, leads, irresistibly, to an inference the very reverse of what is maintained by the American plenipotentiary.

At a later period the navigation of the Mississippi became a subject of arrangement between Spain and the United States. By the fourth article of their treaty of boundary and navigation, concluded in 1795, a similar agreement to that which had before subsisted between France and Great Britain was effected between those Powers, with this remarkable difference: that the liberty of navigating the river was expressly confined to the "parties themselves, unless the King of Spain," to use the words of the treaty, "should extend the privilege to the subjects of other Powers by special convention."

It must not be overlooked that, when the clause which is here quoted, and the exclusive stipulation immediately preceding it, were drawn up, the sources of the Mississippi were still supposed to be within the British territory; and, at the same time, there was in force a treaty between Great Britain and the United States declaring that "the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, should forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain."

Some additional light may, perhaps, be thrown on the object of the present discussion by the quotation of a note on the fourth article of the Spanish treaty, which is printed in the collection of the United States laws, arranged and published under the authority of an act of Congress. It is as follows:

"Whatsoever right his Catholic Majesty had to interdict the free navigation of the Mississippi to any nation at the date of the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real, (the 27th of October, 1795,) that right was wholly transferred to the United States, in virtue of the cession of Louisiana from France, by the treaty of April 30, 1803. And, as the definitive treaty of peace was concluded previously to the transfer to the United States of the right of Spain to the dominion of the river Mississippi, and, of course, prior to the United States possessing the Spanish right, it would seem that the stipulation contained in the 8th article of the definitive treaty with Great Britain could not have included any greater latitude of navigation on the Mississippi than that which the United States were authorized to grant on the 3d of September, 1783.

"The additional right of sovereignty which was acquired over the river by the cession of Louisiana was paid for by the American Government; and therefore any extension of it to a foreign Power could scarcely be expected without an equivalent."

The natural right asserted by the American plenipotentiary being thus examined in respect both to the principles which it involves and to the general practice of nations, the acquired title, as distinct from the natural, stands next for consideration.

This title is described in the American argument as originating in circumstances which either preceded or attended the acquisition of the Canadas by Great Britain. It is said "that, if Great Britain possessed the navigation of the St. Lawrence before the conclusion of peace in 1763, so did the people of the United States, as forming, at that time, a part of the British Empire; but if Great Britain only first acquired it together with the Canadas, then did the people of the United States acquire it in common with her at the same period." In both the supposed cases it is taken for granted that, whatever liberty to navigate the St. Lawrence, in the whole length of its course, the inhabitants of the United States enjoyed when those States were part of the British Empire, continued to belong to them after their separation from the mother country. Now, if this were so, it would also be true, and in a far stronger degree, that the subjects of Great Britain have an equal right to enjoy, in common with American citizens, the use of the navigable rivers and other public possessions of the United States which existed when both countries were united under the same Government; for the acquired title, be it remembered, does not affect the St. Lawrence, as a river flowing from the territories of one Power through those of another, to the sea, but is manifestly grounded on the supposition that an object which had been possessed in common by the people of both countries up to the time of their separation, continues to belong, in point of use, to both after they have ceased to be parts of the same community. If it be true that the inhabitants of the United States contributed, as British subjects, to effect the conquest of Canada, it cannot, at the same time, be denied that the United States, before their separation from Great Britain, were frequently indebted to the councils and exertions of the parent country for protection against their unquiet and encroaching neighbors.

Specifically did they owe to Great Britain their first enjoyment of the waters of the Mississippi, conquered in part from France by the very same efforts which transformed Canada from a French settlement into a British colony. The pretension of the American Government as grounded on the simultaneous acquisition of the St. Lawrence, as well by the inhabitants of the adjacent, and, at that time, British provinces, as by those of the countries originally composing the British monarchy, must, therefore, if admitted, even for the sake of argument, be applied reciprocally in favor of Great Britain.

The fact, however, is, that no such pretension can be allowed to have survived the treaty by which the independence of the United States was first acknowledged by Great Britain.

By that treaty a perpetual line of demarcation was drawn between the two Powers, no longer connected by any other ties than those of amity and conventional agreement.

No portion of the sovereignty of the British Empire, exclusive to the actual territory of the United States, as acknowledged by that treaty, could possibly devolve upon the people of the United States separated from Great Britain.

By the same instrument the territorial boundary of the States, as recognized by their former Sovereign, were carefully defined for the express purpose of avoiding disputes in future; and the articles stipulating for a concurrent enjoyment of the North American fisheries, and of the navigation of the river Mississippi, prove that equal care was taken to determine, in the general act of pacification and acknowledgment, those objects of which the usufruct in common was either retained or conceded by Great Britain.

Is it conceivable, under these circumstances, that the treaty of 1783 should have made no mention of the concurrent navigation of the St. Lawrence if the claim, now raised by the United States, had rested on any tenable grounds?

But the commercial treaty of 1794 would afford additional proof, if it were wanted, that the channel of the St. Lawrence, from the sea to the 45th parallel of latitude, was never for a moment considered as forming any exception to the territorial possessions of Great Britain.

The third article of the commercial treaty shows most clearlyt hat the power of excluding foreign vessels from those parts of the river which flow entirely within the British dominions was deemed to belong of right to the British Government. The leading purpose of that article is to establish a free commercial intercourse between the two parties throughout their respective territories in North America.

The same article contains a limitation of this privilege with respect to a considerable portion of the St. Lawrence, to which it was declared that American vessels were not to have access; and the corresponding restriction against Great Britain was an exclusion of British vessels from such parts of the rivers of the United States as lie above the highest ports of entry for foreign shipping from the sea.

It necessarily results from the nature of the two clauses, thus viewed with reference to each other, that the authority of Great Britain over the part of the St. Lawrence interdicted to American vessels was no less completely exclusive than that of the United States over such parts of their interior waters as were, in like manner, interdicted to the shipping of Great Britain.

The former limitation is, besides, of itself inconsistent with the notion of a right to a free, uninterrupted passage for American vessels by the St. Lawrence to the ocean.

Nor is it less conclusive as to the merits of the case when coupled with the declaration, contained in the very same article, that the navigation of the Mississippi was to be enjoyed in common by both parties, notwithstanding that a subsequent article of the same treaty expresses the uncertainty which already prevailed with respect to the sources of that river being actually situated within the British frontiers.

With these facts in view, it is difficult to conceive how a tacit enjoyment of the navigation now claimed can be stated by the American plenipotentiary to account for the silence maintained on this subject by his Government from the establishment of its independence to the present negotiation.

In the course of forty years, during which no mention whatever has been made of this claim, there has been no want of opportunities fit for its assertion and discussion. To say nothing of periods anterior to the rupture of 1812, it is strange that an interest of such vast importance should have been wholly neglected, as well on the renewal of peace in 1815 as during the negotiation of the commercial treaty which took place in the close of that year. This long-continued silence is the more remarkable, as the mere apprehension of an eventual change in the regulations under which a part of the St. Lawrence is actually navigated by foreign vessels has been alleged by the American Government as their reason for now raising the discussion.

The regions contiguous to the upper waters of the St. Lawrence are doubtless more extensively settled than they were before the late war, and the inhabitants of those regions might at times find it advantageous to export their lumber and flour by the channel of that river. But mere convenience and the profits of trade cannot be deemed to constitute that case of extreme necessity under the law of nations to which the rights of property may perhaps be occasionally required to give way. It has already been shown that such interests can, at most, amount to an imperfect right of innocent utility, the exercise of which is entirely dependent on the will and discretion of the local Sovereign. Of this description are the rights and accompanying duties of nations to trade with each other, and to permit the access of foreigners to their respective waters in time of peace; but will any one, at the same time, call in question the co-existing right of every State not only to regulate and to limit its commercial intercourse with others, but even, as occasion may require, to suspend or to withhold it altogether?

If ever there was a case which particularly imposed on a Sovereign the indispensable duty of maintaining this right unimpaired, even with every disposition to consult the convenience and fair advantage of friendly nations, it is the present unqualified demand of the United States.

It cannot be necessary to enumerate the various circumstances which make this claim peculiarly objectionable; but there is no concealing that, besides the ordinary considerations of territorial protection, those of commercial interest and colonial policy are alike involved in the demand of a free, gratuitous, unlimited right of passage for American citizens, with their vessels and merchandise, from one end of Canada to the other.

Interests of such high national importance are not to be put in competition with the claims of justice; but when justice is clearly on their side they have a right to be heard, and cannot be denied their full weight. That the right is, in this instance, undoubtedly on the side of Great Britain, a moment's reflection on the preceding argument will suffice to establish.

It has been shown that the independent right asserted by the United States is inconsistent with the dominion, paramount sovereignty, and exclusive possession of Great Britain.

It has been proved, by reference to the most esteemed authorities on the law of nations, with respect as well to the general principle as to the opinions distinctly given on this point, that the right of sovereignty and exclusive possession extends over rivers in common with the territory through which they flow.

The same principles and the same opinions have been cited to prove that those parts of the river St.

Lawrence which flow exclusively through the British dominions form no exception to the general doctrine so applied to rivers.

The existence of any necessity calculated to give the United States, in this case, a special right in contradiction to the general rule has been distinctly denied, and the denial conclusively supported by a reference to known facts.

With no disposition to contest such imperfect claims and moral obligations as are consistent with the paramount rights of sovereignty and exclusive possession, it has been proved, from the authorities already quoted, that of those imperfect claims and moral obligations the territorial Sovereign is the judge.

The title of the United States, as derived from previous enjoyment, at the time when they formed part of the British Empire, has been shown to have ceased with the conclusion of that treaty by which Great Britain recognized them in the new character of an independent nation.

It has also been shown that, while the American Government acknowledge that their claim is now brought forward for the first time, not only have they had since their independence no enjoyment under treaty of the navigation now claimed, but that the provisions of the commercial treaty concluded in 1794, and described as having been till lately in force, are in direct contradiction with their present demand.

It has finally been made to appear that the treaties concluded by European Powers as to the navigation of rivers, far from invalidating the rights of sovereignty in that particular, tend, on the contrary, to establish those rights; and that the general principle of protection, essential to sovereignty, dominion, and property, applies with peculiar force to the present case of the river St. Lawrence.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 465. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIM OF RICHARD W. MEADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 8, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom were referred the petition of Richard W. Meade, and the memorials, in his behalf, of numerous citizens, have had the same under their consideration, and beg leave to report:

That the petitioner, Richard W. Meade, had claims upon the Government of Spain principally for contracts, for losses upon exchange, for depreciation of Spanish Government paper, for damages, and for interest; a general statement of which had been presented to the Government of the United States and to the American minister in Spain prior to the signature of the treaty of February 22, 1819. By the provisions of that treaty the United States renounced all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, "statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, had been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of the treaty." The claims thus renounced as against Spain were assumed by the United States. It was stipulated by the treaty that the United States should appropriate five millions of dollars for their payment; and provision was made in the treaty for the creation of a Board of Commissioners "to ascertain the full amount and validity of the claims" assumed by the United States and renounced as against Spain; which board was to meet at Washington, and, within three years, was "to decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims" included in the renunciations of the treaty.

A statement of the claims of Mr. Meade having been presented to the Department of State and to the American minister in Spain, soliciting the interference of the American Government, his claims were thereby included among those for which provision was made by the Florida treaty.—(See papers marked C, annexed.)

Subsequent to the signature of the treaty, but before its ratification, Mr. Meade procured an examination, settlement, and liquidation of his claim by the Spanish Government, and an order for its payment from the Royal Treasury.—(See papers marked D, annexed.)

The Board of Commissioners under the Florida treaty was organized in June, 1821, and to this board, on the 6th January, 1822, Mr. Meade addressed his memorial, (see document E, annexed,) submitting the following questions to the decision of the board:

1. "Whether his claims be not clearly comprehended in the list of renunciations declared, on the part of the United States, in the ninth article of the treaty?"

2. "Whether, being so comprehended, your memorialist be not clearly entitled to a substantive and full satisfaction of his claim, whatever may be the pro rata allowance to the general mass of the claimants, out of the specific fund provided by the said treaty?"

The Commissioners at first entertained the opinion that claims for contracts were not embraced in the renunciations of the treaty. But regarding the possibility that their construction of it to this effect might be contrary to the intent of the parties negotiating it, they addressed a letter, dated March 5, 1822, to the Secretary of State, (see document F, annexed,) requesting (in substance) information from the Executive on that head. By a letter from the Secretary of State, of the 9th of the same month, (see document G, annexed,) the Commissioners were informed, by direction of the President, that claims for contracts with the Spanish Government were not intended to be excluded from the provisions of the treaty, but were to be examined and liquidated in common with all other claims falling within the terms of the renunciations.

Mr. Meade's claims were covered by the principles set forth in this statement. In consequence, on the 27th June, 1822, the Commissioners received his memorial as one reciting a claim which was considered to be included within the provisions of the treaty; but they refused to accept the Spanish certificate of liquidation as evidence of the amount and validity of the claim.

Mr. Meade, having inferred, from the reply of the Secretary of State to the Commissioners, that such might probably be the decision of the Commissioners, had already written a letter to Mr. Anduaga, the Spanish minister, dated April 4, 1822, (see document H, annexed,) acquainting him with that fact, and invoking his aid to procure the original vouchers of his claim from the offices in Spain, where they were deposited. To this letter no reply was given by the Spanish minister, in consequence of the delay required to write hence to his Government for instructions. On the 10th of October following, Mr. Meade renewed his instances to the same effect in another letter to the Spanish minister. By a reply of Mr. Anduaga, (see document I, annexed,) of October 16, 1822, that minister made known to Mr. Meade that his Government would consider the rejection of the Spanish certificate of liquidation as a "serious insult," and intimated that his Catholic Majesty knew "too well what is due to his own dignity, to the reputation of his ministers, and to the integrity of his tribunals," to furnish the original vouchers used by any foreign board.

It may here be observed that, by the terms of the treaty, the Board of American Commissioners were to decide all questions relative to the amount and validity of the claims; and Spain was bound to furnish all the documents and elucidations necessary to their investigation.

Having received this letter from the Spanish minister, Mr. Meade addressed another memorial to the board, (see document K, annexed,) of what date does not appear, urging a reconsideration of their decision; but, if that could not be had, soliciting the Commissioners, in virtue of the 11th article of the treaty, to make an official demand on the Spanish Government of the original vouchers in the case.

In the month of April, 1823, an opinion was publicly read by the Hon. H. L. White, (one of the board,) confirming the rejection of the certificate of liquidation, and consenting to the demand of the papers from Spain.—(See document L, annexed.) On the 18th of April, accordingly, the Commissioners forwarded to the Secretary of State a list, furnished by Mr. Meade, of the requisite documents, in order that a demand might be officially made for them on the Spanish Government.—(See document M, annexed.)

About the same time (viz: April 15, 1823,) Mr. de Rivas y Salmon, the successor of Mr. Anduaga, presented a vigorous remonstrance and formal protest to the Secretary of State, confirming Mr. Anduaga's letter of 16th October preceding, and stating that the rejection of the certificate of liquidation was a slight upon the most respectable authorities, and upon the King of Spain himself.—(See document N, annexed)

The documents required by Mr. Meade were demanded by the American Government, through Mr. Nelson, the American minister, then about to sail for Spain. Mr. Nelson, on arriving at Cadiz, found it blockaded by a French squadron, and was unable to enter it. After the surrender of Cadiz he returned to that port, and thence proceeded to Madrid, arriving there a few months only before the Commissioners at Washington closed their sessions. Mr. Nelson addressed himself to the Spanish Government for the documents required; and the Spanish Government professed its perfect willingness to furnish them. In consequence, however, of the great quantity of the documents and of the confusion into which the public offices had been thrown by the removal of the Government to Seville and Cadiz, Mr. Nelson was given to understand that some delay would attend their being furnished. A few days before the expiration of the American commission under the Florida treaty intelligence to the foregoing effect was received from Spain, and, on the 29th May, 1824, (ten days before the close of the commission,) Mr. Meade's claim was rejected for want of sufficient evidence to establish its validity.—(See document O, annexed.)

Such is a condensed view of the facts of the case down to the period of the close of the commission under the Florida treaty. It is admitted that Mr. Meade had a large amount of claims against Spain at the time the treaty was signed. That these claims were, in common with those of other American citizens, intended, by the parties to the treaty, to be included within its provisions is the avowed understanding of the American Executive who negotiated it. That Mr. Meade's claims were received for examination and liquidation appears on the record of the commission; and there appears to be no ground to doubt that, if the original vouchers had been furnished by Spain, the claims would, in part at least, have been allowed, and that their total rejection was owing to the failure of Spain to furnish these papers.

The important question then arises, What is the nature of the obligation which Spain assumed, by the treaty, to furnish the papers demanded, and by whose fault did the failure to produce those demanded in this case take place?

The obligation of Spain was unlimited. The Board of Commissioners were created the sole tribunal to receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims included within the provisions of the treaty. They were further authorized "to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same;" and it was stipulated that "the Spanish Government should furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession for the adjustment of the said claims, according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of October 28, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said Commissioners."

It is evident that the American Board of Commissioners were hereby constituted the sole judges of the evidence necessary to establish the amount and validity of the claims, and consequently the sole judges of the documents and elucidations necessary to support them. Nor is there any limitation on the obligation of Spain to furnish these documents and elucidations. She was bound to furnish all in her possession necessary to the adjustment of the claims. The particular mode in which they were to be demanded is not distinctly pointed out in the treaty. That instrument provides that they were to "be specified when demanded at the instance of the Commissioners;" but it is not stated that they could be demanded in no other way.

Mr. Meade, in April, 1822, and immediately after being apprised that the certificate of liquidation would probably not be admitted in evidence, applied to the Spanish minister in this country, requesting his good offices in procuring the original vouchers. The Spanish minister appears to have communicated to his Government the application of Mr. Meade, and, in October, 1822, returned an answer that his Government considered the rejection of the certificate of settlement as "a serious insult," and would not allow the decision of its tribunals to be reversed by "a foreign commission." No intimation is dropped that the mode in which the papers were demanded was informal or insufficient. Here, then, was a refusal of the Spanish Government to furnish papers demanded through her minister, not on the ground that the demand was informal, but that it was an insult on Spain for the American board to express an opinion that these vouchers were requisite. This demand must have reached Spain nearly two years before the close of the commission, and before the causes existed which afterwards made it difficult promptly to comply with the demand of the Commissioners.

Mr. Meade having thus failed to procure his vouchers by his own application, applied through the medium of the Commissioners and the Executive. This application was made by Mr. Meade nearly fourteen months before the termination of the commission; but, owing to the casualties above related, was presented at a considerably later period to the Spanish Government; at a period, however, when, had it been instantly complied with, it would have been possible to submit the vouchers to the board in season to be examined before the close of their labors.

Should this view of the subject be correct, it will follow that the responsibility of failing to furnish the papers ultimately rests with Spain, and that good faith must eventually require her to meet the consequences of this failure. But the obligation of Spain to furnish the vouchers arises from a treaty stipulation between the Spanish Government and that of the United States—stipulations which Mr. Meade, individually, has no right nor means to enforce against Spain—and the United States, by renouncing the claims of its citizens against Spain, contracted an obligation toward them of securing to them the enjoyment of the benefits of the treaty. By the provisions of the treaty Mr. Meade was entitled to the use of his original papers, and the United States were bound to procure them for him from Spain. Mr. Meade, therefore, is entitled in equity to be placed by the United States on the same footing as he would have stood upon had his demand for the papers been promptly complied with.

The committee know no way in which this can be effected but by constituting a board as nearly resembling that under the Florida treaty as possible, authorized to examine and liquidate his claim by the principles pursued by that board, and to award him the proportionate amount awarded to other claimants; and to this effect they have reported a bill.

Mr. Meade, in his memorial, expresses the wish that his claim should be submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States; and a desire that such may be the decision of Congress is intimated in the memorials subscribed by very numerous persons on his behalf and presented with his petition. To this course the committee feel strong objections. They do not perceive the convenience of such a reference in the nature of that tribunal, the constitution of which indicates no peculiar aptness for the examination of involved and complicated accounts. Such a reference of matters requiring legislative provision to a court of jurisprudence, it is believed, will be, under the Government of the United States, a novel experiment of doubtful expediency. It is a still more serious objection that it would be submitting the claim of Mr. Meade to a tribunal totally different from that to which the interests of all other claimants under the Florida treaty were referred.

Justice requires that Mr. Meade's claim should be placed, as nearly as possible, on the same footing with theirs; and this object will be attained by the provisions of the bill reported by the committee.

It is scarcely necessary to add, that should it appear that the failure of Spain to furnish the papers has brought upon the United States the burden of liquidating and discharging Mr. Meade's claim, the American Government will have its recourse to that of Spain, and be entitled, by the law of nations, to full indemnity.

A.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Richard W. Meade respectfully shows:

That, at the last session of Congress, the claim of your memorialist received for a time the notice of your honorable bodies. The House of Representatives discussed the same at large, and adopted, by a considerable majority of votes, a resolution providing a mode for its adjustment and liquidation. The Senate, however, rejected this resolution, owing solely, as your memorialist understands, to its introduction at too late a period, when subjects of more general concern required an exclusive attention.

Your memorialist humbly requests that renewed consideration may be given to his appeal to the justice of his country, and that such measures in that behalf may be pursued as the wisdom of your honorable bodies shall suggest.

Impressed with a conviction that he has never asked from the Government of the United States anything which the immutable principles of right did not entitle him to receive, your memorialist will shrink, in the establishment of his demand, from no ordeal by which it may be deemed expedient and proper to test its character and merits. He has made every effort in his power to impart a full and clear comprehension of its origin and of its evidence. But he is sensible that, in its progress, a repulsive mass of documents has of necessity been accumulated, and that important questions of jurisprudence have been brought into debate; both of which a numerous Congress, anxiously superintending the vast interest of his country, may be unwilling or too much occupied to touch.

Confident, then, in the justice of his cause, and solicitous to avoid drawing towards his private affairs much of the attention which your honorable bodies would otherwise give to the public weal, your memorialist respectfully entreats that he may, in due form, be authorized to prove the claim against the United States in the Supreme Court, subject to all the known rules respecting evidence, and bound to establish every principle of law necessary to his success.

In making this petition your memorialist trusts he will not be construed wanting in deference to the wisdom and virtue of Congress; he will cheerfully acquiesce in any other disposition of the case which to them may seem better, his chief object being voluntarily to express a consent that what he asserts and believes to be his right shall undergo the strictest judicial trial.

And your memorialist will ever, &c.

R. W. MEADE.

MEMORIAL.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, respectfully showeth:

That, apprised by the published proceedings of your honorable bodies that the attention of the National Legislature had, at the last session, been given to the claim of Richard W. Meade, to be repaid a sum of money which, by the operation of the Florida treaty, was withheld from him for the use and benefit of the United States, they beg, with great deference, to be permitted briefly to convey the impressions entertained by them upon that interesting subject, to uphold, by their united testimony, a worthy fellow-citizen, and to offer their petition, that a mode of treating his application may be adopted, equally compatible, as they think, with the prudence and honor of the nation.

The claimant is the son of George Meade, and both were natives of the city of Philadelphia. The father, during his life, was distinguished among us as a merchant of undoubted integrity, and a citizen of irreproachable character. The son, although for a long time absent, engaged in commercial pursuits and employed in the service of his country, never ceased to possess our esteem; and now, after his return home with a numerous family, under circumstances in which the whole American people took a lively interest, and after his continued residence here for several years, we frankly own that we feel a deep solicitude as to the personal prosperity and welfare of one who in every public and private relation, has maintained his title to our confidence and respect. In this avowal we trust that your honorable bodies will perceive an adequate and laudable motive for the present intrusion upon your notice.

The appeal made by Richard W. Meade is to the justice, not to the generosity, of the American nation, and is founded upon the following clear case:

He was the creditor of the Spanish Government on various accounts, but principally for supplies furnished to aid patriots in establishing and defending a system of constitutional freedom; and, after a series of delays and disappointments, arising from the frequent changes of political ascendency in the peninsula, he held in his possession, in May, 1820, the most solemn written settlement and recognition of the debt known to the jurisprudence of that monarchy. From the binding operation of this engagement, the United States, by the fifth clause of the ninth article of the treaty called the Florida treaty, ratified in Senate in February, 1821, explicitly and unequivocally exonerated Spain, appropriating, in so doing, that amount of Mr. Meade's private estate as part of the price given for the Floridas; and assuming, conformably to an express provision of our Constitution, as well as to the immutable principles of upright dealing, fully to compensate the individual whose property had thus been taken, without his consent, for public uses. Spain has ever since declared herself no longer liable, and refers Mr. Meade to the good faith of his own country, as the party who, by compact, released her, and thereby undertook to satisfy him.

With no disposition to embarrass our Government, or to become burdensome to its Treasury, more than was absolutely necessary for the assertion of his unquestionable rights, Mr. Meade sought to obtain reimbursement from the fund of five millions set apart by the Florida treaty to be distributed among the enumerated classes of American claimants on Spain. The Commissioners to whom that distribution was confided formally and officially recognized the validity of his demand; its conclusiveness, as respects the original debtor, Spain; its being embraced (intentionally, according to the language of Mr. Adams, then Secretary of State,) within the renunciations of the treaty; and the prompt and unceasing exertions of Mr. Meade to obtain from the Spanish authorities and tribunals every species of explanatory evidence which the most astute judges could exact. But, after postponing their decision until within a week of the period when their board was dissolved, they rejected the claim altogether, owing, avowedly, to the failure of the Government of the United States (on whom the duty had devolved by the treaty, and who had, through their minister plenipotentiary, Mr. Hugh Nelson, attempted to perform it,) to procure from Spain the documents and papers proved to be in her archives, and, as was thought, necessary to develop and establish the items of the aggregate stated in the solemn statement and recognition already adverted to.

Mr. Meade has thus been deprived of his recourse to Spain; the United States have enjoyed all the advantage of using his moneys in the purchase of an extensive and valuable territory; he has been denied any portion of the five million fund; and yet that he ever, directly or indirectly, waived, abandoned, or neglected the rights of which he is thus stripped by the conventional arrangements and uncontrollable proceedings of two Governments has not, for one instant, been pretended by any of those to whom he has applied for liquidation or relief.

The undersigned believe such to be the case submitted by Mr. Meade to the consideration of your honorable bodies; and were it just to expect from a numerous Legislature, superintending and guiding the vast concerns of this Republic, so exclusive a devotion to the voluminous documents of an individual interest as would enable each member thoroughly to master them, the result would be as certain as are the wisdom and virtue of an American Congress. Difficult, however, as it is, in any instance, for an assemblage of statesmen to adopt the investigating habits, and to discharge the functions of a judicial tribunal, it becomes almost impossible in reference to a claim circumstanced like that of Mr. Meade. Its details are said to involve legal questions complicated in character, and difficult of solution; for its satisfactory scrutiny, powers to issue commissions to obtain evidence from abroad may be found necessary; and the due protection of private right, as well as a dignified assertion of the public impartiality, would seem, where so much is at stake, to point to some other sphere of final adjustment. It is not, as are the ordinary applications to Congress, a request for equitable relief, or for such remuneration as legislative generosity alone can bestow; but it is a direct, unconditional demand of justice, like those which are daily left to be sifted and settled before the courts of law. Mr. Meade desires nothing from uncertainty; he invokes no aid from liberal conjecture; he does not ask a reasonable allowance, nor a latitude of construction; but he engages to maintain his case by proving every fact, and establishing every principle, under all the forms, and subject to all the tests, which, in the severest tribunals of the country, are employed to recover or to defend the possession of property.

The Government of the United States cannot but feel an entire confidence in the wisdom and probity of their judiciary. Mr. Meade, an individual, might, perhaps, be excused if he shrunk from encountering so formidable an opponent before judges who have certainly manifested no want of sagacity in discerning, or of resolution in maintaining the public interests. But he avoids no ordeal, confident that his cause is just, and persuaded that it only needs to be completely investigated in order to be completely successful.

Your memorialists respectfully suggest that a reference of the claim of Mr. Meade to the Supreme Court of the United States; to be there decided as other controversies are decided; to be fully developed by testimony which such a tribunal is peculiarly fitted to collect, and which cannot be ex parte; to be patiently examined by minds to whom laborious reflection and honest judgment are habitual, would relieve your honorable bodies from the discharge of a troublesome and delicate duty, satisfy a claimant who wants justice only, and (what is an equally legitimate object) give to the citizens of America an assurance that their representatives are prepared always practically to recognize the sacred character of private rights.

That such may be the direction given by Congress to the application of their respected fellow-citizen, Richard W. Meade, under such regulations as its wisdom may prescribe, with a view to make definitive and effectual the judgment of the Supreme Court, is, therefore, the earnest petition of the undersigned.

C.

PHILADELPHIA, January 17, 1819.

SIR: By a letter from Madrid, of November 17, Mr. Meade has just received the opinion given by you on the course best to be proceeded on for the protection of his claims by our Government; he had merely time to make out the statement which I now enclose to you, to be delivered to Mr. Adams, with a few lines addressed to him by me, in case you should think proper to present them.

I should esteem it a particular favor if you would express to me, or to Mr. Henry Toland, jr., the opinion that Mr. Adams may give you upon it, and to say if any steps should be taken by Mr. Meade further than handing to the Department of State the detail of his claims, as mentioned in my letter to Mr. Adams.

Mr. Meade, I presume, hurried himself in this statement, having been assured that the Marquis D'Yrugo had asserted that orders had been sent to the Chevalier De Onis to conclude the treaty with the United States on their own terms.

I remain, sir, &c.,

M. MEADE.

JOHN SERGEANT, Esq.

PHILADELPHIA, January 17, 1819.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you, enclosed, a statement of the grounds of my husband's claims on the Spanish Government, which will be followed by a specific statement of the amount due him from said Government, showing the amount due on libramiento, now in his possession, on contracts and on damages, on bills received from said Government, as well as his reclamation on the score of the unjust imprisonment suffered by him for two years.

The time allowed him to avail himself of the opportunity by which I received this statement was too short to enable him to make out a detail of his claims; but thinking it important that some statement should be immediately forwarded to you, he hastily-made out the enclosed, trusting that, in the event of a speedy conclusion of a treaty between our country and Spain, this document would serve as a guide for that protection which his Government may think proper to grant him.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.,

M. MEADE.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State of the United States.

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1819.

I have the honor to enclose to you a letter and some papers, transmitted by Mr. Meade, to place his claims upon Spain under the protection of the Government in case a treaty should be made with that Power. You will also find enclosed a letter from Mr. Meade, which I send chiefly on account of the concluding paragraph, and will thank you, after reading it, to cause it to be returned to me.

With the greatest respect, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

JOHN SERGEANT.

Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

The claims of Richard W. Meade on the Spanish Government are comprised under the three following heads:

1st. Sales of goods to the Government under contracts, loans of specie, and provisions, the latter lent at the earnest solicitation of the then Government of Spain, and in periods of their greatest distress; for the provisions prices were afterwards agreed on, and a guaranty given to Mr. Meade for the payment, but which has never been complied with; and Mr. Meade has not been able to recover the amount acknowledged due him, though he procured regular condemnation, through the competent tribunals of the country, and execution against the individual who became guaranty, and who is a Spanish merchant. Mr. Meade has been prevented from carrying the execution into effect by a royal order issued by the Minister of Finance, in consequence of this individual having several contracts pending actually with this Government. Against the injustice and illegality of this order the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz have made three very strong representations, pointing out the dangerous consequences to the credit and honor of the nation, if the sentence of the tribunals of justice, granted in favor of a foreign merchant, can be set aside by a ministerial order, though under the sanction of the King, merely because the individual against whom judgment was given had entered into other contracts with the Government. The last of these representations is, however, yet undecided. Mr. Meade only waits the present Minister of Finance's answer in order to lay this case before Mr. Erving, the minister of the United States at Madrid, with all the documents, who has promised him to lay the same before the Minister of State. This particular case is one of high importance, and it is intended to point out in the complaint, which is to be made to the King through Mr. Yrujo, the present Secretary of State, the persecution of Mr. Meade, and the enormous difference in the administration of justice in Spain when an American citizen is defendant and when a plaintiff. In the case of Mr. Meade's imprisonment, which lasted above two years, and which finally has been declared illegal by the King, Mr. Meade was put into prison because he refused paying a second time a sum of money which the King actually held and holds in his own possession; and, in the present case, when Mr. Meade is plaintiff, and calls for the payment of above fifty thousand dollars, for which he has obtained a regular judgment through all the different tribunals to which appeals are allowed or can be made, and in case where the Government hold property of the debtors, they refuse to allow Mr. Meade to execute his judgment against the debtor, or to suspend the payments which they are making to him weekly, in order to satisfy the judgment; and thus Mr. Meade is kept out of his money, and cannot get it either from the Government who received the provisions from Mr. Meade, or from the man who guarantied the transaction.

The other libramientos are for specific sums, and admit of no dispute; the only excuse for not paying them is the present state of the finance and the great want of money. The claims, however, of foreigners, in general, have been acknowledged by the King since his coming to the throne; those of the Spaniards are, with few exceptions, all declared as appertaining to the mass of public debt, for which provision is hereafter to be made, but which are considered as waste paper at present. By a special decree of his Majesty, dated on the 9th of September, 1816, a copy of which is annexed, Mr. Meade's demands on the Government have been fully recognized as just and legitimate, and the order directs that they should be paid agreeably to the original stipulations, but which have never been complied with. Whatever part of these libramientos Mr. Meade has received since 1813, and particularly since the arrival of the King Ferdinand in Spain in 1814, has been with a loss on the original capital of about one-third, besides the sacrifice of all the interests for a number of years, which has made the total loss amount to one-half of the capital. Mr. Meade remains, however, with a considerable sum of the libramientos, for which he has not been able to recover one shilling since his imprisonment in May, 1816, though acknowledged and repeated orders given for their payment.

2d. A demand on the Spanish Government for damages and actual losses sustained by Mr. Meade on a bill of exchange, drawn to Mr. Meade's order by the Minister of Finance, by order of the Regency, dated in 1812, on the Viceroy of Mexico, payable at Vera Cruz, for $300,000, the specie of which was allowed to be exported by special contract to London. The bill was protested, and fifty thousand dollars only were paid in Mexico on account, and that in tobacco. The actual loss which accrued to Mr. Meade on this transaction amounts to considerably more than one hundred thousand dollars. He had an English vessel detained at Vera Cruz twelve months waiting for the specie of the Cortes, who then governed Spain, who commanded that Mr. Meade should be heard in justice respecting his claim for damages, viz: that the affair should be regularly tried, and the damages assessed by a competent tribunal. In 1815 Mr. Meade obtained also an order from his present Majesty directing the Supreme Council of Finance to hear the demands of Mr. Meade and to decide on the question; but Mr. Meade has never been able to obtain any decision or satisfaction from the Council, though the Fiscal admits the justice of Mr. Meade's claim for damages, and Mr. Meade possesses the most ample testimonies to fully establish the same.

3d and lastly. The claim which Mr. Meade has for his illegal imprisonment, the damages he sustained thereby, as well as the total ruin of his mercantile establishment at Cadiz, and the enormous expenses he was put to to defend himself.

The foregoing comprises all Mr. Meade's personal claims, and, according to his estimate, may amount, altogether, to between three and four hundred thousand dollars.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 20, 1819.

MADAM: I have the honor, by the direction of the Secretary, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter to him of the 17th, through the hands of Mr. Sergeant, with two papers in relation to the claims of Mr. Meade upon the Government of Spain, both of which are deposited in this office.

I am, madam, with very great respect, your obedient, very humble servant,

DANIEL BRENT, Chief Clerk.

MRS. MARGARET MEADE.

Copy of an official letter addressed by his excellency Don Jose Canga Arguelles, Minister of Finance at Madrid, to Richard W. Meade, citizen of the United States of America.

A statement, in due form, of your claims against this Government, and the damages you have sustained in consequence thereof, was transmitted to this Department of Finance by the Minister of State, accompanied by a royal order, dated the 26th of January of last year; which statement had been received from and supported by the minister of the United States resident at this Court. His Majesty named a special junta of councillors to take cognizance of the liquidation of all the credits which you might present or be able to substantiate, and of the claims which you should make.

The junta gave in their award, and consulted his Majesty on the subject, who having been pleased to approve thereof and adopt the same, the said junta has extended, in legal form, a certificate of the entire credit due to you by the nation; the sum of which amounts to R. vn. 9,823,072 11 ms., or $491,153 62, in the terms and for the reasons therein specified; which document, with his Majesty's approbation thereunto annexed, and certified by me, I herewith transmit to you, by his royal order, for your security, and for whatever other purpose or object that may be conducive to your interest.

God preserve you many years. Given at the royal palace, in Madrid, the 21st of May, 1820.

CANGA ARGUELLES.

Signor Don RICARDO MEADE.

NOTE.—The sum recited in the above order contains the total amount of the claims for Mr. Meade's own account, as well as agent for others; the personal claims for Mr. Meade amount only to 7,477,595 reals of vellon, equal to $373,879 75.

MADRID, June 10, 1820.

SIR: I have the satisfaction of informing you that the Spanish Government, always upright and honorable in its decisions, has determined to acknowledge, with the sanction of his Majesty, Don Richard Meade, a citizen of the United States, its creditor for nine millions eight hundred and twenty-three thousand and seventy-two reals vellon and eleven maravedis, for which a competent security, in writing, has been given him. As your Government, sir, has taken part in the fortune of this individual, I hope you will be pleased to communicate this favorable determination to the President of the said States, inasmuch as the respect which he deserves has had much influence in it; and, also, the hope that Spanish subjects may, by a just reciprocity, find equal protection and consideration in the United States.

With so agreeable a motive, I present myself anew to your disposal, and pray God that you may live many years.

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 12, 1822.

The foregoing letter is faithfully translated from an authentic transcript in this office.

SECOND MEMORIAL.

To the Commissioners appointed under the 11th article of the treaty with Spain, ratified in February, 1821, together with sundry documents explanatory of the claim, &c.

The memorial of Richard W. Meade respectfully shows: That your memorialist is a native citizen of the United States, and, as such, sojourned at Cadiz, in Spain, from some time in the year 1804 till the year 1818; that, during the time of such his sojournment and residence at Cadiz, the Spanish Government became indebted to him in very large sums of money on account of very extensive supplies of provisions, moneys, and goods of various kinds, furnished by him under contracts with the Government of Spain, or with their agents, on public account, principally during the captivity of their King in France, and the struggle maintained by the Spanish nation under the Government of the Cortes, in the name of their captive King, against the invasion and domination of the French; and besides what was so due to him on his personal and individual account they were largely indebted to him as agent for American citizens, on account of cargoes sold to the Spanish Government, or sold on public account; that, in the midst of his attempts to have these various claims adjusted and settled, after the restoration of the King, a system of the most corrupt and unprincipled intrigue was set in motion against him by certain officers and agents of the Spanish Government for the purpose of extorting from him the most unjust compromises and concessions of his rights, by means of which intrigues, and the most wily and fraudulent shifts, devices, and pretexts, he was thrown into prison, and there detained in close confinement for the space of two years, or thereabout, to wit., from some time in May, 1816, till May, 1818; and when, at length, after repeated and frequent and pressing applications to the Spanish Government, he was released by a royal order, it was under the most explicit acknowledgment, on the part of the Spanish Government, that his imprisonment had been altogether illegal and iniquitous. Your memorialist lost no time after his enlargement in preferring his various claims upon the Spanish Government, in which he included a claim of compensation for his unjust imprisonment; and, after various procrastinations on the part of that Government, he applied, by petition to the Spanish Government, some time in December, 1818, to have a commission or junta appointed to audit and settle his claims; that some time in the course of that winter such a commission was appointed, pursuant to his request, who, after the most careful and minute examination into the grounds of all his claims, made a report on the 30th September, 1819, allowing his various claims, amounting, in the aggregate, to the sum of $491,153 33, which was in sums admitted as a debt of the most meritorious character, due from the Spanish Government to your memorialist. The report, after having been recommitted to the junta by the Minister of Finance, accompanied by sundry remarks of his own, was deliberately reconsidered and confirmed on the 15th November, 1819; and was then submitted by the Minister of Finance to the revision of the Treasurer General, and to the Comptroller General of Accounts, by whom it was approved; and was then finally ratified by the King. A formal certificate of the report thus ratified and confirmed, importing an ascertained and absolute debt due from the Spanish Government to your memorialist to the amount aforesaid, to be paid, with interest, out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, signed by all the members of the junta, and approved by the Minister of Finances, by the order and in the name of the King, with the royal seal affixed, was then made out and transmitted to your memorialist in May, 1820, by Mr. Arguelles, the new Minister of Finance. Your memorialist would ask the attention of the Commissioners to the fact that, in the interval between the report of the junta on the 30th September, 1819, and its final ratification in May, 1820, the new revolution in the Government of Spain had been effected; by which the functions of the Cortes had been restored, and the powers and prerogatives of the King considerably modified and limited; so that his debt has been conclusively ascertained and acknowledged by competent and concurring authorities under both administrations.

Your petitioner, therefore, presumes it will be unnecessary to enter into any detailed explanations of the nature and extent of the articles by which the debt was created, or of the circumstances upon which certain damages included in the sum total were awarded to him, deeming it sufficient to refer to the documentary evidence of the said debt, as manifested by the said certificate and proceedings of the Spanish authorities, in which the various heads of his claims, as allowed, are recapitulated; which document, verified and established by all the highest sanctions and solemnities known to the Spanish laws, he here produces, annexed to this memorial, as forming a part thereof, and to that he prays that particular reference may be had for a fuller and better understanding of what is herein alleged concerning the same. The only part of the claims admitted by that document, concerning which it is deemed material for your memorialist to be more particular, is that which has been allowed him in his capacity of agent. With respect to that portion of the said debt, he states that the sum of $75,179 27 is for a cargo of tobacco, shipped on board the American brig Bayard, John Diebier master, owned by the following persons, viz: James Thornburn, George Raincock, Johnson & Walker, Jacob Kline, Warren Ashley, Joseph Hays, and Solomon Marks, jr., besides the claim of the captain, John Dinon, for his charges as captain and supercargo for the commissions and advances; your memorialist being also interested in that sum to the amount (not yet ascertained) of his commissions and advances; also, that the sum of $42,094 18 was a bill or order of the Treasurer General of Spain against the Treasurer of the Customs of Cadiz for cash, and interest thereon, due for flour delivered by James Wardrop & Co., of Cadiz, which, by a regular execution of the competent tribunals of Spain, was declared to belong to John and James Gamble and Robert Pollard, which bill or order was duly accepted, but not paid. In that sum is also interested Mr. James Brown, of Richmond, as principal and partner in the house of James Wardrop & Co., in case there should be any surplus left after paying the demands of Messrs. Gamble and Pollard, and the commissions and expenses of this memorialist, not yet ascertained. And your memorialist further shows that the said claims have not, in the whole or in part, been paid or satisfied to the said respective claimants; nor hath he, or the other persons concerned, ever received any sum of money, or other equivalent or indemnification therefor; that all of them, with interest from the day of liquidation, to wit, the 30th September, 1819, are now justly due; and that, in case they are allowed by the said Commissioners, they will belong, so far as regards the said individual claims of the memorialist, solely and absolutely to himself; and, so far as regards the claims which have been ascertained to him in his representative character of agent as aforesaid, the same will belong, and do belong, to the persons, respectively, before named, or their assignees, and not, to his knowledge, to any other person, and that the same did so belong when the said claims respectively arose; that your memorialist is now, and always has been, from his birth, a citizen of the United States, and, at the time the said claims respectively arose, and for a long time before and after, he was domiciliated at Cadiz, in Spain, and is now domiciliated at Philadelphia; that all the other persons hereinbefore named as interested in certain parts and portions of the said debt were, as this memorialist is credibly informed and verily believes, at the time the said claims respectively arose, and still are, citizens of the United States, and were then, and still are, domiciliated in the State of Virginia, except the said Solomon Marks, who, this memorialist has understood, is now in some part of Europe, unknown, having assigned his interest in said claim to his creditors at Norfolk, or elsewhere, who are unknown to this memorialist; that after the date of the convention between Spain and the United States, in the year 1802, since which date all the said claims have originated, and before the signature of the said treaty of the 22d February, 1819, to wit, on or about the 18th January, 1819, the memorialist presented to the minister of the United States in Spain a statement of the same, soliciting the interposition of the United States, and a statement of the said personal and individual claims of the memorialist, in his own right, upon the said Spanish Government, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, was also presented to the Department of State of the United States, after the date of the convention of 1802, and before the signature of the said treaty, to wit, on or about the 20th day of January, 1819; that, before the said signature, the Government of the United States, by their minister in Spain, officially solicited and promoted the adjustment, liquidation, and settlement of the said claims by the Spanish Government, which Government, proceeding according to its own approved forms, did, accordingly, adjust, liquidate, and settle the same, and acknowledged itself, on the 19th day of May, 1820, to owe to the memorialist, on account of the debt due to him in his own right, the sum of $373,879 88, including therein a sum of $75,000, for his wrongful imprisonment, and the damages arising therefrom, and, on account of the debts due to him as representative or agent aforesaid, the sum of $117,273 45, and extended, executed, and delivered to the memorialist, by royal order, a certificate under the hand of the Commissioners and the Minister of Finance, and the royal seal, acknowledging the said debts accordingly.

That your memorialist, having been informed by the honorable John Q. Adams, the Secretary of State, and one of the negotiators of the said treaty, at a time subsequent to the conclusion of the same, and before the final ratification thereof by the Senate of the United States on the 22d day of February, 1821, that he was of opinion that the memorialist's claims were embraced within the treaty, is advised that this circumstance, connected with the release and renunciation to the Spanish Government contained in the treaty, gives him a just and valid claim to entire payment and satisfaction of the same, with interest, by the United States, according to the tenor of the obligation and acknowledgment of the Spanish Government, and before the final ratification of the said treaty by the Senate of the United States; so the memorialist respectfully stated and submitted to the President of the United States, to make such official disposition of the same as he might deem expedient. But the memorialist has, at no time, personally abandoned his said claims, or any of them, against the said Government of Spain, and the same now continue in their original vigor against the Spanish Government, and so, he submits, will continue until actual payment, except so far as they may have been legally impaired by the public renunciation and discharge in the said treaty contained.

That, conceiving himself entitled to apply to his original debtor for payment of these demands, or for direction to the source from which payment might be obtained, the memorialist, on the 14th day of May last, made such application through his agent in Madrid to the Minister of State of the Spanish Government; and, on the 16th of June last, was officially advised by the said Minister of State that the said claims were embraced by the 9th article of the treaty, to which the memorialist was referred.

That between two great nations, one of whom is unquestionably liable to the memorialist for the full amount of the said claims, and in opposition to either of whom he has nothing to sustain him but the principles of justice and the obligations of national honor, the memorialist trusts this reference to either will never be considered by the other as an abandonment of any of his rights. Whatever he may do in the way of soliciting payment, or in preferring a claim to it, he submits, is the result of a necessity which, as an individual, he has no means to evade or avert; and he therefore respectfully states that all which he now does, or shall hereafter do, in this behalf, is, and will continue to be, done under an explicit reservation of all his rights, up to the time when he shall enter into the full enjoyment of them.

Being instructed by the Government of Spain that his claims are within the provisions of the said treaty, having received no decision or instruction of the American Government that they are not so, and conceiving, if the said claims are so embraced, that the just interpretation of the said treaty, and of the obligations so assumed in consequence thereof by the United States, will give the memorialist the full and entire payment of his demands, he accordingly submits the claims to the Board of Commissioners constituted under the said treaty, and prays to have an opportunity of offering any further evidence that may be required in support thereof.

Your memorialist, by way of explaining more at large the grounds upon which he protests against being concluded, either by the treaty or by any claim which he may set up under the treaty, from asserting and pursuing his original claims, or of adopting either alternative in the assertion and pursuit of them, as against the Government of Spain or that of the United States, prays that particular reference may be had to his memorial, dated on the 8th February, 1821, addressed to the President of the United States before the final ratification of the treaty, and by the President of the United States laid before the Senate at the same time that the treaty was presented for ratification; also, to his second memorial, after the ratification of the treaty, addressed to both Houses of Congress during the last session. From the facts and the reasons advanced in those two memorials, and from such other facts and reasons as he reserves to himself the right of bringing forward hereafter, he hopes to have established the following conclusions beyond doubt or controversy:

1. That the Government of the United States had no power or authority whatever to cancel or release the debt due from Spain to your memorialist in any other manner, or upon any other terms, but the payment of the debt as guarantee of Spain—in other words, that the treaty-making power is, per se, utterly incompetent to exert its jurisdiction over the rights of a creditor claiming a mere pecuniary debt, under the circumstances of the debt due from Spain to your memorialist, differing so widely and fundamentally in all the incidents, qualities, and relations, which may rightfully have subjected every other of the renounced claims to the action of the treaty-making power.

2. That in default of an original and inherent jurisdiction of the treaty-making power to cancel or release the debt, no authority whatsoever has in fact been supplied by the agency or consent of the creditor, who, in point of fact, has never committed his claim to the management or discretion of the Government any further than to invoke the interposition of the good offices of the American Government in aid of the claims and petitions of the individual creditor; which claims and petitions, in all instances, went the length of demanding full and complete satisfaction, without being at all intermixed with the public negotiations and discussions between the two Governments, so that the entire agency of the American functionaries, as auxiliary to the individual demands and resources of the creditor, was merely gratuitous and in the ordinary routine of diplomatic comity.

3. That the claim is nevertheless comprehended in the fifth renunciation declared on the part of the United States, in virtue of which, connected with the express stipulation of the eleventh article, the United States are absolutely and unconditionally bound, in consideration of a valuable equivalent received of Spain, to exonerate her from the debt; and by that means have interposed a bar to remedies otherwise clear and indisputable, by which the creditor might have secured his debt from the original debtor.

4. That, by the force and effect of these stipulations, the public faith of the United States is solemnly pledged equally to Spain as the debtor, and to your memorialist as the creditor, to discharge the debt without defalcation or delay, and without reference to the stipulated and limited fund provided by the treaty.

With the clear and unfaltering intent of adhering to these principles in the present, as well as in all future assertions of his claim, whether it be advanced against the Government of Spain or against that of the United States, your memorialist prays that you will proceed to investigate the circumstances of his claim, in order that it may be officially decided and promulgated what provision is intended for your memorialist by the treaty—that is to say:

1st. Whether his claim be not clearly comprehended in the list of renunciations declared on the part of the United States in the 9th article of the said treaty.

2d. Whether, being so comprehended, your memorialist be not clearly entitled to a substantive and full satisfaction of his claim, whatever may be the pro rata allowance to the general mass of claimants out of the specific fund provided by the said treaty.

All which is respectfully submitted.

R. W. MEADE.

WASHINGTON, January 6, 1822.

WASHINGTON, March 12, 1821.

SIR: I have attentively examined the papers illustrative of your demand upon the Government of the United States, founded upon your acknowledged claim on that of Spain, and arising out of the recent treaty concluded between them; and although, from the variety and pressure of my engagements incident to my departure from this place, I have not time to prepare and present to you an argumentative opinion upon the whole case, I will take that to say that, in the instance of wrongs, including violence committed by one nation, or under its authority, upon the citizens of another, the latter has a right, in the preservation of its sovereignty and honor, to settle the grievance so as to conclude the rights of its citizens who have been aggrieved, even if the measure of redress falls short of the measure of injury; that such a settlement, however, ought not to be made but on weighty and urgent reasons; and that one nation ought never to avail itself of the claim to redress, for violent injuries committed by another upon its citizens, to acquire territorial or other advantages inuring to the benefit of the public at large.

In regard to contracts or commercial operations between the citizens of one country and a foreign Power which withholds from them justice, there is no absolute right of interposition on the part of that country, since those citizens have voluntarily put their trust in the foreign Power. The country may interpose at the instance of its citizens, but the extent of that interposition must depend upon the request of its citizens. The country then becomes a sort of agent, of a high and dignified character, to ask justice for its injured citizens. It must not abuse this agency which is submitted to the laws which regulate all delegated power. In your case, you asked the assistance of your country's minister to have your claims settled. You obtained it. You proceeded in their liquidation; and you completed the adjustment of them with Spain. After you had obtained the bond of Spain for the payment of the debt which it acknowledged to be due to you, your country acquits Spain of this bond by a provision in the recent treaty, to which you gave no express assent, nor, as I think, any implied assent. Now, if a country is not bound to go to war to support the rights of its citizens; if it is not even compelled to interpose its good offices in cases where those citizens have, with their eyes open, confided in a foreign State by contracting or voluntarily dealing with it, neither has it a right, especially in the latter case, to extinguish the just rights of its citizens arising out of such contract or voluntary trading. The treaty extinction of them is probably binding on them; but if it is, it appears to me that the rule of equity furnished by our Constitution, and which provides that private property shall not be taken for public purposes without just compensation, applies, and entitles the injured citizen to consider his own country as substituted to the foreign State.

As to you, the treaty must be considered as taking its date from the Spanish ratification or the last American ratification. Prior to the former event it was at an end. There had been a compact intended, but both parties, and each, were released from it. A new compact was proposed, the same in terms as the old one, by the act of the Spanish ratification. It was finally consummated by that of America. Taken in either view, the treaty came upon you whilst you were in the regular prosecution of your demand before the Spanish Government. It arrested your progress; it abated your suit, after you had got a verdict and judgment. Having taken from you the means of obtaining satisfaction by your execution, it seems to me that it is now incumbent upon your own country, which has thus thought proper, from public considerations, to check your career, to render you an equivalent, an entire satisfaction.

R. W. MEADE, Esq.

PHILADELPHIA, July 1, 1821.

SIR: The following questions, with all the papers relating to the subject, are respectfully submitted by me to you for your opinion.

Respectfully, yours, &c.,

R. W. MEADE.

HORACE BINNEY, Esq., Philadelphia.

1. Whether the Government of the United States have a right to cancel or compromise the claim of a citizen of the said States on a foreign Government arising out of civil contracts or engagements, without fully indemnifying that citizen for the amount of his claim, as acknowledged by that foreign Government?

2. Whether, by soliciting the protection of my Government in the manner and form which I did, Mr. Adams was authorized to enter into a compromise by which I should only receive one-third of its amount, or any other indefinite or undetermined sum, in lieu of that claim?

3. Whether the Government of the United States, granting by treaty a positive and specific discharge to a foreign Government for a private debt of that Government to one of its citizens, and particularly when made fully aware of the nature and amount of said debt prior to the ratification and exchange of the treaty, is not bound by the law of nations, and by the Constitution of the United States, to make full compensation to that individual?

4. Whether a liquidation and recognition of a debt between a foreign Government and a citizen of the United States, made or obtained at the request of the Government of the United States itself, through its accredited minister plenipotentiary at the Court of that country, and officially made known by the foreign Government to said minister, or his successor, is valid or not?

5. Where there is an express acknowledgment by a foreign Government of a specific sum due by it to a citizen of the United States, and a certificate given to that individual by the Minister of Finance by express order of the King, and his royal seal affixed thereto, are any further liquidation or examination necessary to establish the fact of the sum due, particularly when that certificate contains no provision of payment connected with any other nation or Power, or subject to any contingency, but expressly declares the sum to be due and payable out of the finances of the Government acknowledging the debt?

6. Whether a liquidation is valid which was called for by the American minister in Madrid many months prior to the signature of the treaty in Washington, and at a time when there existed no hope or expectation of speedily concluding any treaty, as stated by Mr. Adams in his letter of September, 1818, to Mr. Meade, though imperious circumstances, arising out of the nature of the business itself, depending on a multitude of contracts in different provinces of Spain, and the necessity of examining the archives of the whole country, for many years subject to foreign invasion, various changes in the Government, and during a period of revolution, delayed the award being given in till the 30th of September, 1819, seven months after the signature of the treaty at Washington? It is to be observed at the same time that it was about one month prior to the date of the award that the American minister plenipotentiary had solemnly notified Spain that the six months allowed for the exchange of the ratifications having expired, that the treaty was null and void, so that in fact no such treaty could be said to exist when the award was given in. It is also to be observed that, subsequent to that period, a new minister was sent to Washington to treat; that new and important matters were introduced into the negotiations; that those negotiations were again suspended, owing to the new revolution, which re-established in Spain the constitution of 1812, by an article of which the whole treaty became null, even though it had not been so declared prior thereto. By that article the King had no power or authority to cede the Floridas, as it was not till the 5th October, 1820, that the Cortes granted the King that authority, which was more than twelve months after the date of the award given in by the special commission appointed to settle my claim, and five months after that the King himself had approved of that award.

R. W. MEADE.

MR. BINNEY'S OPINION.

The questions which Mr. Meade has proposed to me for consideration may be embraced by the following inquiries, under which, I think, all points in his case that are in any degree disputable may be examined:

I. Have the United States, in point of fact, released the Government of Spain from the claims of Mr. Meade?

II. If such release has been given, is it effectual to exonerate Spain; that is, does it bind Mr. Meade and extinguish the debt as effectually as a release given by himself?

III. Whether the release be or be not such as to extinguish the debt, yet if in fact given, are not the United States bound to pay Mr. Meade the full amount released?

IV. Are the settlement by Mr. Meade with Spain, and her recognition of the amount due, evidence against the United States?

1. The answer to the first question is to be sought in the terms of the treaty, and in the circumstances of the claim. There is no doubt that external evidence is necessary to bring Mr. Meade's case within the description of the treaty; but I am not of opinion that, except in cases differently situated from the present, the private declarations of the negotiators, in regard to their views in the introduction of a certain clause, are matter of lawful resort in such an inquiry. In examining this question, I shall therefore lay aside all private communications from the late minister of Spain, or any other person, to the effect before mentioned, and confine myself to what, it will be conceded by everybody, are legitimate sources of information.

After the articles of cession by Spain, which extend from the second to the eighth inclusive, both nations, by the ninth article, "renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, as well as their respective citizens and subjects, may have suffered until the signing of the treaty." The terms damages or injuries are large enough to comprehend every species of wrong which a nation can inflict or an individual suffer, and will include the damage or injury suffered by a creditor whose lawful demands are disregarded, as well as that which is suffered from an act of violence on the high seas. This, however, might be thought too extensive an interpretation of the words, if found alone and undefined in a public treaty, whose objects are in general public wrongs and concerns, and not such as are of a private kind. But the words do not stand alone, nor without such a context as will give the materials of a reasonably certain definition. Each party, after this general renunciation, proceeds to enumerate four of the particulars in certainty to which it shall be held to extend; and then the United States conclude, on their part, the renunciation by the sweeping abandonment of "all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State or to the minister of the United States in Spain since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty." This clause is as clear as it is comprehensive. It follows a statement of four kinds of claims, all distinguished as to their origin and specific character; and it then introduces a class whose origin and specific character become immaterial by the substitution of a general characteristic which may belong to a claim of any kind: "all claims, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State," and so on. If there is no reason for refusing the sense which this clause of the treaty naturally presents, it becomes an inquiry of fact merely, whether the claim of Mr. Meade has the general attributes that are called for?

Mr. Meade is a native citizen of the United States, though for many years before the date of the treaty resident in Spain. His claim is upon the Spanish Government—upon the nation in its political capacity. It has arisen altogether since the convention of 1802; and if a statement of it has been exhibited in the manner, within the periods, and to the effect pointed out in the treaty, then it is comprehended within the clause, and the United States have "exonerated Spain from all demands on account of it, considering it entirely cancelled."

The statement required is in order if presented to the Department of State or to the minister of the United States in Spain.

The official letter of the Spanish Minister of Finance, Don José Canya Arguelles, to Mr. Meade, dated at Madrid, the 21st of May, 1820, contains the following paragraph: "A statement, in due form, of your claims upon this Government, and the damages you have sustained in consequence thereof, was transmitted to this Department of Finance by the Minister of State, accompanied by a royal order, dated the 26th of January of last year, (1819,) which statement had been received from and supported by the minister of the United States resident at this Court." This certificate is nearly in the language of the treaty; and, from being posterior in date, may be regarded more as the exposition of Spain to include the demand of Mr. Meade than as evidence of the fact it certifies. But among the papers exhibited to me is a letter to Mr. Meade from Mr. Erving, the American minister in Spain, dated the 18th of January, 1819, in which he says that "he has this morning sent to the Minister of State, with a suitable note, Mr. Meade's two memorials." The memorials contained a statement of Mr. Meade's claims, as well such as depended upon contract as those which arose from his imprisonment; his individual claims, as well as those which regarded certain concerns under his agency; and the fact of Mr. Erving's official interposition in their behalf seems entirely to justify the inference that it was made upon the solicitation of the claimant. With what formality these statements must have been presented, in what terms, or to what extent, the interposition must have been invited, the treaty does not prescribe; and if form is to be disregarded, it does not appear in any way objectionable to consider, as within the fair meaning of the treaty, the statements of a memorial presented to the American minister, to be by him transmitted to the Minister of State, and vindicated in such manner as he should deem expedient. Of an act so purely official as Mr. Erving's it cannot be presumed that he did not retain the evidence in the archives of the legation; though, as between Spain and the United States, it must be immaterial whether he did or not. As little can it be presumed that he had not a precedented authority from his own Government for all he did. But whether these presumptions be just or otherwise, as between the parties to this treaty, the fact of interposition by the Government in behalf of claims which its own minister thus presented before the date of the treaty would seem to be very high, if not conclusive, evidence of all that the clause under consideration requires.

But a statement was also presented to the Department of State, at Washington.

On the 6th of June, 1818, Mr. Meade addressed a letter from Cadiz to Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, informing him that, from some suggestions, he had reason to look for the satisfaction of his claims upon Spain through a cession of lands in Florida; but that he declined either making or listening to a formal proposal on the subject until he should learn the pleasure of the President; and he then proceeds to say, that if the answer should be unsatisfactory, or he should find the suggested arrangement impracticable, he would leave the Kingdom, "and place a full reliance on his own Government for supporting his just demands whenever an arrangement should take place between the two countries; being confident that, whenever that event should take place, provision would be made for the claims of our citizens."

The answer of Mr. Adams, dated at Boston, September 18, 1818, informs Mr. Meade that, "in the negotiation pending between the United States and Spain, it was the intention of the President that provision should be made for the eventual adjustment and satisfaction of the just claims of many citizens of the United States, among which every attention that might be proper would be shown to his." The letter then proceeds to state that this satisfaction was expected through the cession of the Floridas, which expectation would be disappointed by the grant of all the vacant lands to individuals, and therefore, "in case of the conclusion of a treaty including this cession, all grants after a certain date, to be agreed upon, would be annulled."

On the 17th January, 1819, Mrs. Meade addressed to the Secretary of State the following letter: "I have the honor to hand you, enclosed, a statement of the grounds of my husband's claim on the Spanish Government, which will be followed by a specific statement of the amount due him from said Government, showing the amount due on libramientos now in his possession, on contracts, and on damages on bills received from said Government, as well as his reclamation on the score of the unjust imprisonment suffered by him for two years. The time allowed him to avail himself of the opportunity by which I received this statement was too short to enable him to make a detail of his claims; but thinking it important that some statement should be immediately forwarded to you, he hastily made out the enclosed, trusting, in the event of a speedy conclusion of a treaty between this country and Spain, that this document would serve as a guide for that protection which his Government may think proper to give him." By the letter of Mr. Brent, the chief clerk in the Department of State, under date of January 20, 1819, the papers constituting this statement, which regarded Mr. Meade's individual claims, were then deposited in that office.

As the treaty was signed on the 22d February, 1819; as these statements were presented to the Department of State and to the American minister in Spain before that date; as they were presented with the sole view of obtaining the interposition of the United States, that being the avowed object of Mr. Meade in his letter of the 6th June, 1818; the inducement held out in Mr. Adams' letter of September 18, 1818; the particular motive of presenting the statement referred to in Mr. Meade's letter of the 17th January, 1819, and no doubt also the design of the simultaneous reference to Mr. Erving, the American minister in Spain; as these statements exhibited the claims of an American citizen upon the Government of Spain, with all the specification which was essential to their identity, or which the treaty, by any fair interpretation, can be held to require, I am of opinion that, as between Spain and the United States, (and it is only in this relation that I am at present examining the case,) the claim of Mr. Meade is within the 5th clause of the 9th article of the treaty.

Is, however, the natural sense of the treaty to be refused for a construction more artificial and limited? Is it necessary that, in addition to the characteristics mentioned in the clause, the case embraced by it shall present some other distinctive feature, as, for instance, that it should be a case of tort instead of contract, and tort of a public character? I confess I do not see how such an interpretation can be justified. The words are, all claims having the indicia pointed out in the clause. The natural and obvious interpretation comprehends contract as well as tort, and torts of every kind; and there is nothing to call for an interpretation different from the obvious and natural one. On the contrary, after mentioning various claims by their specific character, without reference to any statement or presentment to the Department of State, or elsewhere, if the treaty then ceases, as it certainly does, to designate specifically, and brings in all claims which have been stated for the purpose of engaging the interposition of Government, I apprehend it to call emphatically for the natural interpretation, and to embrace all claims without regard to their character.

There is a very direct application to this case in some of the elementary rules of interpretation. "The first general maxim of interpretation is, that it is not permitted to interpret what has no need of interpretation. When an act is conceived in clear and precise terms, when the sense is manifest and leads to nothing absurd, there can be no reason to refuse the sense which the treaty naturally presents. To go elsewhere in search of conjectures, in order to restrain or extinguish it, is to endeavor to elude it. If this dangerous method be once admitted, there will be no act which it will not render useless. Let the brightest light shine on all parts of the piece; let it be expressed in terms the most clear and determinate; all this shall be of no use, if it be allowed to search for foreign reasons in order to maintain what cannot be found in the sense it naturally presents."—(Vattel, B. 2, chap. 17, sec. 263.)

"We ought, also, give to a disposition the full extent properly implied in the terms, if it appears that the author has had in his view everything properly comprehended in them."—(Vattel B. 2, ch. 17, sec. 270.)

"The contracting Powers are obliged to express themselves in such a manner as they may mutually understand each other." Hence "it is necessary that they should employ the words in their proper signification, in the sense which custom has given them, and that they should affix to the terms they use, and to all their expressions, the received signification." "From all these incontestable truths results this rule: In the interpretation of treaties, pacts, and promises, we ought not to deviate from the common use of the language, at least if we have not very strong reasons for it."—(Vattel, B. 2, ch. 17, sec. 271.)

The knowledge that such statements as I have mentioned had been presented to the Department of State and to the minister in Spain the United States undoubtedly possessed. It is a matter of legal inference that they knew every claim of every kind which had been so presented, and, consequently, that they not only "had in view every thing properly comprehended in the clause," but had power so to qualify it as to embrace some cases and exclude others that were within the general description. The absence of such qualification seems to be conclusive against a qualified construction.

The reason of the clause, moreover, powerfully sustains the natural interpretation. I speak in reference to the public aspect of the arrangement. All cases of claim upon either Government, which the other had been solicited to vindicate, were sources of national controversy, whatever was their origin; and, publicly speaking, it was a just and wise precaution to embrace them by a treaty, which was, in no very forced sense, a treaty of peace between Spain and the United States. These claims might become the means of new perplexity to the nations. They remained in the national bureau, ever ready to light up the flame of discord; and it was a dictate of the highest wisdom, on both sides, to provide for their extinguishment. The clause does not comprehend all claims upon the Spanish Government, but all claims which this nation had been solicited to protect or promote by her interposition. Such claims had, therefore, a public aspect, and were much more within the purview of a treaty than merely private claims ever can be.

It is not material, I conceive, to show that the ministers who negotiated this treaty framed the clause in question with either an exclusive or a particular view to the claim of Mr. Meade; but there is no little reason for inferring a pointed attention to the clause, from certain occurrences in the progress of the negotiation; and every circumstance which shows attention to have been awakened affords an argument for comprehending within the clause all that its natural sense will comprehend, and perhaps also a reason for supposing that the case of Mr. Meade, well known to both the ministers, could not have been overlooked.

By the documents which accompany the President's message of the 7th December, 1819, it appears that the clause in question was introduced by the Spanish minister, Mr. Onis, in his project of a treaty, delivered to the Secretary of State on the 9th of February, 1819, with this difference, that the clause in Mr. Onis' "project" does not require that statements of the claims should have been presented, but merely that the claims should have been made and the interposition of the United States solicited. The counter-project of Mr. Adams, communicated to Mr. Onis on the 13th of the same month, omits a renunciation of the claims in question by the United States, while it literally copies the renunciation by Spain, introduced into the reciprocal clause of Mr. Onis' "project." By the paper which the Secretary of State received from the minister of France on the 16th February, and which contains the result of his mediation between the negotiators of the treaty, it appears that Mr. Onis required an alteration in a part of the ninth article of Mr. Adams' counter-project, but made no objection to its wholly omitting the clause in question; and, nevertheless, without any further written correspondence which the President's message makes known, the clause is found in the treaty, constituting a new paragraph in the ninth article of Mr. Adams' counter-project.

It is extremely difficult to suppose, and indeed quite incredible, that either the abandonment of the clause by Mr. Onis, or its ultimate adoption by Mr. Adams, could have passed without consideration. It was not an agreed clause from the beginning, and which both parties might in some measure have neglected, as being the occasion of no contest; but it was a clause proposed by Mr. Onis, rejected by Mr. Adams; yielded by the one, and ultimately given back by the other; and, therefore, necessarily requiring explanation, exciting discussion, and bringing both parties to a precise knowledge of each other's views. If in no part of this proceeding the particular case of Mr. Meade was adverted to, it is what at least was not likely to happen; and if it was intended by the American minister not to embrace it, the treaty presents an instance of unguarded language, with which it is not easy to reconcile the occurrences just mentioned.

There is a question in regard to this clause, the answer to which may have a material bearing on the argument. To what cases does the clause apply? For certainly it applies to some one. If the pending inquiry before the Commissioners brings forward no claim by an American citizen upon the Spanish Government for a public wrong, a statement of which was presented according to the treaty, and which, at the same time, is not embraced by any of the preceding clauses of description, then it will follow, conclusively, that the clause does not refer to cases of public wrong; and if there shall be found no case of contract or private wrong except Mr. Meade's, or such as are of the same character, then it will follow, in the one event conclusively, and in the other nearly so, that his case was in the contemplation of the negotiators. I have no means, however, for ascertaining what will be the result of the inquiry.

My opinion, then, is founded no doubt upon a view of the papers appertaining to Mr. Meade's case only, and without the knowledge of any other cases which the Department of State may disclose, that his claim upon the Spanish Government is embraced by the treaty; and if it is, then the terms of renunciation in the ninth article, and the terms of exoneration in the eleventh, leave no question that the United States have, in point of fact, absolutely and unconditionally released Spain from the payment of it.

2. If such release has been given, is it effectual to exonerate Spain; that is, does it bind Mr. Meade, and extinguish the debt as effectually as a release given by himself?

This question depends upon the right of the United States to give the release.

The claim of Mr. Meade was not inseparably mixed, nor, perhaps, in any degree, with national injury. It does not exhibit a violation of public law, where the private and national wrong are one, and where the private, which is the less, is, for all national purposes, merged in the public, which is the greater wrong; but it presents, as to part, the case of a disregard of contract, and, as to the residue, an unjust exercise of Spanish power within the territory of Spain. From the great extent and incontestable justice of the claim, and from the utter inability of the claimant to contend with his debtor and oppressor, it was a most fit case for the interference of the United States through its good offices with Spain; but it was nearly as fit an occasion for the good offices of any other Power. It was a case in which the claims of justice and the rights of humanity were disregarded, in the person of a resident in Spain, within her exclusive jurisdiction. The wrong was personal, and was inflicted on personal grounds. There was no principle of national law involved; no question of a national bearing connected with the subject; no odious distinction, to use the language of Vattel, made to the prejudice of our citizens, or of foreigners in general; but an abuse of territorial power, from which, or from abuses of a similar kind, perhaps hundreds of Spanish subjects were suffering at the same time. The United States, therefore, were not interested in this wrong, if the term may be used, as proprietors, nor even as the guardians of American citizens in all parts of the world. Neither the debt due to Mr. Meade, nor the indemnity for his imprisonment, was a public possession, nor did they belong to him by national or public law. They were privately and exclusively his own, and he was denied their enjoyment through the misapplication of territorial power, which it was difficult for any foreign nation to question, since it involved no denial of any principle of the law of nations. Good offices were due to him, in this most unequal contest, from the nation to which he owed a permanent allegiance; but good offices alone were due, and these, as their nature implies, were to be offered by way of persuasion in his behalf, and not under an assertion of national authority, or the allegation of national wrong.

In regard, then, to these private rights of Mr. Meade, the United States stood in the same position as in regard to the private rights of any other of its citizens residing in a foreign country. Had they the power to release, discharge, or give them away?

In this part of the case many questions of an exceedingly complicated character and very difficult of solution might be discussed. Does the right of annulling a private claim, or of transferring the property of one individual to another, or to a foreign nation, exist in the Federal Government? If this Government may take private property for public use, making just compensation, can she take it from one and give its exclusive use to another? If Congress can so dispose of it by a law in which all the representatives of the people concur, is the same true of the treaty-making power? Is the power to be exercised in a case of expediency, or of urgent necessity only? and is the necessity to be shown, or is the fact of the disposition conclusive evidence of the necessity? Can the eminent domain be exercised over debts, and particularly over that claim to compensation or indemnity which arises out of a private tort? These and many other inquiries would find their place in an extended examination of the present case; but I conceive it unnecessary to advert to them for the following reasons: The claims of Mr. Meade were without the jurisdiction of the United States, and existed, at the date of the treaty, within the particular jurisdiction of Spain. He personally resided in Spain at that time, and for many years before. He and the personal rights in question were legally, and, I apprehend, exclusively subject to the dominion of Spain. The law of the domicil gave those rights, regulated them, and was alone competent to annul them; and this domicil was Spanish, and not American. Under no interpretation of the transcendental propriety is it in the power of a nation to cede or transfer what is not subject to her law; and, although the allegiance of Mr. Meade to his own Government may have imposed certain obligations upon him, I am not aware that the duty of submitting his extra territorial property to their disposition is one of them. The eminent domain is a legal fiction, by which all the property within the domains or jurisdiction of a Sovereign are, in case of national exigency, considered his own, and the whole property of the nation as a common stock. He is then regarded as the fountain and source of all, and as having a transcendent property in those things which the constitution and laws of the realm ordinarily appropriate to others. But this is transcendent within his realm and jurisdiction only. What is within the jurisdiction of another Sovereign is subject to his eminent domain, is part of the common stock of his subjects or citizens, and is subject to the exercise of this right by him, but by no other Sovereign.

This seems a necessary inference from the language of Vattel: "Everything in the political society ought to tend to the good of the community; and if even the citizen's person is subject to this rule, his fortune cannot be excepted. The State cannot subsist, or constantly administer public affairs in the most advantageous manner, if it has not the power of disposing, on occasion, of all kinds of goods subject to its authority. It may even be presumed that, when a nation takes possession of a country, the property of certain things is allowed to individuals only with this reserve. The right which belonged to the society, or to the Sovereign, of disposing, in case of necessity and for the public good, of all the wealth contained in the State, is called the eminent domain."—(Vattel, B. 1, ch. 20, sec. 244.)

If the United States had not the right to release this claim by virtue of the eminent domain, they did not possess it, I apprehend, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution of the United States; because none of its provisions reach the case of extra territorial property, nor carry the powers of the Federal Government beyond the limits which public law has prescribed for all nations.

But if they had it not in virtue of these principles, did they possess it in consequence of the reference made to them by Mr. Meade for their national interposition in his behalf?

This is a question which turns upon the nature and terms of that reference. If the United States have secured to Mr. Meade full satisfaction of his claims, or are willing to pay him their amount, the question is no longer of any importance; but if they have compromised it for less, the authority is a point of great interest, which I will proceed to consider.

Can the United States say that this surrender was made under an authority delegated by the proprietor?

Authority derived from the proprietor will undoubtedly justify all acts which conform to it, and the inquiry, therefore, is, what authority did Mr. Meade impart to the United States?

If the authority imparted by a citizen to his Government is not subject to some peculiar rule of interpretation, the present question cannot be attended by much difficulty. If it is to be interpreted as in the case of individuals, there can be no ground, I conceive, for saying that Mr. Meade gave authority to the United States to compromise his claim, to surrender it, or to do anything but sustain and enforce it. The case nowhere exhibits the features of a delegation of power. The United States were solicited to interpose for the purpose of vindicating these claims by her sovereign power, and I am unable to find a word in any part of the correspondence from which an authority in the United States to the effect or purpose of compromise is discoverable.

Mr. Meade's letter of the 6th June, 1818, says that he shall place "a full reliance on his own Government for supporting his just demands whenever an arrangement shall take place." Mr. Adams, in his reply of the 18th September, 1818, says: "It is the intention of the President that provision shall be made for the eventual adjustment and satisfaction of the just claims of many citizens of the United States, among which every attention which may be proper will be shown to yours;" and Mrs. Meade, in transmitting the statement in her letter of the 17th January, 1819, says that "she trusts it will serve as a guide for that protection which the Government may think proper to grant."

It is impossible, I think, to find in any part of this correspondence even an expectation of release or compromise, still less an authority for it; and if the power is not found in the correspondence, it is not to be found in any ratification of the compromise since the date of the treaty.

But it may be urged that there is something peculiar in the case of subject and Sovereign, of the individual and his Government, which takes it out of ordinary rules; and that when national assistance is asked, discretion to the extent of compromise is given.

I am not aware of any authority for this as a maxim of political law. The case of interference by a Government to support the private rights of a citizen against a foreign nation has probably not occurred so often as to create any rule upon the subject. Private rights have generally been so amalgamated with public on all occasions of public negotiation, that the practice of settling down upon a compromise in such cases may be supposed to create a rule for all. But in such cases the Sovereign acts by virtue of his original interest in the subject of negotiation. In others he may be, and in the present case he is assumed to be, a representative, mediator, or any other name befitting his dignity, but always indicating a derivative authority. If it be admitted that without the assent of the subject he cannot interpose at all, it follows that he can interpose only according to the assent. There is no rule for the case of assent but that of right reason applied to the acts and declarations of the party. If the result of such application shall support the compromise by showing a grant of discretionary authority, then, no doubt, the difficulty is removed, but not otherwise.

It is suggested that right reason does support it, because if an individual appeals to his Government for their interposition he voluntarily makes his claim a subject of negotiation, "and of those compromises in which all national adjustments of individual claims consist." If this result is independent of the terms in which the appeal is made, the proposition, I think, cannot be supported. An individual may solicit his Government to aid him in obtaining payment in full, the foreign nation being willing to pay only a part. I know not how such an appeal carries by implication an authority to compromise for a part. He may ask the aid of Government to obtain full satisfaction, entire indemnity, and in such language as to exclude all compromise. It seems a hard proposition to assert that his appeal is to be so far regarded as to authorize his Government to act, but, in all that regards the object, and end, and scope of acting, it is to be disregarded. Nay, some of the consequences of the position are still more striking. Nations negotiate, and compromise, and absolutely surrender claims and rights without any visible compensation or return, except the mere cessation of controversy, and it may as accurately be said that all national adjustments end in such surrenders as that they end in compromises. Neither is true in fact, but both are equally true for the purpose of the argument. Can it be contended that an appeal by a citizen to his Government so makes it the master of his fate as to authorize an entire surrender, abandonment, and extinguishment of his claim? Why does the nation interfere at all? She has no right, except as the subject requests it; this is admitted by the very terms of the proposition. All the power proceeds from the appeal or request; the extent of the power should then depend on the terms of the request. It becomes a case of delegated power, and has the extent only to which it has been delegated. If it necessarily follows that, when national interference is once asked, the nation is at liberty to disregard all restrictions which the petitioning party thinks proper to impose, this is contrary to all received notions on the subject of delegated power, and is in itself a solecism—for how can the authority flow from the request and yet be independent of it? The Government may, no doubt, refuse to act without the most ample authority. On this subject she may dictate her own conditions of interference. But if she cannot negotiate without the consent of the individual, and he will give but a limited authority, I confess I do not see how such an authority can, against his will, become unlimited.

Besides, the proposition that all national adjustments of individual claims consist of compromises is not, I apprehend, to be received, even in regard to claims arising from public or national wrong; still less is it true of such a claim as Mr. Meade's, which has few or no precedents to govern it. There is a very different statement of the rule, in the answer of Mr. Fitzherbert, the British minister, to Count Florida Blanca, in regard to the injuries done to British subjects at Nootka by persons acting under the authority of Spain. "The practice of nations," says he, "has limited such rights of reparation to three articles, viz: the restitution of the vessels; a full indemnification for the losses sustained by the parties injured; and, finally, satisfaction to the Sovereign for the injury offered to his flag."—(Ann. Reg., 1790, p. 298.) And in that case, Spain, by convention, stipulated to make a full compensation, according to the requisition of Great Britain. Cases of this description are doubtless sometimes compromised by virtue of the Sovereign's inherent authority as a party to the wrong which his subjects have suffered by a violation of public law; but they furnish no rule for a case in which the authority of the Sovereign springs from the appeal of his subject.

In my opinion, then, the United States had no right to release the claims of Mr. Meade, either in consequence of his appeal to their protection, or of the principles of the Federal Constitution, or of the rules of public law; and, consequently, that the release is ineffectual to exonerate Spain. It does not bind Mr. Meade; it does not extinguish the debt; and, until actual payment, the moral and legal obligations of Spain continue of the same force and effect as if the treaty had not been signed.

But it is necessary to view this case under another aspect; one, certainly, which presents by far the most difficult question of all, and that is—

3. If the release has in fact been given, whether it effectually extinguish the debt or not, are not the United States bound to pay Mr. Meade the amount released?

It has already been stated that the case of Mr. Meade is not one which, by involving a national wrong, made the United States a party, and gave her authority to make it the subject of negotiation and compromise. This may be the law in regard to public or national wrongs, among which are to be placed the claims enumerated in the first four clauses of the 9th article; but private property, and a claim to redress for a private wrong, are not subjects of national negotiation and compromise. If a nation surrenders or compromises these, she must do it either by virtue of her own sovereign power, or by authority derived from the individual proprietor; and if no authority to compromise has been given by Mr. Meade, as I have endeavored to show, then the surrender is to be supported only by the sovereign power before spoken of.

The case of sovereign power lawfully applied to the transfer of private property, or to the extinguishment of such a private claim as Mr. Meade's, is without a doubt a case of national obligation to pay an equivalent to the private proprietor or creditor. Whether we refer to the doctrine of our own Constitution, or to the principles of public law, the result is the same.

"Private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." This is the language of the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The necessity of this article may be questioned, for it says no more than is implied, as a fundamental restraint upon the public use of private property, in the constitution of every civilized people; but it serves, at least, to give the sanction of an emphatic public assent to what otherwise might have been exposed to discussion; and it is a particular pledge of the national faith for the indemnity of every American citizen who may be in the predicament referred to.

The language of the most approved writers upon public law, in their remarks upon the exercise of the eminent domain, is to the same effect.

Grotius is clear to this point. "But we must also observe this, that a King may, two ways, deprive his subjects of their rights, either by way of punishment, or by virtue of his eminent domain. But, if he do it the last way, it must be for some public advantage, and then the subject ought to receive, if possible, a just compensation for the loss he suffers out of the common stock."—(Grot. War and Peace, 333, B. 2, ch. 14, sec. 7.)

The same writer elsewhere remarks: "This, also, is often disputed: what right Kings have to dispose of the goods of private men to procure a peace, who have no other power over the goods of their subjects than as they are Kings. I have already said that the State has an eminent right of property over the goods of the subjects, so that the State, or those that represent it, may make use of them, and even destroy and alienate them, not only upon an extreme necessity, which allows to private persons a sort of right over men's goods, but for the public benefit, which ought to be preferred to any man's private interest, according to the intention reasonably presumed of those who first entered into civil society. To which we must add that the State is obliged to repair the damages sustained by any subject on that account out of the public stock; so that he, himself, who hath sustained the loss, contribute, if it be necessary, according to his quota, to the discharge of that public debt."—(Ib. 697, B. 3, ch. 20, sec. 7.)

The language of Puffendorf is as follows: "What power the Commonwealth hath to excuse the goods (condonare bona) of the private subject upon a pacification must be discovered from the nature of the transcendental propriety, upon the force of which the goods and fortunes of private men, whatever title purchased or possessed by, may be given up whenever the necessities of the State and public interest require it. But with this consideration, that the State is obliged to make good such losses to the subject out of the public revenues, either immediately, or, at least, as soon as it may be able. But whether a particular subject's goods ought to be excused or taken from him must, in a monarchy, be determined by the Prince; and the whole body of the subjects, upon his command, is obliged to make satisfaction to the person that has sustained losses upon the public account beyond his just proportion."—(Puffend. B. 8, ch. 8, sec. 3, 4th ed. Dr. Kennett's translation.)

He says, in another part of the same book: "But, however, without dispute, they that have lost or sacrificed their fortunes to the public safety in such extremities ought to have a restitution or satisfaction made to them, as far as possible, by the whole community."—(Book 8, ch. 5, sec. 7. On the transcendental propriety, its origin, and necessity.)

Vattel says: "If the nation disposes of the possessions of an individual, the alienation will be valid for the same reason; but justice demands that this individual be recompensed out of the public money."—(Book 1, ch. 22, sec. 244.)

And, again: "The necessity of making a peace authorizes the Sovereign to dispose of things even belonging to private persons, and the eminent domain gives him this right. But these cessions being made for the common advantage, the State is to indemnify the citizens who are sufferers by them"—(Book 4, ch. 2, sec. 12.)

This language, originally and always that of reason, has now become the language of authority, to which no nation is superior; the consciences of all being bound by what is so universally just, and their conformity being required by the uniform practice of the civilized world.

If the United States have extinguished Mr. Meade's claims upon Spain by virtue of their own sovereign power, call it the exercise of eminent domain, or the taking of private property for public use, or by any other name, the conclusion is not to be resisted, that they owe him a just satisfaction, that they are bound to repair his damages, to make good his losses, to make him restitution, to indemnify him, or make him whole. It would be in violation of the spirit as well as the letter of the rule to impose upon him anything less than indemnity and satisfaction; to require him to participate with others in the division of an inadequate sum; and to apply to his case a scale that may be well enough graduated for claims which, under all circumstances, are subject to national control, but is a wholly unfit measure of claims surrendered by virtue of eminent domain, and by that surrender become a public debt.

But is the obligation different in a case like the present, where the national authority has not been lawfully applied to the extinguishment of the debt, but has appropriated it by a sort of violence to its own use?

This is a question which is not readily solved by the application of the ordinary rules of law; they are, indeed, wholly inapplicable to it. The case of a release by an unauthorized stranger produces no difficulty in the ordinary affairs of men. It is a nullity. It impairs neither the right nor the action of the creditor, and it is not a bar, nor a pretext for opposition to his attainment of satisfaction from the debtor. But a national release to a public debtor of a debt due to a subject or citizen of the releasing Power presents a very different case.

A public debtor is at no time subject to private suit and execution. The security of the creditor is in the sense of national honor and faith, which is presumed to become more acute in the political body as the sense of legal liability is taken away. But if, in the accommodation of public differences, the claim of the private creditor has been made an item in the adjustment, and an equivalent has been passed by the debtor to the nation of which the creditor, by his birth and allegiance, was a member, what is the strength of that bond of national faith and honor by which the original debtor is held? It has been cancelled by the nation to which the creditor belongs. It has, in fact, been assumed by that nation upon herself, and the obligations of national faith and honor having now been discharged by the debtor, to the satisfaction of a national mediator, the debt has practically no security. It remains in justice, but it remains without remedy, perfect or imperfect.

This, it appears to me, is the situation in which Mr. Meade is placed by the late treaty with Spain. Whether the United States had or had not a right to release it, they have in fact released it. They have received from Spain, in the transfer of the Floridas, a consideration for the release. They hold the representative of the debt in their hands. They have, in effect, covenanted with Spain to indemnify and save her harmless from the claim of Mr. Meade; they have, as it were, taken the property out of his hands and delivered it to another, with a covenant of general warranty. His title to it remains; but if it is anything more than an empty name, it is because the faith of Spain is a better security for having been discharged with the consent and by the agency of the American nation. Upon what principle can the United States contend that they are not liable to make satisfaction? Can they say they have exceeded their power? This is language which a court of law would not permit an individual to hold, and which it is difficult to believe that the nation herself will hold to the injury of a third person, particularly while they retain the fruit of the release in their own hands. Can they say they have not received a full satisfaction from Spain? This cannot be an answer, when, for the satisfaction received, this nation has given a final discharge, which imports the receipt of full satisfaction. But can it be a just answer, when they have received what in point of value cannot be measured, and what certainly cannot be shown to be less than a full satisfaction?

It is, perhaps, said that the promise of the United States has been limited; that is, to make satisfaction not exceeding a certain sum. To this I answer, that the discharge of Spain has been unlimited, without reservation of any part of the claim, present or eventual. It may also be said that the qualification annexed to the promise to Spain is annexed to the obligation which arises to the individual; and that, if he claims under the treaty, he must take what the treaty gives him. But to this, also, I answer, that the question is not what the United States have expressly promised to do, nor what the treaty gives, if in truth it does give him less than his whole demand, but what is the obligation of the United States in consequence of their unqualified release of his claims. Have they not effectually tied his hands forever? Have they not invited Spain to close her doors against him? And was the effect of the compact to depend upon his assent, or has it not been consummated without his knowledge and against his will? If it has, then I cannot perceive how the limited satisfaction provided by the treaty, if in truth it be a limited and imperfect one, is to bind Mr. Meade any more than a merely nominal satisfaction would do.

It appears to me, therefore, that whatever may be the language which Mr. Meade is justified in using to Spain in regard to this discharge, the United States cannot say that it has not been lawfully made, or that the discharge is not to be attended by all the incidents of a legal exercise of power, and particularly by the duty of making full compensation. And it appears to me, further, to be worthy of adoption, as a distinct principle, that when a nation shall interpose, as the United States have done, to discharge a foreign nation from the unquestionable private claim of one of her citizens, however such discharge may be found wanting in legal efficacy, when tested by the rules of law, either public or private, yet the insurmountable barrier which this act places between the individual and the enjoyment of his original rights gives him a derivative claim upon his own Government of equal vigor and extent.

The exigency of such principles will appear more distinctly by adverting to the course which Spain has taken since the last ratification of the treaty by the United States. On the 14th May, 1821, Mr. Meade presented to the King of Spain a memorial, in which he averred the continuing obligation of that Government to discharge the debt; and that, notwithstanding his indifference as to the quarter from which payment should come, he would not cease to demand it of the Spanish nation, his debtor, until the United States admitted its obligation to pay him. He therefore requested that Spain would pay the liquidated demand, or furnish him such documents as would establish the obligation of the United States to pay it in full. To this memorial the Minister of State, on the 16th June following, made reply, that "his Majesty, being convinced that the claim of Mr. Meade upon the Public Treasury of Spain was comprehended in the fifth clause of the ninth article of the treaty, as it possessed the only two qualifications or characteristics required, had given the necessary instructions to his minister plenipotentiary at Washington to support Mr. Meade in such applications as he might make to the Federal Government, for the purpose of obtaining the acknowledgment and payment of his claim, according to the terms of the seventh article." And thus, in the first place, Mr. Meade is referred to the United States, with a mere promise of the public countenance of Spain to his solicitation of payment in that quarter; the extent to which this countenance is promised is the uncertain extent of the eleventh article; and a claim, once conclusively fixed upon Spain, is cast off from her without being fixed elsewhere, unless it may be by virtue of the principles I have adverted to.

My conclusion upon the third question submitted to me, therefore, is, that the obligation of the United States to pay results from the actual release, whether or not, according to the principles of law, that release extinguishes the debt.

4. The remaining question is, whether the settlement by Mr. Meade with Spain, and her recognition of the amount due, are evidence against the United States?

There can be no doubt that Spain is conclusively fixed for the amount certified by her Minister of Finance on the 21st May, 1820, and it remains to be seen whether the liquidation and final settlement have not been so conducted as to bind the United States. In one aspect this is a question of evidence merely; in another, it is a question of a much higher kind.

The claims of Mr. Meade upon the Spanish Government were not subject to the ordinary tribunals of the country. The Sovereign was not liable to suit or question in those courts, nor in any, unless by him authorized, or constituted with special powers in this behalf. This is the case with all Sovereigns, with the United States, and the several States of the Union. A tribunal specially appointed for such a case is, however, the proper tribunal, as much entitled to respect as a tribunal of more permanent powers; and its decrees, judgments, or awards, when confirmed according to the constitution of the court, are, upon all matters within its jurisdiction, and as to all the points directly decided by it, as binding as the decrees of an ordinary tribunal in a suit between man and man.

A statement of Mr. Meade's claims against the Spanish Government, and the damages he had sustained, was transmitted to the Department of Finance by the Minister of State, accompanied by a royal order of the 26th January, 1819. This statement was received from, and supported by, the American minister in Spain, who, I understand, was privy to many of the details of the liquidation. On the 7th of May, 1819, his Catholic Majesty named a special junta of counsellors to take cognizance of the liquidation of all credits which Mr. Meade might be able to substantiate, and of the claims which he should make. On the 31st August, 1819, Don Bruno Vallernio, the oldest counsellor of the commission, required of Mr. Meade the delivery of the original documents by which his claims were supported, and, on their being delivered to him, gave his receipts therefor on the 4th and 15th September, 1819. This junta, having deliberately investigated all the claims, on the 30th September, 1819, made its report, which, having been confirmed by the King, resulted in the certificate of the 21st May, 1820, recognizing definitively the claims of Mr Meade at the amount there stated. On the 17th August, 1820, Mr. Meade, upon his arrival in the United States, transmitted to the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, copies of the documents received from Spain acknowledging the balance due to him; and, on the 6th of the next month, Mr. Adams, in reply, says: "It gives me pleasure to offer you my congratulations upon the adjustment of your accounts with the Spanish Government, and to assure you that this Government feels not a little gratification in having at all contributed to this satisfactory result."

Now, whether the question be regarded as one of strict law or of national comity, or in reference to consequences, the settlement appears to me to be evidence against the United States.

Upon principles of strict law it is to be regarded as having the characteristics of a judicial inquiry and decree, in a case entirely within the jurisdiction of the tribunal, both as to subject-matter and parties, with full notice to the American minister at the outset, and more than notice, with an instrumentality or public agency on his part in bringing it to a conclusion. If the United States had been, at the time of the award or decree, strangers to the subject in controversy, and afterwards had agreed to pay the debt of Spain to Mr. Meade, this judgment, fixing the extent of the debt, would be as binding upon the United States as the judgment of a common tribunal would be against an individual who should afterwards agree to pay the defendant's debt; and if the United States were not strangers, but interested at the moment in the amount, then the award bound them as having full notice, and promoting the decree or award by their accredited minister. In reality there was, at the time of making the award and extending a certificate of the debt, no interest in the United States. They were legally strangers to the suit. On the 26th of January, 1819, when the royal order set the proceeding in motion, there was no treaty. That instrument having been signed on the 22d February, 1819, the six months allowed for its ratification by Spain expired on the 22d August following. On the 30th September, 1819, the junta made its report; and when the King confirmed it, and the certificate was granted on the 21st of May, 1820, not only there was no treaty, but the Constitution of Spain, then recently brought into vigor, deprived the Crown of Spain of the right to ratify that treaty, as it contained a cession of Spanish territory; and the Cortes withheld their indispensable consent to it until October following. The United States were free from all its obligations; and, before they were renewed by the second ratification, in February, 1821, Mr. Meade's settlement with Spain was made known to the President and Senate, and was in their view at the moment of completing the compact. If this were a case between individuals, I am aware of no rule of law that would call upon the claimant to go through a new proof of his debt.

But will the duty of comity to a foreign nation permit this settlement to be set aside? The demands of Mr. Meade have been examined by a tribunal especially constituted by the Crown of Spain. The capacity of that body for the investigation, their possession of the requisite evidence, their knowledge of all the principles of local or general law involved in the inquiry, and, finally, their integrity, have received the seal and sanction of the Government; and it seems an impeachment of the honor of Spain to subject the claim to a new ordeal. The demands of Mr. Meade regarded Spain in her national character; all of them were in the broadest sense due by the nation. What a nation shall admit and vouch to be due by her, other nations must, from comity, adopt as the truth, at least until errors are detected. If she be interested as the debtor, she will certainly admit no more than is due. There is, in that case, an argument derived from her interest to sustain that which is derived from her honor. If she be without interest, her impartiality is a pledge that she has admitted neither too much nor too little. The imputation of fraud is not to be tolerated; and if error be imputed, however that may be ground for correcting what is shown to be wrong, the suggestion of it cannot be a ground for requiring proof that all is right. In other words, though comity may not require that the United States should, in all cases, admit such a certificate as conclusive, it at least demands that respect be shown to it until errors are pointed out and made manifest.

The consequences of a different rule might produce an enormous mischief in the present case. What ability has Mr. Meade to investigate the claim de novo before an American tribunal, or the tribunal of the treaty? The scene of all the transactions was Spain; and the witnesses, documents, and tribunals from which evidence was derived existed there only. Many circumstances connected with his demands were of undisputed occurrence, notorious in that country, and not to be denied there, nor to require proof. His original documents of every description were there examined, and were perhaps there alone susceptible of proof. How is this matter to be examined in the United States? If the certificate of Spain will not answer for the balance, the admissions of her officers will not answer as to any of the items. Mr. Meade must prove everything: for no one here has the knowledge to relieve him from proof. He is to do this, also, after being deprived of his vouchers, which have doubtless passed into the different bureaus of the Spanish Government. This would be thought a great evil in any case, but it would, I think, deserve the name of an enormous mischief in a case where the settlement was invited, promoted, and finally made a theme of congratulation to Mr. Meade by the American Government, and of self-gratulation to the American Executive for having produced it.

In answering the preceding questions, it is hardly necessary to say that I am to be understood as giving my opinion with all the hesitancy which questions of their magnitude should excite, and especially as the diplomatic intercourse of the two nations, and the official intercourse of each nation with its own minister, in regard to the case of Mr. Meade, may be imperfectly known to me. I have examined the principles with some care, and feel a reasonable confidence in them. It is at Mr. Meade's request that I have expanded my remarks beyond the usual bounds of a professional opinion, but I am at the same time certain that the grounds of the opinion might be much further developed, and probably with great advantage to the views already presented.

Copy of a letter from the late Commissioners under the Florida treaty to the honorable John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, March 5, 1822.

SIR: Several claims of indemnity have been presented to this board by citizens of the United States for losses sustained by reason of the breach of contracts entered into with them by the Government of Spain. In most, if not all, of these contracts the citizen stipulates to perform acts for Spain which, as a subject of a neutral State, he could not have performed without transgressing the acknowledged belligerent rights of other nations with whom Spain was then engaged in open war—acts therefore which would have subjected him to the just application of the laws of war, and justified, nay, probably required the United States to abandon such citizen to the fate of war, without making any reclamation in his behalf. It is for the performance of such acts that Spain has contracted to make compensation.

In support of these claims it is contended that it was distinctly understood by the high contracting parties to the late treaty that claims of this description were to be included, and were intended to be provided for implicitly by the fifth renunciation of the 9th article, within the words of which all such are found, and in proof of this assertion a letter from the minister of Spain, as well as the enclosed document, has been placed before this board.

The Commissioners feel inclined, at present, to construe this article of the treaty in a different mode, and to reject all such claims as those above described. But as such a construction, if contrary to the intent of the high contracting parties, as is suggested, may possibly impair the faith of the United States, and lead to consequences violating even their peace, the Commissioners beg leave to submit to you the propriety of adopting some course which may bring before them any document or suggestion by which the object and intent of the United States, in concluding this treaty, may be disclosed more fully than they are now exhibited by the article before mentioned.

If the President is content to adopt that construction of the treaty which the Commissioners, as at present advised, are disposed to give it, no suggestions need be made to them. But if this should not be the case, as nothing will most probably operate to change the opinion which the Commissioners are disposed at present to entertain upon this subject, but a clear communication that such a construction would be violative of the intention of the high contracting parties, it will be necessary that a communication to this effect should be made to them. The mode of making it is submitted to the President.

The want of any representative of the United States before this board has constrained the Commissioners to adopt the course they have thus pursued, with a full knowledge of all the objections which apply to it, not only as they refer to the President, but to the board itself.

We have the honor to be, &c.,

H. L. WHITE.
WM. KING.
L. W. TAZEWELL.

Hon. the SECRETARY OF STATE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 9, 1822.

GENTLEMEN: In reference to the letter which I have had the honor of receiving from you, dated the 5th instant, I am directed by the President of the United States to inform you that, in providing for the claims of the citizens of the United States upon Spain, by the treaty of 22d of February, 1819, it was not understood or intended by the Government of the United States, nor, as is believed, by the other party to the treaty, that claims arising from contract, as they existed at the time of the signature of the treaty, should be excluded from the benefit of the treaty. The claims intended to be provided for were those specially enumerated in the renunciations, and embraced all claims, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government, had been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the convention of 1802, and until the date of the signature of the treaty.

As there is no limitation in the words of this renunciation, with regard to the nature of the transactions in which the claims originated, whether by contract or by tort, so none was intended. They were claims, of all of which it was believed that the only possible chance of obtaining any satisfaction to the claimants consisted in the execution of the treaty.

Of the absolute obligation of this Government to interpose in behalf their fellow-citizens possessing such claims and imploring the aid of their country to obtain satisfaction for them, no very subtle or punctilious scrutiny had been made. It was the need of the claimant, and not the legal classification of his claim, for which the assistance of his Government had been solicited. The delay or denial of justice, which it was desirable to remedy, was the same, whether it was for a wrong committed or a contract broken. The claimants have alike been promised that at the negotiation of the treaty their claims would be considered, and endeavors made to provide for them in common with others.

Whether among the contracts provided for there were some upon which the Government of the United States, but for the treaty, must have eventually abandoned the claimants to the fate of war was never a subject of inquiry. Those claims, it is presumed, were not the less valid against Spain, nor were their prospects of real satisfaction by Spain in any other manner believed to be different from the rest. The Government was, indeed, aware that the abstract right to its interposition of citizens who had suffered by acts of foreigners, without any co-operation of their own, was more clear and imperative than that of others who had voluntarily staked their property upon the good faith of Spain; and, in the course of the negotiation, a proposal was made to omit the renunciation, which included the latter class of these claims. It was, however, finally agreed to, with the full understanding that all the claims should have the same benefit of the provision, be subjected to the same investigation, and be decided upon, not by any subsequent transaction between the claimant and the Spanish Government, but by the Commissioners, in the manner prescribed by the treaty, and upon such proof as they should think proper to require for ascertaining its amount and validity. Of the right to include such claims in the provisions of the treaty, in cases wherein the interference of the Government had been solicited by the claimants themselves, and their claims had, at their own desire, been made a subject of negotiation, no doubt was entertained. It is sanctioned equally by the moral principles applicable to public law, and by the frequent practice of other civilized nations, as well as by more than one example of our own history. If, indeed, no such right existed, and the two Governments were not competent to make and except such renunciation, it was certainly neither made nor intended. But that a Government, negotiating for the claims upon another Power of its citizens, at their own entreaty, is not competent to compound for them upon terms as favorable as it can, consistently with its duties to the rest of its own nation, secure, is a doctrine certainly not contemplated at the negotiation of the treaty, and now believed to be without warrant, either in the law or usages of nations.

To ascertain in the manner stipulated by the treaty, and in no other, the full amount and validity of these claims, as existing on the day of the signature of the treaty, the commission instituted under the eleventh article of the treaty was provided. How far contracts, under the special circumstances mentioned in your letter as applying to some of those which have been presented to the board, were valid contracts, it is the peculiar province of the Commissioners to decide. The Executive Government had not the means of judging of the validity of any of them; and of their amount it could form no other than a gross estimate. But it fully believed that the sum stipulated for the payment of them would be adequate to the full satisfaction of every valid claim embraced by the treaty, whether the claim had originated in contract or in wrong.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, gentlemen, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Commissioners under the eleventh article of the Florida treaty.

PHILADELPHIA, April 4, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate to your excellency copies of two notes which have passed between the Commissioners under the treaty of the 22d day of February, 1819, and Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State of the United States, dated respectively the 5th and 9th of March last. My principal motive for this communication is to apprise your excellency and the Spanish Government of the view which the Secretary of State seems disposed to take of the liquidation of my claim, notwithstanding it was made in the most formal manner by the Crown of Spain, at the express solicitation of the American minister at Madrid, and was consummated before the effectual ratification of the treaty by either Spain or the United States. If, according to the present suggestion of Mr. Adams, it was the full understanding of the contracting parties that all the claims, including, of course, my own, should be decided by the Commissioners upon such proof as they should think proper to require, and that such a transaction as the liquidation of my claim is to be of no effect whatever, it must probably be known to your excellency, or to that Department of your excellency's Government which has the cognizance of these matters; and if it was really so understood, while I shall have cause to regret that I have never been before apprised of the circumstance, I may at least hope, as an indemnity, for such assistance from Spain as will enable me to make the justice of the liquidation as apparent to the Commissioners as it was to his Catholic Majesty. It is known to those who had the charge of this liquidation in Spain that the original vouchers and documents by which many of my demands were supported were delivered up by me upon a formal requisition to that effect; and that, in some instances, the records and papers of certain of the Spanish offices furnished material evidence upon the subject. If, contrary to what I regard as the fundamental rules of evidence, and, more especially, the obligations of comity between nations, the Commissioners shall treat this liquidation as a nullity, (a result which the declaration of one of the Commissioners compels me to apprehend,) your excellency will at once perceive my embarrassment, and that it will require the effectual interposition of Spain to prevent the acknowledgment of the debt under the seal of the Spanish monarchy from becoming the cause of its rejection from the treaty. Nothing but the possession of the original vouchers and all the other evidence by which the claim was sustained in Spain, can obviate this mischief; and your excellency will, I hope, for this cause, excuse the earnestness with which I entreat you, beforehand, to become my mediator with his Catholic Majesty, to obtain for me all documents, vouchers, and evidence whatsoever in the possession and under the control of Spain appertaining to my demands, that I may prepare them, in case of need, for exhibition to the Commissioners. I still do not surrender the hope that what I conceive to be the best evidence of my claim will be so considered by the Commissioners; but I cannot state with too much strength to your excellency my solicitude to possess the means of encountering a contrary determination.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

R. W. MEADE.

PHILADELPHIA, October 10, 1822.

SIR: On the 4th of April last I had the honor to address to your excellency a letter enclosing copies of two notes which had passed between the Commissioners under the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, and Mr. Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, and which appeared to affect the liquidation of my claim. I then communicated to your excellency my apprehension, arising as well from a portion of this correspondence as from declarations made by one of the Commissioners, that the acknowledgment of the debt under the seal of the Spanish monarchy might not be accepted as conclusive or satisfactory, and that I might want all the documents, vouchers, and evidence with which the justice of that liquidation had been made apparent to his Catholic Majesty, and which, in obedience to a formal requisition, I had delivered up while in Spain, entreating your excellency, at the same time, to become my mediator with your Sovereign to obtain these for me. Since my last address to your excellency nothing has occurred to allay the apprehension I then expressed; but, on the contrary, I have received a formal notice that the Commissioners, on the 27th of June, judicially made known an intention not to regard the liquidation of the Spanish Crown, but to require other proofs of the amount and justice of my claim. Though still not altogether without hope that further reflection on the subject will satisfy these gentlemen how utterly inconsistent such a course of proceeding would be with the soundest rules of evidence and the comity of friendly nations, it is incumbent upon me to prepare for the worst. Presuming that since my application to your excellency to obtain every desired instruction from his Catholic Majesty, I cannot restrain my solicitude to be informed whether I may rely upon the interposition of Spain in the production, if necessary, of the documents, vouchers, and evidence particularly referred to in my letter of April last, your excellency will, I trust, perceive in the approaching meeting of the Commissioners an apology for my present urgent inquiry.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

R. W. MEADE.

[Translated.]

Letter of the Chevalier Don Joaquin de Anduaga to R. W. Meade, dated

PHILADELPHIA, October 16, 1822.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 10th instant, in which you are pleased to communicate to me that the commission installed at Washington in virtue of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, had judicially declared, on the 27th of June last, its intention of considering as null the liquidation made by the Spanish Government of your demands against it, and of requiring other proofs of the value and justice of said demand; and you conclude your letter by asking me whether you can depend on the interposition of Spain in your behalf, and, in case of need, of being enabled to procure and present all the documents, official proceedings, and evidence to which your letter, addressed to me in April of this year, refers.

I have been surprised beyond measure at what you are pleased to impart to me respecting the determination of the commission, and I flatter myself that it will not persist therein when it reflects on the injustice it involves, and on the libel it imports on my Government. The duty and the wishes of the commission, in the examination of your claim, can have no other object than that of convincing itself of its justice, in order to adjudicate to you its amount. To obtain this it ought to require of you the presentation of the most authentic documents known to the country in which your claim originated; and if you exhibit these, and prove them to possess the highest character of authenticity, and that they are sanctioned by the established tribunals for such purposes in that country, and by those to whom, as the heads of that Government, entire credit should be accorded, no corporations or individuals existing of higher grade, or in whom greater confidence can be placed, it is obvious that the commission cannot ask for evidences more satisfactory. Well, then, the liquidation made of your demands by the Spanish Government took place at the particular instance of the minister of the United States at Madrid; it was not the work of persons selected by the ministry of Spain, but of its most respectable tribunals; it was not investigated by one alone, but by various commissions, composed of individuals of the strictest probity, of the highest rank, and of no disposition to favor you; and finally, after the most rigorous examination, it received the sanction of the King himself. It is also well worthy of remark that, when all this was effected, it by no means appeared that the United States would assume to pay this debt; and when the liquidation which had been accomplished was communicated by the Minister of State to the minister of the United States at Madrid, he not only did not make any objection to it, but, in the name of his Government, returned his thanks, and manifested every satisfaction with it. This liquidation, thus sanctioned by his Catholic Majesty, and admitted and approved by the minister of the United States, is the one which you present to the commission; and what document can my Government give you that would be more conclusive? Will the commission place greater faith in the authentication of a notary public, or of a merchant, than in the attestation of the Council of Finance, the Supreme Tribunal of Auditors, the Treasurer General, the Minister of Finance, or, in one word, the King himself? Will the commission refuse its faith to the monarch and the constituted authorities whom the President of the United States respects? Can it be doubted that Spain would have acted with the most scrupulous exactness in forming a liquidation at a time of her greatest financial difficulties, whilst she believed herself bound to satisfy it?

Although I am persuaded that these reflections have already been made by you, I have thought it proper to premise them in order to observe that the natural consequence to be deduced from them is, that the Spanish Government will regard as a serious insult that what in Spain is acknowledged as most sacred and respectable should here be pronounced of no value; that it will never consent to have questioned the legality and purity with which your liquidation was made, and which is accompanied by all the marks of authenticity which it can give it; and in fine, though it should be practicable to reunite all the documents upon which that liquidation was made, his Catholic Majesty knows too well what is due to his own dignity, to the reputation of his ministers, and to the integrity to his tribunals, to consent that a foreign commission shall deem itself authorized to revise their decrees. With respect to every other point, you may rest assured that I am ready to exert exery good office near this Government which you may think necessary.

God preserve you many years. JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

THIRD MEMORIAL.

To the Commissioners under the treaty between the United States and Spain their memorialist, Richard W. Meade, respectfully shows:

That, conformably to a wish expressed by the Commissioners at their session on the 27th of June last, he has been apprised, through the kindness of a gentleman then present, that, pursuing the idea contained in a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the Commissioners on the 9th day of March, 1822, other proofs in support of the claim of your memorialist might be required than the acknowledgment of its justice and amount under the seal of the Spanish monarchy.

Although your memorialist cannot acquiesce in the propriety of such a requisition, and against it begs leave now to enter his respectful but solemn protest, he has most anxiously exerted himself to meet this aspect of the case, and to procure all the documents, vouchers, and evidence upon which the liquidation of his claim was effected in Spain, and was sanctioned by his Catholic Majesty. For that purpose he addressed a letter to his excellency Don Joaquin de Anduaga, minister plenipotentiary from Spain to the United States, as early as the 4th of April last, and a second letter on the 10th of October last, copies of which are hereunto annexed. To the first of his letters your memorialist received no reply, its contents necessarily requiring a delay during which communication might be had by the Spanish minister with his Government. To his second letter your memorialist received an answer under date of the 18th of October, 1822, a translated copy of which is also hereunto annexed, and the original deposited, for inspection, if necessary, in the hands of the secretary of the Commissioners. The result of the correspondence, for which your memorialist solicits particular attention, has been an entire failure to procure the required proofs after a resort to the only expedient in his power. He has thus, however, clearly evinced his own disposition to shed upon the subject every light that can be desired. Upon a former occasion he laid before the Commissioners the duplicate authenticated copies of the acknowledgment of the debt due to him both in his own right and in his representative right as the agent of others, originals of which he has now also deposited in the hands of the secretary of the Commissioners. He has likewise left with the said secretary two official letters addressed to him by Don Bruno Ballerino, member of the Supreme Council of the Indies, and president of the board or tribunal appointed in Spain to liquidate his accounts, translated copies of which are annexed, and which attest the fact that all the original documents, vouchers, and evidence which your memorialist held were exacted from him by that tribunal, and, on the liquidation being sanctioned by the King, were transmitted to the Minister of Finance, to be forwarded to the departments to which they respectively belonged.

Your memorialist begs leave to add that, on his arrival in his native city from Spain, he deemed it his duty to address a letter to the Secretary of State, at Washington, under date of the 16th of August, 1820; and on the day following he transmitted to that gentleman translated copies of the liquidation and of the official communication made to your memorialist by the Minister of Finance in Spain, for the purpose of having the same laid before the President of the United States; and he now respectfully prays the attention of the Commissioners to the answer of the Secretary of State, a copy whereof is hereto annexed, and the original deposited with the secretary of the Commissioners, wherein it will be seen that the proper organ of the Executive Department of our Government, after a full view of the business, and with all the documents in his possession, and subject to his able scrutiny from the 18th of August to the 6th of September, not only did not intimate an objection to the time, place, form, or substance of the liquidation, but, on the contrary, offered his "congratulations upon the adjustment of the accounts of your memorialist with the Spanish Government, and assured him that his Government felt not a little gratification in having at all contributed to the satisfactory result."

Your memorialist respectfully submits that his case is one of a peculiar nature. It stands alone. A formal adjudication in his favor has been made by a competent tribunal, with the sanction of the highest authority known to the laws of the country in which the claim originated, and at the express instance of his own Government; after such adjudication the result was officially communicated by the Spanish Government to the Government of the United States. These Governments interchanged sentiments of mutual satisfaction respecting it, and his own Government addressed your memorialist in strong and animated terms approving the adjustment, and assuming, with reason, some merit for having effected its accomplishment. Nor can your memorialist, with propriety, omit to mention that he presented a memorial to the President of the United States, dated on the 8th of February, 1821, which was by him laid before the Senate prior to the ratification of the treaty, in which your memorialist humbly prayed that, if it were not perfectly well understood that he was to be paid by the American Government, a declaration to that effect might be annexed to the ratification, and his claim explicitly excluded from its operation, as it was his wish to retain unimpaired the responsibility of his acknowledged debtor; and that said memorial was entered upon the journal of the Senate, and the treaty ratified.

Your memorialist considered, and does and ever must consider, the amount of his claim as a private debt, acknowledged to be due to him from Spain as such. The Government of the United States had no constitutional or legal right to cancel it, nor to exonerate Spain from her liability to pay it without themselves discharging it. The protection of his Government was asked in the exercise of his inherent right as a native citizen to do so; but, in asking that protection, he could not be supposed to confer a power arbitrarily to place your memorialist in a situation much worse than any he could possibly have been in had it never been solicited or granted. Spain declares that the debt was justly due by her, and that she has given full value for the amount to the United States, while the latter, by a solemn treaty, duly ratified, and become the law of the land, has agreed to assume and pay it. Nor is it immaterial to remember that it appears, from the documents transmitted by the Secretary of State to the Commissioners previous to November, 1821, that he officially knew, long before the original treaty was first signed at Washington, the amount claimed by your memorialist from Spain, than which the sum ascertained and fixed by the liquidation is less by between twenty and thirty thousand dollars; that these documents were on file in the Department of State, and that, of course, when the negotiation was proceeding, its conductors were aware how much was demanded, and how much they admitted and provided for. The certificate of Don Luis de Onis, one of the negotiators, filed with the secretary of the Commissioners in the case of the claim of Robert Barry, distinctly attests the object and intention of the parties to the treaty as to the claim of your memorialist, and that to embrace its entire payment was within their contemplation.

Your memorialist, therefore, respectfully suggests that, if it will be deemed right and just, though he confidently hopes it will not, to regard the Spanish liquidation as wholly null, and to revise its foundations and proofs, a resort must be had to the eleventh article of the treaty, which points out the course to be pursued in all similar cases; a course mutually agreed upon by the United States and Spain, which the Commissioners alone are competent to take, and the only one from which a satisfactory result can be reasonably expected.

And your memorialist will ever pray, &c.

R. W. MEADE.

L.

OPINION OF JUDGE WHITE IN THE CASE OF R. W. MEADE.

1. As to citizenship. Upon this point the board are not at liberty to doubt that he is a citizen: the proceedings of the Executive and of the Congress of the United States close this question. Both these departments of the Government interfered in his case, when confined in Spain, upon the ground of his being a citizen; and the Government of Spain yielded to their wishes, and predicated several of its acts upon the ground that he was not a subject of Spain ,but a citizen of the United States.

In the face of these acts of both Governments I am not at liberty to doubt his being a citizen. He is one of those intended to be provided for by the treaty, provided he has a claim upon the Spanish Government which will fall within either of the five clauses enumerated in the ninth article.

That he has a valid claim upon the Spanish Government; that it existed prior to the date of the treaty; and that it is one of those of which the United States assumed the payment, are points necessary to be established before this board can make any allowance.

To ascertain how far these propositions are supported we must recur to the proofs. They deviate into two classes: the one details matters which happened before the date of the treaty; the other, things transacted after its date.

As to the first:

1. Copies of several papers, five in number, which passed among the officers of the Spanish Government. From these it appears that, on the 12th of September, 1815, a royal order was passed by which all debts which weighed upon the royal treasury should be incorporated in the national debt, except such as were due to foreigners. That Mr. Meade and others claimed debts due to them as falling within the exception, they being foreigners. Whether Mr. Meade was a foreigner or not became a question. The proper officers are called upon to inquire into the matter. Under date of the 21st March, 1816, a report is made to his excellency the Captain General by Joaquin de la Pena y Santander, in which he enumerates the circumstances that would entitle Mr. Meade to the appellation of subject or foreigner, and says that he does not know what the facts are, but that he can inquire into and put them upon the record if required. On the 28th of March there is an order that it be sent back to the Assessor General of the sub-delegation, that he may extend the report accordingly. On the 26th of April, 1816, the report is made that Mr. Meade is a foreigner—in other words, a citizen of the United States; and that the debt due to him is one of the debts assumed in the royal order, and to be paid. On the 30th of April the Marquis of Casteldosius makes a similar report. On the 9th September, 1816, an official note is communicated from the Intendant to the Treasurer of the Army and of the Royal Finance of Cadiz, in which he says: "The General Treasurer of the Kingdom makes me the following communication under date of the 3d instant. The following royal order has been communicated to me, under date of August 22, by the Department of Finance: In conformity to the report of the Council of Finance, in a committee of the whole, respecting Messrs. Richard Ryan, Richard Meade, Francis Scotto, Richard Hackley, and Peter Charles Tupper, who, as foreigners, solicit that their respective claims against the royal treasury be comprehended in the exception made in favor of foreigners, as declared by the royal order of the 12th of September, 1815, his Majesty has resolved that their debts should be paid as it was promised to them, and according to said royal order of September 12, after the same are duly liquidated," &c.

From these documents it appears to me that Mr. Meade had some demands upon the Spanish Government prior to the 12th of September, 1815. That after that day he applied for payment. That payment was refused upon the grounds of the royal order of that date. That he insisted he fell within the exception, as he was a citizen of the United States. That the question of foreigner or not was deliberately inquired into, settled, and reported upon from the 21st March to 9th September, 1816. That during this period every officer through whose hands this matter passes acts under the conviction that the Spanish Government is indebted to Mr. Meade, and that the only doubt is whether the debt shall be paid as promised, or incorporated in the national debt. Finally, it is determined that his case is within the exception, and shall be paid as promised when liquidated.

It is hardly possible to suppose that these proceedings could have taken place if Mr. Meade had not a well founded claim upon the Spanish Government—at least, one which they were disposed to consider well founded. If he had no claim upon the treasury he would not have been told your claim cannot be paid as promised, because it must be incorporated in the national debt. The short and correct answer would have been, you have no claim, and therefore you will not be paid anything. It would be unreasonable to suppose that so many officers, from those in the lower Departments of the Treasury and Finance up to the King himself, would have been engaged from March to September in examining a question the determination of which would have been entirely useless if no well founded claim existed. I therefore conclude that Mr. Meade had a claim upon the Spanish Government, the payment of which had been promised: but this claim had not been liquidated, and, therefore, the precise sum due was not ascertained, nor is it known on what account Spain became indebted to him.

2. The next documents I meet with are those relating to the imprisonment of Mr. Meade. They give us this information: That during his residence in Spain he had, with the consent of all concerned, been appointed the assignee of a bankrupt's estate; that he had collected and held ready for distribution $50,000, which he ultimately paid into the royal treasury, in treasury notes, in obedience to a mandate from the proper tribunal; that the agent of the British creditors sued Mr. Meade, recovered a judgment against him, and, by intrigue, caused him to be imprisoned on the 2d May, 1816, in which state he remained until the interposition of the American Government caused a royal order for his release, dated April 20, 1818, in which are recited the circumstances under which he was imprisoned, and the sum deposited, &c.

I notice these documents for the sake of saying that the money for which Mr. Meade was imprisoned cannot be the same spoken of in the document before noticed, for many reasons.

The other documents speak of a demand which Meade had upon the treasury: these show that when Meade deposited this money he considered that he had discharged his trust, and had no concern with it afterwards.

They show a demand for Meade's own money which would be incorporated in the national debt if he is considered a subject of Spain; these show a demand against the treasury for money not Meade's, but known to all, in part, at least, to belong to British subjects, which ought not be incorporated, whether Meade is considered a subject or not.

They speak of debt due to Meade, payment of which had been promised him, but the amount unliquidated.

These relate to a specific sum deposited, which did not require any liquidation.

I therefore conclude that whatever claim Mr. Meade had upon the Spanish Government was not affected by his imprisonment or release, even if we suppose the Spanish Government paid the deposit at the time of his release, or at any time afterwards.

3. Next in order I meet with the certificate of two of the supreme junta established for the government and defence of Cadiz during the invasion of the French, to wit: Jose Manuel de Vadillo and Saloador Gazzon de Zalazor, dated July 27, 1818.

These persons, it would seem, were in a situation to know the facts of which they speak, and they testify that during the siege of Cadiz many articles were placed by Mr. Meade at the disposition of the junta, among which the most urgent and remarkable were one hundred thousand barrels of flour, in two contracts, at $15 per barrel, and that he relied upon the faith of the junta for payment, &c.

On the 6th of June, 1818, Mr. Meade addresses the Secretary of State, and observes that Spain is indebted to him in very large sums which he is anxious to have paid; that she is unable, if willing, to pay him in money; thinks by making some advance in cash he can have the whole amount paid him in lands in Florida; and wishes the sanction of the Government to that mode of procuring satisfaction. The Secretary answers that they would not approve of such an arrangement.

On the 5th of November, 1818, Mr. Meade makes a statement of the nature of his several claims upon the Spanish Government, not specifying the sum claimed under either head, and on the 17th of January, 1819, a copy of this statement is forwarded to the Secretary of this Government by Mrs. Meade, from Philadelphia.

4. On the 3d of August, 1818, the American minister in Spain advises the Secretary of State that on the 27th of July he had transmitted to Mr. Pizarro Mr. Meade's memorial, in which he asks compensation for his sufferings and losses.

5. On the 18th of January, 1819, Mr. Erving endorses to the Marquis de Casa Yrujo two memorials of Mr. Meade—the one dated January 12, in which he prays the King to appoint a commission to liquidate the several demands which he has against the Spanish Government on account of supplies furnished for the support of its armies and otherwise during the late war, as well as to consider of the compensation due to him for the losses and personal sufferings under a late proceeding of the council of war already declared by his Majesty to have been illegal; the second dated January 13, in behalf of John Dickson, an American citizen, and others, interested in a cargo of tobacco, sold and delivered to the Spanish Government under a solemn contract in 1815, &c., and proceeds to state that as to what more particularly concerns Mr. Meade's interest he has undeniable claims as a creditor upon the royal hacienda, and it cannot be doubted that his Majesty will be sensible to the value of those very important services rendered to the nation which form the ground of these claims, which give to them the most sacred character, and entitle them to the first consideration and to immediate settlement, &c.

Take these different letters, all dated before February 22, 1819, in connexion with the documents which precede them, and I cannot doubt that Mr. Meade had claims upon the Spanish Government which that Government held itself bound to satisfy. In some instances they expressly acknowledge these claims, and say they shall be paid, as promised, when liquidated; and do not, in any instance, deny the fact of being indebted to him when addressed upon that subject either by Mr. Meade or the American minister, when, if it had been known or believed that he was not a creditor, his claims would have been at once met by a denial of their justice. But the precise nature of these demands, the manner in which they originated, so as to be able to say whether any, and if any, what, amount would fall within the treaty, is not satisfactorily established by this proof, unless it can be collected from notarial copies.

It has been so often stated that it appears almost needless to repeat, that, to establish any claim before this board, the proposition must be supported that it is one of the claims of an American citizen to which his Government has renounced his claim upon the Spanish Government; and in order to avoid all difficulty upon this subject, there is a description of five classes of claims to which the renunciations extend.

In any case, therefore, it is of importance that the proofs should establish, not only a claim upon the Spanish Government, but that it should likewise show the nature of the claim to enable the Commissioners to ascertain whether it will fall within either of the specified classes or not.

I will not say that the proofs which I have noticed are so totally defective as to make it necessary to reject the whole claim, but I will say they are not very satisfactory as to the nature or terms of any of the contracts alluded to, and, as to most of them, so defective that it will be difficult to ascertain the sums due.

2. This makes it necessary that we should inquire into the facts which occurred after the 22d of February, 1819, the date of the treaty.

The first evidence offered is the liquidation of Mr. Meade's claim and the ascertainment of the amount due him by the officers of the Spanish Government on the 21st of May, 1820. And here a difficulty presents itself: is this evidence such as this board can notice for any purpose, and if any, for what purpose?

To form a correct opinion upon this point it is important that we should attend to dates. The treaty is dated February 22, 1819; it was soon afterwards ratified by the United States. In the treaty it is provided that if it is not ratified within six months it shall be void. On the 9th of March, 1819, Mr. Meade presents to the King a second memorial praying the appointment of Commissioners to settle with him, that of the 12th of January, 1819, not having been attended to.

On the 7th of May, 1819, the Commissioners are appointed. On the 30th of September, same year, a report is made, and the sum of near $500,000 awarded Mr. Meade as his whole claim against the Spanish Government; on the 23d of October, 1819, the King orders the report to be reconsidered; on the 15th of November there is a second report awarding the same sum; on the 19th of May, 1820, the award receives the royal approbation, and on the 20th of May, 1820, is notified to Mr. Meade. In October, (say 5th,) 1820, the Cortes advise the ratification of the treaty. The King shortly afterwards does ratify it, and on the 19th of February, 1821, it is again ratified by the President of the United States; the President and Senate having been previously notified of the settlement made with Mr. Meade and of the sum awarded him by the Spanish Government.

The first rule which I lay down as applicable to this question is, that no person, either natural or artificial, can, by his acknowledgments or admissions, create an obligation to be discharged by and at the expense of another unless that other has, by some means, authorized him to do so. If Spain did not owe this debt to Mr. Meade at the date of the treaty, but contracted it afterwards, it is not one of those renounced, and Spain is still responsible for it, not the United States, and ought therefore to be rejected, because it would prove a fact which would avail nothing. If Spain did owe it at the date of the treaty, there must have been some evidence then existing of the demand for which the extent of liability could be ascertained. That evidence would be better than the mere settlement with the Spanish officers, and ought to be produced. The rule is, that the best evidence in the party's possession or power ought always to be produced, or some reasonable account given why it is not. This is not, as has been argued, a contracted rule, applicable alone to the municipal courts of any one country. It is a rule founded in reason, not established by any statute, and applicable to all cases in all countries the judicial proceedings of which are worthy of imitation. Why is it that we notice the protest of the master of a vessel, letters written about the time of a transaction of long standing, &c.? Because from the nature of the transactions to which they allude they are likely to give a correct account of it, and the offer of them does not in itself imply that the party has it reasonably in his power to produce evidence more satisfactory, but holds it back, and offers the inferior evidence to obtain an advantage which he would lose if the better were produced.

The true rule is, that no party shall have the benefit of evidence to establish a fact, which evidence in itself implies that there is better evidence which the party could produce, by reasonable exertions, to establish the same fact; because the not producing the better creates a presumption that it would disclose something which would deprive him of a benefit which he seeks to obtain.

Apply this rule to the present case. The claimant offers as evidence, to prove the account that Spain owed him for breach of contract at the date of this treaty, a settlement made with that Government twelve or fifteen months after its date; well, there may be some mistake in this matter; the sum awarded may be too little—it may be too much. Some of the claims set up may be such as do not fall within either of the five classes specified in this treaty. The evidence from which this settlement was made would be more satisfactory than the award: let us see this; if you do not, we must suppose that there is some one or more of the items that constitute this account which you know we cannot include in the statement we would make, and therefore you offer this less satisfactory evidence; you ought not to be allowed to use it, more especially when we see, from other documents, that you were apprised as early as February, 1821, that there might be some difficulty upon this very point, and therefore both you and the Spanish Government would be careful to preserve all the evidence and documents from which the settlement and award were made.

Again: the eleventh article of the treaty provides that the United States shall make compensation for all claims renounced in the ninth article to an amount not exceeding, in the whole, five millions of dollars; and to ascertain the validity and full amount of these claims Commissioners shall be appointed, &c.; that the Commissioners, upon oath, shall examine the validity and amount of each claim. Further, that they shall examine every question upon oath, and receive suitable and authentic testimony, &c., and Spain, when required, is to furnish any document in her possession necessary to elucidate any one of the claims.

To bring the claim within this treaty it must be shown to have existed before the date of the treaty. If it did exist before the treaty, and is one embraced within it, then the parties have, by mutual consent, provided for the establishment of a tribunal whose duty it is to examine the validity as well as the amount of the claim; but if we admit this evidence, then Spain herself, through her own officers, is still to adjudge the validity and full amount of the claim, and the Commissioners have nothing to do but follow on, and, for form's sake, reallow the claim, the validity and extent of which have been already ascertained. This, it seems to me, cannot have been the intention of the framers of this instrument.

But it may be supposed that this reasoning is unsound because this settlement and award are not the creation of a debt, but only an evidence, which the party could not procure sooner; that this debt, to this same amount, existed before the date of the treaty. The distinction in this case can avail nothing. As soon as Spain ceased to be accountable for the demand she ceased to have any control over it. She can no more create evidence by which the validity of the contract, or the measure of compensation for its violation is to be ascertained, than she could create the contract itself. The substance is the same, and the distinction in words only. This ought not to be considered as suitable evidence under this treaty, which, on its very face, leaves reason to conclude that a persuasive argument to induce the making of the award was the consideration that not Spain, but the United States, were to make the payment.

Again: it has been urged that, at the time this settlement and award were made, Spain herself was the debtor, and to make the compensation, because the treaty had become null, the time for its ratification having expired.

This argument is not satisfactory. When the treaty was afterwards ratified it stands as a treaty in which no time for ratification had been stipulated, and is now to be construed as a treaty dated 22d February, 1819, ratified by Spain in the fall of 1820, and by the United States in February, 1821, at times satisfactory to both parties, and the ratifications are acknowledgments by the respective parties that their negotiators had power to make the treaty upon the terms specified therein; and whether the treaty shall operate upon a particular matter from the date or from the ratification, must, in my opinion, depend upon the matter to which the stipulation relates, and the intention of the parties respecting that matter; hence, it may well happen that the same treaty may become operative upon different matters at different periods; upon some from the date, upon others from the time of ratification, and upon others from neither date nor time of ratification.

If the argument were sound that this can only be considered a treaty from the ratification of the parties, and not from the date, why trouble ourselves with endeavoring to draw a distinction between a contract and the evidence of a contract? We would arrive at the same conclusion by a much more simple process—that of considering the treaty as in truth dated on the day it was last ratified by the United States. Then the case is included by considering the contract and the evidence of it as having existed at the same time. It is true this would not be within the words, but might with plausibility be insisted upon as within the meaning of the fifth renunciation; all that would be necessary might readily be accomplished by considering the ratification as the signature of the treaty, which ought to be the case if we consider the treaty as without date.

It has been urged, with much ingenuity, that there is a difference between a contract and the evidence of it; that the one may well have existed prior to the treaty, and the other have had its existence since. In many cases I think I could see the full force of the distinction, and that, upon such after evidence, the mind would be well satisfied of the existence of a previous contract and its exact terms. But in this case the distinction entirely fails us; the great object is to ascertain the contracts which Mr. Meade had with the Spanish Government before the date of this treaty, their terms, and how far they were complied with by the respective parties; and this for the purpose of enabling us to decide upon their validity, and, if valid, to what extent the compensation for their violation ought to be carried. Now, if we attempt to use this document as evidence upon these points, it is impossible to avoid discovering that there is great danger of being misled by it. Attend to its contents: some of the items possibly grew out of contracts, either express or implied; others undoubtedly out of tort. That of the imprisonment of Mr. Meade certainly had no existence as a contract until the time of this award, after the date of the treaty. If we view that item as existing in the light of contract there is an end of that matter, because it must have been tort until merged in the award or judgment, and then the judgment being the only evidence of the contract, the contract and the evidence of it are one and the same thing, both too late to be compensated or renounced under this treaty.

Suppose we discard the idea, as we must do, of considering this item as growing out of a contract, and say it was a tort: the questions immediately present themselves, of what kind, and by whom committed? So far as we can at present see, the answers are, an imprisonment of Mr. Meade, and that by order of the Spanish Government itself. Under what clause of the treaty should we include this item? Not under the first renunciation, for two reasons: first, if it was an excess, it was one committed by the Government, not by an individual; and no excesses are there provided for but those committed by subjects. Again: if it was an excess by a proper character, it was committed after 1802, and therefore not included.

Under the second, third, or fourth renunciations it is certainly not included. If under any, it would be the fifth; but that cannot be; it is a mere personal wrong; the damages would be arbitrary; we have no data from which to estimate them. Again: if the fifth would include torts, it would not be fair to include those committed by the Government itself. The first four renunciations are employed upon torts by individuals or inferior officers, and, by implication, to include the Government, the most worthy would be against the rules of construction; this wrong, and those of the like kind, the Government of the United States did not intend to renounce, nor did Spain intend they should be judged of by the Commissioners of the United States. In estimating damages for them, the temper with which the act was done, the motives, the character of the wrong-doer, are all justly taken into consideration. No sovereignty could intend that its motives, in a mere personal wrong, should be inquired into and redressed by others. If they were conscious of wrong they would redress it themselves by making such compensation as their own sense of propriety would dictate.

If, then, we take this document as evidence it would mislead us: first, by making us believe that this item grew out of a contract before the treaty; and, next, by making us include a tort which neither party intended to provide for by the treaty.

When we recur to other items we shall not be more safe. Contracts are spoken of. With whom were they made? What were their terms? In what were they to be paid, and when? All these points are material, and upon them this document is unsatisfactory. We see that upon a bill of exchange which was dishonored interest is allowed up to the time of settlement, and a part of this very amount was for the difference of exchange included in the bill. The bill comes back, and upon its nominal amount interest is calculated to the 15th November, 1819.

As to other items it is as little satisfactory. The loan is to be returned and interest upon it.

This sum is all estimated as specie. Have they, as we have sometimes had, and in some places still have, different kinds of currency? In what kind were these dealings, specie or a depreciated paper? If depreciated, how much? We ought to have information upon all these points to do that which would be just, and upon some of them it is essential we should have information which this document does not give. I cannot at present take it as evidence that would be useful in any respect. On some points I think it would mislead as to the whole of the item, on others as to a part, and, I fear, to a greater extent than we can see. I, therefore, think it ought not to be received, either as conclusive or prima facie evidence.

But it is argued that we ought to receive it, because our Government had an agency in procuring this settlement, and were apprised of the result before the ratification of the treaty.

It is true our minister abroad used his influence in favor of Mr. Meade, and that the Executive and Senate both knew of the settlement before the last ratification. As to the first, it was just such a case as would in all cases, it is hoped, be practiced by our minister. He lends his aid to a citizen abroad to bring his matters to such an issue as he wishes without either thinking or believing that his own country is to be in the least affected thereby; and as to the last, they seem to have been content to ratify the treaty without doing anything by which Mr. Meade's claim would be made either better or worse than the terms of the treaty, as it originally stood, would make it.

I cannot see that anything has been either said or done by any of those officers by which this claim is to be treated different from what it would have been if they had been entirely ignorant of this award at the time the treaty was finally ratified. Although I am unwilling to trust this evidence as at present furnishing any evidence of the validity of these contracts, their terms, or the extent of compensation for a violation of them, yet, believing as I do from the other testimony that Mr. Meade has a well founded claim, or at least a claim which the Spanish Government considered well founded, I am perfectly willing to require any document from that Government, which there is reason to think they possess, which will elucidate those transactions, and for that purpose am willing to continue the cause. If we can procure more evidence it is well; we shall have greater certainty in our ultimate decision. If we cannot procure more, we must come to the best conclusion in our power from the proofs as they now exist as to the validity of the claims and the extent of allowance.

SPANISH CLAIMS, OFFICE OF THE COMMISSION, Washington, April 18, 1823.

SIR: Richard W. Meade, who is a claimant before us under the provisions of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, and who represents himself to be a citizen of the United States, has, in due form, made application to us to require of the Spanish Government certain papers and documents which are considered as necessary to the establishment of his claim, and which are specified in the enclosed paper.

In consequence of this application, we are compelled to trouble you with a request that you will be pleased to adopt such means as you think proper to require of the Spanish authorities the documents referred to.

We have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

H. L. WHITE,
WILLIAM KING,
L. W. TAZEWELL.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

N.

Don Hilario de Rivas y Salmon to the Secretary of State, April 15, 1823.

[Translation.]

SIR: Don Richard Meade, a citizen of the United States, addressed two letters to my predecessor, his excellency Don Joaquin de Anduaga, dated the 4th of April and 10th of October, 1822, enclosing your correspondence with the Commissioners appointed in virtue of the 11th article of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, ratified by his Catholic Majesty, and exchanged in February, 1821, relative to the admission of certain claims which are therein mentioned. The said gentleman sent these documents to my Government, along with the answer which he made to Mr. Meade, on the 16th of October, 1822, copy of which I have the honor to enclose to you.

His Majesty has been pleased to approve and sanction the said answer to Mr. Meade, and commands me to support his claims, and to represent to you in the most friendly terms, but at the same time in the most energetic and solemn manner against all opposition which may be attempted to be made, that the particular credit which said Meade had against the Spanish nation is not satisfied, but that, in virtue of the last treaty, the Government of the United States has taken it upon itself.

This credit is in truth the only one which has been solemnly acknowledged by his Catholic Majesty. It was executed at the pressing instances of the minister of the United States at Madrid, and its acknowledgment and final liquidation took place at a time and in circumstances which do not admit the least doubt to ensue as to its legitimacy and import.

The value of the credit was represented to both Governments during the negotiation. Its liquidation could be effected only by the parties interested in the contracts, and in the damages and injuries by which an indemnification was claimed; and the investigation, with precision of the exact sum which was due, appeared to be a point of equal interest to both Governments. This was at least shown and insisted on with vigor by the Government of the United States before and after the date of the treaty; and his Catholic Majesty, when he acceded to its anxiety, desirous of shunning new causes of complaint, chose four of his counsellors from different tribunals, and commanded them to examine scrupulously and in detail all the circumstances regarding an account so complicated, and which required all the possible knowledge and intelligence of the laws of Spain and commercial regulations of the nation to be able to form a just conception of all the transaction. No subject of this nature has been ever considered so cautiously and with so much matureness, not only by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose, but latterly by the Treasurer General, by the Greater Accountant's Office, by the Minister of Finance, and, lastly, it received the sanction of his Majesty.

In these circumstances, his Majesty thinks that he ought not to see with indifference, nor remain undisturbed, when an attempt is made to invalidate an act so solemn. The Spanish nation was certainly responsible for the total amount of the acknowledged debt. The Government of the United States, by the latter ratification of the treaty, took upon itself this debt, in virtue of the fifth renunciation of the 11th (9th) article, and with a full knowledge of its amount, which had been communicated, long before the conclusion of the treaty, to the minister of the United States at Madrid by his Majesty's Secretary of State for the information of the American Government. Certainly, after all that had passed, it was not to be expected that a new investigation of the business should be judged necessary.

There cannot be a doubt that, if the treaty of the 22d of February had not been concluded, Mr. Meade would have received from the Spanish nation the total amount of his debt; and his Majesty cannot comprehend the justice of the Commissioners in having attempted, in the first place, to reject entirely this debt, as not being comprehended in the treaty, and much less could his Majesty be persuaded that so solemn an act of his Government—an act which was, in a great degree, founded upon the interposition of the American Cabinet, and which was done in good faith—would have been afterwards placed in doubt by their agents.

The slight which the Commission of Claims has endeavored to throw upon the most respectable authorities of Spain, and upon his Majesty himself, and, consequently, on the whole nation, has caused his Majesty great pain.

I have, therefore, the order of my Government to inform you that it cannot keep silence when an act so incontestable is placed in doubt, and I, beforehand, protest, solemnly and respectfully, against any decision of the Commissioners appointed in virtue of the treaty which invalidates, in any manner, the acknowledgment made by my Government of the total debt of Mr. Meade, agreeably to the certificate which they sent to him in consequence, and which is in their possession.

I have the honor to repeat to you, sir, the testimony of my distinguished and high consideration.

HILARIO DE RIVAS Y SALMON.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Salmon.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 29, 1823.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 15th instant, enclosing a copy of one bearing date the 16th of October, 1822, from Don Joaquin de Anduaga to Mr. Meade.

By the 5th specific renunciation, in the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, signed on the 22d of February, 1819, but ratified by his Catholic Majesty only on the 24th of October, 1820, it was provided that the renunciation, on the part of the United States, of all claims for damages or injuries sustained by themselves, or their citizens, from Spain, stipulated by the preceding part of the same article, should extend—

"To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty."

You will observe that the time of the signature, and not that of the ratification by either party, nor that of the exchange of ratifications, is expressly agreed upon as the time until which the claim and the statements of them to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, had been received; which claims were, on the part of the United States, renounced.

The reason for fixing upon this particular time for the period at which the obligation of the United States to assume the payment of these claims should terminate is obvious. It was neither proper, nor could it be the intention of the parties, that they should renounce claims, or admit statements of them, not known to the party assuming the obligation at the time of contracting it. Whatever claims might arise, or whatever statements of them might be made after the signature of the treaty, were not, therefore, and could not, with propriety, be provided for by it.

By the eleventh article of the same treaty it was stipulated that—

"The United States, exonerating Spain from all demands in future, on account of the claims of their citizens, to which the renunciations herein contained extend, and considering them entirely cancelled, undertake to make satisfaction for the same to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. That—

"To ascertain the full amount and validity of these claims, a commission, to consist of three Commissioners, citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which commission shall meet at the city of Washington, and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all claims included within the descriptions above mentioned;" that "the said Commissioners shall take an oath, or affirmation, to be entered on the record of their proceedings, for the faithful and diligent discharge of their duties;" and that "the said Commissioners shall be authorized to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable, authentic testimony concerning the same. And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of the said claims, according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said Commissioners."

It has been necessary to set forth, in the terms of the treaty itself, the engagements respectively contracted by the parties to it in these articles, in order to show with clearness their bearing upon the question now brought into discussion by your letter, and that of Mr. Anduaga, which is enclosed.

The claims, payment of which to a fixed and limited amount was assumed by the United States, were claims not only existing, but statements of which had been exhibited at the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, before the signature of the treaty.

To ascertain the full amount and validity of those claims, Commissioners were to be appointed to act under oath, and charged with the duty to receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims.

And the Spanish Government solemnly bound itself to furnish all such documents and elucidations as might be in their possession for the adjustment of the said claims.

If anything in human intention can be made clear by human language, it is that the claims provided for by the above stipulation were in the condition as they had been exhibited at the time of the signature of the treaty; that the authority and the trust of examining, ascertaining, and deciding their amount and validity was solely and exclusively committed to the Commissioners, and that the Spanish Government was and is bound to furnish them, at their demand, all documents and elucidations in possession of the said Government for the adjustment of the claims.

No transaction between any of the claimants and the Spanish Government subsequent to the signature of the treaty could be evidence to the Commissioners of the condition of the claim at the time of that signature. No appeal from the decision of the Commissioners, either to the Government of the United States or of Spain, was reserved. By the transfer to the United States of the obligation of making payment conformably to the treaty of those claims, Spain deliberately, and with full knowledge, transferred also the right of examining and deciding their amount and validity. It is to little purpose, therefore, that Mr. Anduaga's letter descants so largely upon the variety and respectability of the Spanish commissions and tribunals which, many months after the signature of the treaty, undertook to liquidate, that is, to decide upon, the amount and validity of Mr. Meade's claim upon the Spanish Government; neither the number nor the character of those Courts is at all questioned; but, from the day of the signature of the treaty, they had no jurisdiction to try or decide upon any of the claims the payment of which was assumed by the United States. Whatever jurisdiction they did exercise, however obligatory it might be upon his Catholic Majesty's Government, could have no effect whatever to charge the United States, or, so far as they were concerned, to change the condition of the claims, as it had been exhibited to the Government of the United States, or to their minister at Madrid, before the signature of the treaty. It had been exhibited as an unsettled and unliquidated claim; if comprised at all within the provisions of the treaty, it was an unsettled and unliquidated claim, upon which, as upon all the rest, the commission instituted under the treaty was, by the express engagement of both parties, exclusively to decide.

It is alleged by Mr. Anduaga, and repeated in substance by you, that the decision by the Spanish tribunals upon the amount and validity of Mr. Meade's claim, made many months after the signature of the treaty, many months even after his Catholic Majesty was bound to have ratified the same, and after its ratifications ought to have been exchanged, was given at the earnest instance of the minister of the United States in Spain, and that he, as well as the Government of the United States, expressed their satisfaction at the event. The answer to this argument is, however, furnished by Mr. Anduaga and by you. Mr. Anduaga says, "when all this was done there was no probability that the United States would be obliged to pay this debt;" that is to say, there was no probability that his Catholic Majesty would perform the express and solemn promise that he had made to ratify the treaty. Undoubtedly, when there was no probability that the United States would be charged with the payment of the debt, their Government and their minister did earnestly press the Spanish Government to do justice at least to Mr. Meade. What that justice was, what was the amount and validity of his claim upon the Spanish Government, the United States neither had nor claimed the right to decide. So far as it was an obligation to be paid by Spain, and by which no other interests of the United States, or of their citizens, could be affected, the right to decide upon it was exclusively of the resort of Spanish tribunals, and the American Government and minister naturally expressed their satisfaction at the adjustment by the Spanish Government of a claim of one of their citizens, in whose favor they had taken a deep and generous interest, it being always understood by them that this interest did not conflict with their duties to the people of the United States, and to all their other fellow-citizens, also claimants upon Spain, and in whose favor their Government was bound to take an interest as earnest and generous as in that of Mr. Meade.

While there was no probability that the treaty would be ratified by Spain, the adjustment by Spanish tribunals, binding only upon Spain, could in nowise affect any other right or interest of the people of the United States, or of other American citizens, claimants upon Spain. That adjustment could in nowise charge the United States. It was an obligation of Spain, contracted after the signature of the treaty, and was thereby excluded, by the express terms of the treaty itself, from the number of those which the United States had, by the treaty, engaged to assume upon themselves. The cognizance taken at the time by the Spanish tribunals of this claim, and the acknowledgment of the amount and validity of this one alone, as you affirm, among many hundreds of other claims of American citizens, many of much longer standing, and all equally entitled to adjustment and liquidation, are indeed powerful arguments to prove that Mr. Meade's claim was not one of those for which Spain had intended to provide by the treaty. And this argument is strongly fortified by another, which Mr. Meade himself, and his learned counsel in this country, have urged with great force, namely, that the claims of Mr. Meade upon Spain were of a nature which, by the laws of nations and of justice, Spain could not discharge, and the United States could not renounce, by any treaty or compact between themselves. The conclusion from these arguments, if correct, undoubtedly is, that Mr. Meade's claims upon Spain were not intended to be, and even could not be, provided for by the treaty, and were therefore not included in it. If, then, the Commissioners under the treaty did, in the first instance, entertain very serious doubts whether the claim of Mr. Meade was among those provided for, or intended to be provided for by the treaty, it was to these proceedings of the Spanish Government, after the signature of the treaty, and to the argument of Mr. Meade and his counsel against the right of the contracting parties to the treaty to dispose of Mr. Meade's claim, that these doubts must be ascribed. It was assuredly never the intention of the Government of the United States, in that treaty, either to renounce any claim which they had not the right to assume, or to assume any claim which they had not the right to renounce; as far was it doubtless from the intention of Spain to discharge any just claim of Mr. Meade's upon her by the attempt to transfer it to a third party without his consent. Nothing can be more clear than that Spain remains at this hour bound to satisfy, to the last real, every claim acknowledged by herself to be just, and which she had not the right to transfer to a third party without the consent of the claimant.

The treaty, by its express terms, made provision only for unsettled and unliquidated claims. The United States assumed them, as they existed and had been exhibited at the signature of that instrument, the 22d of February, 1819. In assuming the duty of Spain to discharge those claims, the United States acquired the right, and it was, in express words, secured to them by the treaty, of ascertaining and deciding, exclusively by a commission of their own citizens, the amount and validity of each claim assumed. At the same moment when the obligation to discharge the claim attached to the United States, this exclusive right of the commission to examine and decide its amount and validity attached with it. From that moment the Spanish tribunals had no more right to examine or pass in any manner upon the claims than the tribunals of the United States had to examine and pass upon them before the signature of the treaty. This provision imported no distrust in the justice or integrity of the Spanish tribunals. It followed, as an indispensable consequence, from the engagement contracted by the United States to pay the claims.

By the treaty itself, and by the full power of Don Luis de Onis, its negotiator on the part of Spain, his Catholic Majesty was bound to ratify the treaty so that the ratification should be exchanged within six months from the day of its signature. Had this engagement been performed, Mr. Meade's claims would have remained in the same state in which they had been on the day of the signature of the treaty, unsettled and unliquidated. Mr. Meade's claims were not provided for by name, nor had any mention of them been made in the course of the negotiation. The Spanish Government was, at that time, so far from admitting that Mr. Meade had any just claim upon them that they had but very recently, at the earnest and peremptory interposition of the Government of the United States, released him from imprisonment as a defaulter to them.

The treaty remaining unratified by his Catholic Majesty, and, as Mr. Anduaga affirms, there being no probability that it would be ratified, long after the period had expired when he had promised, on his royal word, that it should be ratified, the minister of the United States at Madrid, at the earnest and repeated solicitations of Mr. Meade, certainly did urge the Spanish Government to adjust, liquidate, and satisfy his claims. From the nature of these claims his learned counsel in this country have since drawn it in question, whether the Government of the United States had any right to interpose with that of Spain in relation to them at all; and upon this question depends the other, before noticed, whether Spain could, by treaty, transfer to the United States her own obligation to pay those claims. They were claims which Mr. Meade had acquired, not in his neutral character as a citizen of the United States, but as a voluntary contractor with the Spanish Government while residing in their territory and living under their allegiance. They were, therefore, unquestionably, much less entitled to the interference of the American Government than the great mass of the claims provided for by the treaty; claims for wrongs suffered by citizens of the United States in their genuine character as such; for wrongs, in the origin of which there was no voluntary agency of their own, no forfeiture of their neutral rights, no resort but to the perfect obligation of their own Government to support them. Had the Spanish Government, at the time when the minister of the United States interposed in behalf of this claim, taken the ground of argument since assumed by Mr. Meade and his counsel; had they said, this is a claim in which the Government of the United States have no right to interfere, a question upon contracts between Mr. Meade and us while living in our territories and amenable to our laws, undoubtedly, by the principles of the rights and duties of nations universally recognized, Mr. Meade and the American Government must fain have put up with this answer as conclusive; and Mr. Meade's claim could never have been pretended to be included in the provisions of the treaty.

But no such ground was then taken, either by the Spanish Government or by Mr. Meade. So little was his reliance upon the justice of the Government with which he had contracted and under whose protection he dwelt, without the effectual interposition in his favor of the Government under which he had been born, that his entreaties for the interposition of the American minister and Government in favor of his claims were urgent and unceasing. To this interposition the Spanish Government did not object. Mr. Meade desired that provision for his claim should be made in the treaty which was then negotiating, and made known this desire to the Government of the United States. He was informed, in answer, that, if the treaty should be concluded, his claims would be considered and attended to, as far as might be practicable, in common with the others; and to this agreement he never suggested an objection till after the ratification of the treaty by Spain, nor until just at the moment before its second ratification by the United States. He then, to be sure, and then, for the first time, addressed the President and Senate of the United States, calling upon them to refuse the ratification of a treaty in which the only possible indemnity of many hundreds of their fellow-citizens for their losses, to the amount of five millions of dollars, was secured; or, to make the ratification conditional, that another article should be added by which his claim, not as existing at the time of the signature of the treaty, but as many months after that compact ought to have been ratified by Spain, liquidated by Spanish officers, before the Spanish ratification of the treaty, should be paid to the full amount as acknowledged by them, and without being subject, like all the other claims, to the honest investigation and scrutiny of the American Commissioners; and the principal argument urged by Mr. Meade's counsel in support of this demand, that the American Government should sacrifice the acquisition of the Floridas and five millions of dollars of indemnities justly due to their citizens, whose right to the effectual support of their country was perfect, was, that his claim was of a nature that the American Government had no right to interpose with Spain in its favor at all.

If the claims of Mr. Meade upon Spain were included among those provided for by the treaty, it was, in common with all the others, to be treated like all the others, and to abide the same issue with the others. Such was the clear, unequivocal intention of both parties to the treaty; nor could the American Government, in equal justice to all the claimants, have negotiated upon any other principle. The amount of claims exhibited to them, to be provided for by the treaty, as stated by the claimants themselves, was nearly ten times the five millions which they agreed that the people of the United States should pay from the proceeds of the Florida lands to discharge them. But it was well understood that many of the claims were not even valid against Spain; that most of them were swollen by the statements far beyond what, upon a fair examination, would be found to be due; that equitable deductions from equitable claims would reduce almost all of them within very contracted dimensions; and that, for the whole mass of them, the only hope of the claimants was in the munificence of the treaty. They were all, by the terms of the treaty, unsettled claims. Their just amount could then be only judged of by an estimate, in many respects conjectural, but it was believed, upon considerations duly weighed, that, when stripped of all their appendages to naked justice, five millions of dollars would be sufficient to cover them all. As they were to be paid by the people of the United States, it was the duty of the Government to allow no larger sum than would be sufficient, in rigorous justice, to discharge them. It might happen that even the just and indisputable claims would amount to something more. In that case the claimants must consider it as a composition of their claims, the best that their Government has been able to obtain for them; and it was not doubted that they who had been from one to twenty years waiting, with very little probability of ever obtaining anything for their claims, would be more than contented to receive so nearly all that they could have asked, and to abandon to their country the small remainder for the salvage of the rest. But to render this principle compatible with justice to all parties, it was indispensable that all the claims should be placed upon the same footing; that all should be subjected to the close, vigilant, and rigorous scrutiny and investigation of an upright and intelligent commission of American citizens; that all should be alike submitted to their examination and decision; and that no transaction between the Spanish Government and any one of the claimants subsequent to the signature, but before the ratification of the treaty, should alter the character of his claim and give him an advantage, at the expense of the people of the United States and of all the other claimants under the treaty. If the American Government could have admitted any discrimination between the claims, and that any one should have been privileged above the rest, Mr. Meade's claim, if the present argument of his learned counsel is sound, would have been the very lowest on the list, and the least entitled to favor: since most, if not all the rest, were claims which the American Government had been, from the beginning, bound, by the duty of protection to the rights of their own citizens, to support and maintain, even, if necessary, to the issuing of reprisals; while that of Mr. Meade, incurred voluntarily by himself with the Spanish Government while domiciliated in Spain, and by transactions of no neutral character, was of a nature to leave it doubtful whether the American Government had ever possessed the right of interposing in its behalf at all.

The interest, therefore, taken by the American minister at Madrid in Mr. Meade's favor, by urging on the Spanish Government the settlement of his claims; the satisfaction that he expressed after the liquidation had been obtained; the letter of congratulation from the American Secretary of State to Mr. Meade upon the event, when informed of it by him, have not the slightest bearing upon this argument. The answer to all this is furnished by Mr. Anduaga when he says: "There was, then, no probability that the treaty would be ratified by Spain." The American minister and Secretary of State expected that what the Spanish tribunals had liquidated and settled the Spanish Government would pay. They knew perfectly well that no interests of the people of the United States, or of the other claimants upon Spain, could be injuriously affected by this Spanish liquidation of Mr. Meade's claims. If the treaty should be ratified, and Mr. Meade should be receivable as a claimant under it, they knew that his claims could be admitted only as provided for by the treaty, and that no intermediate transaction between him and the Spanish Government could be evidence of his claims, as they had existed and been exhibited at the signature of the treaty; that no decision of a Spanish tribunal could settle that which the treaty, in express terms, reserved to the exclusive decision of the American commission. If the treaty should not be ratified, they rejoiced that their exertions in his favor had been so far successful that he had a nearer prospect of obtaining satisfaction from the Spanish Government itself. Their pleasure was that of a benevolent and friendly feeling towards Mr. Meade. But the American Government had duties of a more imperious nature to others—to the people of the United States, and to all their fellow-citizens—the other claimants upon Spain. To them it was due that, if the treaty should be ratified, and Mr. Meade be a claimant under it, his claim should stand on the same foundation, and pass through the same ordeal with the rest. The American Government knew that it was so stipulated in the treaty, and they little expected the pretension that, by this separate transaction between him and the Spanish Government, the treaty being yet unratified, the nature of the engagements of the United States in it was changed if it ever should be ratified; that they would be bound to receive as settled claims which they had engaged to receive as unsettled, and to take the dictum of a Spanish tribunal as the decision which the treaty had trusted exclusively to an American commission.

Mr. Meade himself and the learned counsel whom he has employed in this country know better. They were the first to doubt whether his claims were provided for by the treaty at all. They clearly saw that, if provided for, it was only upon the same terms and upon the same conditions with all the rest. His memorial to the President of the United States, objecting to the ratification of the treaty, was on the avowed and only ground that it had not provided for the satisfaction of his claims. He demanded that the ratification of the treaty should be refused, or given upon condition that a new article should be added, providing for the payment in full of his claims; that the Floridas should be sacrificed, and the only hopes of many hundreds of other claimants blasted, that he might be sure to receive, at the expense of the United States, payment, to the last maravedi, of what a Spanish tribunal had, since the treaty was concluded, awarded him as a debt due to him from Spain. His memorial insisted that neither Spain nor the United States had ever possessed the right of making, between themselves, a composition of his claims; and without being aware or mindful that, if this position was true, the irresistible conclusion from it was that they were not included in the treaty at all, and remained in full force against Spain as if the treaty had never been made, he yet required that the United States should make the ratification of this treaty conditional upon the assent of Spain to another, by which his claims should be distinguished from all the rest; admitted without asking questions, and paid without the deduction of a mille. And the principal argument for this moderate proposal was, that his claims upon Spain were such that the American Government has never possessed the right of interfering to support them against Spain at all.

Thus Mr. Meade himself and his learned counsel first raised the question, whether his claims were included among those provided for by the treaty; and if they failed of convincing the President and Senate of the United States of the propriety of withholding the ratification of the treaty which they had made, to exact the consent of Spain to another which they had not made, they conclusively proved that the United States had never been under obligations of negotiating with Spain concerning them at all; and gave plausible color, at least, to the belief that his claims, not being embraced by the provisions of the treaty, remained in all their force, acknowledged and unimpaired, to be paid, without deduction or compromise, from the Treasury of Spain.

But, after the ratifications of the treaty had been exchanged, and the commission instituted under it was organized, Mr. Meade produced before them his claims, as being among those provided for by the treaty; and when the Commissioners, in the discharge of their duty to their country, and to all the other claimants whose rights and interests were involved in the decision; when the Commissioners, yielding to the force of arguments which had been most strenuously urged by Mr. Meade himself and counsel; when the Commissioners, seeing in the treaty, which was their law, no mention of Mr. Meade's claim by name, and no description of claims with which it could, as a settled and liquidated claim, be embraced; when the Commissioners, men of high and irreproachable character, with the oath of God upon their souls, with no evidence before them but such as the treaty must exclude, and no argument but that of Mr. Meade and of his counsel excluding his claim from the treaty; when these Commissioners but intimated an opinion that Mr. Meade's claims were not among those submitted by the treaty to their decision, the basest and most inflammatory anonymous newspaper publications issued from a prostituted press, for the apparent purpose of intimidating, by defamation, the members of a judicial tribunal from the discharge of their trust, according to the conviction of their consciences.

Mr. Meade then, too, resorted to the Spanish minister in this country for his testimony to prove that it had been the intention of the Spanish Government to include his claim among those which were provided for by the treaty. That Spanish minister was not the negotiator of the treaty, nor could he, more than any other person, testify to the intention of the Spanish Government any otherwise than as appeared on the face of the treaty itself. It has already been said that, during the negotiation of the treaty, neither the name nor the claim of Mr. Meade had ever been mentioned between the negotiators; and that, when it was signed, the Spanish Government had never admitted that he had a valid claim upon them for so much as a dollar. Mr. Anduaga did, however, furnish Mr. Meade with his opinion that Mr. Meade's claim was embraced by the treaty, and that opinion was laid before the Commissioners. Other claims were also presented to them, involving the same question, whether contracts of the Spanish Government had been among the cases provided for by the treaty; and, at the application of one of the suitors, they addressed a letter to the Secretary of State suggesting their impressions that claims of that description, which the American Government had never been under any obligation to enforce, and in favor of which even their right to interfere might be questioned, were not included in the treaty, the main and obvious object of which was to obtain indemnity for the wrongs of American citizens entitled, beyond all question, to the full protection of their Government. This letter was laid before the President of the United States, by whose direction the answer was returned, which was conformable to the truth of the facts, and this formed the correspondence which you state to have been communicated by Mr. Meade to Mr. Anduaga, and by him to your Government.

In concluding the treaty, the American Government was well aware, and the Spanish Government could not be ignorant, that, by the laws of eternal justice, a nation has, no more than an individual, the right of discharging itself from the obligation of its contracts, by the agreement of a third party to assume them, without the consent, express or implied, of the party (whether nation or individual) with whom the contract was made.

The parties to the treaty well knew, also, that contracts, and liquidated, acknowledged debts are not, in their nature, subjects of negotiation, especially not of a negotiation between one of the parties with a third party not privy to the contract. The duty of a nation bound by such a contract is not negotiation, but performance.

They likewise knew that, with regard to the contracts of an individual born in one country with the Government of another, most especially when the individual contracting is domiciliated in the country with whose Government he contracts, and formed the contract voluntarily, for his own private emolument, and without the privity of the nation under whose protection he had been born, he has no claim whatsoever to call upon the Government of his nativity to espouse his claim, this Government having no right to compel that with which he voluntary contracted to the performance of that contract.

But unacknowledged, unsettled, unliquidated claims form the natural subject of negotiation; and, of all negotiation, the necessary and essential character is compromise. Of such claims, whether originating in contract or in wrong, the very application of an individual to one Government to assist him in the enforcement of his claims upon another imports, of itself, the consciousness that he cannot obtain his claims without that assistance, and makes them at once a subject of negotiation and compromise.

For such unliquidated claims alone provision was made by the fifth renunciation of the United States in the ninth article of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, which, by its terms, is limited to claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, had been exhibited since the convention of 1802, and until the signature of the treaty.

Mr. Meade was a citizen of the United States, who, since the convention of 1802, and before the signature of the treaty, had solicited the interposition of the Government of the United States, and had presented some general statement of part of his claims. He had specially desired that they should be included in the negotiation of the treaty, and had been informed of the only terms upon which they would or could be considered in that negotiation, in common with the other claims for which it was to provide. They were and could be known to the American Government only as unsettled and disputed claims, and the right to negotiate a compromise for them, in common with the rest, founded upon his own solicitation and the acquiescence of Spain, was not for a moment questioned; but, as an acknowledged claim, the amount and validity of which was known and admitted, and about which the United States and Spain had no right to negotiate between themselves a compromise not sanctioned by him, it certainly was not included, nor ever intended to be included, in the treaty. From the moment that Spain considers it as such, she contracts the obligation of discharging it herself as a contract, the compromise of which neither she nor the United States could rightfully negotiate between themselves without the privity of Mr. Meade; and which, not having been so negotiated, she, Spain, is bound, in honor and in justice to him, to discharge, to the last farthing, from her own Treasury.

This is what Spain can perform without injustice to others; but you will perceive, at a glance, that the Government of the United States could not, without the grossest injustice to their nation, and to all the other claimants under the treaty, admit that a transaction between Spanish tribunals and Mr. Meade, between the signature and ratification of the treaty, should change the nature of the compact between the United States and Spain, control the express terms of the treaty itself, and bind the Commissioners, charged with the duty of ascertaining and deciding the amount and validity of unliquidated claims, to take an acknowledgment in 1820 as evidence of the condition of a claim in 1819. The sum stipulated for payment, by the United States, of all the claims assumed, was limited to five millions of dollars. The amount due upon the whole mass might ultimately be found less, or it might exceed that sum. If it should prove less, the balance would be so much less of debt to be paid by the people of the United States. If more, a proportional deduction from the sum awarded to every claimant must be made, each of whom must make this small sacrifice to the adjustment of all these long-standing, perplexed, disputed, and, I may safely say, otherwise desperate demands. Those of Mr. Meade, in February, 1819, were assuredly not less desperate than the rest. To allow that a Spanish tribunal, long after the treaty ought to have been ratified, and while Spain retained the power of ratifying or rejecting it, should select this claim of Mr. Meade from all the rest, to invest it with the exclusive and invidious exemption from the scrutiny to which all others must be subjected; that it should be taken out of the treaty for examination and settlement, and cast back upon the treaty for payment in full; that it should be screened from all investigation, and privileged from all proportionable deduction; that the people of the United States, and the fund devoted to the just indemnity of many hundred claimants, should be doubly ransomed to satisfy the plenitude of that claim, and in reverence to the dignity of tribunals which, under the treaty, had no right to pass upon it at all, would be as wide from all the duties of the American Government as from the dictates of justice, and as far from its present intentions as from those of either party to the treaty at the time of its conclusion.

It was intended by the Government of the United States that Mr. Meade's claims, as then exhibited to them—unsettled, disputed claims, of a mixed character, for contracts, for losses upon exchange, for depreciation of Spanish Government paper, for interest, and for damages, all, except the first, of most uncertain amount and validity—should, in common with the other claims provided for, have the benefit of the treaty. But no stipulation of special favor to the claims of Mr. Meade, at the expense of other claimants, was or could be intended by the Government of the United States. The claim presented by Mr. Meade to the Commissioners is for an acknowledged debt from the Spanish Government to him, dated May, 1820, and directed to be paid out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest. To say that this is not the claim which, in February, 1819, the United States had renounced and agreed to compound, would be to say that daylight is not darkness. Mr. Meade might, with as much propriety, have purchased in the market, at its current price, any other order upon the funds of the Royal Finance Department, and brought it before the Commissioners as a claim provided for by the treaty, as he could this order, a part of the sum constituting which was for interest accrued after the treaty had been signed.

Of the obligation of the Spanish Government to pay Mr. Meade, with interest, the whole amount of this sum, acknowledged by its own tribunals to be due, there can be no doubt; but it is equally clear that it is not the debt which, in February, 1819, the United States had agreed to assume, to consider as cancelled, and to discharge. It was not the claim which had been exhibited, or had even existed, in February, 1819. It was a claim of a totally distinct and different character. It was a new obligation of Spain, for which no provision had been made by the treaty, and with which the United States could not, without injustice to themselves, and to all the other claimants, be charged.

By the intention of including Mr. Meade's claims among those provided for by the treaty at the time of its negotiation, the American Government had shown its kindness towards him to the utmost verge of its compatibility with their duties to others. Mr. Meade's claims, as then existing, however meritorious as against Spain, were far from being, against the United States, as deserving as many others with which they were to share the benefit of the treaty. They were claims, part of which were for supplies to support the ally of Spain, then, or very shortly after, the enemy of the United States—supplies to maintain a cause to which, so far as concerned Spain, the United States were neutral, but which, by its inseparable connexion with Great Britain, was the cause of that nation against Mr. Meade's country. There was no one point of view in which those claims could be considered that gave them a title to the special favor or support of the American Government or nation; and, by extending to them the advantages of a composition which they were enabled to effect with Spain of numerous other and far more meritorious claims, in meaning to do equal justice to all, they perhaps did more than justice to Mr. Meade.

While, therefore, your position that the Spanish nation was certainly responsible (to Mr. Meade) for the total amount of the acknowledged debt is indisputable, his Catholic Majesty will find, by further examination of the treaty, that the Government of the United States did not take upon itself, by the latter ratification of the treaty, nor ever in any other manner, this debt. The fifth renunciation of the ninth article of the treaty neither did nor could, nor was ever intended to, include this debt; and the latter ratification of the United States neither did nor could, in the slightest degree, alter the character of obligation which the United States had contracted, on the face of the treaty, on the 22d February, 1819. The fifth renunciation, upon its face and by its terms, was limited to claims stated, but unsettled, of uncertain amount and validity, as existing at the signature of the treaty. The ratification of the United States could no more change the import of this renunciation than it could change the words in which it was expressed. The fourth article of the treaty reserves the examination and decision of the amount and validity of all the claims assumed by the United States for the exclusive cognizance of a commission of American citizens; and whoever appears before them as a claimant under the treaty must abide by their decision, conformably to the treaty. For all subsequent engagements, contracts, and debts of the Spanish Government, whether with Mr. Meade or with any other claimants, Spain, and not the United States, is chargeable. If Mr. Meade claims the benefit of the treaty, by the treaty must he submit to be judged, and according to the terms of the treaty must he receive his indemnity. If he means to resort to engagements or debts subsequently contracted, or to the decisions of Spanish tribunals, to Spain alone must he have recourse for satisfaction. This conclusion cannot be departed from by the Government of the United States. It is due to the plain intent and unequivocal language of the treaty; it is due to the rights and interests of the people of the United States; it is due to those of many hundreds of their citizens whose demands upon the justice of Spain were at least as strong and clear, and whose right to the support and protection of their country was at least more perfect and unequivocal than those of Mr. Meade. Special, unstipulated favor to him would be flagrant injustice to them.

When, therefore, in the conclusion of your letter, you beforehand solemnly and respectfully protest against any decision of the Commissioners appointed in virtue of the treaty which invalidates, in any manner, the acknowledgment made by your Government of the total debt of Mr. Meade, agreeably to the certificate which they sent to him in consequence, and which you state to be in possession of the Commissioners, I am directed to say in answer: First. That the Government of the United States have no more than the Government of Spain the right or authority to dictate or control the decisions of the Commissioners appointed by virtue of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, and that, as the United States will not assume themselves, so they will not suffer from Spain the exercise of any such dictation or control, alike repugnant to the principles of impartial justice and to that judicial independence which constitutes the excellence and the glory of the institutions both of this country and of Spain. And secondly. That there neither has been, nor is there reason to expect, any decision of the Commissioners to invalidate, in any manner, any acknowledgment by your Government of the total debt to Mr. Meade, the validity of any such acknowledgment being, like the obligation which it imports, for the exclusive cognizance of the Spanish Government itself, and importing neither obligation nor authority for which the United States are answerable, or the charge of which they have ever consented to assume.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

The Count Ofalia to Mr. Nelson.

Palace, March 8, 1824.

Sir: I have laid before the King, my august master, your note of the 25th of the last month, in which you propose, for the saving of time and expense, to deliver to the legation the original documents which are here, and which may be found necessary for the settlement of the claims of American citizens, in conformity with the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, in the place of copies of them.

His Majesty being informed, he commands me to say to you that the papers of this office (Secretaria) have been thrown into great confusion by their removal to Seville and Cadiz, whence they are expected in a few days. As soon as they shall arrive we will proceed to search for those which you demand, and all those originals whose delivery may not be inconvenient shall be at your disposal; those, also, which are found to be not of this character shall be furnished, that true copies of them may be had, conformably to the treaty. With this, I have the pleasure to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

THE CONDE DE OFALIA.

Extract of a letter from the Count de Ofalia, Secretary of State, to Mr. Nelson, dated Aranjuez, May 14, 1824.

"No. 5. To his excellency the Secretary of the Department of Finance, upon the case of Mr. Richard Meade."

Aranjuez, May 14, 1824.

By the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, Spain obliged itself to furnish the Government of the United States of America all the documents which might be necessary for the adjustment of the reclamations of its subjects, the payment of which it remained bound for by the same treaty.

In consequence thereof, the minister plenipotentiary has claimed various papers relative to the comprobation of said reclamations, and, among them, those relating to the contracts and other affairs of Mr. Richard Meade.

In your Department there exist writings on this important affair, which, it appears, were remitted to the Department under my charge on the 24th of May, 1821, and returned on 26th of the same month, in which there are probably many of the documents that the said minister calls for, agreeably to the tenor of the annexed exposition of the American Commissioners of the 18th of April, 1823, (and which I transmit without a translation on account of the urgency with which the documents are demanded, and from the scarcity of persons in this royal residence,) the despatch of the remainder corresponding to the authorities and offices depending upon your ministry.

The King, our lord, considering, on one side, the obligation contracted by the treaty, and the benefit which has accrued to the royal finance, of being released by it from the payment of near ten millions of reals, to which the claims of Meade amounted, commands me to recommend to your excellency, in the most efficacious manner, that you will facilitate to his excellency, the aforesaid minister of the United States, or to the person or persons that he may delegate for this purpose, the said documents, in the earliest time possible, &c. By royal order, &c. God preserve your excellency many years.

DEL CONDE DE OFALIA.

His Excellency the SECRETARY OF THE DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 14, 1824.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Nelson, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain, to the Secretary of State, dated July 31, 1824.

"The Spanish Government seems disposed to proceed with the calls made upon them for papers; and we may now be permitted to indulge the hope that most of the records which have been asked for will be supplied before a very distant day. From this calculation I fear we must exclude the papers in Meade's case, which, being so voluminous, although entered upon by the Spanish officers apparently in good faith to supply them, seem to forbid any well founded expectation that they can be speedily furnished."

Certificate from Dr. Watkins of admission and rejection of R. Meade's claim, June 7, 1824.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSION UNDER THE 11TH ARTICLE OF THE TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND SPAIN,
Washington, June 7, 1824.

I, Tobias Watkins, secretary of the commission under the 11th article of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, between his Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, being thereto requested by Richard W. Meade, Esq., do hereby certify and make known, to all whom it may concern, that, on the 6th day of January, 1822, the said Richard W. Meade presented, to be filed in the office of the said commission, in conformity with public notice, a memorial setting forth the grounds of his claim against the Spanish Government; that said memorial was, by the commission, read and considered on the 27th day of June, 1822; and on the same day, as appears by their journal of proceedings, the said memorial was "received;" which term, received, was used by the commission to signify that the memorial recited a claim which was considered to be included within the provisions of the treaty aforesaid; and I do further certify that, on the 29th day of May, 1824, as appears by the said journal of proceedings, the claim set forth in the said memorial, on the part of the said Richard W. Meade, was by the said commission rejected, on the alleged ground that the evidence produced was not sufficient to establish the same. In testimony of all which, and to the end that the same may be used as to the said Richard W. Meade may seem meet and proper, I have granted this present, at the place and date first above written; and have signed and sealed the same with my own proper hand and seal.

T. WATKINS,
Secretary to the Commission under the 11*th article of the treaty aforesaid.*

Deposition of Don José Canga Arguelles.

[Translation.]

In the city of London, on the ninth day of the month of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, before me, Daniel Simon Merceron, notary public of this city, and in the presence of the witnesses, after subscribing, appeared the most exellent Señor Don José Canga Arguelles, Knight of the Spanish Order of Charles Third, Honorary Counsellor of State, &c., &c., who said and declared, as by these presents he doth solemnly say and declare for truth, that, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven, whilst he, the deponent, was Secretary of State and of the Department of Finances of Spain and the Indies, under the Regency of Cadiz, Richard W. Meade, Esq., a citizen of the United States, through his intervention and at his request, made considerable advances of money and provisions for the maintenance and subsistence of the Spanish troops. That amongst various other contracts entered into with him by Meade, during the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven and the beginning of one thousand eight hundred and twelve, was one for twelve thousand barrels of flour, which were destined for the relief of the garrisons of Carthagena and Alicant, on the coast of the Mediterranean, and without which relief those garrisons would inevitably have surrendered to the French troops, by which they were besieged. That such contract, which amounted to two hundred and four thousand hard dollars, at the rate of seventeen hard dollars per barrel of flour, was to be paid for out of the first funds that should arrive from the American colonies; which funds were momentarily expected from Lima and Vera Cruz, but, unfortunately, the disturbances which had commenced in the American colonies were the occasion of specie not having been remitted in such large quantities as was expected, and the Regency was obliged to take possession of and appropriate the whole of the specie that arrived to other important services of the State which would not admit of delay; so that the Government, contrary to its inclination and merely from its then urgent necessity, omitted to pay Meade agreeably to the stipulations of the contract, and conformably to the right he had of demanding such payment under the most express privileges granted to him by the Cortes of the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, which likewise recognized his claim as a national debt, by ordering and directing that the same should be punctually paid out of a moiety of the specie that might arrive from the transmarine colonies in the Spanish Treasury, and out of the duties on the specie that might arrive on account of individuals, which was ratified by the Cortes held in the city of San Fernando in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, there being included in the said accounts a bill of exchange for three hundred thousand hard dollars, given to Meade on the Royal Treasury of Vera Cruz, but which was not honored for want of funds; the same being ordered to be paid in Spain, and the costs and damages to be settled and reimbursed to Meade, conformably to the laws and usages of Spain and the custom of merchants: all of which is well known to the deponent from the circumstance of his having been a deputy to the Cortes in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, and having been a member of the said Commission of Finances thereof, and having energetically supported the same at the public session wherein the business was discussed. That, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, on the arrival of King Ferdinand in Spain, the Cortes were dissolved by an armed force, and the deponent, one of the deputies thereof, was arrested and imprisoned with the greatest rigor until the month of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty; at which period the King swore to and re-established the constitution of the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve; and, in the same month, the deponent was called to Madrid, and appointed Minister of the Department of Finances of Spain and the Indies; which office was exercised by him until the month of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, as appears by public documents and by the Spanish and foreign gazettes of that period. That in the month of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, at the petition of Richard Meade, Esq., and after a previous investigation by a Board of Ministers, by his Majesty for that purpose specially appointed; as also, after a previous inquiry on the part of the principal Accountant's Office at the Exchequer, his Majesty sanctioned and approved of the formal liquidation of the sums that remained due to the said Meade under his contracts, advances, and services, aforesaid, and the necessary certificates were granted thereof, legalized by the deponent in his then quality of Secretary of State and of the Department of Finances, recognizing the same as a national debt without any the least reference to the treaty, which was not ratified by Spain until some mouths afterwards. That, at the period at which the document ascertaining the liquidated amount of Meade's debt against the Spanish nation was granted to him, no treaty existed between the Government of Spain and the United States of America touching the cession of the Floridas; the term therein prefixed for the ratification thereof having expired, and the same, for such reason, having been, by the minister of the United States, declared null, and as if it had never existed. That there, moreover, was another reason of infinitely more importance for the annulment of the said treaty, viz: that, by the constitution of the monarchy, it was incompetent to the King either to alien or cede by treaty or sale any part of the territory of the Spanish nation without the previous consent of the Cortes; and that, consequently, the debt of Meade was recognized and judicially substantiated by all the formalities prescribed by the laws as a national debt in the month of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, without any sort of reference to, or connexion with, the treaty. That, if the payment did not at that time take place, it was merely to be ascribed to the exhausted state of the Spanish Treasury at the moment of the re-establishment of the constitution, and to the enormous expenses incurred in the various expeditions sent out to the American colonies. That the Cortes having assembled in the month of July, of the said year, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, Meade, by his agent, presented a memorial praying the liquidation of his claim. In the month of October, the Cortes having proceeded to a discussion of the report of the special commission, appointed out of its members, touching the treaty of the Floridas, an account was, at the same time, given by the said commission of the claim of Meade; and it is indisputably true, that the whole of the members were unanimously convinced, by the declarations of his excellency the Secretary of State of Spain, and of his excellency the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that, in case of the ratification thereof on the part of the Cortes, the debt of Meade was included therein, and that payment thereof ought to be made by the Government of the United States. That the deponent having read over the annexed deposition of the late Señor Don José Moreno y Guerra, deceased, with whom he was particularly acquainted, he is persuaded that everything therein by him deposed is the truth, and conformable to what passed and took place at that period. And the deponent feels it incumbent upon him solemnly to declare that the Cortes authorized, and the Spanish Government ratified, the treaty under an idea that the debt of Meade was included therein, and that the payment thereof was to be provided for by the American Government, Spain remaining exonerated of and from all results.

In testimony whereof, the said appearer hath signed with me, the said notary, and witnesses, and I have caused my notarial seal to be hereto affixed, to serve and avail where need may require, the day and year aforesaid.

THOS. ASPINWALL.

The deposition of Joseph Moreno Guerra, taken at Philadelphia, before Francis Hopkinson, and by him reduced to writing, one of the Commissioners appointed to take affidavits by the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.

The said Joseph Moreno Guerra, on his solemn oath, doth depose and say: That he is a native of the town of Rumbla, province of Cordova, Andalusia, in Spain, and is aged about forty-six years and upwards; that he was duly elected from his native province a deputy to the National Cortes of Spain in the year 1820, for that and the following year 1821; and that the said Cortes assembled at Madrid on the 7th day of July, 1820; that, on or about the beginning of October, in the same year, the Cortes discussed the question relating to the treaty signed during the year before, at the city of Washington, between Spain and the United States of America, involving a cession of the two Floridas. At the same time a special committee, to whom the business of that treaty had been referred, made a report on a memorial previously presented by the agent of Richard W. Meade, of Philadelphia, in the United States, claiming an appropriation for the payment of a sum acknowledged to be due to him by his Majesty the King of Spain. This committee, in their report, informed the Cortes that, in order to decide definitively upon the claim of the memorialist, it was necessary to ascertain whether the amount of money due to Richard W. Meade, and to those who were represented by him, had been included among those claims which the Government of the United States undertook to pay, and from which it was wholly to exonerate Spain; for, if this should not prove to have been done, the debt owing to Richard W. Meade, in particular, ought immediately to be paid, as it was considered a national debt, arising either directly out of contracts or from the consequences of contracts made by him in aid of the liberty and independence of Spain at the most critical periods of the revolution; that, at the periods of those contracts, and in the full confidence that they would be fulfilled, the services of Meade had been of the most important kind; and that the sum for which payment was required had been liquidated and fixed by a special commission of counsellors appointed for that purpose by his Majesty the King, who had subsequently sanctioned and approved the settlement. In consequence of this report of the committee, it was proposed in the Cortes to address an official letter to the Secretary of State, to ascertain whether or not the sum then claimed in the memorial above mentioned had been included among those which the United States undertook to discharge. Such a letter was accordingly written, by the Secretary of the Cortes, in the usual manner, and a reply from the Secretary of State was received, stating, distinctly, that the debt due to Richard W. Meade was expressly included in the treaty; that the nature and amount of said debt were well known to the Government of the United States, as the same had been officially communicated to the American minister residing at Madrid; but that the same Government of the United States required the large cessions of lands made to the Duke of Alagon, Count Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas to be cancelled, considering the entire Floridas appropriated to the payment of the claims of its citizens upon the Spanish Government. In order to avoid any possible misunderstanding or mistake upon this subject, it was proposed in the Cortes that a committee of two of its members should be appointed to wait on the minister of the United States, Mr. Forsyth; and, accordingly, this deponent, with Mr. Thomas Isturio, member of the city of Cadiz, were appointed, did wait on Mr. Forsyth, and obtained from that gentleman the clear and distinct assurance that the debt due to Richard W. Meade would certainly be paid to him by the United States, if the treaty were ratified by the Spanish Government and the cessions above mentioned totally annulled.

And this deponent solemnly declares that these assurances, thus conveyed to the Cortes, and these assurances only, induced that body to annul the grants of land in the Floridas, two of which had been acknowledged valid in the treaty itself; that, had not the Cortes been perfectly satisfied, by these solemn assurances, that the national debt (as it was regarded) due to Richard W. Meade would be fully paid by the United States, it would not have consented to vacate them as respects the individuals to whom they had been made, reserving them to the Spanish nation by the law of reversion, for the express purpose of paying, by them, the debt due to the said Richard W. Meade, either by their transfer to said Meade or by sale, and with the product thereof would have paid the debt and interest.

In this debt to the said Meade, the deponent says that the Cortes took a particular interest, as it arose from contracts, the most of which had been sanctioned by the former Cortes which sat in Cadiz during the years 1811 and 1812. The Cortes deemed itself especially bound to see such engagements complied with; and the said Meade was considered as more than commonly meritorious, having been unjustly persecuted on account of the services he had rendered the Spanish nation. The deponent adds that the Cortes founded their right to vacate, as to the individual grantees, the cessions of land in Florida above referred to, and to reserve them for the nation, to be devoted to any purpose that might be deemed just and proper, upon the law called reversion and incorporation, well known in the history and legislation of Spain since the fourteenth century; a law which converts into national property whatever the prodigality of the monarchs might confer on their favorites, as happened with those termed Enrequenas, and with many others. This deponent has been absent from Spain during the last nine months, having left his country on the 2d day of July, 1823. He arrived at New York in October last; left the United States of America for Mexico on the 14th day of October, 1823; and he is now on his return to Spain, intending to embark from this country for Gibraltar in the course of a few days.

Deposition of Don Alvaro Florez Estrada.

[Translation.]

In the city of London, on the ninth day of the month of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, before me, Daniel Simon Merceron, notary public of this city, and in the presence of the undersigned witnesses, appeared Don Alvaro Florez Estrada, Commissary General of the Army and province of Seville, and lastly of Valencia, and late deputy to the Cortes for the province of the Asturias, in the years one thousand eight hundred and twenty and one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, who, as well from the circumstance of his having held such office as from the particular and intimate knowledge which he had, both prior and subsequent to his election as deputy, of the just claims of citizen Richard Meade, a native of Philadelphia, against the Spanish Government, as also from the interest he took in the payment thereof, seeing the honor of his nation was compromised therein, said and declared, as by these presents he doth solemnly say and declare for truth, that, during the struggles and difficulties experienced by the Spanish nation in maintaining and carrying on the war against the Emperor Bonaparte, from the year one thousand eight hundred and eight to that of one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, the said Meade, by means of certain formal contracts and loans, without interest, facilitated and advanced to the Spanish legitimate Government considerable sums in provisions and money; that the deponent further well knows, in his late quality of Commissary General of the Army, as is equally notorious to those who, at that period, were at the head of the affairs of the Spanish nation, that the latter would have found it almost wholly impracticable to maintain and carry on such a noble achievement had it not been for the services rendered it by Meade by means of the said contracts and loans; that it is likewise well known to him, the deponent, being equally public and notorious, that the Cortes of Cadiz, for the reasons above indicated, expressly and individually declared as a sacred and national debt that which arose from the said contracts, by most strictly charging the Government with the payment of the amount of what was due to Meade out of certain funds exclusively appropriated to that object; that he, the deponent, likewise well knows that the Government, not having been able to complete the payment to Meade, on the return of his Majesty Ferdinand VII from France, acknowledged, as a national debt, the balance which Meade had against it at that period; and his Majesty, in consequence thereof, ordered the formation of a special committee, composed of members of various councils, in order that, after an examination of the whole of the original documents produced by Meade in support of his claim, they might liquidate the total amount thereof, after a previous deduction of the sums antecedently received by Meade; that the said committee, after a careful and mature examination, made a report, which, by a royal order, being referred to the Principal Accountant's Office at the Exchequer, his Majesty, after due consideration of the whole of the proceedings, ordered the most formal and authentic document to be granted and despatched in favor of Meade, and legalized by his excellency Don José Cangar Arguelles, his Secretary of State and of the Department of Finances for Spain and the Indies, whereby it appears that the Spanish Government and the nation are debtors to Richard Meade, a citizen of the United States of America, in the sum of four hundred and ninety-one thousand one hundred and fifty-three hard dollars and twelve reals vellon, which sum was the final close of the account and last result of the balance formed on the amount of the aggregate sum of what, under and by virtue of the most just vouchers, was still due and owing to him at that time. And the deponent equally well knows, as well from his being in possession of the most irrefragible proof thereof as from the circumstance of his having been a deputy to the Cortes at Madrid in the years one thousand eight hundred and twenty and one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, and, as such, having attended the discussion and voted the approbation of the definitive treaty between his Catholic Majesty and the President of the Republic of the United States of America touching the cession of the Floridas; that, prior to the Cortes deciding on the confirmation of the said treaty, proceeding on the supposition that the cession of the Floridas was made with a view to the indemnification of certain American citizens for various sums which they asserted themselves to be creditors of the Spanish nation, they resolved to ascertain whether in the number of the latter was specifically included citizen Meade; when having ascertained, by the respectable answers of the Secretary of State of his Catholic Majesty, and of Mr. Forsyth, the minister of the United States of America, that citizen Meade was one of those specially included in the indemnification that was to be made for the Floridas, they gave their approbation to the said treaty, by virtue of which alone the same could be carried into effect. That he, the deponent, is in possession of the most indisputable proof that the Cortes of Madrid acceded to the cession of the Floridas on the basis that citizen Richard Meade should be satisfied by the Government of the United States of America for the whole of the sums that were then due and owing him on the part of the Spanish nation, as being the only recognized and liquidated debt amongst all such debts as might be included in the list of claims of the citizens of the United States which occasioned the cession of the two Floridas; and which claims, so far as regards the origin, circumstances, and amount thereof, were not so well known to the Spaniards as that of citizen Richard Meade.

In testimony whereof, the said appearer hath signed with me, the said notary and witnesses, and I have caused my notarial seal to be hereto affixed, to serve and avail where need may require, the day and year aforesaid.

Copy of a letter from the Commissioners under the Florida treaty to the Secretary of State.

SPANISH CLAIMS, OFFICE OF THE COMMISSION, Washington, April 18, 1823.

SIR: Richard W. Meade, who is a claimant before us, under the provisions of the treaty of February 22, 1819, and who represents himself to be a citizen of the United States, has, in due form, made application to us to require of the Spanish Government certain papers and documents which are considered as necessary to the establishment of his claim, and which are specified in the enclosed paper.

In consequence of this application we are compelled to trouble you with a request that you will be pleased to adopt such means as you may think proper to require of the Spanish authorities the documents referred to.

We have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

HU. L. WHITE.
LITT. W. TAZEWELL.
WILLIAM KING.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Nelson, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 13, 1823.

SIR: I enclose herewith copies of a letter received at this Department from the Commissioners under the 11th article of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, and of a schedule, therewith transmitted, of documents and elucidations relating to the claim of R. W. Meade, required by him, and which you will demand of the Spanish Government in execution of the same 11th article of the treaty.

From a communication received from Mr. Forsyth, in a case of another similar requisition, it appears that a backwardness in furnishing these papers has been shown by the Head of the Table, or officer in the Foreign Department whose duty it was to furnish them. As the stipulation in the treaty is clear and explicit, you will press it, if necessary, with earnestness upon the good faith of the Spanish Government.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Schedule of papers, documents, and vouchers relative to the sundry contracts made by R. W. Meade with the Spanish Government from July, 1809, to May, 1814.

FIRST ITEM.

A sum allowed for interest on the bill of $300,000 on Vera Cruz, which bill was drawn by Don Antonio Raux Romanillos, Minister of Finance, dated Cadiz, March 11, 1812, at 30 days' sight, to the order of R. W. Meade, on the Viceroy of Mexico.

Documents relative to this claim.

First. One of the original bills.

Secondly. The autos or proceedings instituted in this case by the Treasurer General, together with all the documents on the subject in the Treasury Department.

Thirdly. The autos instituted before the Intendant of Cadiz, and all the documents in that Department.

Fourthly. The autos and antecedentes in the Supreme Council of Hacienda, and all the official communications, both private and public, from the Viceroy of Mexico to the Minister of Finance, and all the other documents relative to this affair in the said Department of Finance.

Fifthly. A certificate from two respectable officers of the Government, stating what the laws of Spain are relative to bills of exchange, whether, when protested, they are not subject to damages, redrafts, and all the expenses incident to similar transactions in other countries; whether the drawer is not bound to pay the amount expressed in the bill without any regard to premium or discount allowed at the time of negotiation; whether the usual allowance of premium or discount on bills of exchange, drawn in Spain on the Americas, is not from 25 to 33⅓ per cent.; and yet, if the bill is protested, whether the drawer is not compelled to pay the full amount expressed in the bill, besides interest from the day of protest, with all the damages and expenses that may occur.

Sixthly. The expediente formed by the Captain General at Cadiz, as Intendant of that province, asking information from the Chamber of Commerce; from Don Benito de la Pudra, Chief of the Office of Consolidation, Don Ildefonso Ruis del Rio, and Don Mequil Lobo, as members of the Junta of Cadiz, respecting the customs and usages relative to similar bills; and the answers which were called for by the Intendant of Cadiz, to show the legal right of Mr. Meade to the full amount of the bill, with damages and interest, agreeable to the laws and usages in similar transactions.

SECOND ITEM.

For net amount of provisions delivered in virtue of a contract made with the Government, under the guarantee of Vincent Bertram de Lis, who obliged himself to pay the amount as surety of the Government, with interest, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, for which a judgment was obtained in the Royal Tribunal of Commerce against him, and suspended by the Captain General of Madrid, where he resided.

Documents relative to this claim.

° First. The original Treasury note.
Secondly. The autos or proceedings in the suit instituted in the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz.
Thirdly. The autos or proceedings in the suit instituted before the Captain General of Madrid.
Fourthly. And all the documents and official papers in the offices of the Intendant of Cadiz, Treasurer General, and of the Minister of Finance, from 1814 to the year 1819, on this subject.

THIRD ITEM.

Balance due for tobacco sold to the Superintendent of Seville in 1807 and 1808, being for a draft on Algesiras unpaid.

Documents relative to this claim.

First. The expedientes of this business, which exist in the Superintendent's Office at Seville, the Treasurer General's Office, and in the Department of the Minister of Finance.
° Secondly. The original acknowledgment of the sum due, and the certificate of the Comptroller of the Treasurer General, Don José Moreno y Martinez, dated September 11, 1811.

FOURTH ITEM.

For amount of a loan in specie of $4,000, made by R. W. Meade to the Government on the 2d March, 1811.

Documents relative to this claim.

° First. The original receipt for this sum.
Secondly. Besides the original receipt, a document is required stating the nature of the loan, and that the sum paid by Mr. Meade was in specie.
Thirdly. A certificate is also required to prove whether the whole of the loan by Government, of which this forms a part, has not since been paid in public stock, and the interest thereon allowed to those who loaned the money, through Spanish citizens or subjects.

FIFTH ITEM.

Amount of a balance due R. W. Meade for flour taken from his agent at Algesiras for the use of the citadel of Ceuta, rls. 21,067.

Document relative to this claim.

° The original papers from the municipality of Ceuta acknowledging this debt.

SIXTH ITEM.

Amount of sundry sums due by the Junta of Cadiz in 1810 for a cargo of barley destroyed by the French batteries after sale and delivery; for some deduction on rice sold, and for the expenses of the Health Office in the discharge of sundry vessels in quarantine, their cargoes being required for immediate use of the Army; which expenses, by agreement, the Junta were to pay.

Documents relative to this claim.

All the original papers relative to this claim in the Department of the Minister of Finance.

SEVENTH ITEM.

For amount of a loan or payment to the colonel of the provincial regiment of Cordova for the equipment of the regiment.

Documents relative to this claim.

° The original document of this payment is required.

The originals of the foregoing documents, marked °, were delivered by R. W. Meade to Don Bruno Vallarino, President of the Junta, appointed by his Majesty in May, 1819, on his demand; and agreeable to his official note to the Minister of Finance, were by him transmitted to that Department on the ——— day of ———, 1820, in order, as he states, to be transmitted to their respective Departments to be cancelled.

EIGHTH ITEM.

Documents relative to this claim.

First. Contract by the Director General of Rents with R. W. Meade, as agent for Captain Dickson, dated Madrid, August 10, 1815, to be found in the office of the Director General of Rents.
Secondly. A certificate of the delivery of the tobacco at Cadiz, consisting of 237 hogsheads.
Note.—In case the original documents cannot, for any motive, be furnished, authenticated copies are required.

NINTH ITEM.

Amount of flour due to James Wardrop and transferred to Mr. Meade as agent of sundry American merchants.

Documents relative to this claim.

First. A certificate from the officers of the Treasury Department of the sum actually due.

Secondly. A receipt for 660,000 reals, with the Treasurer of Cadiz's note at the bottom of the two payments, of 15,000 reals each, making 30,000 reals, and reducing the sum due to 630,000 reals vellon. This receipt was delivered to the president of the commission, Don Bruno Vallarino.

Thirdly. The autos or proceedings in the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz, of Don Diego Hagerty against Don Diego Wardrop; Mr. Hagerty being the first agent employed in this business; he transferred it to Mr. Meade. These proceedings prove the judgment obtained against Wardrop, with the interest awarded to be due, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, instead of only 6 per cent., allowed by the Commission of Liquidation at Madrid, and proves also the nature and origin of the debt.

Fourthly. Copies of the Royal Orders, also dated 24th November, 1814, 4th April and 13th June, 1815, from the Treasurer General of Rents at Cadiz, and a copy of the official letter of the Treasurer of Cadiz, Don Antonio Alonzo, to R. W. Meade, dated 22d October, 1817.

The five remaining items refer to the failure to comply with the contracts, on the part of the different Spanish Governments that ruled the country, in the absence of Ferdinand, from the year 1809 to 1814, inclusive; the great injuries and damages that resulted from a want of compliance with specific contracts and engagements, and the constant promises of full and ample compensation, whenever circumstances should permit it.

The following documents are therefore necessary.

Contract of 12th July, 1809, made by R. W. Meade, with the intervention of the sworn broker, Don Prote Alvarez Manilla, with the Treasurer General, Don Vicente Alcala Guliano, by order of the Minister of Finance, and approved by the Committee of Finance of the Supreme Junta Contract, and the deliveries made to Don José Maria Vicenty, Director of the Provisions of the Island of St. Leon, consisting of—

926 whole, and
158 half casks rice, at $7 50 per quintal;
10,014 barrels flour, at $11.

Added afterwards—

500 barrels flour,
268½ casks rice, at same prices.

The amount of the account, as per contract, $173,091 20.

Second contract.

On the 14th and 22d August, through the same broker, Don Prote Alvarez Manilla, with the Director General of Provisions—

881 barrels pork,
875 quintals beans,
1,121 quintals peas.

Amount of account, as per contract, $23,885 20.

Third contract.

Contract of 7th December, 1809, through the sworn broker, Don Prote Alvarez Manilla, with the Treasurer General, Don Vincente Alcala Guliano, and approved by the Junta Contract, and delivered to José Maria Vicenty, Director of Provisions at the Island of St. Leon—

2,200 barrels pork, at $23;
3,018½ casks rice, at $7 per quintal.

Total amount of account, as per contract, $418,495 30.

Fourth contract.

Sundry contracts with the Junta of Cadiz, made in the year 1810. Two of these contracts were for one hundred thousand barrels of flour—fifty thousand barrels each contract.

The amount of the contracts with the Junta of Cadiz exceed one million nine hundred thousand dollars, and consisted of the following articles:

285 pieces creas,
2,480 fanegas barley,
2,232 quintals codfish,

3,938 pipe staves for casks,
366 quintals peas,
855 quintals beans,
223 quintals cheese,
2,000 quintals soap,
14,930 quintals or cwt. rice,
109,000 barrels flour.

Contract of 9th March, 1811, made through the broker of the member, Don Luis de Rebaupierre, with Don José Perez Quintero, Treasurer General of the Kingdom, for the following articles:

12,000 barrels flour, at $15 75;
2,500 barrels beef, at $13;
2,181 barrels pork, at $23;
2,000 casks rice, at $6 50.

Amount of account presented, as per contract, $348,565 65.

Contracts of 16th July, 1811, with the Director General of Provisions, approved by the Regency on the 19th July, and made through the broker of the member, Don Luis Rebaupierre, consisting of the following articles:

25,000 barrels flour, at $15 50;
10,768 quintals rice, at $6;
1,816½ fanegas sarbones, or beans, at $6 75;
1,121 fanegas barley, at $2 90.

Amount of account presented, as per contract, $467,622 65.

Contract made under 18th December, 1811, with a commission of the Junta of Cadiz, duly authorized to that effect by the Regency, and approved of by the same on the 19th of the same month, for the following articles:

1,500 quintals rice, at $6 50;
500 barrels salt beef, at $16;
450 barrels pork, at $22.

Amounting, as per account presented, to $245,000.

Contract of 21st January, 1812, made by the Minister of Finance, José Canga Arguelles, by order of the Cortes, for the relief of Alicante and Carthagena—

12,000 barrels flour, at $17.

Amount of account, $204,000.

Contract of 27th February, 1812, by the Junta of Cadiz, commissioned for that purpose by the Regency, and approved of by the same—

14,000 barrels flour, at $16 75;
2,500 quintals rice, at $8;
800 barrels beef, at $18;
600 barrels pork, at $24.

Amount of account furnished, as per contract, $283,300.

Contract made with the Minister of Finance, by order of the Intendant of Cadiz, Don Bernardo Elizalde, and guarantied by Vincent Bertram de Lis. The goods were delivered in August, 1813, and the receipt for them signed by Don Manuel Franco, storekeeper, on the 8th September—

2,950½ barrels flour;
567 barrels pork;
504 barrels beef.

Amount of account furnished, as per contract, $71,453 50.

Contract of 5th April, 1814, made with Don Bernardo Elizalde, Intendant of the Province of Cadiz, through the sworn broker, Don Felipe de los Hurs—

3,000 barrels flour, at $14 75;
4,000 quintals rice, at $6 50;
600 barrels beef, at $20;
450 barrels pork, at $30.

Amount of account furnished, as per contract, $94,250.

General summary of contracts.

Contract of 12th July, 1809	$173,091 20
Contract of 14th and 12th August, 1809	23,885 20
Contract of 7th December, 1809	418,495 00
Contract with Junta Supreme of Cadiz, about	1,900,000 00
Contract of 9th March, 1811	348,565 65
Contract of 16th July, 1811	467,622 65
Contract of 18th December, 1811	245,000 00
Contract of 21st January, 1812	204,000 00
Contract of 27th February, 1812	283,300 00
Contract of August, 1813	71,453 50
Contract of 5th April, 1814	94,250 00
	4,229,663 50

Documents required.

First. The preceding original contracts.

Secondly. An acknowledgment, in due form, of every one of them being faithfully complied with by R. W. Meade.

Thirdly. The correspondence of the Minister of Finance, the Marquis of Hermosos, the Director of Provisions, Don José Maria Vicenty, of Cusoria of Osio, and the Junta Superior of Cadiz, relative to the contract of 7th December, 1809.

Fourthly. The correspondence on this subject between the Minister and the Junta. The reclamation of Mr. Meade, and the acts of the Junta, to show where and how this amount was liquidated. All these papers exist, or ought to be among the archives of the Junta, handed over to the General Government when it ceased its functions, and in the Finance Department.

All the documents relative to the contract of the 9th March, 16th July, and 18th December, 1811, 21st January and 27th February, 1812, are in the archives of the Treasury General, the Director General of Provisions, and the Department of Finance.

The major part of the payments being effected in the Departments of Cadiz, Madrid, Seville, and Alicante, the particulars will be required from each Provincial Treasury of the modes and dates of payments.

The official reclamations in the Finance Department, and in the offices of the different Treasurers, will show the payments, and when and how made.

As the Treasurers were changed every year, and each one reserving his own documents, to cancel his responsibility many of the documents will have been remitted to the Auditor General's office.

A separate expediente, or process verbal, of each contract ought to exist in the Finance Department and the Treasurer General's office, relative to the various orders issued at different periods for the payments, and are required.

The representations of R. W. Meade to the Extraordinary Cortes, in session at Cadiz in July and August, 1812. The Cortes thought the business of so much importance that it occupied their attention several days in their private sessions, and they appointed a committee to examine into the business. This committee was authorized to call for papers and to cite persons, which they did. The committee finally made a report, which is necessary, together with all the proceedings and documents presented to the Cortes. These proceedings and documents ought to be in the archives of the Cortes.

The following documents are also required:

First. The autos or proceedings commenced against Mr. Meade by Mr. Duff, the British consul, in the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz.

Secondly. The official letters of Mr. Duff to the Minister of Finance and the Treasurer General, on the subject of Mr. Meade, are also required.

Thirdly. All the papers and documents relative to a deposit made of large quantity of flour, made by Mr. Meade, in the hands of Mr. Duff.

Fourthly. Expediente and papers relative to a draft through the Minister of Finance, by the Treasurer General, by order of the Cortes, on the corporation of Cadiz, in September, 1812, for fifty thousand dollars, which draft remained unpaid.

Papers and documents relative to the amount awarded, to be due R. W. Meade, for his imprisonment:

First. Autos existing in the Consulado of Cadiz, and in the Supreme Tribunal of War, commenced by John McDermott against R. W. Meade, for the payment, a second time, of a sum of $52,000, deposited by order of the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz in the Royal Treasury of that province.

Secondly. Autos on the same subject in the office of the Captain General of Andalusia and Governor of Cadiz, relative to the imprisonment of Mr. Meade.

Thirdly. Copies of the royal orders issued through the Minister of State to the council of war on this subject.

Fourthly. Copies of the royal orders from the Minister of Finance to the council of war, particularly an official private order of Don Manuel Lopez Arango to the said council.

Continuation of documents required:

First. A certificate from the Minister of State or Finance, showing that from the year 1805 to the present period no currency existed in Spain except gold and silver, and, particularly, that no kind of paper money was in circulation, or, indeed, existed, except vales reales, which was a funded debt of the Government, bearing interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum, but which paper has nothing to do with the currency of the nation or the contracts of the Government, and was never bought, sold, or received in payment, except under special contract or agreement between individuals, the same as the funded debt of any other nation.

Secondly. A certificate from the Minister of Finance, stating the rate or rates of interest which was paid during the years 1811 and 1812, and subsequently by the Government, on moneys taken up on loan by it.

Thirdly. A certificate from the Minister of Finance, showing whether the different Governments of Spain complied with the engagements made with Mr. Meade. If they did not, what were the reasons of their not fulfilling their engagements.

Whether Mr. Meade was not entitled by law to ample compensation for the failure on the part of the Government to pay him at the different periods and in the divers modes of payment agreed on. Whether the failure proceeded from misconduct of the agents of the Government, or from circumstances not within the control of the Government.

Whether Mr. Meade was not entitled by law to interest for sums illegally detained from him by the Government and its agents.

Whether the Government has not constantly promised to make full compensation to him for the injuries he had received from want of punctuality on the part of the Government, long prior to the year 1819.

Whether the debt due to Mr. Meade was not considered as one of the most sacred nature due by the Spanish nation.

Whether the Spanish Government would not have paid to Mr. Meade the full sum awarded to be due to him, together with interest thereon till payment was effected, if the Government of the United States had not solemnly agreed to assume and pay the debt.

Whether the Royal Commission named by his Catholic Majesty, in May, 1819, to liquidate the claims of Mr. Meade, was not, in every point of view, competent to decide on the matters submitted to them; and when the award was sanctioned by his Majesty, whether it was not as binding on the nation as any judgment obtained in the supreme councils of the nation.

Whether the appointment of such a special commission or tribunal is not usual in Spain, and resorted to in cases of the highest importance, both civil and criminal. It being one of the highest prerogatives of the royal authority, the designation or appointment of a tribunal, where a demand against the nation shall be heard and decided, and whether such decisions, when approved of by the King, are not binding on the nation.

Whether the Cortes of the nation, in October, 1820, did not acknowledge the debt due to Mr. Meade, as finally settled by the commission, and send the same to the King through the Secretary of State, directing that the same should be paid to Mr. Meade; provided the same had not been assumed by the Government of the United States in the treaty about to be ratified for the cession of the Floridas.

Whether Don Luis de Onis, the minister who negotiated the treaty, did not officially inform the Government of Spain that the claim of Mr. Meade had been specifically and expressly included in the treaty. And whether Mr. Onis did not demand its insertion, by name, in the treaty, which was finally given up for State reasons alone; it not being thought proper to insert the individual name, though the fifth renunciation was inserted for the express object of including this claim.

Whether his Majesty did not in the month of August, 1818, declare, by a royal order, that compensation should be made to Mr. Meade for his unjust and illegal imprisonment from May, 1816, to May, 1818; and if so, a copy of the original document is required.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Nelson, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated December 26, 1823.

"In the evening of the same day (25th) I received a note from the Count of Ofalia, (Narcisso Heredia,) apprising me that, during the indisposition of the Marquis of Casa Irujo, the King had appointed him (the Count) to execute the duties of First Secretary of State. Before taking leave of the Secretary, on the 18th instant, I stated to him that I was instructed to ask from the Spanish Government certain records and documents which, by the treaty of February 22, 1819, were stipulated to be furnished on the demand of the American Government. That I would send a note specifying the papers requested, to which he promised readily to give the proper direction to insure the attention of the Spanish Government to the application. On the 19th I addressed to him a note, of which A, enclosed, is a copy, asking for the papers called for by the commission under the 11th article of the treaty: 1st. For those in the case of Messrs. Oliver, in Baltimore, which form the subject of the communication from the Department, No. 3. 2d. Those called for by the same board in the case of R. W. Meade, and which form the subject of the communication, No. 4, from the Department of State."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Nelson to the Marquis of Casa Irujo, (marked A,) dated MADRID, December 19, 1823.

"The undersigned, the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, salutes his excellency the Marquis of Casa Irujo, his Catholic Majesty's First Secretary of State and of the Despatch, and begs to express his gratification at the readiness expressed by his excellency at their interview of the 18th instant to give his attention to the affairs of interest between the United States and Spain, which, on the part of the former, have been confided to the care of the undersigned. At the instance of the Commissioners appointed by the Government of the United States, in conformity with the treaty of 22d of February, 1819, the Secretary of State of the United States has directed the undersigned to ask of his Catholic Majesty's Government that they would furnish, as soon as possible, the documents and elucidations which are specified in the enclosed applications, and which are included in the stipulations of the aforesaid treaty. It is only necessary to add, to induce his excellency to give prompt and immediate attention to applications for records and documents under the treaty, that Commissioners appointed under it to administer justice to those whose rights and interests are secured by that instrument are delayed in their proceedings through want of these documents. Some of these boards are limited in their duration by the act of Congress creating them, and the whole exists as a heavy expense to the Government of the United States. The undersigned asks leave to add that he shall feel additional gratification if he shall be enabled, very speedily, to transmit to his Government these records on which the interests of very many individuals entirely depend."

MADRID, February 11, 1824.

"The undersigned has the honor to transmit to his excellency the Count of Ofalia the memorandum of cases in which applications have been made, under the Florida treaty, for papers and documents, in compliance with the suggestion made by his excellency in the conversation which the undersigned held with him on the 31st January ultimo, and which have not been complied with, and begs to renew the request for the most prompt furnishing of these documents, to enable the tribunals instituted under that treaty to proceed, as expeditiously as possible, in dispensing justice to those whose rights and interests are intended to be secured by the provisions of that instrument. The undersigned asks of his excellency that the legation of the United States may be furnished, from time to time, with such copies of the papers required as may be prepared at the offices; and that the delay may be avoided which would result from not supplying any until the whole can be furnished. The undersigned begs leave, also, again to suggest that the tribunals constituted in America under the treaty are limited in their duration, and that great inconvenience and injury may arise from the delay which is experienced in these applications. The undersigned hopes that the spirit of justice which was manifested in the conclusion of the Florida treaty may be still found to preside over the councils of his Catholic Majesty in their deliberations; and that the most prompt compliance with these stipulations, which are designed to secure the rights and interests of individuals, too long aggrieved by delays in the prosecution of their claims for just redress, will be accorded in the minor part which Spain has covenanted to perform in regard to these rights and interests."

"Third. In the case of Richard Meade, the documents which are required are specifically described in the papers accompanying the application of the 19th of December, 1823."

[Translation.]

Extract of a letter from the Count of Ofalia, Minister of Despatch and of Foreign Affairs of Spain, to Mr. Nelson, dated

ARANJUEZ, May 14, 1824.

"Your penetration saves me the trouble of pointing out the absolute impossibility of collecting, in a very short time, the documents which are required, either on account of their extent in some of said cases or their great number in others, especially in that of Mr. Richard Meade, as you will have observed by looking at the list which accompanies the letter of the American Commissioners of the 18th April, 1823."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Nelson to the Secretary of State, (No. 37,) dated MADRID, July 31, 1824.

"The Spanish Government seems disposed to proceed with the calls made upon them for papers, and we may now be permitted to indulge the hope that most of the records which have been asked for will be supplied before a very distant day. From this calculation, I fear, we must exclude the papers in Meade's case, which, being so voluminous, although entered upon by the Spanish officers apparently in good faith to supply them, seem to forbid any well founded expectation that they can be very speedily furnished."

MITCHELL'S MAP AND MAP A OF THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, JANUARY 9, 1828.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant,* I transmit herewith Mitchell's map and the map marked A, as requested by the resolution; desiring that, when the Senate shall have no further use for them, they may be returned.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, January 9, 1828.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 467. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIMS FOR SLAVES AND OTHER PROPERTY CARRIED AWAY BY THE FORCES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 11, 1828.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the petition of H. P. Cathell, made the following report:

That the memorialist was employed to prosecute the claims of William Harris, Doughty Bounds, James Sampson, John H. Anderson, George Handy, and Henry Foxwell, for slaves and other property alleged to have been carried away or destroyed by the British, in violation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent. That, acting as the agent for these claimants, he wrote four letters, directed to John Hay, Esq., Washington, D. C., which were postmarked Princess Anne, Maryland, two of them dated the 6th May, 1823, the third dated on the 16th June, 1823, and the fourth on the 26th August, 1823, enclosing sundry depositions in support of the said claims, with a request that they might be examined by him, and filed in the office of the Secretary of State. In each of these letters he requested that the name of W. G. D. Worthington, Esq., might be marked with his own, upon the list of claims, as counsel for the claimants. The memorialist was mistaken in the christian name of George Hay, Esq., who had been appointed the agent, and, in consequence thereof, directed his letters to John, instead of George Hay. The difficulty in the present case, no doubt, originated in this mistake.

The memorialist represents that, about the time these letters were written, he removed from the State of Maryland, having left the claims referred to in the particular care of Mr. Worthington; but neither he nor the memorialist appears to have paid any attention to them, nor even to have inquired whether they had been placed on the definitive list from the time they were transmitted to John Hay, Esq., in 1823, until the month of November, 1827. The first intimation which the memorialist received that these claims were not upon this list was contained in a letter from Mr. Worthington to him, dated 20th November, 1827. Immediately upon the receipt of this letter the memorialist came to this city, and here found the four letters which he had directed to John Hay, Esq., in 1823, in the office of dead letters.

Under these circumstances, the memorialist asks Congress to pass a special act placing the said claims on the regular list before the board appointed to decide such claims.

By the third article of the convention concluded at St. Petersburg on the 12th July, 1822, under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia, and for the purpose of carrying into effect his decision upon the construction of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, it was stipulated that, "when the average value of slaves shall have been ascertained and fixed, the two Commissioners shall constitute a board for the examination of claims which are to be submitted to them, and they shall notify to the Secretary of State of the United States that they are ready to receive a definitive list of the slaves and other private property for which the citizens of the United States claim indemnification; it being understood, and hereby agreed, that the commission shall not take cognizance of, nor receive, and that his Britannic Majesty shall not be required to make compensation for, any claims for private property under the first article of the treaty of Ghent not contained in the said list."

* IN SENATE, January 7, 1828.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, under such injunctions as he may judge proper, Mitchell's map, and also the agreed map, designated as map A, in the 4th article of the convention relating to the northeastern boundary of the United States.

Difficulties having arisen in the execution of this treaty, a convention was concluded at London on the 13th of November, 1826, by the first article of which "his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland agrees to pay, and the United States of America agree to receive, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation by virtue of the said decision and convention, the sum of twelve hundred and four thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars, current money of the United States, in lieu of, and in full and complete satisfaction for, all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain, by any person or persons whatsoever, under the said decision and convention." From this statement of facts, the committee are of opinion they have no right to create new claimants upon this fund who were not embraced in the definitive list furnished by the Department of State to the Commissioners under the treaty of St. Petersburg. This fund clearly belongs, in the language of the last treaty, to the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation, by virtue of the decision of the Emperor of Russia and the convention concluded for the purpose of carrying it into execution. Who are those persons? The treaty of St. Petersburg answers this question. It declares, "that the commission shall not take cognizance of, nor receive, and that his Britannic Majesty shall not be required to make compensation for, any claims for private property under the first article of the treaty of Ghent not contained in the definitive list." All other claims are excluded. If, therefore, Congress were to direct the payment of any claim not embraced in that list, its amount must be taken from claimants who have a vested right to the entire fund. Should this fund, contrary to expectation, prove to be more than sufficient to satisfy all the just claims contained in the difinitive list, the surplus will then be subject to any disposition which Congress may think proper to make of it among other claimants.

It is true that Congress, at its last session, provided "that all claims which were deposited in the Department of State, and, by mistake, omitted to be placed on the definitive list," should be added thereto. Although this provision was only intended to cure a mere clerical mistake of the Department, and was in favor of claimants who, on their part, had complied with every requisition of the treaty; yet, in the opinion of the committee, it went quite as far as could be justified upon any correct principle of legislation. That case, however, can certainly not be drawn into a precedent for the purpose of sanctioning such claims as those which have been referred to the committee—claims which never reached the Department of State until several years after the definitive list had been closed and transmitted to the Board of Commissioners.

The committee also deem it proper to state that, in this case, either the memorialist or the other agent of the claimants, or perhaps both of them, have been guilty of gross negligence, having never taken any means to ascertain whether the claims which they represented had been placed upon the definitive list from the time they were first transmitted to Washington, in 1823, until late in the month of November last. If such claims could, at this late period, be added to that list, the wise provision of the seventh section of the act of the 2d March last would be defeated, and the commission could not be closed with the present session of Congress. The committee, therefore, offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioner.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 468. [1ST SESSION.

RECOVERY OF DEBTS FROM FUGITIVES TO MEXICO, AND BOUNDARY BETWEEN TEXAS AND LOUISIANA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 15, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 2d instant, requesting information respecting the recovery of debts and property in the Mexican States from persons absconding from the United States, and also respecting the boundary between the State of Louisiana and the province of Texas, I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State on the subject-matter of the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, January 15, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, D. C., January 14, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred, by the President, the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 2d instant, requesting him "to inform the House, if it be not incompatible with the public interest, whether any representation or arrangement to or with the Mexican Government has been made so as to enable citizens of the United States to recover debts and property belonging to them from persons absconding from the United States and taking refuge within the limits of that Government, and whether any steps have been taken to establish the boundary of the United States between the State of Louisiana and the province of Texas," has the honor to report:

That no such representation or arrangement as the above resolution describes has been made; that information reached the Department of State that some impediment existed in some parts of the Mexican States to the recovery of debts from the inhabitants due to foreigners, but the information was not very authentic; and, upon inquiry of the minister of those States residing near this Government, he stated that he was not aware of the existence of any such impediment, but that, on the contrary, he believed the tribunals of his country were open alike to foreigners and inhabitants for the recovery of their debts and the prosecution of all their rights; that, since the adoption of the above resolution, an instruction has been addressed to the minister of the United States at Mexico to inquire into the true state of the fact and, if necessary, to make such representations or remonstrances as its actual condition may call for.

That the minister of the United States at Mexico, when he was sent on his mission, was charged with a negotiation relating to the territorial boundary between that Republic and the United States in its whole extent, and, consequently, including that portion which divides Louisiana from the province of Texas, but no definitive arrangement on that subject has been yet concluded; and it is respectfully submitted to the President that, in the present stage of the negotiation, it would be premature to publish the correspondence that has passed between the two Governments.

All which is respectfully reported.

WASHINGTON, May 30, 1827.

The undersigned, officer of the Imperial Order of the Crosiers, and charged with the affairs of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil near the Government of the United States, has the honor to inform his excellency Mr. Henry Clay, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that questions having arisen with regard to the legality or illegality of the act of detention of various American vessels that attempted (eluding, as is supposed, the blockade which the naval forces of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil are enforcing against Buenos Ayres, according to the laws of nations) to enter that port, and, at the same time, with respect to the detention of the brig Spark, of New York, which cleared from Rio de Janeiro for Montevideo, the Government of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil has commanded me to communicate to the Government of the United States that his Majesty the Emperor, desiring to preserve, and even to extend further, if possible, the friendly relations subsisting between the two nations, hopes that the Government of the United States, disapproving the character of the proceedings of Mr. Condy Raguet, the Chargé d'Affaires of the said States at Rio de Janeiro, in suddenly demanding his passports, may appoint a new representative to reside near his Majesty the Emperor, who, being received with the consideration due to his character, will find, in the Government of his Majesty the Emperor, the most pacific dispositions, and will adjust, in a manner satisfactory to the Government of the United States, the questions pending with regard to the detained vessels and to the brig Spark according to the law of nations. The undersigned hopes for an answer, in writing, that the Government of the United States disapproves the conduct of Mr. Raguet, and that the said Government is ready to meet the pacific views of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil.

The undersigned reiterates to his excellency the protestations of respect and consideration due to his excellency.

J. SILVESTRE REBELLO.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Rebello.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington May 31, 1827.

SIR: I have received the note which you did me the honor on yesterday to address to me, and submitted it to the President.

He is aware that, during the progress of a maritime war, the commerce of neutral nations is liable to occasional interruption and vexation. That of the United States has been frequently subject to embarrassments and aggressions, under color of Brazilian authority, prior to and during the war unhappily existing between his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil and the Republic of Buenos Ayres. When these injuries are inflicted, it is the just expectation of the neutral that prompt and full redress will be made by the belligerent upon friendly representation. The President regrets that this expectation has not been fulfilled in frequent instances of well-founded complaint on the part of citizens of the United States, urged by Mr. Raguet during his mission to the Court of the Brazils; and, particularly, that satisfaction was not promptly made for the illegal seizure and detention of the Spark under circumstances of no ordinary aggravation. Mr. Raguet's demand of his passports, in consequence of withholding that satisfaction, was without orders, and his personal act—for which he is accountable to his own Government, and that only. The President regrets an occurrence which, in Mr. Raguet's view of it, has led to an interruption at Rio Janeiro of the diplomatic relations of the two countries. But no such interruption exists at Washington, and it would have been agreeable to the President if you had been authorized and empowered to make here that indemnity due to American citizens which has been unavailingly demanded at Rio Janeiro.

The President, however, participating in the desire which the Government of the Brazils professes to preserve, and to extend, still further, if possible, the friendly relations between the two countries, charges me to say that he is disposed to render a new and signal proof of that desire, by nominating a successor to Mr. Raguet, without unnecessary delay, upon the assurance which you have given that he shall be received with the consideration due to his official character; and provided you are also authorized to give the assurance that, in all cases in which injuries have been inflicted on the property or persons of American citizens, contrary to the public law, a prompt arrangement will be made by the Government of Brazil satisfactory to that of the United States.

I pray you to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

WASHINGTON, June 1, 1827.

The undersigned, officer of the Imperial Order of the Croisers, and Chargé d'Affaires of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil near the Government of the United States, has the honor to state to his excellency H. Clay, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that he has received his excellency's note transmitted yesterday.

The undersigned, confiding in the certainty that a successor to Mr. Raguet will be appointed, (the absence of a representative of the Government of the United States from the Court of Rio de Janeiro being an inconvenience both to that of his Majesty the Emperor and to that of the United States,) hopes that the appointment will be made without unnecessary delay, since, without the presence of an American diplomatic agent, the Government of his Majesty the Emperor can settle no arrangements with that of the United States.

The undersigned, believing that the Government of his Majesty the Emperor scrupulously maintains the observance of public law in all its acts in relation to the Governments and individuals of other nations, feels himself authorized to assure that of the United States that, whenever that Government will make it appear that any injury has been done to the citizens of the United States or to their property under the authority of the flag of his Majesty the Emperor, full and complete indemnity will be promptly afforded, keeping always in view a strict observance of the said public law.

The undersigned, flattered by the desire expressed by his excellency the President that these arrangements should be made in this metropolis with the concurrence of the undersigned, (which may be difficult, since it is at the Court of Rio de Janeiro that are to be found the documents which will prove the justice or injustice of the proceedings,) hopes that your excellency will tender to his excellency the President, in the name of the undersigned, his respectful acknowledgments for this mark of confidence on the part of the Government of the United States—a confidence which he will endeavor to retain by promoting, as far as lies in his power, the interests of both nations and the friendly relations happily subsisting between the Government of his Majesty the Emperor and that of the United States.

The undersigned renews to his excellency the assurances of the high consideration and esteem which he entertains for his excellency.

J. SILVESTRE REBELLO.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Rebello.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 2, 1827.

SIR: Having received and submitted to the President of the United States the official note which you did me the honor to address to me yesterday, I am directed by him to communicate to you, for the information of your Government, that, relying upon the authorized assurance which your note contains, that, on the arrival at Rio Janeiro of a successor to Mr. Raguet, a full and adequate indemnity will be promptly made for any injuries which have been committed on the public law, under color of authority derived from his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, such a successor will be accordingly sent; and there will be no other delay than such as may be necessary to the designation of a suitable person, and to those preparations which are incident to his proceeding on the mission.

Confidently anticipating a satisfactory arrangement of all just claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of the Emperor of Brazil, according to the assurance which has been given, the President hopes that all past unfriendly impressions will be thus entirely effaced, and that fresh vigor will be given to the amicable intercourse which both countries have so much reason to cultivate with each other.

I avail myself, with pleasure, of the occasion to renew to you assurances of my distinguished consideration.

TRADE WITH THE FRENCH COLONIES OF MARTINIQUE AND GUADALOUPE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE FEBRUARY 5, 1828.

To the Senate of the United States:

A resolution of the Senate, of the 9th instant, requested information relative to the trade between the United States and the colonies of France. A report from the Secretary of State, with a translation of the ordinance of the King of France, of the 5th of February, 1826, is herewith transmitted, containing the information desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 15, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred, by the President, the resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, requesting "any information that he may possess relative to the trade between the United States and the colonies of France, showing whether the produce and manufactures of the United States, or any portion thereof, are admitted into any of those colonies in American vessels; and if so, on what terms; that is, whether any higher duties are imposed on such articles if imported in American vessels than would be payable if imported in French vessels," has the honor to report a translation of an ordinance adopted by the present King of France, of the 6th of February, 1826, to take effect the first of July following, regulating the trade and navigation of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, the principal colonial possessions of France in this hemisphere: that, by the tables annexed to the ordinance, it will be seen that a number of articles, the produce of the United States, are admitted into those colonies, and the terms of their admission: that, by the third and seventh articles of the ordinance, the importation of the produce thus receivable is allowed in foreign as well as national vessels; and it is expressly declared by the seventh article that foreign vessels "shall not be subject to higher tonnage duties, port charges, payment of light money, or other charges of the same nature, than those to which national vessels shall be subject."

All which is respectfully submitted.

MINISTRY OF THE MARINE AND THE COLONIES.

Ordinance of the King, authorizing the importation, by national and foreign vessels, into the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, of the several articles designated by the annexed tariff.

PARIS, February 5, 1826.

Charles, by the grace of God, King of France and Navarre, having taken into consideration the act of the Council of 30th August, 1784, concerning the commerce of the colonies with foreign nations, as also the tariffs, at present existing, of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, by virtue of the acts of our Governors; and wishing to render more uniform the commercial regulations of the said islands, and, at the same time, to extend and facilitate their foreign commercial relations in everything that is not contrary to the interests of the mother country; upon the report of the President of our Council of Ministers, and by the advice of our Superior Council of Commerce and the Colonies, we have ordered and do hereby order, as follows:

ARTICLE 1. From and after the first of July of the present year, vessels, national or foreign, will be permitted to import into the two islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, but only at the ports hereinafter designated, the several articles of foreign produce and merchandise enumerated in the tables Nos. 1 and 2, annexed to the present ordinance.

ARTICLE 2. The only ports at which the said articles of produce and merchandise can be imported are: for Martinique—St. Pierre, Fort Royal, and Trinity. For Guadaloupe—Basseterre and Point á Pitre.

ARTICLE 3. Those said articles of produce and merchandise which are enumerated in table No. 1 shall pay, on their importation from foreign countries, the duties set forth in the said table, without distinction of flag, whether foreign or national. Articles of the same kind imported from France in French ships shall pay a duty of five centimes per hundred kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 4. The duties declared in the subjoined tariff shall neither be augmented nor diminished by any act of our Governors, nor of any other authority in the colonies; and, to this effect, we hereby issue the most positive orders.

These duties will commence on the 1st July of the present year; and from that day all other duties in the two colonies, on the articles named in the said tariff, shall cease.

ARTICLE 5. There is nothing in this order to affect the laws which fix a duty of one per cent. in the two colonies on merchandise imported from the mother country, so far as they are not named in the tables Nos. 1 and 2; the said duty of one per cent. is, on the contrary, confirmed by these presents; and we issue to the authorities of the colonies the same prohibition to make any change therein, without our express authority, transmitted through our Minister the Secretary of State for the Department of the Marine and the Colonies.

ARTICLE 6. The articles of produce and merchandise enumerated in the table No. 2 shall only be liable to a duty of five centimes per hundred kilogrammes, without regard to the flag under which they may be imported. The authorities of the colonies are prohibited from making any change herein.

ARTICLE 7. Foreign vessels importing the articles of produce and merchandise authorized by this ordinance shall not be subject to higher tonnage duties, port charges, payments of light-money, or other charges of the same nature, than those to which French vessels shall be subject.

ARTICLE 8. No article of merchandise other than those named in the tables Nos. 1 and 2 shall be imported, either in foreign vessels or French vessels coming from any foreign country, under pain of confiscation of vessel and cargo.

ARTICLE 9. No foreign vessel, nor any French vessel coming from foreign countries, though laden with articles the importation of which is permitted, can, except in cases of distress, which must be legally proved, enter any other than the ports opened by this ordinance, under pain of confiscation.

ARTICLE 10. The articles enumerated in the tables Nos. 1 and 2 can, as well as all merchandise coming from France, be re-exported from one colony to the other, but in French vessels only. They shall there be received free of all duties: Provided always, That the importer of the articles liable to duty, which are enumerated in the statement No. 1, shall make it manifest that the duties have been paid upon the said merchandise in the colony into which it was first imported.

ARTICLE 11. Foreign as well as French vessels may export to foreign countries free of all duties, but only through the ports opened by Article 2, the articles of produce and merchandise imported into the two colonies, whether from France or other countries.

ARTICLE 12. There is nothing in this to affect the products of the two colonies, of which the exportation is not permitted but to France, and by French vessels. But those said products of which the exportation to foreign nations is or shall be ultimately permitted shall not be subject, when exported in foreign vessels, to higher duties than when exported in French vessels.

ARTICLE 13. The duties mentioned in Article 5, which shall be collected in our colonies on French merchandise, shall continue to be refunded when the same merchandise shall be re-exported from the colonies under any flag whatever.

ARTICLE 14. Whenever imperious and extraordinary circumstances shall make it appear to our Governors, of either colony, that an immediate supply of foreign flour is indispensable, it shall be effected with the forms hereby indicated, which are to be strictly enforced:

1st. The Governor shall convoke a Privy Council, to which, besides the persons who commonly compose it, shall be called three captains of merchant vessels belonging to ports of France. These three captains shall be selected by the captains of the French ships anchored in the ports of the colony open to foreign commerce.

2d. To this Council shall be given in writing: 1st, the rates or price of flour in the principal towns of the colony; 2d, a statement of the quantity in the colony; and 3d, an estimate of the quantity expected from France.

3d. There shall be drawn up minutes of the sittings, in which shall be entered the three documents described in the preceding article. Moreover, the minutes shall exhibit an exact account of the opinions of each of the members called to the council.

4th. These facts being ascertained, and all remarks heard, the Governor, if he thinks it necessary, shall authorize the importation of a certain quantity of foreign flour, which shall not, in any event, exceed four thousand barrels. The power to effect and complete this importation shall in no case extend for a longer period than three months.

5th. Foreign flour, of which the importation may be so permitted, shall pay a duty of 21 francs 50 centimes per barrel of 90 kilogrammes. It is positively prohibited to the Governors to grant, in any case, or under any pretext whatever, an abatement or remission of said duty.

6th. It is equally prohibited to the Governors to give permits or licenses to individuals. Their ordinance shall specify the quantity of foreign flour permitted to be imported, and the period at which the said power of importation shall entirely cease.

That ordinance shall be published and posted up (affichée) in the usual manner, and, as soon as it arrives in France, shall be made public through the Moniteur, as well as the extract from the minutes, showing the rates and quantity of flour in the colonies at the time when the ordinance issued.

ARTICLE 15. The act of August 30, 1784, and all other regulations in operation, shall continue in force as to so much thereof as is not repealed by the present ordinance, or by anterior acts.

ARTICLE 16. The President of our Council of Ministers, and our Minister the Secretary of State for the Marine and the Colonies, are severally charged with the execution of the present ordinance, which shall be inserted in the Bulletin of the Laws.

Given at Paris, at our Palace of the Tuilleries, the 5th February, A. D. 1826, and of our reign the second.

CHARLES.

By the King:

JH. DE VILLELE, President of the Council of Ministers.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 4, 1828.

SIR: I have received your note of the 26th ultimo, transmitting a copy of a resolution of the Senate instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire whether any, and if any, what, legislative measures ought to be adopted in consequence of the French ordinance of the 5th February, 1826, regulating trade with the islands of Guadaloupe and Martinique. You request, by the direction of the committee, that I would communicate such facts and suggestions on the subject-matter of the resolution as may tend to aid the committee in their inquiries. And you state, as facts respecting which they desire information, the time and manner of communicating the ordinance to this Government; the steps which the Executive adopted in consequence of it; the duties imposed on French vessels since arriving here from Guadaloupe and Martinique, if any; and the regulations now existing at those islands concerning our trade, if differing from this ordinance.

The ordinance above mentioned was communicated to this Department on the 21st June, 1826. It was not communicated by an official note, but was personally delivered by the French minister at the Department as a document which he supposed it might be acceptable to the American Government to possess. He made no proposal or demand at the time to reciprocate to French vessels the privileges which it extends to American, among other foreign vessels, in the trade with those islands, according to the provisions of the act of January, 1824. It was received as a paper communicated in conformity with the usage of diplomatic intercourse. About the time of its reception its publication in some of the American newspapers was noticed; and it was not doubted that persons concerned in the trade were fully acquainted with the provisions of the ordinance.

The ordinance was regarded as a measure adopted by the French Government with a view to its own interests exclusively, and without any purpose of particular accommodation towards foreign Powers. It was revocable at the pleasure of the French Government, and might have, in fact, been revoked the next day after the commencement of its operation. The privileges which are granted to foreign navigation are limited by it to the islands of Guadaloupe and Martinique, and not extended to the other colonial possessions of France. Whether there may not be some local or port regulations within those islands operating unequally between French and American navigation is not known.

The stipulations of the convention with France of the 24th day of June, 1822, do not embrace the French colonies, but are restricted to France proper. The equality for which it ultimately provided between the vessels of the two countries had not taken place when the above ordinance went into effect, and was not attained until October of the last year. The French Government has complained, both at Paris and at Washington, of the disadvantages which it alleges are experienced by French navigation under the operation of the convention, and has intimated a wish to open a negotiation to improve the commercial intercourse between the two countries. We have signified our readiness to receive and consider, in a friendly spirit, any proposals which France may choose to make for the mutual advantage of the parties, and we have accordingly expected that some proposals would be brought forward. On that occasion, should any be offered, a suitable opportunity may present itself of making an arrangement of the colonial intercourse satisfactory to both countries.

A question has arisen in France whether an American vessel laden with the produce of the United States does not forfeit the privileges of the convention, and subject itself to the French discriminating duties by merely touching at the port of a third Power, although only for information and without breaking bulk. A decision having been actually given to that effect, Mr. Brown has been instructed to remonstrate against it as being contrary to the convention; but he had not been able to get it reversed at the date of his last despatch. In the meantime a question had been raised in the ports of the United States whether a French vessel, sailing from France, laden with French produce, and touching at any of the French islands, did not lose the benefit of the convention. The two questions are substantially the same. But the President decided that the French vessel did not, in the case stated, forfeit the privileges of the convention. A copy of the correspondence which passed between the French minister and this Department on that subject is herewith transmitted. The President's decision was communicated to Mr. Brown, and he was instructed to urge the liberality which marked it as a new motive for producing a change of the decision in France in the analogous case.

French vessels, coming directly from the French islands, laden with their produce, are liable to pay the alien duties. If it be thought by the committee to be expedient to open the ports of the United States to French vessels in the direct trade between the islands of Guadaloupe and Martinique and this country on the same terms with American vessels, it may be necessary to propose a bill to that effect. The act of Congress of January, 1824, is not believed to authorize the President to issue the proclamation which it describes, under all the circumstances of the case.

It was reported some short time ago that a change had been made in the ordinance disadvantageous to the commerce and navigation of the United States; but no official information of any such change has reached this Department, and the Chargé d'Affaires of France states that he is not advised of any having been made.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

LEVI WOODBURY, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Baron de Mareuil to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, March 13, 1827.

SIR: Three French vessels, viz: the Ville du Hâvre, the Sully, and the Eugenie, arrived at Savannah, in December last, from the port of St. Pierre, Martinique, with remnants of cargoes taken in France, have been subjected to the payment of the discriminating duty.

It being the first time, since the concluding of the convention of 1822, that such a duty has been collected on French vessels in the ports of the United States, the Consul General had directed the vice consul residing at Savannah to claim directly from the Collector at that port the repayment of a duty which did not appear to be authorized either by former usages, the spirit of the convention of 1822, or by the principle of reciprocity so often appealed to by the Government of the United States.

The refusal of the Collector of Customs to accede to the request of the vice consul places me under the necessity of laying this claim before you.

The convention of 1822 contains no specific allusion to colonies; but if French vessels, coming from France, and laden with French products, are, by virtue of this convention, exempt from all duties but those authorized by the convention itself, can there be any reason to deprive them of this privilege because they may, on their way, have touched at one of the colonial dependencies of France?

If, in order to prevent fraud, it has been deemed proper to confine to the direct intercourse between the two countries the benefit of the privilege granted under the convention, the exclusion, with the same view, of vessels touching at a foreign port does not necessarily involve vessels which may have visited a colony of the country to which they belong, and which have not touched at any foreign country or possession.

Furthermore, the royal ordinance of the 5th of February, 1826, which I had the honor of communicating to you, having enacted that vessels of the United States should be admitted into the ports of Martinique and Guadaloupe on equal terms with French vessels coming from the United States, I must find, in this disposition, a motive on which to ground my claim to a reciprocity in favor of French vessels coming from said colonies.

Upon the various considerations I have enumerated above, I deem it just to claim the repayment of the discriminating duties collected at Savannah on the three vessels above mentioned, and to request, through your interference, that the Government of the United States may please to order that no duties of this nature shall, in future, be collected in the ports of the Republic on French vessels loaded with French products, and which may have visited our colonies.

It has been my wish, sir, as I have before stated, to place this claim under your eyes, before communicating it to my Government, that I may have it in my power to transmit, at the same time, the answer with which you will honor me, and which will necessarily influence the light in which the commercial relations between the two countries shall be considered in future.

Accept, sir, my renewed assurances of high consideration.

BARON DE MAREUIL.

Mr. Clay to Baron de Mareuil.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 20, 1827.

SIR: Having submitted to the President of the United States your letter of the 13th instant, in relation to the French vessels, the Ville du Hâvre, the Sully, and the Eugenie, which arrived at Savannah, in December last, from the port of St. Pierre, Martinique, with remnants of cargoes of French produce taken on board in France, and which were subjected to the payment of the discriminating duty, I have the satisfaction now to inform you that the President's decision is, that neither those vessels nor their cargoes were, under the circumstances stated, legally chargeable with the discriminating duty. Orders will be issued from the Treasury Department to refund it, and to prevent, in future, the collection of the duty from French vessels similarly situated.

The President entirely concurs with you in the opinion, that, since the convention of 1822 makes no specific allusion to colonies, French vessels coming from France, and laden with the produce of France, are, by virtue of the stipulations of that instrument, exempt from all duties but those for which it provides; and that this right of exemption is not lost by the fact of such vessels touching, in the course of their voyage, at the colonial dependencies of France.

To entitle the vessels of the two countries reciprocally to the rate of duties which the convention stipulates, all that is necessary is, that their cargoes shall consist of "articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture" of those countries respectively. The convention is equally silent both as to colonies and foreign countries; and, in the opinion of the President, its principles are not forfeited, because, in the course of the voyage, a French or American vessel (as the case may be) shall happen to touch at a colonial port, or the port of a third Power; provided the vessel, on her arrival at her destination, imports only the produce of the country to which she belongs. It has been seen, with regret, that a different interpretation has been put upon the convention in France; and that an American vessel has been deemed to have lost the benefits of the convention, because, during her voyage, she touched at a British port, merely for information, without discharging any part of her cargo, or taking in a single article whatever. This interpretation cannot be considered as authorized; nor is there any justification of it in the desire to repress fraud, which you assign as its motive. The same reason, if it were well founded, would apply equally to vessels touching at colonial ports and at the ports of third Powers, both descriptions of these ports being alike excluded from the terms of the convention, which, however, does not forbid a vessel touching at either. It is certainly practicable to devise some other mode of preventing fraudulent importations of produce, not authorized by the convention to be imported into the two countries in their respective vessels, than that of either prohibiting the importation of that which the convention does authorize, or of subjecting it to a higher rate of duty.

The hope is therefore indulged that, on a reconsideration of this question in France, a different construction will be adopted; and that the duties which have been illegally exacted will be refunded, and proper orders given to prevent the collection of similar illegal duties in future.

I pray you to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

H. CLAY.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 471. [1ST SESSION.

TREATY OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION WITH SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 7, 1828.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate herewith to Congress copies of a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, concluded at Stockholm on the 4th of July, 1827, and the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 18th ultimo at this city.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1828.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, together with a separate article thereto, were concluded and signed by their plenipotentiaries at Stockholm on the fourth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven; which treaty and separate article being in the French language, and whereof the annexed is a faithful translation, are, word for word, as follows:

In the name of the Most Holy and Indivisible Trinity.

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, equally animated with the desire of extending and consolidating the commercial relations subsisting between their respective territories, and convinced that this object cannot better be accomplished than by placing them on the basis of a perfect equality and reciprocity, have, in consequence, agreed to enter into negotiation for a new treaty of commerce and navigation, and, to this effect, have appointed plenipotentiaries, to wit: The President of the United States of America, John James Appleton, Chargé d'Affaires of the said States at the Court of his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway; and his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, the Sieur Gustave Count de Wetterstedt, his Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, Knight Commander of his Orders, Knight of the Orders of St. Andrew, St. Alexander Newsky, and St. Ann, of the first class, of Russia; Knight of the Order of the Red Eagle, of the first class, of Prussia; Grand Cross of the Order of Leopold, of Austria; one of the eighteen of the Swedish Academy: who, after having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The citizens and subjects of each of the two high contracting parties may, with all security for their persons, vessels, and cargoes, freely enter the ports, places, and rivers of the territories of the other, wherever foreign commerce is permitted. They shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatsoever of said territories; to rent and occupy houses and warehouses for their commerce; and they shall enjoy, generally, the most entire security and protection in their mercantile transactions, on condition of their submitting to the laws and ordinances of the respective countries.

ARTICLE 2. Swedish and Norwegian vessels, and those of the island of St. Bartholomew, arriving, either laden or in ballast, into the ports of the United States of America, from whatever place they may come, shall be treated on their entrance, during their stay, and at their departure, upon the same footing as national vessels coming from the same place, with respect to the duties of tonnage, light-houses, pilotage, and port charges, as well as to the perquisites of public officers, and all other duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever.

And reciprocally, the vessels of the United States of America arriving, either laden or in ballast, in the ports of the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, from whatever place they may come, shall be treated on their entrance, during their stay, and at their departure, upon the same footing as national vessels coming from the same place, with respect to the duties of tonnage, light-houses, pilotage, and port charges, as well as to the perquisites of public officers, and all other duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever.

ARTICLE 3. All that may be lawfully imported into the United States of America in vessels of the said States may also be thereinto imported in Swedish

Au nom de la très Sainte et Indivisible Trinité.

Les Etats Unis d'Amérique, et sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvège, également animés du désir d'étendre et de consolider les relations commerciales qui subsistent entre leurs territoires respectifs, et convaincus que ce but ne saurait être mieux rempli, qu'en les plaçant sur la base d'une parfaite égalité et réciprocité, sont convenus, en conséquence, d'entrer en négociation pour un nouveau traité de commerce et de navigation, et ont nommé, à cet effet, des plénipotentiaires, savoir: le President des Etats Unis d'Amérique, John James Appleton, Chargé d'Affaires des dits Etats à la Cour de sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvège; et sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvège, le Sieur Gustave, Compte de Wetterstedt, son Ministre d'Etat et des Affaires Etrangères, Chevalier Commandeur de ses Ordres, Chevalier des Ordres de Russie, de St. André, de St. Alexandre Newsky, et de Ste. Anne, de la premiere classe, Chevalier de l'Ordre de l'Aigle Rouge de Prusse, de la premiere classe, Grand' Croix de l'Ordre de Léopold d'Autriche, un des Dix-huit de l'Académie Suédoise, lesquels, après avoir echangé leurs pleins pouvoirs, trouvés en bonne et due forme, ont arrêté les articles suivans:

ARTICLE 1. Les citoyens et sujets de chacune des deux hautes parties contractantes, pourront avec toute sureté, pour leurs personnes, vaisseaux et cargaisons, aborder librement dans les ports, places et rivieres des territoires de l'autre, partout où le commerce étranger est permis. Ils pourront s'y arrêter et résider dans quelque partie que ce soit des dits territoires, y louer et occuper des maisons, et des magasins pour leur commerce, et jouiront, généralement de la plus entiere sécurité et protection pour les affaires de leur négoce, à charge de se soumettre aux lois et ordonnances des pays respectifs.

ARTICLE 2. Les bâtimens Suèdois et Norvégiens et ceux de l'ile de St. Barthelemy qui arriveront sur leur lest, ou chargés dans les ports des Etats Unis d'Amérique, de quelque lieu qu'ils viennent, seront traités à leur entrée, pendant leur séjour et à leur sortie, sur le même pied que les bâtimens nationaux venant du même lieu, par rapport aux droits de tonnage, de fanaux, de pilotage, et de port, ainsi qu'aux vacations des officiers publics, et à tout autre droit ou charge, des quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom ou au profit du Gouvernement, des administrations locales, ou d'etablissemens particuliers quelconques.

Et réciproquement, les bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amérique qui arriveront sur leur lest, ou chargés dans les ports des Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, de quelque lieu qu'ils viennent, seront traités à leur entrée, pendant leur séjour et à leur sortie, sur le même pied que les bâtimens nationaux venant du même lieu, par rapport aux droits de tonnage, de fanaux, de pilotage et de port, ainsi qu'aux vacations des officiers publics et à tout autre droit ou charge, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom, ou au profit, du Gouvernement, des administrations locales, ou d'etablissemens particuliers quelconques.

ARTICLE 3. Tout ce qui pourra légalement être importé dans les Etats Unis d'Amérique, par bâtimens des dits Etats, pourra également y être importé par and Norwegian vessels, and in those of the island of St. Bartholomew, from whatever place they may come, without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if imported in national vessels.

And reciprocally, all that may be lawfully imported into the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway in Swedish and Norwegian vessels, or in those of the island of St. Bartholomew, may also be thereinto imported in vessels of the United States of America, from whatever place they may come, without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if imported in national vessels.

ARTICLE 4. All that may be lawfully exported from the United States of America in vessels of the said States may also be exported therefrom in Swedish and Norwegian vessels, or in those of the island of St. Bartholomew, without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if exported in national vessels.

And reciprocally, all that may be lawfully exported from the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway in Swedish and Norwegian vessels, or in those of the island of St. Bartholomew, may also be exported therefrom in vessels of the United States of America without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if exported in national vessels.

ARTICLE 5. The stipulations contained in the three preceding articles are, to their full extent, applicable to the vessels of the United States of America proceeding, either laden or not laden, to the colony of St. Bartholomew, in the West Indies, whether from the ports of the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway or from any other place whatsoever; or proceeding from the said colony, either laden or not laden, whether bound for Sweden or Norway, or for any other place whatsoever.

ARTICLE 6. It is expressly understood that the foregoing second, third, and fourth articles are not applicable to the coastwise navigation from one port of the United States of America to another port of the said States; nor to the navigation from one port of the Kingdoms of Sweden or of Norway to another, nor to that between the two latter countries, which navigation each of the two high contracting parties reserves to itself.

ARTICLE 7. Each of the two high contracting parties engages not to grant, in its purchases or in those which might be made by companies or agents acting in its name or under its authority, any preference to importations made in its own vessels, or in those of a third Power, over those made in the vessels of the other contracting party.

ARTICLE 8. The two high contracting parties engage not to impose upon the navigation between their respective territories, in the vessels of either, any tonnage or other duties of any kind or denomination which shall be higher or other than those which shall be imposed on every other navigation, except that which they have reserved to themselves, respectively, by the sixth article of the present treaty.

ARTICLE 9. There shall not be established in the United States of America, upon the products of the soil or industry of the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, or of the island of St. Bartholomew, any prohibition or restriction of importation or exporta-bâtimens Suédois et Norvégiens, ou de l'île de St. Barthelemy, de quelque lieu qu'ils viennent, sans payer d'autres ou plus hauts droits ou charges, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom, ou au profit du Gouvernement, des administrations locales, ou d'etablissemens particuliers quelconques, que si l'importation avait lieu en bâtimens nationaux.

Et réciproquement, tout ce qui pourra légalement être importé dans les Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, par bâtimens Suédois ou Norvégiens, ou de l'île de St. Barthelemy, pourra également y être importé par bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amérique, de quelque lieu qu'ils viennent, sans payer d'autres ou plus hauts droits ou charges, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom, ou au profit du Gouvernement, des administrations locales, ou d'etablissemens particuliers, quelconques, que si l'importation avait lieu en bâtimens nationaux.

ARTICLE 4. Tout ce qui pourra légalement être exporté des Etats Unis d'Amérique, par bâtimens des dits Etats, pourra également en être exporté par bâtimens Suédois et Norvégiens, ou de l'île de St. Barthelemy, sans payer d'autres ou plus hauts droits ou charges, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que se soit perçus au nom, ou au profit, du Gouvernement, des administrations locales, ou d'etablissemens particuliers quelconques, que si l'exportation avait eu lieu en bâtimens nationaux.

Et réciproquement, tout ce qui pourra légalement être exporté des Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, par bâtimens Suédois et Novégiens, ou de l'île de St. Barthelemy, pourra également en être exporté par bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amérique, sans payer d'autres ou plus haut droits ou charges, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom, ou au profit, du Gouvernement, des administrations locales, ou d'etablissemens particuliers quelconques, que si l'exportation avait lieu en bâtimens nationaux.

ARTICLE 5. Les stipulations des trois articles précédens sont dans toute leur plénitude, applicables aux bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amérique qui se rendront charges, ou non chargés dans la colonie de St. Barthelemy, aux Indes Occidentales, soit des ports des Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, soit de tout autre lieu quelconque, ou qui sortiront de la dite colonie, chargés ou non chargés, pour se rendre, soit en Suède ou en Norvège, soit en tout autre lieu quelconque.

ARTICLE 6. Il est expressément entendu que les articles précédens, deux, trois, et quatre, ne sont point applicables à la navigation de côte ou de cabotage d'un port des Etats Unis d'Amérique, à un autre port des dits Etats, ni à la navigation d'un port des Royaumes de Suède ou de Norvège à un autre, ou a celle entre ces deux dernier pays, navigation que chacune des deux hautes parties contractantes se réserve.

ARTICLE 7. Chacune des deux hautes parties contractantes s'engage à ne donner dans ses achats, ou dans ceux qui seraient faits par des compagnies ou des agens agissant en son nom ou sous son autorité, aucune préférence aux importations faites par ses bâtimens ou par ceux d'une nation tierce, sur celles faites dans les bâtimens de l'autre partie contractante.

ARTICLE 8. Les deux hautes parties contractantes s'engagent à ne pas établir sur la navigation entre leur territoires respectifs, pâr les bâtimens de l'une ou de l'autre, des droits de tonnage ou autres, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, plus hauts ou autres que ceux qui seront établis sur toute autre navigation, excepté celle qu'elles se sont respectivement reservée par le sixieme article du present traité.

ARTICLE 9. Il ne pourra pas être établi dans les Etats Unis d'Amérique, sur les productions du sol ou de l'industrie des Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, et de l'île de St. Barthelemy, aucune prohibition ou restriction d'importation ou d'exportation, ni aucune tion, nor any duties of any kind or denomination whatsoever, unless such prohibitions, restrictions, and duties shall likewise be established upon articles of like nature, the growth of any other country.

And reciprocally, there shall not be established in the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, nor in the island of St. Bartholomew, on the products of the soil or industry of the United States of America, any prohibition or restriction of importation or exportation, nor any duties of any kind or denomination whatsoever, unless such prohibitions, restrictions, and duties be likewise established upon articles of like nature the growth of the island of St. Bartholomew, or of any other place, in case such importation be made into or from the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, or of the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, or of any other place, in case such importation or exportation be made into or from the island of St. Bartholomew.

droits, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, qu'autant que ces prohibitions, ces restrictions et ces droits seraient également établis sur les objets de même nature provenant de toute autre contrée.

Et réciproquement, il ne pourra pas être établi dans les Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, ni dans l'île de St. Barthelemy, sur les productions du sol ou de l'industrie des Etats Unis d'Amérique, aucune prohibition ou restriction d'importation ou d'exportation, ni aucuns droits, de quelques espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, qu'autant que ces prohibitions, ces restrictions et ces droits, seraient également etablis sur les objets de même nature provenant, dans le cas où l'importation ou l'exportation aurait lieu dans ou hors des Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège, de l'île de St. Barthelemy ou de tout autre endroit; et, dans le cas où l'importation ou l'exportation aurait lieu dans ou hors l'île de St. Barthelemy, des Royaumes de Suède et de Norvège ou de tout autre endroit.

Article 10. All privileges of transit, and all bounties and drawbacks which may be allowed within the territories of one of the high contracting parties upon the importation or exportation of any article whatsoever, shall likewise be allowed on the articles of like nature, the products of the soil or industry of the other contracting party, and on the importations and exportations made in its vessels.

Article 10. Toute faculté d'entrepôt et toutes primes et remboursemens de droits, qui seroient accordés dans les territoires d'une des hautes parties contractantes, à l'importation ou à l'exportation de quelque objet que ce soit, seront également accordés aux objets de même nature produits du sol ou de l'industrie de l'autre partie contractante, et aux importations et exportations faites dans ses bâtimens.

Article 11. The citizens or subjects of one of the high contracting parties arriving with their vessels on the coasts belonging to the other, but not wishing to enter the port, or after having entered therein not wishing to unload any part of their cargo, shall be at liberty to depart and continue their voyage without paying any other duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever for the vessel and cargo than those of pilotage, wharfage, and for the support of lighthouses, when such duties shall be levied on national vessels in similar cases. It is understood, however, that they shall always conform to such regulations and ordinances concerning navigation and the places and ports which they may enter as are, or shall be, in force with regard to national vessels; and that the custom-house officers shall be permitted to visit them, to remain on board, and to take all such precautions as may be necessary to prevent all unlawful commerce as long as the vessels shall remain within the limits of their jurisdiction.

Article 11. Le citoyens ou sujets de l'une des hautes parties contractantes, arrivant avec leurs bâtimens à l'une des côtes appartenant à l'autre, mais ne voulant pas entrer dans le port, ou, après y être entrés, ne voulant décharger aucune partie de leur cargaison, auront la liberté de partir et de poursuivre leur voyage, sans payer d'autres droits, impôts ou charges quelconques, pour le bâtiment ou la cargaison, que les droits de pilotage, de quayage, et d'entretien de fanaux, quand ces droits sont perçus sur les nationaux dans les mêmes cas. Bien entendu, cependant, qu'ils se conformeront toujours aux règlemens et ordonnances concernant la navigation et les places ou ports dans lesquels ils pourront aborder, qui sont, ou seront en vigueur pour les nationaux, et qu'il sera permis aux officiers des doûanes de les visiter, de rester à bord, et de prendre telles précautions, qui pourraient être necessaires pour prévener tout commerce illicite, pendant que les bâtimens resteront dans l'enceinte de leur jurisdiction.

Article 12. It is further agreed that the vessels of one of the high contracting parties, having entered into the ports of the other, will be permitted to confine themselves to unlading such part only of their cargoes as the captain or owner may wish, and that they may freely depart with the remainder without paying any duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, except for that part which shall have been landed, and which shall be marked upon and erased from the manifest exhibiting the enumeration of the articles with which the vessel was laden; which manifest shall be presented entire at the custom-house of the place where the vessel shall have entered. Nothing shall be paid on that part of the cargo which the vessel shall carry away, and with which it may continue its voyage to one or several other ports of the same country, there to dispose of the remainder of its cargo, if composed of articles whose importation is permitted, on paying the duties chargeable upon it, or it may proceed to any other country. It is understood, however, that all duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, which are or may become chargeable upon the vessels themselves, must be paid at the first port where they shall break bulk or unlade part of their cargoes; but that no duties, imposts, or charges, of the same description, shall be demanded anew in the ports of the same country which such vessels might afterwards wish to enter, unless national vessels be, in similar cases, subject to some ulterior duties.

Article 12. Il est aussi convenu que les bâtimens de l'une des hautes parties contractantes, étant éntres dans les ports de l'autre, pourront se borner à ne décharger qu'une partie de leur cargaison, selon que le capitaine ou propriétaire le desirera, et qu'ils pourront s'en aller librement avec le reste, sans payer de droits, impôts ou charges quelconques, que pour la partie qui aura été mise à terre, et qui sera marquée et biffée sur le manifeste, qui contiendra l'enumeration des effets dont le bâtiment était chargé, lequel manifeste devra être présenté en entier à la douane du lieu où le bâtiment aura abordé. Il ne sera rien payé pour la partie de la cargaison que le bâtiment remportera, et avec la quelle il pourra continuer sa route pour un ou plusieurs autres ports du même pays, et y disposer du reste de sa cargaison, si elle est composée d'objets dont l'importations est permise, en payant les droits qui y sont applicables, ou bien il pourra s'en aller dans tout autre pays. Il est cependant entendu que les droits, impôts ou charges quelconques, qui sont ou seront payables pour les bâtimens même, doivent être acquittés au premier port où ils romproient le chargement, ou en dechargeroient une partie, mais qu'aucuns droits, impôts ou charges parcils ne seront demandés de nouveau dans les ports du même pays où lesdits bâtimens pourroient vouloir entrer après, à moins que les nationaux ne soient sujets à quelques droits ultériéurs dans le même cas.

Article 13. Each of the high contracting parties grants to the other the privilege of appointing, in its commercial ports and places, consuls, vice consuls, and commercial agents, who shall enjoy the full protection and receive every assistance necessary for the due exercise of their functions; but it is expressly declared that, in case of illegal or improper conduct with respect to the laws or Government of the country in which said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents shall reside, they may be prosecuted and punished conformably to the laws, and deprived of the exercise of their functions by the offended Government, which shall acquaint the other with its motives for having thus acted; it being understood, however, that the archives and documents relative to the affairs of the consulate shall be exempt from all search, and shall be carefully preserved under the seals of the consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents, and of the authority of the place where they may reside.

The consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents, or the persons duly authorized to supply their places, shall have the right, as such, to sit as judges and arbitrators in such differences as may arise between the captains and crews of the vessels belonging to the nation whose interests are committed to their charge, without the interference of the local authorities, unless the conduct of the crews, or of the captain, should disturb the order or tranquillity of the country, or the said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents should require their assistance to cause their decisions to be carried into effect or supported. It is however understood that this species of judgment or arbitration shall not deprive the contending parties of the right they have to resort, on their return, to the judicial authority of their country.

ARTICLE 14. The said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents are authorized to require the assistance of the local authorities for the arrest, detention, and imprisonment of the deserters from the ships of war and merchant vessels of their country; and for this purpose they shall apply to the competent tribunals, judges, and officers, and shall, in writing, demand said deserters, proving, by the exhibition of the registers of the vessels, the rolls of the crews, or by other official documents, that such individuals formed part of the crews; and on this reclamation being thus substantiated, the surrender shall not be refused.

Such deserters, when arrested, shall be placed at the disposal of the said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents, and may be confined in the public prisons at the request and cost of those who claim them, in order to be sent to the vessels to which they belonged, or to others of the same country. But if not sent back within the space of two months, reckoning from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause.

It is understood, however, that, if the deserter should be found to have committed any crime or offence, his surrender may be delayed until the tribunal before which the case shall be depending shall have pronounced its sentence, and such sentence shall have been carried into effect.

ARTICLE 15. In case any vessel of one of the high contracting parties shall have been stranded or shipwrecked, or shall have suffered any other damage on the coasts of the dominions of the other, every aid and assistance shall be given to the persons shipwrecked or in danger, and passports shall be granted to them to return to their country. The shipwrecked vessels and merchandise, or their proceeds if the same shall have been sold, shall be restored to their owners, or those entitled thereto, if claimed within a year and a day, upon paying such costs of salvage as would be paid by national vessels in the same circumstances; and the salvage companies shall not compel the acceptance of their services, except in the same cases, and after the same delays, as shall be granted to the captains and antes accorde à l'autre la faculté d'entretenir dans ses ports et places de commerce, des consuls, vice consuls, ou agens de commerce, qui jouiront de toute la protection, et recevront toute l'assistance nécessaire pour remplir duement leurs fonctions; mais il est expressément déclaré que dans le cas d'une conduite illégale ou impropre envers les lois ou le Gouvernement du pays dans lesquels lesdits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens de commerce, résideroient ils pourront être poursuivis et punis conformément aux lois, et privés de l'exercice de leurs fonctions par le Gouvernement offensé qui fera connoitre à l'autre ses motifs pour avoir agi ainsi, bien entendu cependant que les archives et documens relatifs aux affaires du consulat seront à l'abri de toute recherche, et devront être soigneusement conservés sous le scellé des consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux, et de l'autorité de l'endroit où ils résideroient.

Les consuls, vice consuls, et agens commerciaux, ou ceux qui seroient duement autorisés à les suppléer, auront le droit, comme tels, de servir de juges et d'arbitres dans les differens qui pourroient s'elever entre les capitaines et les équipages des bâtimens de la nation dont ils soignent les intérêts, sans que les autorités locales puissent y intervenir, à moins que la conduite des équipages ou du capitaine ne troublât l'ordre ou la tranquillité du pays, ou que lesdits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux ne réquissent leur intervention pour faire exécuter ou maintenir leurs décisions. Bien entendu que cette espèce de jugement ou d'arbitrage ne saurait pourtant priver les parties contendantes du droit qu'elles ont, à leur retour de recourir aux autorités judiciaires de leur patrie.

ARTICLE 14. Les dits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux, seront autorisés à requérir l'assistance des autorités locales pour l'arrestation, la détention, et l'emprisonnement de déserteurs des navires de guerre et marchands de leur pays, et ils s'adresseront, pour cet objet, aux tribunaux, juges et officiers compétens, et reclameront, par écrit, les deserteurs sus mentionnés, en prouvant, par la communication des régistres des navires, ou rôles de l'équipage, ou par d'autres documens officiels, que de tels individus ont fait partie desdits équipages, et cette reclamation ainsi prouvée, l'extradition ne sera point refusée.

De tels déserteurs, lorsqu'ils auront été arrêtés, seront mis à la disposition desdits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux, et pourront être enfermés dans les prisons publiques, à la réquisition et aux frais de ceux qui les reclament, pour être envoyé saux navires auxquels ils appartenoient, ou à d'autres de la même nation. Mais s'ils ne sont pa renvoyés dans l'espace de deux mois, à compter du jour de leur arrestation, ils seront mis en liberté et ne seront plus arrêtés pour la même cause.

Il est entendu, toutefois, que si le déserteur se trouvoit avoir commis quelque crime ou délit, il pourra être sursis à son extradition, jusqu' à ce que le tribunal nanti de l'affaire aura rendu sa sentence, et que celle-ci ait reçu son exécution.

ARTICLE 15. Dans le cas où quelque bâtiment de l'une des hautes parties contractantes, aura échoué fait naufrage, ou souffert quelqu' autre dommage sur les côtes de la domination de l'autre, il sera donné toute aide et assistance aux personnes naufragées, ou qui se trouveraient en danger, et il leur sera accordé des passeports pour retourner dans leur patrie. Les bâtimens et les marchandises naufragés, ou leur produit, s'ils ont été vendus, seront restitués à leurs propriétaires ou ayant cause, s'ils sont réclamés dans l'an et jour, en payant les frais de sauvetage que payeroient les nationaux dans les mêmes cas. Et les compagnies de sauvetage ne pourront faire accepter leurs services que dans les mêmes cas, et après les mêmes délais qui seraient accordés aux capitaines et aux equipages nationaux. Les Gouvcrews of national vessels. Moreover, the respective Governments will take care that these companies do not commit any vexatious or arbitary acts.

ARTICLE 16. It is agreed that vessels arriving directly from the United States of America at a port within the dominions of his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, or from the territories of his said Majesty in Europe, at a port of the United States, and provided with a bill of health granted by an officer having competent power to that effect, at the port whence such vessel shall have sailed, setting forth that no malignant or contagious diseases prevailed in that port, shall be subjected to no other quarantine than such as may be necessary for the visit of the health officer of the port where such vessels shall have arrived; after which said vessels shall be allowed immediately to enter and unload their cargoes: provided, always, that there shall be on board no person who, during the voyage, shall have been attacked with any malignant or contagious diseases; that such vessels shall not, during their passage, have communicated with any vessel liable itself to undergo a quarantine; and that the country whence they came shall not at that time be so far infected or suspected that, before their arrival, an ordinance had been issued in consequence of which all vessels coming from that country should be considered as suspected, and consequently subject to quarantine.

ARTICLE 17. The second, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fifth articles of the treaty of amity and commerce, concluded at Paris on the third of April, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of his Majesty the King of Sweden, together with the first, second, fourth, and fifth separate articles, signed on the same day by the same plenipotentiaries, are revived and made applicable to all the countries under the dominion of the present high contracting parties, and shall have the same force and value as if they were inserted in the context of the present treaty. It being understood that the stipulations contained in the articles above cited shall always be considered as in no manner affecting the conventions concluded by either party with other nations during the interval between the expiration of the said treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, and the revival of said articles by the treaty of commerce and navigation concluded at Stockholm by the present high contracting parties on the fourth of September, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

ARTICLE 18. Considering the remoteness of the respective countries of the two high contracting parties, and the uncertainty resulting therefrom with respect to the various events which may take place, it is agreed that a merchant vessel belonging to either of them which may be bound to a port supposed, at the time of its departure, to be blockaded, shall not, however, be captured or condemned for having attempted, a first time, to enter said port, unless it can be proved that said vessel could and ought to have learned during its voyage that the blockade of the place in question still continued. But all vessels which, after having been warned off once, shall, during the same voyage, attempt a second time to enter the same blockaded port during the continuance of said blockade, shall then subject themselves to be detained and condemned.

ARTICLE 19. The present treaty shall continue in force for ten years, counting from the day of the exchange of the ratifications; and if, before the expiration of the first nine years, neither of the high contracting parties shall have announced, by an official notification, to the other its intention to arrest the operation of said treaty, it shall remain binding for one year beyond that time, and so on until the ernemens respectifs veilleront d'ailleurs à ce que ces compagnies ne se permettent point de vexations ou d'actes arbitraires.

ARTICLE 16. Il est convenu que les bâtimens qui arriveront directement des Etats Unis d'Amérique, à un port de la domination de sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvège, ou des territoires de sa dite Majesté en Europe, à un port des Etats Unis, et qui seroient pourvus d'un certificat de santé, donné par l'officier compétent à cet égard du port d'ou les bâtimens sont sortis, et assurant qu'aucune maladie maligne ou contagieuse n'existait dans ce port, ne seront soumis à aucune autre quarantaine que celle qui sera nécessaire pour la visite de l'officier de santé du port où les bâtimens seroient arrivés, après laquelle il sera permis a ces bâtimens d'entrer immédiatement, et de discharger leurs cargaisons, bien entendu, toutefois, qu'il n'y ait eu personne à leur bord, qui ait été attaqué pendant le voyage d'une maladie maligne ou contagieuse, que les bâtimens n'aient point communiqué dans leur traverseé avec un bâtiment qui seroit lui même dans les cas de subir une quarantaine, et que la contrée d'où ils viendroient ne fut pas, à cette époque si généralement infectée ou suspecte, qu'on ait rendu, avant leur arrivée, une ordonnance, d'après laquelle tous les bâtimens venant de cette contrée seroient regardés comme suspects, et en conséquence assujettis à une quarantaine.

ARTICLE 17. Les articles deux, cinq, six, sept, huit, neuf, dix, onze, douze, treize, quatorze, quinze, seize, dix-sept, dix-huit, dix-neuf, vingt-un, vingt-deux, vingt-trois, et vingt-cinq, du traité d'amitié et de commerce conclu à Paris le trois Avril, mil sept cent quatre-vingt-trois, par les plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis d'Amerique et de sa Majesté le Roi de Suède, ainsi que les articles séparés un, deux, quatre et cinq, qui furent signés le même jour par les mêmes plénipotentiaires, sont remis en vigueur et rendus applicables à tous les pays sous la domination des hautes parties, actuellement contractantes, et auront la même force et valeur que s'ils etaient insérés textuellement dans le présent traité. Bien entendu que les stipulations contenues dans les articles précités seront toujours censés ne rien changer aux conventions conclues de part et d'autre, avec d'autres nations dans l'intervalle ecoulé entre l'expiration dudit traité de mil sept-cent quatre-vingt-trois, et la remise en vigueur des dits articles par le traité de commerce et de navigation, conclu par les hautes parties actuellement contractantes, à Stockholm, le quatre Septembre, mil huit cent seize.

ARTICLE 18. Vû l'éloignement des pays respectifs des deux hautes parties contractantes, et l'incertitude qui en résulte sur les divers événemens qui peuvent avoir lieu, il est convenu qu'un bâtiment marchand appartenant à l'une d'elles, qui se trouverait destiné pour un port supposé bloqué au moment du départ de ce bâtiment, ne sera cependant pas capturé ou condamné pour avoir essayé une premiere fois d'entrer dans ledit port, à moins qu'il ne puisse être prouvé que ledit bâtiment avait pû et dû apprendre en route que l'état de blocus de la place en question duroits encore: mais les bâtimens qui après avoir été renvoyés une fois, essayeroient pendant le même voyage d'entrer une seconde fois dans le même port bloqué, durant la continuation de ce blocus, se trouveront alors sujets à être détenus et condamnés.

ARTICLE 19. Le présent traité sera en vigueur pendant dix années, à partir du jour de l'échange des ratifications, et, si avant l'expiration des neuf premieres années, l'une ou l'autre des hautes parties contractantes n'avait pas annoncé à l'autre, par une notification officielle, son intention d'en faire cesser l'effet, ce traité restera obligatoire une anneé au delà, et ainsi de suite jusqu' à l'expiration des douze expiration of the twelve months which will follow a similar notification, whatever the time at which it may take place.

ARTICLE 20. The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and by his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within the space of nine months from the signature, or sooner, if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty by duplicates, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms. Done at Stockholm, the fourth of July, in the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.

SEPARATE ARTICLE.

Certain relations of proximity and ancient connexions having led to regulations for the importation of the products of the Kingdoms of Sweden and Norway into the Grand Duchy of Finland, and that of the products of Finland into Sweden and Norway, in vessels of the respective countries, by special stipulations of a treaty still in force, and whose renewal forms, at this time, the subject of a negotiation between the Courts of Sweden and Norway and Russia, said stipulations being in no manner connected with the existing regulations for foreign commerce in general, the two high contracting parties, anxious to remove from their commercial relations all kinds of ambiguity or motives of discussion, have agreed that the eighth, ninth, and tenth articles of the present treaty shall not be applicable either to the navigation and commerce above mentioned, nor, consequently, to the exceptions in the general tariff of custom-house duties, and in the regulations of navigation resulting therefrom, nor to the special advantages which are, or may be, granted to the importation of tallow and candles from Russia, founded upon equivalent advantages granted by Russia on certain articles of importation from Sweden and Norway.

The present separate article shall have the same force and value as if it were inserted, word for word, in the treaty signed this day, and shall be ratified at the same time.

In faith whereof, we the undersigned, by virtue of our respective full powers, have signed the present separate article, and affixed thereto the seals of our arms.

mois qui suivront une semblable notification, à qu'elque époque quelle ait lieu.

ARTICLE 20. Le présent traité sera ratifié par le Président des Etats Unis d'Amérique, par et avec l'avis et le consentement du Sénat, et par sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvège, et les ratifications en seront echangées à Washington, dans l'espace de neuf, mois après la signature, ou plutôt, si faire se peut.

En foi de quoi les plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé le présent traité en duplicata, et y ont apposé le cachet de leurs armes. Fait à Stockholm, le quatre Juillet, l'an de Grâce mil huit cent vingt sept.

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ.

Des rapports de proximité et d'anciennes relations ayant fait regler l'importation des productions des Royaumes des Suède et de Norvège dans le Grand Duché de Finlande, et celle des productions de la Finlande en Suède et en Norvège sur les bâtimens des pays respectifs, par des stipulations spéciales d'un traité encore en vigueur, et dont le renouvellement forme un objet de négociation actuelle, entre les cours de Suède et de Norvège et de Russie, sans que lesdites stipulations soient liées aux règlemens existans pour le commerce étranger en général, les deux hautes parties contractantes voulant écarter de leurs relations commerciales toute espèce d'équivoque ou de motif de discussion, sont tombées d'accord que les articles huit, neuf et dix du présent traité, ne seront point applicables ní à la navigation et au commerce susmentionnés, et par conséquent aux exceptions dans les tarifs generaux des douanes, et dans les reglemens de navigation qui en résultent, ni aux avantages speciaux qui sont ou pourroient être donnés à l'importation du suif et des chandelles de Russie, motivés par des avantages equivalens accordés en Russie à des articles d'importation de Suède et de Norvège.

Le présent article séparé aura la même force et valeur que s'il etait inséré mot à dans le traité signé aujourd'hui, et sera ratifié en même tems.

En foi de quoi, nous soussignés, en vertu de nos pleins pouvoirs respectifs, avons signé le présent article séparé, et y avons apposé le cachet de nos armes.

And whereas the said treaty and separate article have been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at Washington, on the eighteenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, by Henry Clay, Secretary of State of the United States, and Robert, Baron de Stackelberg, Colonel, Knight of the Order of the Sword, and Chargé d'Affaires of his Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway near the said United States, on the part of their respective Governments:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, John Quincy Adams, President of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty and separate article to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 472. [1ST SESSION.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN GEORGIA AND FLORIDA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 3, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with documents containing the instructions of the Government of the United States to Thomas Pinckney, under which was negotiated the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real, and relating to the boundary line between the United States and the dominions at that time of Spain, as requested by a resolution of the House of the 18th ultimo.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 29, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 18th instant requesting the President to communicate to the House copies of the instructions of the Government of the United States, given to Thomas Pinckney, its minister in Spain, in pursuance of which the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real was entered into by said minister with the Government of Spain, so far as said instructions relate to the designation of the dividing line between the territories of Spain and the United States, has the honor to submit to the President the accompanying extracts, the first from a letter of instructions from Mr. Edmund Randolph, then Secretary of State, under date the 28th November, 1794, to Mr. Thomas Pinckney, appointed minister plenipotentiary to Spain, and the other from a report referred to therein, which comprehend the particular instructions required by the resolution of the House.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

Extract from instructions of Edmund Randolph, Secretary of State, to Thomas Pinckney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, dated November 28, 1794.

"Your powers inform you, in general terms, of the subjects with which you are charged. The development of the principles upon which they are to be contended for will be found in the documents of which Mr. Short is possessed. But, for the sake of enabling you to avail yourself of every opportunity before you reach Madrid, I send a statement of our pretensions as they were laid before Congress, comprehending Mr. Jay's discussions with Mr. Gardoqui, and the instructions and arguments transmitted to Messrs. Carmichael and Short. In these the President sees no reason for a change."

Extract from instructions of Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Carmichael and Short, Ministers Plenipotentiary to Madrid, dated March 18, 1792.

"The President having thought proper to appoint you joint Commissioners Plenipotentiary, on the part of the United States, to treat with the Court of Madrid on the subjects of the navigation of the Mississippi, arrangements on our limits, and commerce, you will herewith receive your commission; as, also, observations on these several subjects reported to the President and approved by him, which will, therefore, serve as instructions for you. These expressing minutely the sense of our Government, and what they wish to have done, it is unnecessary for me to do more here than desire you to pursue these objects unremittingly, and endeavor to bring them to an issue in the course of the ensuing summer.

Extract from a report of Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to the President of the United States, dated March 18, 1792.

The appointment of Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Short as Commissioners to negotiate, with the Court of Spain, a treaty or convention relative to the navigation of the Mississippi, and which, perhaps, may be extended to other interests, rendering it necessary that the subjects to be treated of should be developed and the conditions of arrangement explained, the Secretary of State reports to the President of the United States the following observations on the subjects of negotiation between the United States of America and the Court of Spain, to be communicated by way of instruction to the Commissioners of the United States appointed, as before mentioned, to manage that negotiation. These subjects are—

1. Boundary.
2. The navigation of the Mississippi.
3. Commerce.

1. As to boundary, that between Georgia and Florida is the only one which will need any explanation. Spain sets up a claim to possessions within the State of Georgia, founded on her having rescued them, by force, from the British during the late war. The following view of that subject seems to admit no reply:

The several States now composing the United States of America were, from their first establishment, separate and distinct societies, dependent on no other society of men whatever; they continued at the head of their respective Governments the Executive Magistrate who presided over the one they had left, and thereby secured, in effect, a constant amity with the nation. In this stage of their Government their several boundaries were fixed, and particularly the southern boundary of Georgia, the only one now in question, was established at the 31st degree of latitude from the Apalachicola, westwardly; and the western boundary, originally the Pacific Ocean, was, by the treaty of Paris, reduced to the middle of the Mississippi. The part which our Chief Magistrate took in a war waged against us by the nation among whom he resided obliged us to discontinue him, and to name one within every State. In the course of this war we were joined by France as an ally, and by Spain and Holland as associates, having a common enemy; each sought that common enemy wherever they could find him. France, on our invitation, landed a large army within our territories, continued it with us two years, and aided us in recovering sundry places from the possession of the enemy; but she did not pretend to keep possession of the places rescued. Spain entered into the remote western part of our territory, dislodged the common enemy from several posts they held therein, to the annoyance of Spain, and perhaps thought it necessary to remain in some of them, as the only means of preventing their return. We, in like manner, dislodged them from several posts in the same western territory, to wit: Vincennes, Cahokia, Caskaskia, &c., rescued the inhabitants, and retained, constantly afterwards, both them and the territory under our possession and Government. At the conclusion of the war Great Britain, on the 30th of November, 1782, by treaty, acknowledged our independence and our boundary, to wit: the Mississippi to the west, and the completion of the 31st degree, &c., to the south. In her treaty with Spain, concluded seven weeks afterwards, to wit: January 20, 1783, she ceded to her the two Floridas (which had been defined in the proclamation of 1763) and Minorca; and, by the 8th article of the treaty, Spain agreed to restore, without compensation, all the territories conquered by her, and not included in the treaty, either under the head of cession or restitutions—that is to say, all except Minorca and the Floridas. According to this stipulation, Spain was expressly bound to have delivered up the possessions she had taken within the limits of Georgia to Great Britain, if they were conquests on Great Britain, who was to deliver them over to the United States; or, rather, she should have delivered them to the United States themselves, as standing, quoad hoc, in the place of Great Britain; and she was bound, by natural right, to deliver them to the same United States, on a much stronger ground, as the real and only proprietors of those places which she had taken possession of, in a moment of danger, without having had any cause of war with the United States, to whom they belonged, and without having declared any, but, on the contrary, conducting herself, in other respects, as a friend and associate.—(Vattel, l. 3, 122.)

It is an established principle that conquest gives only an inchoate right, which does not become perfect till confirmed by the treaty of peace, and by a renunciation or abandonment by the former proprietor. Had Great Britain been that former proprietor, she was so far from confirming to Spain the right to the territory of Georgia invaded by Spain that she expressly relinquished to the United States any right that might remain in her, and afterwards completed that relinquishment by procuring and consolidating with it the agreement of Spain herself to restore such territory without compensation. It is still more palpable that a war existing between two nations, as Spain and Great Britain, could give to neither the right to seize and appropriate the territory of a third, which is even neutral, much less which is an associate in the war, as the United States were with Spain.—(See, on this subject, Grotius, l. 3, c. 6, § 26; Puffend., l. 8, c. 6, § 17, 23; Vattel, l. 3, § 197, 198.)

On the conclusion of the general peace the United States lost no time in requiring from Spain an evacuation of their territory: that it has been hitherto delayed, by means which we need not explain to that Court, but which have been equally contrary to our right and to our consent.

Should Spain pretend, as has been intimated, that there was a secret article of treaty between the United States and Great Britain, agreeing if, at the close of the war, the latter should retain the Floridas, that then the southern boundary of Georgia should be the completion of the 32d degree of north latitude, the Commissioners may safely deny all knowledge of the fact, and refuse conference on any such postulatum; or should they find it necessary to enter into argument on the subject, they will, of course, do it hypothetically, and, in that way, may justly say, on the part of the United States: "Suppose that the United States, exhausted by a bloody and expensive war with Great Britain, might have been willing to have purchased peace by relinquishing, under a particular contingency, a small part of their territory, it does not follow that the same United States, recruited and better organized, must relinquish the same territory to Spain without striking a blow. The United States, too, have irrevocably put it out of their power to do it by a new Constitution, which guaranties every State against the invasion of its territory. A disastrous war, indeed, might, by necessity, supersede this stipulation, (as necessity is above all law,) and oblige them to abandon a part of a State; but nothing short of this can justify or obtain such an abandonment."

The southern limits of Georgia depend chiefly on—

1st. The charter of Carolina to the lords proprietors, in 1663, extending southwardly to the river Matheo, now called St. John's, supposed in the charter to be in latitude 31°, and so west, in a direct line, as far as the South Sea.

2d. On the proclamation of the British King, in 1763, establishing the boundary between Georgia and the two Floridas, to begin on the Mississippi, in 31° of latitude north of the equator, and running eastwardly to the Apalachicola; thence along the said river to the mouth of the Flint; thence, in a direct line, to the source of St. Mary's river, and down the same to the ocean. This proclamation will be found in Postlethwayte voce "British America."

3d. On the treaties between the United States and Great Britain of November 30, 1782, and September 3, 1783, repeating and confirming these ancient boundaries.

There was an intermediate transaction, to wit: a convention concluded at the Pardo in 1739, whereby it was agreed that ministers plenipotentiary should be immediately appointed by Spain and Great Britain for settling the limits of Florida and Carolina. The convention is to be found in the collections of treaties; but the proceedings of the plenipotentiaries are unknown here. Qu. If it was on that occasion that the southern boundary of Carolina was transferred from the latitude of Matheo, or St. John's river, further north to the St. Mary's? or was it the proclamation of 1763 which first removed this boundary? [If the Commissioners can procure in Spain a copy of whatever was agreed on in consequence of the convention of the Pardo, it is a desirable State paper here.]

To this demonstration of our rights may be added the explicit declaration of the Court of Spain, that she would accede to them. This took place in conversations and correspondence thereon between Mr.

Jay, minister plenipotentiary for the United States at the Court of Madrid, the Marquis de Lafayette, and the Count de Florida Blanca. Monsieur de Lafayette, in his letter of February 19, 1783, to the Count de Florida Blanca, states the result of their conversations on limits in these words: "With respect to limits, his Catholic Majesty has adopted those that are determined by the preliminaries of the 30th of November between the United States and the Court of London." The Count de Florida Blanca, in his answer of February 22 to M. de Lafayette, says: "Although it is his Majesty's intention, for the present, by the limits established by the treaty of the 30th of November, 1782, between the English and Americans, the King intends to inform himself, particularly, whether it can be, in anyways, inconvenient or prejudicial to settle that affair amicably with the United States." And M. de Lafayette, in his letter of the same day, to Mr. Jay, wherein he had inserted the preceding, says: "On receiving the answer of the Count Florida Blanca, (to wit, his answer, before mentioned, to M. de Lafayette,) I desired an explanation respecting the addition that relates to the limits. I was answered that it was a fixed principle to abide by the limits established by the treaty between the English and the Americans; that his remark related only to mere unimportant details, which he wished to receive from the Spanish commandants, which would be amicably regulated, and would by no means oppose the general principle. I asked him, before the Ambassador of France, [M. de Montmorin,] whether he would give me his word of honor for it? He assured me he would, and that I might engage it to the United States."

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 473. [1ST SESSION.

AGGRESSIONS ON JOHN BAKER AND OTHER CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES BY THE AUTHORITIES OF GREAT BRITAIN IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MARCH 4, 1828.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 3d of January last, requesting the communication of information in my possession relative to alleged aggression on the rights of citizens of the United States by persons claiming authority under the Government of the province of New Brunswick, I communicate a report from the Secretary of State, with a copy of that of the special agent mentioned in my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress as having been sent to visit the spot where the cause of complaint had occurred to ascertain the state of the facts, and the result of whose inquiries I then promised to communicate to Congress when it should be received.

The Senate are requested to receive this communication as the fulfilment of that engagement; and, in making it, I deem it proper to notice, with just acknowledgment, the liberality with which the minister of his Britannic Majesty residing here, and the Government of the province of New Brunswick, have furnished the agent of the United States with every facility for the attainment of the information which it was the object of his mission to procure.

Considering the exercise of exclusive territorial jurisdiction upon the grounds in controversy by the Government of New Brunswick, in the arrest and imprisonment of John Baker, as incompatible with the mutual understanding existing between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain on this subject, a demand has been addressed to the provincial authorities, through the minister of Great Britain, for the release of that individual from prison, and of indemnity to him for his detention. In doing this, it has not been intended to maintain the regularity of his own proceedings, or of those with whom he was associated, to which they were not authorized by any sovereign authority of this country.

The documents appended to the report of the agent being original papers, belonging to the files of the Department of State, a return of them is requested when the Senate shall have no further use for them.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 28, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred, by the President, the resolution of the Senate of the third ultimo, requesting him to communicate to the Senate (so far as may be compatible with the public interest) any information in his possession relative to any alleged aggression on the rights of the citizens of the United States by persons claiming authority under the Government of the province of New Brunswick, has the honor to report herewith a copy of the instructions given to S. B. Barrell, who was deputed to collect information in relation to the subject mentioned in the resolution, and a copy of his report made in conformity with them.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 19, 1827.

SIR: Some difficulties having arisen on our northeastern border between the Government and people of New Brunswick and the State of Maine, in regard to certain settlements within the territory mutually claimed by the United States and Great Britain, the President is desirous of possessing information on particular points, which it is thought can be best acquired by sending some person to collect it on the disputed ground. He has accordingly authorized me to engage some person in this service; and as you have consented to accept it, I will now direct your attention to the particular points regarding which information is desired.

From the perusal of the affidavits,* copies of which you will receive herewith, you will perceive that collisions have arisen between the British authorities of New Brunswick and some of the settlers on the Madawaska and the Aroostook, branches of the St. John; that these authorities claim to exercise a jurisdiction over those settlements, although they are within the above disputed territory, and that they have, in fact, exercised it in various ways, and finally by the arrest of an American citizen, by the name of John Baker, who, after being carried from his home some distance to Fredericton, was there tried, convicted, and sentenced to an imprisonment of six months, and the payment of a fine of £150. The President wishes to know when and by whom these settlements on the Madawaska and Aroostook were first made? Whether they were under American or British authority, or of French origin? By whom have they been governed? Have both the American and British Governments exercised acts of jurisdiction over them, or only one Government, and which, exclusively? Have the settlers generally acquiesced in the exercise of that authority, whether British or American, which has been extended over them? If these settlements were originally American, when did the British authorities first attempt to exercise jurisdiction over them? If they were originally British, when was an objection first made to the exercise of British jurisdiction over them? And when was the right first asserted, if it has been asserted at all, to exercise authority from the State of Massachusetts or of Maine over them? From what Government do the settlers deduce their land titles? If both from an American and a British source, from which has the greater number been obtained? Which are the oldest?

You are also requested to inquire particularly into the causes of the arrest and condemnation of John Baker, and his present situation, and to procure official copies of the process and judicial proceedings against him. It being alleged that he is confined in a loathsome and unhealthy jail, you will examine, as far as you can, into his condition, and for that purpose, if you shall deem it necessary, you will proceed to the place of his confinement and apply to the proper authority for permission to see him, and to ascertain the circumstances of his situation.

If it should turn out, upon investigation, that the abovementioned settlements were made and have been governed under the authority of Massachusetts and Maine, or either of them, you will please to take the affidavits of some three or four or more persons to establish that fact.

Measures being in a course of adoption or operation to settle between the United States and Great Britain the question of right in the disputed territory, it is the wish of the Government of the United States, and it is professed to be that of the Government of Great Britain, that nothing should occur within the disputed territory to disturb the harmony between the two countries. We have inculcated forbearance and moderation on our side, and we are officially assured that it has been and will be practiced on the other. Should you have intercourse with any of the inhabitants of the disputed territory, you may explain to them this mutual understanding between the two Governments. Whilst measures are in progress to adjust, in a regular way, by the two Governments themselves, the disputed boundary, abstinance from all acts of individual violence, and from all unnecessary collision is the interest on both sides. Such acts and collisions might retard, but are not likely to advance the work of amicable settlement between the two nations.

You will proceed, in the first place, and before you go upon the disputed ground, to his excellency Enoch Lincoln, Governor of Maine, and explain to him fully the object of this commission. You will request of him such assistance and information in the execution of it as he may be able and think proper to render. A letter of introduction to Governor Lincoln is herewith delivered to you; and I expect also to procure for you a letter of introduction to Sir Howard Douglas, the Governor of New Brunswick, from the British minister, which will be delivered or forwarded to you.

The sum of $300 is now advanced to you on account of your expenses. On your return a reasonable allowance will be made for your services, and your reasonable expenses will also be reimbursed you.

I am, sir, &c., &c., &c.,

H. CLAY.

S. B. BARRELL, Esq.

WASHINGTON, February 11, 1828.

The undersigned has the honor to report that, in pursuance of the instructions which he received from the Department of State on the 19th day of November last, he proceeded to Portland, in the State of Maine, and explained to his excellency Enoch Lincoln, the Governor of that State, the object of his commission, and requested of him such assistance and information, in the execution of it, as he was able and might think proper to render. His excellency expressed his ready compliance with the request of the undersigned, and in reply to a letter addressed to him the undersigned received the letter from his excellency, with its accompanying document, herewith presented, and marked A and B.

From Portland the undersigned proceeded to Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick, and the residence of Sir Howard Douglas, the Lieutenant Governor of that province, to whom he transmitted, upon his arrival, a letter of introduction from the minister of his Britannic Majesty near the United States, a copy of which is herewith presented, marked C.

In consequence of severe bodily indisposition Sir Howard Douglas was unable to give the undersigned a personal interview; but he was, without delay, informed, by other members of the Government of New Brunswick, that he was fully accredited as the representative of his Government; and that any information, documentary or otherwise, relating to his mission, which he desired, should be promptly furnished.

Soon after his arrival at Fredericton the undersigned received a letter from the Attorney General of the province, under date of December 23, which, together with a copy of his letter in reply, are herewith presented, marked D and E.

* These affidavits were communicated to Congress at the opening of the present session of Congress, with the President's message.

On the 23d of December the Attorney General transmitted to the undersigned the letter herewith presented, and marked F, together with sundry documents, which are also herewith presented, and numbered from 1 to 6, inclusive. And on the 25th of December the undersigned received from the Attorney General his letter of that date, marked C, and which, with the accompanying documents, numbered from 7 to 10, inclusive, are also herewith presented.

The undersigned, while at Fredericton, had repeated interviews with Mr. John Baker, whom he found confined in prison at that place. In conformity with his instructions, he applied for permission to see Mr. Baker in prison, in order that he might ascertain the circumstances of his situation, and an opportunity was readily afforded him for that purpose. The apartment of the prison in which Mr. Baker is confined is of a description that precludes the possibility of rendering its tenants comfortable. But the prison affords none better, and it is appropriated to prisoners in confinement for debt. The undersigned found in the same apartment with Mr. Baker an individual who was imprisoned at the suit of a creditor. It is but justice to add, that the undersigned was informed by Mr. Baker that both the high sheriff of the county and the keeper of the prison had done all which, consistently with their duty, they could do to alleviate his situation and to render him as comfortable as circumstances would authorize. The undersigned was informed, at Fredericton, that the prison had been recently presented by the grand jury of the county as a public nusiance.

It will be found from an examination of the document (No. 2) accompanying the letter from the Attorney General of New Brunswick to the undersigned, under the date of December 23, that the offences with which Mr. Baker stands charged, and for which he is to be tried at Fredericton, are for exciting sedition among the French settlers at Madawaska, and endeavoring to obstruct the passage of the British mail upon the river St. John. Mr. Baker is also imprisoned on civil process at the suit of Robert Shear, residing in Lower Canada. He confessed a judgment to Shear, at Quebec, for about two hundred and thirty pounds, in the year 1821, and upon this judgment the present suit is founded. On the criminal suit he was required to find bail for his appearance in the sum of one hundred pounds, which he informed the undersigned he could readily obtain if he could be discharged from the civil process.

The undersigned proceeded from Fredericton to Houlton Plantation, a settlement within the aknowledged bounds of the State of Maine, and about twelve miles distant from Woodstock, upon the river St. John. At this place he met with several of the settlers upon the Aroostook river, from whom he received all the information he sought respecting the first settlements upon that river, and the causes of recent disturbances among the setflers.

The earliest settlement upon the Aroostook was made about six years since. The settlers are about forty in number, nine of whom are citizens of the United States, and the residue are British subjects. No one of them has a grant of land either from the Government of the province of New Brunswick or that of the States of Massachusetts or Maine; nor any other title to the land occupied than that which arises from possession. Lewis Johnson and Charles Johnson, born in the British province of Nova Scotia, and William McCrea, born in Ireland, were the earliest settlers. The disturbances which have taken place have been confined almost exclusively to what is termed the Upper Settlement upon the Aroostook, about thirty miles from the mouth of the river. The settlers, generally, are composed of individuals who have fled from the British provinces involved in debt, and probably with a view of avoiding their creditors, and who settled themselves upon the Aroostook under an impression, as they state, that they were going upon American ground, and doubtless under the expectation that they should find themselves beyond the reach of the laws of Great Britain. Of this description, as the undersigned was informed, was William Dalton, the individual whose statement, under oath, was transmitted to the Department of State in November last, and which has been productive of such excitement in all parts of the United States, and more especially in the State of Maine. Dalton was born in the State of Maine; but for some years before he settled upon the Aroostook he resided in the province of New Brunswick, and at different places upon the river St. John, where he was engaged in the business of lumbering. It is said that he failed in business, and left the province of New Brunswick, deeply involved in debt, and took up his residence upon the Aroostook river, where the undersigned has reason to believe he would have remained to the present time if he had found himself without the reach of his British creditors. From information derived from other settlers upon the Aroostook, the undersigned is himself satisfied, and feels it to be his duty to report to the Government, that the statement of Mr. Dalton, above alluded to, is substantially, and in every material point, absolutely false. The facts respecting the taking away of Joseph Arnold's cow, as represented by James Armstrong, one of the settlers, as well as by Arnold himself, are briefly these: Arnold had exchanged a cow belonging to him for another in possession of one William McCrea, and which the latter claimed as his property. The cow received from McCrea by Arnold was subsequently taken from the latter by due process of law by one John Bradley, who claimed to be the owner of the cow, and who stated that he had sold the cow to McCrea only conditionally, and that, as McCrea had not complied with the terms of the contract, he (Bradley) was entitled to his cow again. Arnold applied for relief to the magistrate by whom the writ of replevin had been issued, under which the cow he had received from McCrea had been taken from him; but failing to procure redress he returned home and told McCrea that he must either furnish him with legal evidence of his ownership in the cow which he had received from him, or return to him the cow which he had given in exchange for that which Bradley had taken from him. McCrea refused to deliver up the cow, but consented to leave the matter to be settled by referees. Referees were agreed upon by the parties, who decided that if McCrea, within a certain specified period, should not furnish Arnold with proof of his being the owner of the cow which he had exchanged for that of Arnold, that he should restore to Arnold the cow he had received from him. The time prescribed having elapsed, and McCrea having neglected to furnish the proof required, and the cow received from Arnold being yet in McCrea's possession, Arnold took the cow from McCrea and carried her to his own house; thus exercising a summary act of justice not unusual, it is believed, in communities like that at the Aroostook. McCrea pretended that he had sold Arnold's cow to one Michael Cummings, whom he had accompanied to the residence of Mr. Justice Morehouse, and procured in his behalf a writ of replevin for the return of the animal. It was the service of this writ that was successfully resisted by the settlers, (as stated in document No. 9, furnished by the Attorney General of New Brunswick,) and the cow has since remained in the possession of Arnold. According to Dalton's statement, the cow was taken away from Arnold, and, the public are led to infer, was restored to McCrea. That part of Dalton's statement, relative to the loss he sustained in removing from the Aroostook, was represented to the undersigned as exaggerated. Armstrong states that his property was not of the value he represents it, and was disposed of by him for a larger amount than he acknowledges to have received. The concluding and most material part of his statement, that "for the last seven weeks the inhabitants of Aroostook settlement have been unwilling and afraid to sleep in their own houses, and have retired to the lower part of the settlement and spent the night on the banks of the river and in the woods, and kept watch night and day as in an Indian war," is stated by others of the settlers to be absolutely false; and the fact is said to be that for two nights only, and when a force was expected to arrive at the settlement from Fredericton, sent thither by the Government for the purpose of apprehending those who were concerned in the rescue of Arnold's cow from the constable, some of the settlers, to use their own term, "mustered together," and lodged one night in a barn, and one night in a house belonging to one of them.

The undersigned deems it proper, in this place, to remark upon the testimony of Jonathan Wilson, whose statement was taken under oath, and transmitted to the Government at the same time with that of Dalton's, that his statement is founded entirely upon hearsay testimony, which, upon investigation, has been ascertained, in every material respect, to be entirely unfounded.

Civil process has been occasionally issued against the settlers upon the Aroostook by British magistrates for three or four years past, and during the last summer process for trespass and intrusion was issued, at the instance of the Attorney General of the province of New Brunswick, against the settlers generally, who were compelled to go to Fredericton and employ counsel in their defence. These suits are still pending.

It was the intention of the undersigned, in conformity with his instructions, to have gone from Houlton Plantation to the settlement upon the river Aroostook; but he was informed that a journey to that settlement was, at that time, hazardous and almost impracticable, and it would have necessarily produced in his progress great delay; and as he had seen at Houlton some of the settlers, who appeared to be men of intelligence, and had received from them the information which it would have been the principal object of his journey there to procure, he deemed it inexpedient to do so, and proceeded directly to the Madawaska settlement.

This settlement derives its name from the river Madawaska, which empties itself into the river St. John, about thirty-six miles above the Grand Falls, and about one hundred and sixty miles above Fredericton. The first settlers arrived soon after the treaty of 1783, and the first grant, which was "of fifty-one several lots or plantations of land," was made to Joseph Muzeroll and fifty-one other French settlers, in the month of October, 1790, by Thomas Carleton, Esquire, the then Lieutenant Governor of the province of New Brunswick. The land granted lay at intervals between the river Verte and the Madawaska river, nine miles distant from each other, and on both sides of the river St. John. The second grant was of five thousand two hundred and fifty-three acres of land lying below the river Verte, and was made to Joseph Soucer and others, by Lieutenant Governor Carleton, in August, 1794. These are the only grants ever made by the British Government within the settlement, excepting one to Limo Hibert, of two hundred and fifty acres of land, opposite to and upon the river Madawaska, in May, 1825.

The laws of the province of New Brunswick appear to have been always in force since the origin of that settlement. The settlers have acquiesced in the exercise of British authority, both civil and military, among them, and have for many years had an organized militia in the settlement. In 1824 there were but two companies of militia in the settlement. In 1826 three new companies were organized, and the number of enrolled militia now exceeds four hundred. The population of Madawaska amounts to about two thousand, and is almost exclusively French. The French settlement commences a few miles above the Grand Falls, and extends to the Marigoumtegook (or Mariumplicook) creek. There was one French settler within the distance of half a mile from the mouth of that creek at the period when the earliest of the American settlers went to reside there; and, at the distance of about six miles further down the river St. John, there now resides Joseph Mishut, a Frenchman, the wife of whom informed the undersigned that her former husband settled upon the spot where they now reside, and built the house they now occupy, about thirty years ago. The number of American settlers is about twenty-five.

The undersigned proceeded up the river St. John as far as the mouth of the Mariumplicook creek, which is about fifteen miles above the river Madawaska. At the mouth of this creek is the residence of several of the American settlers, and among others is that of Mr. John Baker. The undersigned had free and unreserved communications with all the American settlers upon the river St. John; and, from information derived from them, corroborated in all material points from other sources, he is enabled to make the statement which follows respecting the origin of the American settlement, and the causes of recent disturbances among the settlers.

Nathan Baker, John Harford, and his son John Harford, jr., were the first American citizens who settled upon the river St. John, within the territory mutually claimed by the United States and Great Britain. John Harford and his son came in June, 1817, and were followed a few months afterwards by Nathan Baker, and were all engaged in the lumbering business. In the summer of 1818 they removed their respective families from the Kennebec river. Baker established himself at the mouth of the Mariumplicook, and Harford about fifteen miles further up the river St. John. The undersigned was informed by John Harford that Nathan Baker formed a connexion in business with Mr. Samuel Nevers, a merchant of St. John, and under Nevers, who had obtained license from the Government of New Brunswick to cut timber, he engaged in the lumbering business. In the summer of 1819 a subpœna was served upon John Harford, (which is herewith presented, and marked H,) requiring him to appear at Fredericton to answer to a suit for trespass and intrusion on Crown lands, instituted by the Attorney General. Similar process was issued against his son, John Harford, jr., and also against Nathan Baker. John Harford states that he went to Fredericton in obedience to the summons, and that he, together with Nathan Baker, submitted to the authority of the Government of New Brunswick, and were both permitted to return to their settlements.

John Baker, the brother of Nathan Baker, was born in Moscow, in the county of Somerset, in the then district of Maine, in the year 1787. In 1816 he left the United States, and took up his residence in the province of New Brunswick, where he remained about two years, and then left New Brunswick for the province of Lower Canada, where he resided about the same length of time. During the whole of this period he was engaged in the lumbering business. In 1820 he left the British provinces, and went to reside with his brother Nathan, at the Madawaska settlement, and engaged in the lumbering business with him, under Nevers. In 1821 Nathan Baker died, and John Baker continued to carry on the lumbering business under Nevers.

On the 4th of October, 1825, deeds were given by the agents of the States of Massachusetts and Maine to John Baker and James Bacon, two of the American settlers. Each deed was for one hundred acres of land, of which the grantees were previously in possession; and on the 10th of the same month Bacon was authorized by the same agents to grant licenses to cut timber within the disputed territory, as appears from the document herewith presented, and marked I. This authority was subsequently revoked. The undersigned was informed by the settlers that John Baker had previously made application to the authorities at Fredericton to become a naturalized British subject, and that he was actually upon his way to Fredericton, for the purpose of becoming naturalized, when he met with the agents of Massachusetts and Maine, with whom he returned to the settlement, and from whom he subsequently received a deed for the property he then had in possession. They state, also, that in 1822 he applied for and received from the Government of New Brunswick the bounty paid to those who raise grain upon lands recently cleared and cultivated; that Mr. Nevers, with the knowledge, consent, and concurrence of Mr. Baker, had applied for a grant of the very tract of land for which Baker afterwards received a deed from the States of Massachusetts and Maine, but the grant was refused by the Governor of New Brunswick; and that Baker and others of the settlers, both before and subsequent to the period when deeds were given by the agents of Massachusetts and Maine, voluntarily applied to the British authorities for the enforcement of the British laws among the American settlers, both in civil and criminal matters.

The fourth of July last was celebrated by the American settlers at the Madawaska. A flagstaff was raised by them upon the land of John Baker, and the American flag displayed thereon. Many of the French settlers were invited to join in the celebration, several of whom accepted the invitation and were present, and two assisted in the ceremony of raising the American flag. Most of the American settlers participated in the proceeding of the day, and it was represented to the undersigned by others of the American settlers that Mr. Baker was the principal personage among them, and it was he who proposed the celebration and the raising of the American flag. An address was delivered, and the party dined together at Mr. Baker's house. A ball in the evening at the house of Mr. Bacon, where were present, by invitation, many of the French settlers of both sexes, concluded the festivities of the day.

On the day following a paper was drawn up by one of the settlers which, it said, was dictated by Baker and Bacon. This document, as the undersigned was informed by several of the settlers, was in the form of by-laws; and the purport of it was, that the signers, in consequence of their great distance from their own Government, thinking it expedient to form themselves into a society and have laws of their own, agreed that they would resist any further attempt to enforce the laws of Great Britain among them, and would make laws for themselves. John Baker, James Bacon, and Daniel Savage, were constituted a tribunal for the enforcement of law among them, with power to seize and sell property in satisfaction of debts contracted among the settlers. One of the settlers was appointed to the office of constable. These by-laws were to be in force for one year, unless sooner annulled by the American Government. This document, they state, was signed by most of the American settlers, and was offered for signature, and the contents explained to several of the French settlers, one of whom was induced to put his name to it. It was destroyed about a month afterwards.

On the 11th August last a suit was instituted before Mr. Justice Morehouse by Phineas R. Harford against James Bacon for a debt of about eight dollars due from Bacon to Harford. A writ was issued against Bacon by Mr. Morehouse, and delivered to a constable for service. It was the service of this writ which was successfully resisted by the American settlers, who rescued Bacon from the hands of the officer, and drove the latter, but without either threatening or attempting his personal injury, from the settlement. The debt was afterwards paid by Bacon to Harford. Baker is represented by the settlers to have taken the lead in this affair. The undersigned deems it scarcely necessary to add that the proceeding of the settlers on the fourth and fifth of July last, and on the eleventh of August following, were without the authority or knowledge of the Executive of the State of Maine.

The undersigned recommended to the American settlers at Madawaska forbearance and moderation in their future proceedings during the pendency of the existing negotiation between their Government and that of Great Britain in relation to the disputed territory, assuring them that, if their conduct should be inoffensive and peaceable, they might rely upon the protection of their Government; and he has the satisfaction to believe that reliance may be placed upon the assurances he received from the settlers generally that they would hereafter abstain from all acts of individual violence, and from all unnecessary collision with the authorities of the neighboring province.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Letter from Governor Lincoln to S. B. Barrell.

STATE OF MAINE.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, Portland, December 10, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor, in reply to your letter received on the 8th instant, to state that the right to assert jurisdiction over the country watered by the Madawaska and Aroostook, however and whenever it may have been settled, commenced with the period of the first assignment of the boundary of Massachusetts. That right has been relied upon also by Maine, as an independent State, during the whole term of her existence in that capacity, and it seems to be her intention to maintain, as far as the Constitution will permit, the claim she has made. That the whole of the territory adjacent to New Brunswick, now in dispute under the provision of the treaty of 1783, has been considered as American property, must have been a matter of notoriety throughout this country and the contiguous province. Indeed, the claim made by that province to soil and jurisdiction northward and westwardly of Mars Hill is viewed as an astonishing novelty. The acts which are below noticed are regarded as having attached to them a constructive possession of the whole territory claimed, and as evidence of authority over any settlements on the same. There was no occasion for more particular acts immediately applying to every spot. It is not believed that British jurisdiction ever invaded the Aroostook until very recently. The instances of the special application of the power of the State Governments to which you advert are included in the following schedule.

I am, with the most respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

ENOCH LINCOLN.

SAMUEL B. BARRELL, Esq., Fredericton.

P. S.—Please to submit the contents to the inspection of Mr. Davies.

Document accompanying the letter from Governor Lincoln to S. B. Barrell.

ACTS OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Grant to certain soldiers of Mars Hill, "on the eastern line of this Commonwealth," dated March 5, 1801.

Same to General William Eaton, "near the eastern boundary line," March 4, 1806.

Various other subsequent grants.

The resolves under which the above grants were made were published, and no remonstrance is known to have been offered by the British Government. There may have been previous acts of jurisdiction, but there has not been time for an examination by which to ascertain them.

ACT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The census of the Madawaska settlement was taken in 1820, under the authority of the United States, and adopted by them as correct.

ACTS OF MAINE AND MASSACHUSETTS.

In 1822 Benjamin J. Porter, of Topsham, was commissioned by Governor King, and instructed to proceed to the Aroostook and take into his possession any timber that might have been cut by trespassers.

In 1823 James Irish was commissioned by Governor Parris, and directed to proceed to the Aroostook and seize and take all such timber as should be found cut by trespassers on said river westward of the line between Maine and New Brunswick, which was done.

In 1825 James Irish, land agent for Maine, and George W. Coffin, land agent for Massachusetts, were directed by their respective States, pursuant to joint resolves passed by both States, to repair to the Madawaska settlements and there convey such lands as might be applied for; pursuant to which authority said agents did bargain, sell, and convey, to John Baker and James Bacon, one hundred acres of land each, as will appear by said Baker and Bacon's deeds, dated October 4, 1825. Said agents posted up notice at the Catholic church of their authority and intention to sell lands in the Madawaska settlement. Several applications were made to purchase.

The States of Maine and Massachusetts now hold sundry notes of hand for timber cut on the Aroostook by trespassers, with whom the agents have settled, and some money has been received.

Letter from Mr. Vaughan to Sir Howard Douglas.

WASHINGTON, November 20, 1827.

SIR: The Government of the United States having resolved to send Mr. S. B. Barrell to the State of Maine and to the province of New Brunswick for the purpose of obtaining information in regard to the settlements on the Madawaska and the Aroostook, to the causes of recent disturbances there, and especially in respect to the late arrest, trial, and conviction of John Baker, I beg leave to present to you Mr. Barrell, and to request that he may receive from your excellency every assistance in prosecuting the inquiries which he is commissioned by his Government to make.

Mr. Barrell is also directed to procure copies of the process and judicial proceedings which have been instituted against Mr. Baker, and I venture to solicit every indulgence in that part of his commission which your excellency may be able to grant.

I have the honor to be, with great truth and regard, sir, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

His Excellency Sir HOWARD DOUGLAS, Bar't,
His Majesty's Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, &c., &c., &c., Fredericton.

Letter from the Attorney General to S. B. Barrell.

FREDERICTON, December 21, 1827.

SIR: Having received directions from his excellency, the Lieutenant Governor, to furnish you with every information within my power which you may require in regard to the object of your present mission to this province, I beg you will have the goodness to favor me with the particulars of what you may wish, that I may perform the duty required of me by his excellency, who has authorized me to be unreserved in any communication which I may make upon this occasion.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

Letter from S. B. Barrell to the Attorney General.

FREDERICTON, December 21, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter requesting me to designate particularly the information which I am desirous to obtain on subjects connected with my mission to this province, and, in reply, I beg leave to state that I have been requested to inquire particularly into the causes of the arrest of John Baker, and to procure official copies of the process and judicial proceedings against him. Any information, documentary or otherwise, which, in your opinion, may have a tendency to elucidate and explain the late proceedings of the Government of this province in relation to Mr Baker, and with which you may think proper to furnish me, I will receive and convey to the Government of the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

S. B. BARRELL.

HON. THOMAS WETMORE, Attorney General, &c., &c., &c.

F.

Letter to S. B. Barrell, Esq.

FREDERICTON, December 23, 1827.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 21st instant, (which I had the honor to receive this day,) "to be informed particularly as to the causes of the arrest of John Baker, and to be furnished with copies of the process and judicial proceedings against him," I had prepared a number of papers with an intention of conveying the same to you, but finding by a Halifax paper received by to-day's mail that several of those papers had been communicated to Congress with the President's message of the 4th instant, it has become necessary for me to alter, in some degree, the arrangement I had previously made.

The affidavits referred to in Mr. Vaughan's letter to Mr. Clay were the foundation of the magistrate's warrant against Baker, Bacon, and Studson, the three persons named therein. A copy of that warrant, and the return endorsed thereon, I have the honor to send herewith, (marked No. 1.) Upon my return from the northern circuit, which happened after the commencement of the last term of the Supreme Court, I found the defendant, Baker, was in custody, against whom I exhibited an ex officio information, a copy of which accompanies this letter, (marked No. 2.) Upon which information he was charged, and to which he pleaded not guilty, and was committed until he found two sureties, in £50 each, to appear at the next term to take his trial. I well remember he named in court one person who was approved of, but that person was not present, and he could not then name another. That cause stands for trial in the usual course at the next term in February next. Previous to the preparing of the above mentioned warrant, a report had been received from Justice Morehouse of the commission of a very high handed riot and rescue by a party of American citizens in the Madawaska settlement, but no affidavit accompanied the report, and none reached me until the 26th of last month. I now beg leave to refer you to the enclosed documents, (marked No. 3,) being copies of the original report, and the affidavit of Sanfaçon, the constable, and also of the affidavit which was the foundation of the warrant to take James Bacon. Both of the parties in the suit before the magistrate were American citizens, inhabitants of Madawaska.

The want of sufficient information prevented me from proceeding against those rioters, who were, as you will perceive, headed by Baker, at the last term. A suit is also depending against Mr. Baker for trespass and intrusion. I herewith enclose copies of the proceedings therein, (marked No. 4.) He has not yet entered his appearance. Being prevented by the present indisposition of his excellency from having a personal interview with him, I avail myself of the general direction given to me to be unreserved in my communication to you, to enclose to you copies (marked No. 5) of certain documents relating to similar conduct on the part of a late brother of John Baker and other American citizens in 1818. Upon that occasion suits were instituted by me for trespass and intrusion against Nathan Baker and John Harford & Son, which suits, in consequence of their submission, were not further proceeded in.

With great pleasure I also further avail myself of that general direction in sending to you copies (marked No. 6) of the correspondence relating to the mode of executing the first mentioned warrant against John Baker and others, as it will thereby manifestly appear how extremely desirous his excellency has been that the proceedings against those persons should be conducted in such a way as to avoid any just cause of complaint; in short, to have no more done than was absolutely necessary to preserve the supremacy of the laws, without which there would be an end of liberty and all personal security.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

T. WETMORE, Attorney General, New Brunswick.

Letter to S. B. Barrell.

KINGSWOOD, NEAR FREDERICTON, December 25, 1827.

SIR: From the suggestions made at our conference yesterday, I now have the honor of furnishing you with, not only the copies of the documents which I perceive have already been communicated to your Government, and on the 4th instant submitted to Congress, but of other papers which may have a tendency to give a true complexion to those proceedings, which, partly from the want of correct information, but principally from wilful misrepresentation, have produced excitements that have in some degree threatened the disturbance of the peace and harmony which have heretofore prevailed between our neighbors and us. The documents that accompany this are—

1st. A copy of my letter to Justice Morehouse, of the 31st July last, with copies of Adjutant Rice's letter to him of the 25th, and his letter to Mr. Secretary Odell, of the 26th of the same month, relating to the conduct of Baker and others; in a file marked No. 7.

2d. Copies of the depositions of Feirio, Silesté, Chamberland, and Markee, made on the 7th, 8th, and 9th of August last, and Justice Morehouse's letter to me on the 11th of that month, with his list of American citizens settled in Madawaska; in a file marked No. 8.

3d. Copies of Justice Morehouse's report to Mr. Secretary Odell, and the affidavit of Stephen McNiel, the constable, dated the 20th of last September, relating to a riot and rescue, and false imprisonment of the constable, by an armed party of thirteen men, principally British subjects, on the river Restook; in file marked No. 9.

4th. Copies of my letters of the 7th of last September to the Sheriff of York and Justice Morehouse, relating to the issuing of process against Baker, Bacon, and Studson, and directing the manner of executing the same, marked No. 10.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

Subpœna ad respondendum.

[L. S.] George the Fourth, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c., to John Harford, greeting:

We command you that, laying aside all excuses whatsoever, you be and appear, in your proper person, before our justices of our Supreme Court for our province of New Brunswick, at Fredericton, on Saturday next, after the second Tuesday in July next, to answer to us of and concerning certain matters which our behalf shall be then and there objected against you. And this you are by no means to omit, under the penalty of one hundred pounds, which we will cause to be levied on your goods and chattels, lands and tenements, to our use, if you neglect to obey this our present command.

Witness Jonathan Bliss, Esquire, our Chief Justice of Fredericton, the twentieth day of May, in the first year of our reign.

By the Justices.

ODELL.

Endorsed: At the suit of the Attorney General for trespass and intrusion on the Crown lands.

OCTOBER 10, 1825.

SIR: We hereby authorize and direct you to ascertain the amount of timber that may be cut the approaching season upon the St. John river, and upon the several streams and rivers emptying into St. John river above the Grand Falls; and, where permits have been granted by us, settle with the holders of said permits, conformably to the conditions thereof; but where any persons have presumed to cut without our permission, or permission obtained from you upon the same terms, (a copy of one of said permits is here enclosed,) you will require such persons to pay fifty cents per ton for timber, and one dollar and twenty-five cents per thousand for boards; or, on refusing to pay as aforesaid, seize the logs and timber, and sell the same at public auction for the benefit of said Commonwealth and State, first giving thirty days' public notice of the time and place of sale, by posting the advertisement at one or more public places within your district.

GEO. W. COFFIN, Land Agent for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

MR. JAMES BACON.

No. 1.

Justice Morehouse's warrant against John Baker and two others.

YORK. To the high sheriff of the county of York, and his deputies, and to all and singular the [L. S.] constables of the respective towns and parishes in the same county, and to every one of them, greeting:

Forasmuch as it appears to me, George Morehouse, Esquire, one of his Majesty's justices, assigned to keep the peace in and for the said county, as well by the oath of Peter Markee and others as upon my own view, that John Baker, James Bacon, and Charles Studson, all of the parish of Kent, in the county of York, aforesaid, laborers, have been guilty of a high misdemeanor, by endeavoring to persuade and procure divers of the inhabitants of the said parish, his Majesty's loyal subjects, to depart from the allegiance which they owe to his said Majesty, and in violently opposing the execution of the laws of the Realm of England and of this province within the said parish, and opposing and resisting the authority of his Majesty's Government there, and conspiring together to subvert his Majesty's authority and Government in that part of this province: These are, in his Majesty's name, to command you, and every one of you, forthwith to apprehend the said John Baker, James Bacon, and Charles Studson, and bring them before me, the said justice, at my dwelling-house in the said parish, to answer to the said charge, and further to be dealt with according to law. Hereof fail not at your peril. Given under my hand and seal, at the parish of Kent, aforesaid, the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, and in the eighth year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Fourth.

GEORGE MOREHOUSE, Justice of the Peace.

I have taken the body of John Baker, and had him before George Morehouse, Esq., on Tuesday, the twenty-fifth day of September, who referred me to the Attorney General for examination. The said John Baker I have now in custody, to be dealt with as the law may direct. The other offenders, Bacon and Studson, could not be arrested.

Copy of information against John Baker for a misdemeanor, October 13, 1827.

NEW BRUNSWICK, SUPREME COURT. YORK, TO WIT: } Michaelmas term, in the eighth year of the reign of King George IV.

Be it remembered, that Thomas Wetmore, Esq., Attorney General of our sovereign lord the now King for his Majesty's province of New Brunswick, who, for our said lord the King, prosecutes in this behalf, in his own proper person, comes here into the court of our said lord the King, before the King himself, at Fredericton, in the county of York, on Saturday next, after the second Tuesday in October, in this same term, and, for our said lord the King, gives the court here to understand and be informed that John Baker, of the parish of Kent, in the county of York, laborer, being a person greatly disaffected to our said lord the now King and his Government, within this, his Majesty's province of New Brunswick, and contriving, endeavoring, and unlawfully, maliciously, factiously, and seditiously intending to vex, molest, and disturb the peace and common tranquillity of this province, and to bring into hatred and contempt our most serene lord the now King and his Government, and for creating false opinions and suspicions in the people and subjects of our said lord the King, of and concerning the Government and administration of our said lord the King, and of the royal power and undisputed prerogative of our said lord the King within this province, he, the said John Baker, for performing, perfecting, and effecting his said most wicked contrivances and intentions, on the fifteenth day of July, in the eighth year of the reign of our sovereign lord King George the Fourth, at the parish of Kent aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, with force and arms, contemptuously, maliciously, factiously, and seditiously applied to one Peter Markee, being one of the subjects of our said lord the King, residing and inhabiting within the said parish, and then and there endeavored to persuade and seduce the said Peter Markee to depart from and violate the allegiance which he owed to our said lord the King, and did then and there present to the said Peter Markee a written paper, then and there requesting and persuading him, the said Peter Markee, to subscribe his name thereto; then and there stating to the said Peter Markee that the same paper was drawn up by him, the said John Baker, and others residing in the Madawaska settlement, in the parish aforesaid, and county aforesaid, with an intent thereby to bind those who subscribed the same paper to defend one another against any act of a British officer, civil or military, and not to allow the British laws to be put in force among them in the said Madawaska settlement aforesaid, (to wit, in the parish aforesaid, and county aforesaid,) he, the said John Baker, then and there declaring that the British Government, meaning the Government of our said lord the King, had no right to exercise any authority over the inhabitants of the said settlement, and that the Government of the United States of America would protect him, the said John Baker, and others his confederates, as aforesaid, in what they were then doing. And that he, the said John Baker, in order further to perform, perfect, and effect his malicious, factious, and seditious intentions and designs aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the eighteenth day of the same month of July, in the year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, endeavored to oppose and obstruct the postman, then and there having the custody and carriage of his Majesty's mail to Canada, in the prosecution of his journey with the same mail, he, the said John Baker, then and there declaring, with a loud voice, in presence and hearing of divers of the subjects of our said lord the King, that England had no right to send her mails by that route, (meaning through that part of the said parish of Kent,) and that he, the said John Baker, had received orders from the said Government of the United States to stop the conveyance of the said mails through the same; to the derogation, great damage, diminution, and prejudice of our said lord the King and his prerogative, in very great contempt of our said lord the King and his laws, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, and against the peace of our said lord the King, his crown, and dignity.

Whereupon the said Attorney General of our said lord the King, who for our said lord the King in this behalf prosecutes for our said lord the King, prays the consideration of the court here in the premises, and that due process of law may be awarded against the said John Baker, in this behalf, to make him answer to our said lord the King touching and concerning the premises aforesaid.

Copies of report of Justice Morehouse, and other documents relating to the riot and rescue of James Bacon.

KENT, August 22, 1827.

SIR: A few days subsequent to my inquiries into the late conduct of American citizens in Madawaska, application was made to me by one Phineas R. Hofford for a capias to hold James Bacon, one of the ring-leaders in their refractory conduct, to bail for debt. I issued the writ, and the constable, Joseph Sanfaçon, has this day made report to me that he served it on Bacon, but that Bacon was rescued and taken out of his hands by a party of Americans, about twelve in number, all armed with muskets and swords, who ordered him to go about his business, and threatened to take his life if he returned, as well as the person who applied for the writ, thus putting in execution their threats that they would not allow the laws of England to be put in force amongst them. From this flagrant conduct of them, I shall not attempt to issue any more writs against them until they are reduced and compelled to adopt a more friendly line of conduct towards us, as I conceive that sending constables among them will be running an unnecessary risk of their lives.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE MOREHOUSE.

THOMAS WETMORE, Esq.

NEW BRUNSWICK, York, ss.

Joseph Sanfaçon, of Madawaska, and one of the constables of the parish of Kent, in the county of York, and province of New Brunswick, maketh oath and saith: That having a capias to hold to bail James Bacon, an American citizen, residing in Madawaska, at the suit of Phineas Reynold Hofford, deponent proceeded for that purpose to the residence of the said James Bacon, in Madawaska, on the morning of the 11th of August last, between the hours of 7 and 9 o'clock a. m., when deponent took the said Bacon prisoner, and demanded bail. That Bacon declared he would not submit to the authority of that writ, but immediately sent a man to bring John Baker and others to rescue him. That the said John Baker, an American citizen, resident there, came armed with a sword, and with him a party of men, American citizens, to wit: John Schoedder, armed with a musket; Walter Powers, Nathaniel Bartlett, Daniel Savage, Isaac Jones, and John Baker, jr., all armed with clubs, as well as others, American citizens, unknown to this dependent. That John Baker, Nathaniel Bartlett, and Daniel Savage acted as leaders in the fray, and encouraged the others to assist in rescuing Bacon; that they demanded of deponent to give up his prisoner, and on his refusal so to do, stepped forward and by force took him away; at the same time they formed a ring, putting Bacon in the midst of them, and declaring that if it was a writ from the United States they would submit to its authority, but that they had bound themselves not to submit to the laws of England.

That John Baker addressed himself to this deponent in most violent language, threatening to take his life for attempting to serve that writ, when this deponent, finding any further attempts to do his duty useless, desisted and went away.

JOSEPH SANFAÇON.

YORK, ss.

Phineas Reynold Hofford, of the town or parish of Kent, in the county of York, maketh oath and saith: That James Bacon, of the town or parish of Kent, in the said county of York, is justly and truly indebted unto this deponent in the sum of five pounds of lawful money of New Brunswick, over and above all discounts; and that he, the said James Bacon, is about to abscond or depart from this county, as he, the deponent, is informed and verily believes; and that he, the deponent, will be in danger of losing his said debt unless the said debtor be held to bail for the said sum, so due as aforesaid, in an action which the deponent is now about to commence for the recovery of the same.

PHINEAS R. HOFFORD.

Sworn before me, this 9th day of August, 1827.

GEORGE MOREHOUSE, Justice of the Peace for the County of York.

YORK, ss.—George Morehouse, Esq., one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the County of York:

To either of the constables of the town or parish of Kent, in the said county, greeting: You are hereby commanded to take James Bacon, if he shall be found in your parish, and him safely keep, so that you may have his body before me, at my office, in Kent, in the said county, on ———day, the ——— day of August, to answer Phineas Reynold Hofford in an action for debt in the sum of five pounds, and have you then there this precept.

Given under my hand and seal, at Kent, this 9th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.

Information and process against John Baker for trespass and intrusion.

In the Supreme Court.—Exchequer side.

York, to wit:

Be it remembered, that Thomas Wetmore, Esq., Attorney General of our sovereign lord the King for this his Majesty's province of New Brunswick, who prosecutes for our said lord the King, comes, in his own proper person, into the court of our said lord the King, before the justices of our said lord the King at Fredericton, on the seventeenth day of September, in the eighth year of the reign of our sovereign lord the now King, and for our said lord the King gives the court here to understand and be informed: That, whereas a certain tract or parcel of land, situated in the parish of Kent, in the county of York, in the said province, and lying on both sides of the river St. John, between the mouth of the Madawaska river and the river St. Francis, and containing, in the whole, fifty thousand acres, in the hands and possession of our said lord the King, on the first day of February, in the first year of his reign, and before and continually after, was, and of right ought to be, and yet ought to be, in the right of his Imperial Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and as part of the dominions of our said lord the King in this province, and for so long a time as there is no remembrance of any man to the contrary, has been in the possession of the said lord the King and his predecessors, the Kings and Queens of Great Britain and Ireland, and a part of the dominions of the said Crown. Nevertheless, one John Baker, of the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, farmer, the laws of the said lord the King in nowise regarding, but intending the disherison of the said lord the King in the premises, on the first day of February, in the second year of the reign of our said present sovereign lord the King, and on divers days and times before and since, with force and arms, and without any lawful authority, in and upon the possession of the said lord the King, of a part of his said lands, to wit: One hundred acres thereof lying on the westerly side of the Land Turtle, or Mereumpticook river, a branch of the said river St. John, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, intruded and entered and erected, and built thereon a certain house, and other edifices, and cut and felled divers, to wit: five hundred timber and other trees thereon standing and growing, of the value, together, of one hundred pounds, and took and carried away the timber and wood arising from the said trees, and of his own will disposed thereof, and the issues and profits of the same land coming, received, and had, and as yet doth receive and have, to his own use, and still holds and keeps possession of the same lands. And the said trespass aforesaid hitherto and yet continuing, to the great annoyance of our said lord the King, in contempt of our said lord the King, and contrary to his laws and against the peace of our said lord the King: Whereupon the said Attorney General of our said lord the King, for the said lord the King, prays the advice of the court here in the premises. And that the aforesaid John Baker come here to answer the said lord the King in the premises.

T. WETMORE, Attorney General.

We command you, firmly enjoining that, laying aside all excuses whatsoever, you be, in your own proper person, before the justices of our Supreme Court of judicature for our province of New Brunswick, at Fredericton, on the second Tuesday in October next, to answer to us of and concerning certain matters which on our behalf shall be then and there objected against you. And this you are by no means to omit, under the penalty of one hundred pounds, which we will cause to be levied on your goods and chattels, lands and tenements, to our use, if you neglect to obey this our present command.

Witness John Saunders, Esquire, our Chief Justice at Fredericton, the seventeenth day of September, in the eighth year of our reign.

By the Justices.

Correspondence, &c., relating to the intrusions of Nathan Baker and others, in 1818.

St. John, December 29, 1818.

Sir: Some short time since the enclosed letter was forwarded to me by the honorable Judge Bliss, from a Mr. Du Perreé, at the Grand Falls, stating that some Americans had recently set themselves down at the Madawaska settlement, on the plea that the ground belonged to the United States.

A copy of Mr. Du Perreé's letter has been shown to our minister at Washington by Colonel Barclay, and I now send you a copy of Mr. Bagot's communication on the subject, and from a consideration of which I have to request that you will take immediate steps to get more particular information from Mr. Du Perreé, and further act in the affair as you may judge legal and expedient.

I have to request to be acquainted, from time to time, as to the exact state of this transaction.

I have the honor to be, sir, your humble servant,

G. S. SMYTH.

The Hon. Attorney General.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1818.

SIR: I received on the 4th your letter of the 2d instant, and have since had an opportunity of speaking upon the subject of it with Mr. Adams.

From my conversation with him, I have every reason to be assured that the American Government will readily take whatever measure may be necessary to prevent the occupation of American citizens of any part of the territory, which, until otherwise decided by the Commissioners of Boundary, is considered to be ours; but Mr. Adams appears to think that the persons referred to in Mr. Du Perreé's letter to Judge Bliss, are, in reality, what are called squatters, and must be dealt with accordingly.

In this view of the subject, it appears to me that the Governor of New Brunswick need not scruple to displace them by whatever is the ordinary process resorted to against persons of this description; and if their names can be ascertained and communicated to me, this Government will not delay to request the Governor of Massachusetts to take such steps in respect to them as may depend upon him.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

Colonel BARCLAY.

MADAWASKA, September 5, 1818.

SIR: After paying you my best respects, I shall be very glad if our jurisdiction be enforced as usual in Madawaska, because there are several American families arrived amongst us from the Kennebec river, who would induce many of the inhabitants of this district to believe that the jurisdiction of the United States is in force, and that of New Brunswick not, which I do not believe; and I hope that your honor will be pleased to have me in your consideration in relation to this matter.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

P. DU PERREÉ.

Hon. J. MURRAY BLISS.

FREDERICTON, January 8, 1819.

SIR: Your letter to the honorable Judge Bliss, of the 5th of last September, stating "that some Americans had recently set themselves down at the Madawaska settlement, on the plea that the ground belonged to the United States," having been sent by him to his excellency the Lieutenant Governor, and a copy of it shown to his Majesty's envoy to the United States, and a conference had thereon with the Secretary of State of that Government, I have received the Lieutenant Governor's commands to get more particular information from you on the subject, and to take such steps in the affair as may be legal and expedient. I must, therefore, request that you will, as soon as possible, inform me of the names of any American citizens who have within the last eight months taken up their residence in the Madawaska settlement, or anywhere in the neighborhood of it, to the westward of the line of experiment lately run across the river St. John, and the particular places where they may have set themselves down, and the time when, and whether on ungranted lands or lands bought from individuals, and from whom; and, also, whether any surveys have been lately made by any American surveyors on the Madawaska or St. John rivers to the westward of the said line. In short, I must beg of you to give me the fullest and most particular information of any attempt that has been, since the running of that line, made by any Americans to encroach upon that part of his Majesty's territory; for, until it is otherwise decided by the Commissioners of Boundary, the whole of the river St. John, and, of course, the Madawaska river, must be considered as belonging to his Majesty.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS WETMORE, Attorney General.

Captain PETER DU PERREÉ, Madawaska.

MADAWASKA, February 20, 1819.

HONORED SIR: In answer to your letter of the 8th of January, I have sent you a particular account of the Americans who have taken up their residence in the Madawaska settlement. Captain Nathan Baker came to Madawaska twelve months ago. At that time he wished to introduce the laws of the States; brought a magistrate along with him from the States to form a corporation, and desired my concurrence. I told him I would have nothing to do with such matters before the line was settled between the British Government and the States. I likewise told the rest of the French settlers to have nothing to do with him about such matters, which they did. In August last he brought his wife and family from Kennebec river, and took up his residence in the upper settlement of Madawaska, and built a house. In the beginning of October he began to lumber, and with five men took a range for wood through ten lots, on all which there are settlers, and some of them established fifteen years ago, and have made considerable improvements. Some of the inhabitants forbade him to cut wood upon their lots; he said it did not belong to them but to the States. He has already about ten or twelve hundred tons of timber, a great part of which I saw, on the 19th February, upon the banks of the river St. John, on the north side. He appears to me to be a man who takes much upon him. In August last Captain Flecher came from the States and entered into partnership with him in the lumber trade.

John Herford came from the States with his wife and family at the same time, and took up his residence in the upper settlement of Madawaska, built a house, and is carrying on improvements on his land.

Likewise his son, George Herford, with his wife and family, settled beside his father and built a house, and is improving his land. About three months ago they came down to make shingles, at the mouth of the Madawaska river, upon the land belonging to the Indians, but will return to their settlements, when the river opens, to plant. In the last of September, Esquire Johnson's son, one of the American surveyors, made a survey upon the north side of the river St. John, beginning at the mouth of the Madawaska river, up to the river St. Francis; he measured the French settlement at the same time. If you want any more information respecting these or other matters, I shall be happy to give you all the information in my power.

I am, honored sir, your most obedient servant,

P. DU PERREÉ, Captain of the Militia.

Letters to Sheriff Miller, report to the Lieutenant Governor, and his excellency's approval of the course pursued by the Attorney General.

KINGSWOOD, September 13, 1827.

SIR: Upon my arrival here last night I was much surprised and a little alarmed at the intelligence I received, of the manner in which the sheriff had commenced his journey up the river to perform the service required of him in regard to the execution of process on the Madawaska intruders; and I this morning early despatched my son Robert in pursuit of him with a letter, of which I beg to trouble your excellency with a copy. That letter reached him at the distance of about eight miles from town. The effect it produced will appear by the certificate thereon endorsed.

A few moments' consideration led to the conclusion that my duty was not discharged until I had used my utmost exertion to put a stop to the execution of a project which I was very apprehensive might produce serious mischief and greatly embarrass your excellency in any attempt at explanation why, instead of only two or three attendants, the sheriff should have proceeded with a party of sixteen men, armed and equipped as a military body. I therefore wrote another letter to the sheriff, which overtook him at the distance of about twenty-two miles from town. To a copy of that letter, and the certificate thereunder written, I crave leave also to refer your excellency.

The sheriff intends, as my son informs me, to proceed in the morning on horseback, in the way pointed out in my letter of the 7th instant.

The steps which I have taken, although they may be disapproved of by some, will, I hope, be considered by your excellency to be such as could not have been omitted, under existing circumstances, without a neglect of my duty.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient and very humble servant,

T. WETMORE, Attorney General.

No. 7.

Copies of letters relating to the conduct of John Baker and others, and directing an inquiry into the same.

KINGSWOOD, September 13, 1827.

SIR: Being informed upon my arrival last night from the city that you had, contrary to the direction contained in my letter of the 7th, proceeded on your journey up the river with a posse from Fredericton to execute the process which Mr. Justice Morehouse is requested to issue against Baker and two others, I have considered it a matter of sufficient importance to despatch my son express after you with this my protest against that measure, or any other deviation from his excellency's commands, as expressed in that letter, which has received his entire approbation. Two attendants will be amply sufficient, and better than three, and those not armed in any unusual way. The process is to be executed in the usual and ordinary manner, and it is committed to you to induce a ready submission to the laws when carried into execution by an officer of your rank; and if you make any parade of force until after you meet with opposition and resistance, you will incur his excellency's great displeasure.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. WETMORE, Attorney General.

Mr. Sheriff MILLER.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1827.

I do certify that I did this day deliver to Mr. Sheriff Miller a letter of which this is a copy; and at the same time intimated that his proceeding upon his expedition with so many attendants, and in such a manner, would be acting in direct violation of his excellency's commands; and that it must be upon his own responsibility.

His reply to me was, that he had taken the advice of the council, and that, at all events, he would not now return.

T. R. WETMORE, Clerk to the Attorney General.

KINGSWOOD, September 13, 1827.

SIR: Finding from my son's report to me that you are determined to act in opposition to the wishes and commands of his excellency the Lieutenant Governor in the business which has been the subject of my letter to you of this morning, it becomes my indispensable duty to require that you return to me by the bearer the despatch which I intrusted to your care, addressed to Mr. Justice George Morehouse, in my letter to you of the 7th instant, as all further proceedings in the affair must be suspended until his excellency's pleasure shall be known in regard to the extraordinary course you are pursuing, of which I shall make an immediate report.

If you withhold that letter after this requisition, you will reduce me to the necessity of sending an express to Mr. Morehouse to countermand the directions therein contained.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. WETMORE, Attorney General.

EDWARD WINSLOW MILLER, Esq., High Sheriff of York.

P. S.—As it is his excellency's wish that no time should be lost in performing the service in which you are now engaged, you are at liberty to proceed, upon condition only that you take with you but two attendants; and it appears to me that were you to go on horseback you would execute the duty in one-fourth of the time.

T. W.

[Endorsed upon the preceding letter.]

Mr. Sheriff Miller, upon seeing me, having concluded immediately to return, and having anticipated the nature of my errand, I deemed it unnecessary to deliver him the despatch of which the preceding is a copy, but read to him such parts of the same as were necessary for his information, particularly the postscript, by which he was at liberty to retain the despatch to Mr. Justice Morehouse upon the condition therein stated.

T. R. WETMORE, Clerk to the Attorney General.

ST. JOHN, September 18, 1827.

SIR: I am commanded by his excellency the Lieutenant Governor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant, and its several enclosures, reporting to his excellency the manner in which the sheriff of York county had commenced his journey up the river to perform the service required of him, in regard to the execution of process on the Madawaska intruders.

His excellency desires me to convey to you his excellency's entire sanction and approbation of the course you have pursued, and of the directions which you gave the sheriff on this occasion, who would have incurred his excellency's most severe displeasure had he persisted in the manner of proceeding in which it appears he had commenced his journey.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient, humble servant,

C. DOUGLAS, Private Secretary.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.

FREDERICTON, July 31, 1827.

SIR: Your letter of the 26th to the provincial Secretary, enclosing a letter from Mr. Francis Rice to you, dated 25th instant, having been referred to me by his excellency the Lieutenant Governor, with directions to procure the necessary affidavits of the facts stated by Mr. Rice, I must request you will be pleased, with the least possible delay, to proceed to the place, and possess yourself of the best proofs of the conduct of Baker and others, which you will forward to me under cover to the Secretary. I send herewith a copy of Mr. Rice's letter for your guidance.

You will be particularly careful to ascertain, if possible, whether Baker is acting under pretended authority or not; and procure, if you can, a copy of the paper which has been offered for signature.

Should Baker or any other person use any violence or force to obstruct the post, you will of course consider it your duty, upon receiving the complaint under oath, to cause the offender to be arrested and committed to jail, unless he gives satisfactory security for his appearance at the next Supreme Court to answer to the charge.

I must beg you will furnish me with a sketch or general description of the lands which Baker or any other American citizen is in possession of in the neighborhood of Madawaska, and the length of time they have possessed the same.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

T. WETMORE, Attorney General.

Copies of Justice Morehouse's report, with affidavits of Peter Markee and others, and a list of American citizens settled in Madawaska.

KENT, July 25, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a letter addressed to me by Mr. Francis Rice, adjutant of the Madawaska militia, by which you will see the American subjects residing in that settlement are disposed to acts of aggression which his excellency may think proper to take measures to put a stop to. I therefore request that you will lay this before his excellency for his consideration.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE MOREHOUSE.

W. F. ODELL, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

GRAND RIVER, MADAWASKA, July 25, 1827.

SIR: Having commenced, Saturday, 21st instant, the militia company training, and finding some disorder amongst the people, occasioned by Baker and others in the upper settlement, I find it my duty to let you know as much as I am informed concerning them. In the first place, they have a written document, wherein they say they have authority from the States to have it signed by the French people of Madawaska. This they have proposed to many of the inhabitants, and, I am sorry to say, they have persuaded some of them to sign it; the name of one of the signers is Abraham Chamberland. Baker is the head man. All this can be proven by oath. In the second place, Baker met the postman, and asked him what he had got with him; he told him it was the province mail. Then Baker told the post that he had orders from the States to stop it. The man told him that if he was a better man than him, to try and take it. Baker answered and said, he would let it pass for this time, but at a future period he would put his orders in execution.

Sir, if this Baker and others are not stopped immediately, they will corrupt a great part of our militia. You have heard of the liberty pole they have raised in this settlement. I need not give you any information as to that: anything strange that may happen in this place I will trouble you with the shortest notice.

I am, sir, with greatest respect, your humble and obedient servant,

FRANCIS RICE, Adjutant.

NEW BRUNSWICK, York, ss.

William Feirio, of Madawaska, in the parish of Kent, county of York, and province of New Brunswick, maketh oath and saith: That by an invitation from John Baker, an American citizen, who resides in Madawaska, he, the deponent, went to the said Baker on the fourth day of July last, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven; that Baker and the other American citizens then raised a flagstaff and placed the American flag thereon; that the said Baker then declared that place to be American territory, which he repeated to this deponent and other French settlers then there, and that they must, for the future, look upon themselves as subjects of the United States, who would protect them and him in what he was doing.

WILLIAM his ⋈ mark. FEIRIO.

Sworn before me, at Madawaska, in Kent, this 8th day of August, 1827.

GEORGE MOREHOUSE,
Justice of the Peace.

NEW BRUNSWICK, York, ss:

Peter Sileste, of the Madawaska settlement, in the parish of Kent and county of York, in the province of New Brunswick, maketh oath and saith: That on the 18th day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, as this deponent was proceeding up the river St. John, in charge of the mail for Canada, one John Baker, an American citizen, who resides in Madawaska, met him near the chapel, when the said Baker demanded of this deponent what he had in his canoe; on being told by this deponent it was the mail for Canada, the said Baker then declared that England had no right to send her mails that route, and that he (Baker) had received orders from the Government of the United States to stop them; but on the deponent's saying that he should not have that mail without he was a better man than deponent, he (Baker) said it might pass for that time, but for the future it should not, as he was determined to put the orders of his Government into execution.

PETER his ⋈ mark. SILESTE.

Sworn before me, at Madawaska, in the parish of Kent, this 9th day of August, 1827.

GEORGE MOREHOUSE,
Magistrate for the County of York.

NEW BRUNSWICK, York, ss:

Abraham Chamberland, of the Madawaska settlement, in the parish of Kent and county of York, in the province of New Brunswick, maketh oath and saith: That on or about the fifteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, one Charles Studson, an American citizen, residing in Madawaska, presented a written paper to deponent, and asked him to sign it; that deponent asked him the contents of the said paper, when the said Studson informed him that by that paper they bound themselves to oppose the execution of the laws of England amongst them in Madawaska, and that his Government, the United States, would protect them in what they were doing.

ABRAHAM his ⋈ mark. CHAMBERLAND.

Sworn before me, at Madawaska, in the parish of Kent and county of York, this 7th day of August, 1827.

GEORGE MOREHOUSE.
Justice of the Peace for the County of Kent.

NEW BRUNSWICK, York, ss:

Peter Markee, of the Madawaska settlement, in the parish of Kent and county of York, in the province of New Brusnwick, maketh oath and saith: That on or about the fifteenth day of July last, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, three persons, John Baker, James Bacon, and Charles Studson, American citizens, residing in the Madawaska settlement, came to this deponent and presented a paper to him to sign his name thereto. That on deponent asking them the contents of it, they declared that it was a document drawn up by them and others residing in Madawaska, the intention of which was that they bound themselves to defend each other against any act of a British officer, civil or military; that they did not intend to allow the British laws to be put in force amongst them in the Madawaska settlement; that the British Government had no right to exercise any authority over them, as that was American territory, and the Government of the United States would protect them in what they were doing.

GEORGE MOREHOUSE,
Justice of the Peace for the County of York.

KENT, August 11, 1827.

SIR: In compliance with your request, contained in your letter of the 31st of July, I proceeded, without delay, to Madawaska to inquire into the conduct of Baker and other American citizens in that settlement, on which, for the information of Government, I beg leave to make the following report:

After getting the affidavits of some of the French settlers, I went up the river to where there is a settlement forming by Americans, and endeavored to get in my possession the paper which had been offered for signatures, but found that quite out of the question; they pointedly refused to let me see it. As soon as it was known that I was in their settlement, Baker and others hoisted the American flag as a token of defiance. I ordered him to pull it down, but instead of complying, Baker, as their organ, made the following declaration:

That they had hoisted that flag, and they had mutually entered into a written agreement to keep it there, and that nothing but a force superior to their own should take it down. That they considered, and had a right to consider, themselves on the territory of the United States, and that they had bound themselves to resist by force the execution of the laws of Great Britain amongst them; and that they had a right to expect, and would receive, the protection and support of their Government in what they were doing.

It seems the flag in question was first raised on the 4th of July last, when Baker, a few days previous, personally invited the most of the French settlers to join them in that act; but I am happy to have it in my power to say that but few complied.

I find that they are using every argument to induce the French people to declare themselves American subjects, and I fear if those fellows are not well looked after they will eventually succeed in their designs, for I find their insinuations have already had the effect to throw some of the people in doubt whether they are to consider themselves British or American subjects. And I trust his Majesty's Government will speedily take such measures as will convince the French settlers of Madawaska that the Americans have no right to act as they do, and crush this banditti, for I feel convinced that, unless this transaction is promptly followed by some other to suppress them, the French, it is more than probable, will shortly consider us the intruders.

I herewith send the affidavits of the postman whom Baker was said to have stopped, which will show what passed between them; also a list of American citizens settled on the river St. John, above the French settlement.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient,

GEORGE MOREHOUSE.

THOMAS WETMORE, Esq.

List of American citizens in possession of lands in Madawaska, quantity, &c.

James Bacon, on the lower or southeast side of the Mereumpticook creek, fronting the river St. John, 100 acres, deeded to him in 1825 by James Irish and George W. Coffin; settled nine years.

John Baker, on the upper or southwest side of the creek, 100 acres, deeded to him by Coffin and Irish; settled nine years.

Charles Studson, joining Bacon, on the lower side, 100 acres; settled three years.

Mathias Acorn, joining Baker, on the northwest; settled one year; in possession of 100 acres.

John Scheodder joins Acorn on the west; in possession of 100 acres; settled two years.

Stephen Grover, joining Scheodder, on the west side; one year settled; 100 acres.

John Hofford, about two miles above Grover's; settled ten years.

Oakes, about three miles above the Mereumpticook, on the southwest side of the river St. John; in possession of 100 acres; three years settled.

John Hofford, about five miles above Fish river, 200 acres; settled ten years.

Fish river empties into the St. John, on the southwest side, about five miles above the Mereumpticook.

John Hofford, jr., joining the last mentioned, on the west side, 100 acres; settled one year.

Copy of Justice Morehouse's report to the Attorney General, and of the affidavit of McNiel, the constable, relating to a riot and rescue, &c., on the river Restook.

KENT, September 20, 1827.

SIR: Stephen McNiel, one of the constables of Kent, came before me this day and made a deposition respecting the treatment he has met with from the Restook settlers, in the execution of his duty as a constable. He had a writ against the property of one Joseph Arnold, a Restook settler, which he served, and was proceeding down the river with the property levied on, and was overtaken by a party of the settlers, armed with fire-arms, when they took him prisoner and rescued the cow, (the property by him taken;) they kept him a prisoner during the night, and threatened him that if Johnstone, their magistrate, (nominated by themselves,) would give a mittimus, they would carry him a prisoner to some of the jails in the State of Maine. They despatched a messenger to him, (Johnstone,) and it seems he would not comply with their demand. They then released McNiel and sent him off, declaring that they were American citizens, and they would not allow the laws of Great Britain to be put in force against them or their property; and that they would take the life of any sheriff or constable that should attempt to come amongst them again. In consequence of this outrageous and highhanded conduct of theirs, I shall desist from sending any constable amongst them until I hear from you on the subject. Their names are given in McNiel's deposition. The most of them are British subjects, removed from different parts of this province to the Restook. Dalton, Stewart, and Morton are known to be American citizens.

I beg you will be pleased to lay this before his excellency the Lieutenant Governor for his consideration.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE MOREHOUSE.

WILLIAM F. ODELL, Esq.

YORK, to wit:

Stephen McNiel, one of the constables of the parish of Kent, in the said county of York, maketh oath and saith: That on Monday, the 17th day of this present month of September, 1827, he proceeded up the Restook river to serve a writ on Joseph Arnold, and also to seize property of said Arnold. That having taken, by virtue of the said authority, a cow from him, proceeded down the river to William McCrea's, where he put up for the night. That between the hours of seven and nine o'clock in the evening, thirteen men, (settlers on the Restook,) armed with fusees, followed, and there overtook deponent, when they demanded of him to restore the cow, and give himself up as a prisoner, which he was compelled to do. That they then sent off two of their party to collect more of the said settlers to their assistance, and also to bring to them one Lewis Johnstone, whom they said to deponent that they had nominated a magistrate, and that if he would give a mittimus to carry him to jail, in the State of Maine, they would carry him there; but Johnstone refusing to do so, they then released deponent, and desired him to go home, and at his peril never to come there as a constable again, nor any other person under the authority of the British laws, as they considered themselves American subjects, and were determined not to submit to the laws of England, but would resist them by force. That the party who came armed against him are as follows: Joseph Arnold, William Dalton, Seth Stewart, Peter Bull, Joshua Christie, Thomas Beckwith, John Beckwith, Ferdinand Armstrong, Thomas Feeby, William Brown, James Rau, —— Morton, and John Rafford.

Copies of letters from the Attorney General to Sheriff Miller and Justice Morehouse, relating to the issuing and service of process on Baker, Bacon, and Studson.

ST. JOHN, September 7, 1827.

SIR: His excellency having had under consideration your report to me of the 11th ultimo, and the affidavits accompanying the same, has deemed it expedient to direct that legal steps should be immediately taken against Baker and others for the high misdemeanor committed by them, and that the high sheriff should in person execute the process.

I send to you herewith copies of the affidavits, and a warrant, which the Solicitor General and myself are of opinion the report and affidavits will justify you in issuing.

When the defendants are arrested, you will please to offer to take bail for their appearance at the next Supreme Court to answer to the charge, and in the meantime to keep the peace and to be of good behavior. I think they should each be bound in £100, with two sureties, each in £50. Perhaps your accompanying the sheriff up may save time and trouble to both of you.

It will be advisable for you to renew the process which the constable was prevented from executing, and the sheriff will see it duly executed; and perhaps you may find it expedient to issue other warrants against those who oppose the constable, and for other breaches of the peace, of which you must be the judge.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. WETMORE, Attorney General.

GEORGE MOREHOUSE, Esq.

ST. JOHN, September 7, 1827.

SIR: Having received the commands of his excellency the Lieutenant Governor to carry into effect a certain course of proceedings against John Baker and other American citizens for violently opposing and resisting his Majesty's authority and the execution of the laws in the upper part of the parish of Kent, and attempting to seduce his Majesty's subjects there to depart from their allegiance to his Majesty, I have written to Mr. Justice George Morehouse to issue his warrant for the arrest of the offenders, which warrant his excellency the Lieutenant Governor now deems it expedient should be delivered to you, to be executed in person, on account of the resistance which it is supposed may be made.

In the performance of this service it will be advisable for you, while acting with firmness, to be careful to use no more force than will be necessary for the execution of the warrant. Two or three attendants will be quite sufficient to take with you from Fredericton, as you can obtain as much assistance as will be required in the neighborhood of Madawaska; and it is very desirable that the service should be performed quietly, and with the least possible parade.

The enclosed despatch I will thank you to deliver to Justice Morehouse as soon as you can possibly make it convenient.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

T. WETMORE, Attorney General.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 474. [1ST SESSION

CLAIMS OF INDEMNITY FOR SLAVES AND OTHER PROPERTY UNDER THE FIRST ARTICLE OF THE TREATY OF GHENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 10, 1828.

To the honorable the House of Representatives:

A Memorial on behalf of the Virginia and Maryland claimants under the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

The claim for slaves and other private property grew out of the first article of the treaty of Ghent. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, widely differing as to the construction of the said article, submitted the whole subject to the decision and award of the Emperor of all the Russias. Upon the rendition of his award, his further mediation was invoked to have prepared a convention at St. Petersburg, to carry into effect the objects of his award, as expounding the first article of the treaty of Ghent. A mixed commission was constituted soon after, which met in the city of Washington. After continuing from 1824 until 1826, it was well ascertained that the British and American Commissioners would never agree as to the true construction of the said convention. They submitted the points of difference and their arguments to their respective Governments, and Mr. Gallatin, the minister of the United States, concluded with the British Government the convention of London, in November, 1826, which was duly ratified. In the said last convention it was stipulated, in effect, that the British Government was to be wholly released and exonerated from all claims for slaves and other private property, upon the payment of "twelve hundred and four thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars."

This amount has been paid. Congress, about the 1st of March, 1827, passed a law constituting a Board of Commissioners to carry into effect the first article of the treaty. The St. Petersburg convention was dissolved, save only as to two particulars:

1. The definitive list was not to be disturbed.
2. The average value of the slaves was to remain the same as fixed upon by the mixed commission.

The commission, recently appointed, was untrammelled by any other of the provisions of the convention concluded at St. Petersburg, and were left free to act in conformity with the stipulations of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, as expounded by the Russian Emperor.

The board, composed of the Honorable Langdon Cheves, James P. Pleasants, and Henry Sewell, formed in the city of Washington in July last, and proceeded to the discharge of their duties.

The southern claims were mainly put down for decision. There were doubts upon two very important points: First, whether the ships that lay off the islands of Cumberland and Amelia were within the jurisdictional limits of the United States at the time of the ratification of the treaty? Secondly, whether Dauphin island, at the time of the peace, was in the possession of the United States?

The board decided both questions in favor of the claimants, and forthwith some two or three hundred thousand dollars were awarded and paid over. Much, very much, depended upon the decision of these two questions, as they related to the interest of the south; and I dare say that the Virginia and Maryland claimants and agents would have thought it improper and unfair to have interfered in the least to hurt the interest, or to defeat the claims of their south countrymen.

The Chesapeake claimants had lost their property at various times during the war and up to the return of peace. They and their friends were almost broken down by the frequent calls of the military authorities to defend the repeated and annoying invasions of the predatory and incendiary enemy, who burnt their houses, despoiled their improvements, and robbed them of their property; amid all these ills they were the truest and the most devoted patriots. I cannot forbear to give one instance which occurred in the northern neck of Virginia.

In July and August, 1814, the enemy made several landings, and, with increased fierceness, inflicted numerous wrongs upon the people. All the militia in this peninsula were called into service, and the property was pretty well protected. On a sudden, an order came (I think it was from General Winder) that all the troops should forthwith be marched to the defence of Washington; which order was promptly obeyed; and this neck of eighteen miles wide, upwards of one hundred miles long, washed by bold and navigable waters, a hostile fleet in sight, was emptied of all its efficient forces for nearly six weeks. None but our women, children, and old men remained. During the absence of the forces there was nothing to restrain our slaves, and they flocked in hundreds to the enemy.

But to return. It had been urged, during the time of the mixed commission, upon the part of the claimants, that, when they had proved the taking of their slaves by the enemy, it would then devolve upon the British Government to show, by satisfactory evidence, the precise point of time when the slaves were deported. But we are told now that this is a new point: it is as old as the existence of the mixed commission.

The Virginia and Maryland claimants could never produce but very little positive evidence of the exact place where their slaves were at the time of the return of peace. It was not within the nature of the relation in which they stood with the enemy for them to do so. But it was within the power of the British Government, through their naval records; and that Government had stipulated, in the St. Petersburg convention, to furnish the evidence, if in her power. In conformity with this stipulation, a formal call was made upon the British Government by a resolution offered before the mixed commission, (a copy of which resolution will accompany this address.) That call has been answered by sending a parcel of copies, deranged, and almost unintelligible. But it is now pretended that better evidence can be got; that is to say, evidence to defeat the claims of those who have not yet succeeded.

It was understood in July last that Mr. Wirt would prepare an argument in support of the Virginia and Maryland claims, involving chiefly the old question of the onus probandi. When the board met, on the 1st of November last, this argument was offered, and copies printed. There were others who wrote arguments on the same side of the question, which were filed with the board. A decision was at that time pressed; but it was asked by an agent, who is largely concerned on behalf of the Georgia claimants, of the board, to wait a short time, that the Hon. Mr. Berrien was preparing, or would prepare, a reply to the argument of the Hon. William Wirt. It is stated that, in order to give as much effect as possible to the reply, leave of the Senate was obtained to make public the views of the Government in the creation of the convention of London of November, 1826. The argument of Mr. Berrien has been printed and laid before the board, and Mr. Wirt has rejoined.

It seems by this new attempt to get this law passed that the southern claimants, their agents, and their distinguished counsel, are afraid to risk a decision even now before the board.

In the argument before the Senate I understand there were two reasons urged in support of the bill: one was, that some of the claimants were not prepared to try their cases. If this be a fact, I do not know it: at all events, they can have time; but those who are ready should not be postponed. Secondly, that if the claims from Virginia and Maryland are allowed, there will not be a sufficient fund to pay the principal sums awarded. I am sure there is an ample fund, and I do invoke the members of the House of Representatives to require information on this point. So certain am I of the fact that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing that a law be immediately passed directing the payment of the twenty-five per cent. unpaid upon awards heretofore entered up, and that awards shall be wholly paid as they may be entered up hereafter.

There are about $600,000 dollars awarded, and, as far as I can make the estimate, (it is true I have not certain data before me,) there will not be claims established to the amount of more than about $500,000 more; which will then leave a surplus of upwards of $100,000 to be distributed, in the nature of interest or otherwise, among the successful claimants.

Whatever were the real motives of those who originated the bill which passed the Senate I do not know; but it is stated that the south claimants are desirous to destroy the claims from the Chesapeake and its waters, under the hope that the residue of the British money would then be divided among those who had succeeded before the commission. The subject of interest upon their claims is only secondary to the main object they have in view. It has been urged that some new question has arisen; therefore, further time is required. Why, the main evidence in support of the undecided claims has been filed ever since the years 1822, 1823, or 1824. A few depositions were filed in November last, with the arguments upon the general question, and to which every person had access, if required.

In November and December last some hundreds of cases were put down for trial and decision. The board waited, at the intimation of the south claimants' agents, till the next meeting, (which was to be in March,) in order to receive arguments and to hear evidence in opposition to the claims from Virginia and Maryland. Rules for the taking of evidence were prescribed in December and January, and a gentleman (and there probably were many others) of great industry and intelligence has made a tour in pursuit of this evidence. He has now returned, and, I understand, was wholly disappointed. It may be inferred that, anticipating this result, the said bill was offered to the Senate.

I have come here now, and it is the sixth time since the constitution of the mixed commission, as agent on behalf of claimants for more than six hundred slaves, and other private property; and it was confidently expected that a final decision would now be had of all the cases ready for trial. I put down some one or two hundred cases for trial in November and December last. I was then postponed till March, and it is now asked to postpone us till November next, without any sufficient reason. The south claimants have seventy-five per cent. of their money in their pockets, and now demand that Congress will estop us, or lay an injunction, in effect, upon our claims until they can traverse the seas and distant lands in search of evidence to destroy our claims. A more ungracious and selfish proceeding I cannot well conceive. For thirteen years we have been anxiously hoping for compensation for some of our losses. We always expected some resistance from the British Government, but never from our fellow-citizens. When they received awards for a great number of slaves upon Dauphin island, at the value of $580 each, we did not say that that island was not in the possession of the United States at the time of the ratification of the treaty; nor did we say that if that island were in the possession of the United States it was within the jurisdiction of Alabama, and, therefore, the claimants were entitled only to the sum of $390 each—the average value fixed upon for Alabama slaves. No; we only wished to succeed in our just claims, and never wished to defeat the claims of our fellow-sufferers.

I am willing that the duration of the commission shall be extended to some future day, even to the 30th of November next, to permit claimants (if there be any such) to obtain evidence in support of their claims now pending before the board; but I do utterly loathe the idea that the claimants whose cases are ready for trial shall be postponed in order to permit the successful claimants to search the habitable globe for evidence to destroy the rights of their co-claimants. If it should be so, (which justice and reason forbid!) four or five hundred thousand dollars, which have long since been deposited in the Treasury, will be enjoined from the use of the rightful owners to indulge the caprice of a pecuniary, selfish speculation which has no parallel. The money has been paid by Great Britain; and those who have succeeded now ask that others who have not shall be delayed until, perchance, some evidence can be got to defeat their claims.

We have been anxiously waiting for a decision of this subject for thirteen years. Last November the question was urged; the Georgia claimants asked to be heard; the board has been waiting; arguments have been written and read, and new evidence sought after; agents scouring the country in the search; and now, the issue being doubtful, an application is made to Congress to interfere, on behalf of those who have succeeded, to defeat fair claimants upon the definitive list who bore more hardships of the war and suffered more losses than those gentlemen who have been successful before the board.

In conclusion, I do most respectfully ask that a law may be enacted authorizing the payment of the twenty-five per cent. remaining unpaid upon awards heretofore entered up by the board; and that in future the whole amount of the awards may be paid as soon as they are concluded.

That further time may be given to such claimants upon the definitive list who are desirous to procure more evidence in support of their claims; but that the board shall forthwith proceed to decide any and every case which is docketed or which shall be docketed before them for examination and decision, and that the bill sent from the Senate may be amended to that effect.

AUG. NEALE,
Agent for many claimants before the Commission to award indemnity for slaves and other private property under the treaty of Ghent.

CLAIMS TO THE TERRITORY WESTWARD OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS BY THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 15, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, requesting me to lay before the House correspondence not heretofore communicated, between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain, on the subject of the claims of the two Governments to the territory westward of the Rocky mountains, I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, with the documents requested by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, March 15, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 13, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, requesting the President to lay before that House any correspondence not heretofore communicated, which may have taken place between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain, on the subject of the claims of the two Governments to the territory westward of the Rocky mountains, if, in his opinion, the same can be communicated without injury to the public interest, has the honor to report to the President the accompanying pamphlet,* which, with the manuscript copy added thereto, contains copies of so much of the correspondence required as, in the judgment of the Secretary, can with propriety be made public at this this time.

Respectfully submitted.

CLAIM OF INDEMNITY FOR PROPERTY UNDER THE FIRST ARTICLE OF THE TREATY OF GHENT, BY JOSEPH BURNETT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 18, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom had been referred the petition of Joseph Burnett, made the following report:

That the petitioner represents himself to have been the owner of a vessel which, being at Alexandria when the British squadron in 1814 entered and blockaded Chesapeake bay, was there, of necessity, laid up and dismantled, and subsequently seized and taken possession of by the enemy at Alexandria, and by them carried away. The petitioner represents that he did not become apprised of the measures taken to carry into effect the first article of the treaty of Ghent till the spring of 1827; that in July last he presented his claim for indemnification to the board which was created by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1827, to provide for the adjustment of the claims of persons entitled to indemnification under the first article of the treaty of Ghent; but that his claim was not received by the board because it was not embraced in what is termed the definitive list of claims provided for under the stipulations of the aforesaid article. The petitioner accordingly solicits the passage of an act of Congress authorizing the Board of Commissioners to receive his claim (for a reason set forth in his memorial) in like manner as if it had been comprehended in the definitive list.

By the third article of the convention of St. Petersburg of July 12, 1822, it is provided that, "when the average value of slaves shall have been ascertained and fixed, the two Commissioners shall constitute a board for the examination of the claims which are to be submitted to them; and they shall notify to the Secretary of State of the United States that they are ready to receive a definitive list of the slaves and other private property for which the citizens of the United States claim indemnification; it being understood, and hereby agreed, that the commission shall not take cognizance of, nor receive, and that his Britannic Majesty shall not be required to make compensation for any claims for private property, under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, not contained in the said list."

Under this provision of the convention of St. Petersburg, the definitive list was furnished, by the Department of State, of all claims presented before the period fixed for the closing of said list. The amount of claims thus presented formed the basis of the calculation of the amount due to the citizens of the United States. By a subsequent convention between the United States and Great Britain, bearing date November 13, 1826, it was provided that Great Britain should pay the sum of $1,240,960, in lieu of, and in full and complete satisfaction for, all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and the convention of St. Petersburg formed to carry it into effect. By the second article of the said convention with Great Britain, of November 13, 1826, it is provided, "that the object of the said convention [that of St. Petersburg] being thus fulfilled, that convention is hereby declared to be cancelled and annulled, save and except the second article of the same, which has already been carried into execution by the Commissioners appointed under the said convention; and save and except so much of the third article of the same as relates to the definitive list of claims which has already likewise been carried into execution by the said Commissioners."

It is plain, therefore, that the fund paid by Great Britain was paid for the indemnification of the claimants whose claims were included in the definitive list; and that it would be a violation both of the spirit and letter of the convention of St. Petersburg and of the convention of November 13, 1826, to divert any part of that fund to the payment of claims presented after the expiration of the period fixed for the closing of that list. For this reason the Committee of Foreign Affairs recommend to the adoption of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of Joseph Burnett ought not to be granted.

MAPS OF THE NORTHERN AND NORTHWESTERN BOUNDARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 18, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 15, 1828.

The Secretary of State, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th ultimo, directing him to report to that House a copy of the maps and so much of the reports of the Commissioners under the treaty of Ghent, for ascertaining the northern and northwestern boundary between the United States and Great Britain, as will exhibit those parts of said boundary which are already decided upon, has the honor to report the accompanying copies of a part of a series of maps which have been communicated to this office, exhibiting surveys and delineations of so much of said boundary line as is believed to be required by the resolution of the House; and respectfully to refer the House to the decision, dated June 18, 1822, of the Joint Commissioners under the 6th article of the said treaty, published at the end of the acts of the 2d session of the 17th Congress, in the 7th volume of the Laws of the United States, for a further and full explanation of the said boundary line, as agreed upon and established.

Respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

Decision of the Commissioners under the sixth article of the treaty of Ghent, done at Utica, in the State of New York, June 18, 1822.

The undersigned, Commissioners appointed, sworn, and authorized, in virtue of the sixth article of the treaty of peace and amity between his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, concluded at Ghent on the 24th of December, 1814, impartially to examine, and, by a report or declaration under their hands and seals, to designate "that portion of the boundary of the United States from the point where the 45th degree of north latitude strikes the river Iroquois, or Cataraqui, along the middle of said river into Lake Ontario, through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication, by water, between that lake and Lake Erie; thence along the middle of said communication into Lake Erie, through the middle of said lake, until it arrives at the water communication into Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said water communication into Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior;" and to "decide to which of the two contracting parties the several islands lying within the said rivers, lakes, and water communications do respectively belong, in conformity with the true intent of the treaty of 1783," do decide and declare that the following described line (which is more clearly indicated on a series of maps accompanying this report exhibiting correct surveys and delineations of all the rivers, lakes, water communications, and islands embraced by the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent, by a black line shaded on the British side with red, and on the American side with blue, and each sheet of which series of maps is identified by a certificate subscribed by the Commissioners and by the two principal surveyors employed by them) is the true boundary intended by the two beforementioned treaties; that is to say:

Beginning at a stone monument erected by Andrew Ellicot, Esq., in the year 1817, on the south bank or shore of the said river Iroquois, or Cataraqui, (now called the St. Lawrence,) which monument bears south 74° 45′ west, and is eighteen hundred and forty yards distant from the stone church in the Indian village of St. Regis, and indicates the point at which the 45th parallel of north latitude strikes the said river; thence running north 35° 45′ west, into the river, on a line at right angles with the southern shore, to a point one hundred yards south of the opposite island, called Cornwall island; thence turning westerly and passing around the southern and western sides of said island, keeping one hundred yards distant therefrom, and following the curvatures of its shores, to a point opposite to the northwest corner or angle of said island; thence to and along the middle of the main river, until it approaches the eastern extremity of Barnhart's island; thence northerly along the channel which divides the last mentioned island from the Canada shore, keeping one hundred yards distant from the island, until it approaches Shiek's island; thence along the middle of the strait which divides Barnhart's and Shiek's islands to the channel called the Long Sault, which separates the two last mentioned islands from the Lower Long Sault island; thence westerly (crossing the centre of the last mentioned channel) until it approaches within one hundred yards of the north shore of the Lower Sault island; thence up the north branch of the river, keeping to the north of and near the Lower Sault island, and also north of and near the Upper Sault (sometimes called Baxter's) island, and south of the two small islands marked on the map A and B, to the western extremity of the Upper Sault, or Baxter's island; thence passing between the two islands called the Cats to the middle of the river above; thence along the middle of the river, keeping to the north of the small islands marked C and D, and north also of Chrystler's island, and of the small island next above it marked E, until it approaches the northeast angle of Goose Neck island; thence along the passage which divides the last mentioned island from the Canada shore, keeping one hundred yards from the island, to the upper end of the same; thence south of and near the two small islands called the Nut islands; thence north of and near the island marked F, and also the island called Dry or Smuggler's island; thence passing between the islands marked G and H to the north of the island called Isle au Rapid Platt; thence along the north side of the last mentioned island, keeping one hundred yards from the shore, to the upper end thereof; thence along the middle of the river, keeping to the south of and near the islands called Cousson (or Tussin) and Presque isle; thence up the river, keeping north of and near the several Gallop isles, numbered on the map 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and also of Tick, Tibbit's, and Chimney islands, and south of and near the Gallop isles, numbered 11, 12, and 13, and also of Duck, Drummond, and Sheep islands; thence along the middle of the river, passing north of island No. 14, south of 15 and 16, north of 17, south of 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, and 28, and north of 26 and 27; thence along the middle of the river, north of Gull island and of the islands Nos. 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, Bluff island, and Nos. 39, 44, and 45, and to the south of Nos. 30, 31, 36, Grenadier island, and Nos. 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 46, 47, and 48, until it approaches the east end of Well's island; thence to the north of Well's island, and along the strait which divides it from Rowe's island, keeping to the north of the small islands Nos. 51, 52, 54, 58, 59, and 61, and to the south of the small islands numbered and marked 49, 50, 53, 55, 57, 60, and X, until it approaches the northeast point of Grindstone island; thence to the north of Grindstone island, and keeping to the north also of the small islands, Nos. 63, 65, 67, 68, 70, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, and 78, and to the south of Nos. 62, 64, 66, 69, and 71, until it approaches the southern point of Hickory island; thence passing to the south of Hickory island, and of the two small islands lying near its southern extremity, numbered 79 and 80; thence to the south of Grand or Long island, keeping near its southern shore, and passing to the north of Carlton island, until it arrives opposite to the southwestern point of said Grand island, in Lake Ontario; thence passing to the north of Grenadier, Fox, Stony, and the Gallop islands, in Lake Ontario, and to the south of and near the islands called the Ducks, to the middle of the said lake; thence westerly along the middle of said lake to a point opposite the mouth of the Niagara river; thence to and up the middle of the said river to the Great Falls; thence up the falls, through the point of the Horse Shoe, keeping to the west of Iris or Goat island, and of the group of small islands at its head, and following the bends of the river, so as to enter the strait between Navy and Grand islands; thence along the middle of said strait to the head of Navy island; thence to the west and south of, and near to, Grand and Beaver islands, and to the west of Strawberry, Squaw, and Bird islands, to Lake Erie; thence southerly and westerly, along the middle of Lake Erie, in a direction to enter the passage immediately south of Middle island, being one of the easternmost of the group of islands lying in the western part of said lake; thence along the said passage, proceeding to the north of Cunningham's island, of the three Bass islands, and of the Western Sister, and to the south of the islands called the Hen and Chickens, and of the Eastern and Middle Sisters; thence to the middle of the mouth of the Detroit river, in a direction to enter the channel which divides Bois Blanc and Sugar islands; thence up the said channel to the west of Bois Blanc island, and to the east of Sugar, Fox, and Stony islands, until it approaches Fighting or Great Turkey island; thence along the western side, and near the shore of said last mentioned island, to the middle of the river above the same; thence along the middle of said river, keeping to the southeast of and near Hog island, and to the northwest of and near the island called Isle a la Pêche, to Lake St. Clair; thence through the middle of said lake in a direction to enter that mouth or channel of the river St. Clair which is usually denominated the Old Ship Channel; thence along the middle of said channel, between Squirrel island on the southeast, and Herson's island on the northwest, to the upper end of the last mentioned island, which is nearly opposite to Point au Chênes, on the Americam shore; thence along the middle of the river St. Clair, keeping to the west of and near the islands called Belle Rivière isle, and and the Isle aux Cerfs, to Lake Huron; thence through the middle of Lake Huron in a direction to enter the strait or passage between Drummond's island on the west, and the Little Manitou island on the east; thence through the middle of the passage which divides the two last mentioned islands; thence turning northerly and westerly around the eastern and northern shores of Drummond's island, and proceeding in a direction to enter the passage between the island of St. Joseph's and the American shore, passing to the north of the intermediate islands, Nos. 61, 11, 10, 12, 9, 6, 4, and 2, and to the south of those numbered 15, 13, 5, and 1.

Thence up the said last mentioned passage, keeping near to the island of St. Joseph's, and passing to the north and east of Isle a la Crosse, and of the small islands numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, and to the south and west of those numbered 21, 22, and 23, until it strikes a line (drawn on the map with black ink, and shaded on one side of the point of intersection with blue, and on the other with red,) passing across the river at the head of St. Joseph's island, and at the foot of the Neebish Rapids, which line denotes the termination of the boundary directed to be run by the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent.

And the said Commissioners do further decide and declare that all the islands lying in the rivers, lakes, and water communications, between the before described boundary line and the adjacent shores of Upper Canada, do, and each of them does, belong to his Britannic Majesty; and that all the islands lying in the rivers, lakes, and water communications, between the said boundary line and the adjacent shores of the United States, or their territories, do, and each of them does, belong to the United States of America, in conformity with the true intent of the 2d article of the said treaty of 1783, and of the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent.

In faith whereof, we, the Commissioners aforesaid, have signed this declaration, and thereunto affixed our seals.

Done, in quadruplicate, at Utica, in the State of New York, in the United States of America, this eighteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 478. [1ST SESSION.

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS FOR INDEMNIFICATION UNDER THE FIRST ARTICLE OF THE TREATY OF GHENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 22, 1828.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act supplementary to an act to provide for the adjustment of claims of persons entitled to indemnification under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and for the distribution among such claimants of the sum paid, and to be paid, by the Government of Great Britain, under a convention between the United States and his Britannic Majesty, concluded at London, on the thirteenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six," passed on the 2d day of March, 1827, made the following report:

By the resolutions of the House the committee was specially instructed to obtain and report, in connexion with the bill, the resolutions or petition in pursuance of which said bill was introduced into the Senate. All the information which the committee has upon that subject will be seen by reference to the paper, (No. 1.) To whom this communication was addressed the committee is not informed. It is found among the papers, and may be regarded as furnishing the reasons upon which the Senate acted.

In discharge of the other duties imposed by the resolution, the committee believe the most satisfactory evidence upon the subject could be obtained from the members of the Board of Commissioners themselves. And a letter was addressed by one of the committee to the board, marked A, to which the letters B, C, and D were received as answers; all of which are referred to as part of this report.

The committee, upon a full examination of the whole subject, believe it to be inexpedient to extend the time of the Board of Commissioners. The committee deem it unnecessary, if not improper, to give, at full length, the reasons which have conducted its members to this determination, lest it might, in some degree, involve the discussion of a question raised before the board, and yet undecided; they, therefore, content themselves with the recommending that the first section of the bill be stricken out.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1828.

SIR: Having been charged with the prosecution of certain claims, for property removed by the British contrary to the terms of the treaty of Ghent, before the Commissioners appointed under the convention of London, we take the liberty of stating the reasons which induce us to ask that the term assigned for the closing of that commission should be enlarged, and to request that you will do us the favor to lay them before the committee to whom the resolution on that subject was referred.

It is known to the committee that the sum paid by Great Britain in discharge of her obligation to pay for the property removed after the treaty is much less than the amount of claims made before the joint commission; and, of course, that it is the interest of those who have just claims to prevent the allowance of such as are not of that description.

The greater part of the claims represented by us have been allowed, and the amount of seventy-five per cent. has been paid to our constituents. Claims are still undecided amounting to a sum sufficient to absorb the whole of the remaining part of the fund. These are chiefly for slaves taken from the States of Virginia and Maryland, and their allowance will depend principally on the proof of the time of their removal.

It has been argued before the Commissioners that these last claimants will have done enough to establish these claims by showing that the slaves in question were taken by the British forces, throwing upon us the burden of proving the negative, that they were not here at the time the treaty was ratified. On this question no decision has yet been had, and as the Commissioners do not meet until the first of March, no decision can take place until that day; after which it will be impossible for us to procure the proof that will be required of us before the probable end of the session, when the commission will, by the present limitation, expire. The evidence which such a decision will require must be sought for principally in the British ports of Halifax and Bermuda, and perhaps in Europe, so that no diligence on our part can procure it in time, unless the term for closing the commission is enlarged. Nor can we be charged with any neglect, inasmuch as the novel nature of the argument, the allowance of which would impose on us this obligation, was such as to prevent our anticipating its being urged or allowed.

D. BOULIGNY,
JOHN E. FROST.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1828.

GENTLEMEN: A bill to extend the time of the board (of which you are members) created by the act of Congress of the last session has passed the Senate, and been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, of which I am a member, under certain specific resolutions and instructions.

The committee has imposed upon me the duty of investigating the subject, and the collection of the facts and evidences necessary to enable it to discharge the duties imposed by the order of the House.

As some of the inquiries relate to the wishes and opinions of the board upon the propriety of the passage of the bill, as also upon other subjects, the best evidence of which must be in the possession of the Commissioners, I have been directed by the committee to communicate with you.

I therefore have the honor of transmitting to you a copy of the resolutions of the House of Representatives, to which I invite your attention, and solicit from you such information as you may possess and feel at liberty to give. How far the latter clause in the resolution may draw to itself the investigation, if not the decision, of any matter sub-judice, I leave to the determination of yourselves, with the expression of the opinion of the committee, that they do not suppose it could have been the intention of the House of Representatives to have interfered with those questions which rightfully belong to the decision of the Commissioners.

Your answer, as early as your duties and convenience will permit, is respectfully desired.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. A. WICKLIFFE.

MESSRS. CHEVES, PLEASANTS, and SEWALL, Commissioners.

B.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS, &c., March 19, 1828.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 1st instant, addressed to this board, and, in reply, to say that I have perused the answer of Mr. Pleasants to the same note, on which is stated so fully my view of the facts to which the answer of this board is required, that I deem it unnecessary here to repeat it. I will only add that, in relation to the inquiry contained in the last resolution, those cases are still sub-judice, and the very point involved is, whether there is proof of the deportation after the ratification of the treaty of Ghent; and on that account I should feel reluctance in undertaking, at this time, to state what is the evidence before the board: for I should, in such case, according to my view, connect with the proof offered by the claimants many facts not proven by them, and all the circumstances under which the compromise by the treaty of London of 1826 was made.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

HENRY SEWALL.

HON. CHARLES A. WICKLIFFE.

C.

COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, March 19, 1828.

SIR: Some difference of opinion existing among the Commissioners as to the best mode of answering the communication which the board have had the honor to receive from you on behalf of the committee of the House of Representatives, to whom is referred (with instructions from the House) the bill from the Senate for prolonging the duration of this board, the board determined that the end the committee had in view would probably be best answered by each member making a separate communication on the subject. This determination has occasioned some delay on our part, though it is hoped not so much as to produce any serious inconvenience to the committee. I proceed to present such a view as, in my judgment, will meet the wishes of the committee, in as few words as I can.

With reference to the first resolution of instructions, having no knowledge of the subject, I can say nothing.

On the subject of that part of the second resolution which asks if the board has asked for or suggested the necessity of an extension of the term of their duration, I reply, that nothing has been asked for or suggested by the Commissioners on the subject. Just before the adjournment of the board in January last, it informed the claimants that the evidence and arguments on the general question before it must be closed by the first instant, when it would be necessary for it to decide them, unless Congress should extend the period prescribed for the sitting of the board; and that the board would not agitate the question of further time, but leave it to the parties interested to do so or not, according to their own views of the propriety or necessity of the measure. The board, at its meeting, (according to adjournment on the 1st instant,) found the bill referred to by your note before the Senate, and felt itself bound to await the decision of Congress on the question.

In reply to the further interrogatories in said resolution of instructions, I presume that the design of the bill in extending the term is to enable a certain class of claimants whose cases have been decided, and who have received, agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress establishing this board, seventy-five per cent. of their principal, to procure testimony (from abroad principally) to prevent certain other claimants, those from Maryland and Virginia, commonly called the Chesapeake claimants, from establishing their claims; the effect of which would be to stay proceedings in many cases which are sub-judice and ready for hearing. To whose benefit and whose prejudice the successful exercise of such endeavor would operate I need not state.

No new question has arisen or testimony been filed, it is believed, which has given rise to the desire of extending the term. The question, the possible decision of which may make such extension desirable to the class of claimants asking it, it was distinctly understood, at the first meeting of this board in July last, would be made. Upon this question several voluminous arguments have been filed by the counsel and agents on each side, the last of which has been recently received, and the decision of the question awaits the decision of the bill from the Senate now before your committee.

It is presumed that the fund to be distributed will very nearly or quite pay the principal due for all the refugee slaves, if, as is believed will be mostly the fact, the property other than slaves shall be found not to come within the provisions of the treaty.

The grounds on which the seventy-five per cent. has been adjudged to those claimants who have received it are the evidence produced by those claimants, positive or presumptive, to satisfy the Commissioners, or a majority of them, that their claims come within the provisions of the conventions. As before stated, the Commissioners are directed, in so many words, by the act of Congress establishing the board, to pay immediately to each person whose claim is established seventy-five per cent. of the principal sum awarded, and so till the claims should all be decided.—(See section 9th of the act of last session of Congress establishing this board.) In this seventy-five per cent. of the principal so paid, no interest, of course, is included; the question of interest has been reserved in all the cases adjudicated, as it will be unnecessary, it is presumed, to decide it at all if the fund should not be more than sufficient to pay the whole principal; which cannot be ascertained till all the cases have been examined.

In reply to the last interrogatory in the instructions, I remark, that those claimants who have received nothing, and whose claims are now before the board, have of course not yet had those claims examined; the fact of the character of their evidence, and whether it will prove that their property was within the United States at the ratification of the treaty is precisely what the Commissioners have to determine, it being, indeed, the pivot upon which turns the successful or unsuccessful decision of the claim.

In conclusion, I take the liberty of stating that, should the bill from the Senate not pass, it may yet be necessary to extend the term some time to enable the board to complete the business which it is probable they will hardly be able to accomplish by the rising of Congress; but upon this point I can speak with no certainty at this time.

The claims on the definitive list amount to between 1,000 and 1,100; of these, near 700 have been examined; a number of them finally decided, except, as before stated, as to the question of interest; the remainder, (of the 700,) principally, are partially decided, awaiting the decision of the question of presumptive evidence before referred to. Some have been rejected. At their first meeting, in July last, the board decided every question which was ready for decision; at their late meeting, on the first of November last, they did the same, except as to a few cases kept under advisement for particular reasons. The cases now on the docket, and which are in a course of examination, have been very recently put down for hearing.

I have thus given, as explicitly as I could, the information in my power to give, which I believe to be required by the instructions to the committee.

With sentiments of the highest respect for yourself and the committee, I am your obedient servant,

JAMES PLEASANTS.

Hon. C. A. WICKLIFFE.

D.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS,
Under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, March 19, 1828.

SIR: I have the honor, in reply to your note of the 14th instant, to state the following facts:

The extension of the time beyond the period prescribed by law for the sitting of this board has not been asked for or suggested to be necessary by the Commissioners, except that, in January last, when the board was about temporarily to adjourn, it informed the claimants that the evidence and the arguments on the general questions before it (which will be hereafter particularly stated) must be closed by the first instant, when it would be necessary to decide them, unless Congress should extend the time prescribed for the sitting of the board; and that the board would not agitate the question of further time, but leave it to the parties interested to do so or not, according to their own views of the propriety or necessity of the measure. The board, at its meeting, according to adjournment, on the first instant, found the bill referred to in your note before the Senate, and has felt itself, under these circumstances, bound to wait the decision of Congress on the question.

The first meeting of the board was on the 10th of July last, which was the day prescribed by the act creating it for its first meeting. There are on the definitive list between one thousand and eleven hundred cases, which includes slaves and all other property. Of these, between 600 and 700 cases have been examined by the board. Those which have been examined consist principally of two classes; they are almost exclusively claims for slaves, and the following facts refer exclusively to that species of property:

1. The first class consists of those which have been allowed. These have been supported by specific testimony, positive or circumstantial, which has been satisfactory to the board, or a majority of it, proving that the slaves claimed in each case were within the territory or waters of the United States at the date of the ratification of the treaty. The claimants of this class have received, or are entitled to receive, according to the provisions of the act of Congress, seventy-five per cent. of the principal sum awarded. The question of interest has been reserved in all cases.

2. The second class consists of such as have not been allowed, but are kept under consideration. The specific testimony sustaining these, (except in relation to such slaves as have been found on "the Halifax list," hereafter referred to,) consists only of proof of the taking by the enemy at different periods during the war. The taking appears to have been principally between the beginning of June, 1813, and the beginning of December, 1814; a few only were taken before June, 1813, and a good many appear to have been taken as late as the 5th of December, 1814. Included in this class are such slaves as have been identified on "the Halifax list." This is not one of the documents furnished by the British Government in execution of the third article of the convention of St. Petersburg, but one which the British Commissioners, at the time of the dissolution of the mixed commission, put into the hands of the American Commissioner, with liberty to retain it if he thought proper, without stating how it was procured, or from whence it came, but treating it as a document of authenticity, and which was, of course, received by the American Commissioner. It purports to be "a return of American refugee negroes who have been received into the province of Nova Scotia from the United States of America between the 27th April, 1815, and the 24th October, 1818."

The award of the Emperor of Russia and the conventions consequent thereon provide only for the indemnity of those whose property was taken away or destroyed after the ratification of the treaty of Ghent.

The claimants of the second class contend—

1. That, on principles of law, the proof of the taking at any period during the war throws the burden on the opposing party of proving that the slaves claimed were actually carried out of the territory and waters of the United States before the ratification of the treaty; and that, on failure to do so, these claimants are entitled to a full participation in the fund.

2. That the proof of the taking at any time during the war, with the circumstantial evidence that has incidentally come before the board, and additional testimony which they have filed to sustain this proposition, authorizes the presumption that all the slaves contained in the second class remained in the United States until the ratification of the treaty, and ought to be allowed. In the cases of more recent capture it is urged that this presumption is the stronger.

3. It is contended that, in addition to this general presumption, the Halifax document should be taken in itself as sufficient evidence that all those contained therein were taken away after the ratification of the treaty.

The claimants of the first class resist the first of these propositions as unfounded in principle, and the second and third as unsustained by the evidence relied upon. They contend, on the contrary, that the evidence before the board repels these presumptions; and they allege that they can disprove them if allowed time to procure the testimony, some of which, they state, is to be obtained from abroad. The object of the bill from the Senate is understood to be to grant this time. On the merits of this bill I presume I am not expected to give any opinion; but it is proper I should say that, if it be rejected, some further time may nevertheless be necessary to close the business of the board, but whether any further time will be necessary, or, if any, what time, I am at present unable to say. If a more particular knowledge of the points in controversy be desired, it will be obtained by reference to the printed arguments of counsel on either side. The first of these was filed by the claimants of the second class in the beginning of November last, when these points were, for the first time, submitted for hearing, although they had, at the first meeting of the board, been mentioned as points that would be raised.

I believe the foregoing statement of facts affords the best information I can give on the questions growing out of the resolutions of the House of Representatives, except that which directs an inquiry "whether the fund now remaining to be distributed by the Commissioners be sufficient to satisfy the principal sum claimed for refugee slaves and other property entered on the definitive list?" To this I reply that it is not sufficient, and that the claims for slaves alone, (considering the decision of the board that claimants for slaves originally taken from other States, but found in Georgia, or the waters thereof, at the ratification of the treaty, shall be entitled to the Georgia average,) if all claims for that species of property be allowed, will alone absorb the whole fund received from Great Britain.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LANGDON CHEVES.

Hon. CHARLES A. WICKLIFFE, &c., Washington City.

P. S.—If the bill of the Senate be passed it will, of course, delay the decision of the general questions before the board, and the cases which may depend thereon, but no other cases.

COMPLAINT OF CONDY RAGUET AGAINST THE BRAZILIAN GOVERNMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 25, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the communication of Condy Raguet, late Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of Brazil, made the following report:

The subject brought before the House of Representatives by the memorialist, Mr. Raguet, late Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of Brazil, is an attack upon his character contained in a newspaper, entitled the Gazeta do Brazil, published at Rio Janeiro, and represented by Mr. Raguet, as he is informed, to be under the sanction, patronage, and censorship of the Brazilian Government. In the number of this paper published on the 1st day of August, 1827, it is asserted, in substance, that Mr. Raguet had been ill received by the President of the United States on his return from Brazil; that he had been bribed by the Government of Buenos Ayres to pursue measures designed to interrupt the harmony between the Governments of the United States and Brazil; and that, after the rupture of Mr. Raguet's diplomatic connexions with Brazil, he was complimented with a dinner and a present of two thousand pounds sterling by the agents of Buenos Ayres.

Mr. Raguet further represents, in his communication, that a copy of the gazette, containing the foregoing libel, was, in the latter part of September, 1827, transmitted by him to the President of the United States; and that, in the month of January last, another copy, together with a translation of the libellous article, was sent to several members of the Pennsylvania delegation in Congress, accompanied with a note, soliciting their advice as to the most effectual mode of refuting it. Since that period, Mr.

Raguet states that he understands that charges against his character to the same effect have been insinuated by a functionary in the foreign service of the Brazilian Government to a gentleman in the service of the United States in Brazil, and by the latter transmitted to the Executive of the United States.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs do full justice to the feelings of indignation excited in the mind of Mr. Raguet by such a libellous attack in the columns of a gazette understood by him to be under the censorship of the Brazilian Government. But they apprehend that no possible injury can be done to his character by anonymous insinuations so gross in their nature and so obviously false. Were the charges avowedly made against him by a foreign Government, it may be doubted how far it would consist with the dignity of this Government to take cognizance of allegations against its public servants, injuriously thrown out in the columns of a newspaper. But wholly unauthentic and unavowed as they are, the committee conceive that they could not, with any propriety, become the subjects of the animadversion of the House.

The committee conceive that the character of Mr. Raguet rests upon a satisfactory basis in having received the approbation of his own Government. In his message to both Houses of Congress, at the opening of the present session, the President thus expresses himself: "In the diplomatic discussions at Rio Janeiro of those wrongs sustained by citizens of the United States and others, which seemed as if emanating immediately from that Government itself, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, under the impression that his representations in behalf of the rights and interests of his countrymen were totally disregarded and useless, deemed it his duty, without waiting for instructions, to terminate his official functions, to demand his passports, and to return to the United States. This movement, dictated by an honest zeal for the honor and interests of his country—motives which operated exclusively upon the mind of the officer who resorted to it—has not been disapproved by me."

This public and official expression of the opinion entertained by the Chief Magistrate with regard to the motives which governed Mr. Raguet is considered by the committee as a sufficient vindication of his character against the libellous attack of a foreign journalist.

With respect to the intimation in Mr. Raguet's memorial, that insinuations against his character have been made by a Brazilian functionary in a foreign service, to an officer of the United States in Brazil, and by the latter transmitted to the Department of State, the committee would observe that any insinuation, through such a channel, from whomsoever proceeding, must be considered altogether inofficial. As no communication has been made to Congress by the Executive upon this subject, the committee infer that it has not been deemed by the Executive to present a case requiring the interposition of the Legislature.

The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution to the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

PHILADELPHIA, February 15, 1828.

SIR: I take the liberty, respectfully, to request that you will be pleased to lay the enclosed communication before the body over which you preside.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

The Hon. ANDREW STEVENSON, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

To the honorable the members of the House of Representatives of the United States:

Availing myself of the privilege which belongs to me as a citizen of this Republic, recently employed in the diplomatic service of the country, I take the liberty of bringing into the view of the representatives of the people a base and calumnious accusation which has been pronounced against me, in my official character of Chargé d'Affaires of the United States near the Government of Brazil. In making this communication, I have respectfully to request that your honorable body will cause such inquiry to be made in the case as will result in the development of the truth, in order that I may not appear before my fellow-citizens and the world as a servant of this nation who has been unfaithful to his trust, or that I may receive the reward due to an act which ought to consign to perpetual infamy and disgrace any individual capable of committing it.

The accusation to which I allude appeared, on the first day of August last, in a gazette, entitled "Gazeta do Brazil," published in the city of Rio de Janeiro, under the immediate sanction, patronage, and censorship, as I am informed, of the Government of Brazil, in an article, of which the following is a translation:

"It is now known with certainty that Mr. Isidoro da Costa Oliveira had arrived at Baltimore on his return from Washington, and that he would take passage for this capital in the first ship. It is also known that Condy Raguet, who was here Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, has been very badly received by the President in consequence of his departure from Brazil. This man, as it appears, had been bought by the agents of Buenos Ayres to put into execution, on the first occasion which might offer, that infamous proceeding, for the purpose of seeing if, by that means, they could disturb the good understanding happily subsisting between the Court of Brazil and the Cabinet of Washington. They say that, after the rupture made by Raguet, he was complimented with a dinner and two thousand pounds sterling, which he received in bills of exchange from the hands of ——— & Co., merchants of this place.

"It is also announced from Baltimore that Mr. Joze Silvestre Rebello, charged with the affairs of the Empire near the Government of the United States, had concluded a satisfactory arrangement upon the question of the American prizes."

A copy of this gazette, soon after it came to hand, which was in the latter end of September, was transmitted by me to the President of the United States; and another was submitted early in January, with a translation of the libellous article, to several members of the Pennsylvania delegation in Congress, accompanied by a note soliciting their advice as to the most efficient mode of refuting the vile fabrication then resting solely on the authority of a newspaper. Since that period, however, information has reached me from Brazil, through a source entitled to credit, that a gentleman in the service of the United States in that country had received a letter from a person high in the confidence and employment of the Brazilian Government abroad, insinuating that some of the public officers of the United States in that quarter had been bribed by Buenos Ayres. This letter, as I have also been informed, was deemed of sufficient importance to be transmitted to the Secretary of State, at Washington; and, as I am led to believe, from its coincidence with the article quoted above, that the imputation is designed against me, I earnestly solicit that your honorable body will take the subject into early consideration, and adopt such measures as in your wisdom may be deemed expedient.

A copy of the gazette from which the above translation was made is transmitted herewith; and should your honorable body think proper to refer this communication to a committee, I shall be prepared to produce such documents and testimonials as the nature of the case will admit.

CONDY RAGUET.

PHILADELPHIA, February 15, 1828.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 481. [1ST SESSION.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF THE BOUNDARIES OF THE UNITED STATES WITH GREAT BRITAIN BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CONFEDERATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 25, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, prepared in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 25th of February last, requesting copies of instructions and correspondence relating to the settlement of the boundary line of the United States, or of any one of them, under the Government of the Confederated States, and by the definitive treaty of peace of September 3, 1783, with Great Britain.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 22, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 25th of last month, requesting the President "to send to that House copies of the instructions given by the Government of the Confederated States to its ministers, by whom the definitive treaty of peace was concluded with the Government of Great Britain, so far as such instructions relate to the settlement of the boundary line of the United States, or any one of them, and also the correspondence between said ministers with the ministers of Great Britain upon the same subject, or so much therefrom as will not be injurious to public service," has the honor to report to the President that it does not appear, from the research which has been made in this office, which has been full and particular, that any instructions, other than those which are published in the second and third volumes of the Secret Journals of Congress,* were given to the ministers of the Confederated or United States, by whom the preliminary articles, or the definitive treaty of peace were concluded with the Government of Great Britain, in relation to the settlement of the boundary line of the United States, or any one of them; or that there was any correspondence, in writing, between said ministers and the ministers of Great Britain upon the same subject. The Secretary begs leave, therefore, respectfully, to refer to the said two volumes of the Secret Journal, which were printed and published by authority of Congress, for the information required by the resolution of the House, so far as they contain such information.

Respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

* The following embrace the proceedings of the Congress of the Confederation, and instructions to its ministers, relating to the settlement of the boundary line of the United States, &c., referred to in the above report:

March 19, 1779.—Congress took into consideration the report of the Committee of the Whole, and agreed to the following ultimata:

1. That the thirteen United States are bounded north by a line to be drawn from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, along the highlands which divide those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence due west in the latitude forty-five degrees north from the equator, to the northwesternmost side of the river St. Lawrence, or Cadaraqui; thence straight to the south end of Lake Nepissing; and thence straight to the source of the river Mississippi; west by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi from its source to where the said line shall intersect the latitude of thirty-one degrees north; south by a line to be drawn due east from the termination of the line last mentioned in the latitude thirty-one degrees north from the equator to the middle of the river Apalachicola, or Catahouchie; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river; thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river to the Atlantic Ocean; and east by a line to be drawn along the middle of St. John's from its source to its mouth in the Bay of Fundy, or by a line to be settled and adjusted between that part of the State of Massachusetts Bay, formerly called the province of Maine, and the colony of Nova Scotia, agreeably to their respective rights, comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforesaid boundaries between Nova Scotia on the one part, and East Florida on the other part, shall respectively touch the Bay of Fundy and the Atlantic Ocean: Provided, That if the line to be drawn from the mouth of Lake Nepissing to the head of the Mississippi cannot be obtained without continuing the war for that purpose, then that a line or lines may be drawn more southerly, so as not to be southward of a line in latitude forty-five degrees north.

2. That every post and place within the United States, and every island, harbor, and road to them, or any of them belonging, be absolutely evacuated by the land and sea forces of his Britannic Majesty, and yielded to the powers of the States to which they respectively belong.

August 13, 1779.—The committee appointed to prepare instructions for the minister plenipotentiary of the United States, to be appointed for negotiating a peace, brought in a draught, which was taken into consideration, and debated by paragraphs.

August 14, 1779.—Congress proceeded in the consideration of the instructions to the minister to be appointed for negotiating a peace, and unanimously agreed to the following draught of instructions to the Commissioner to be appointed to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain:

SIR: You will herewith receive a commission giving you full power to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain, in doing which you will conform to the following information and instructions:

1. The United States are sincerely desirous of peace, and wish, by every means consistent with their dignity and safety, to spare the further effusion of blood. They have, therefore, by your commission and these instructions, labored to remove the obstacles to that event before the enemy have evidenced their disposition for it. But as the great object of the present defensive war on the part of the allies is to establish the independence of the United States, and as any treaty whereby this end cannot be obtained must be only ostensible and illusory, you are, therefore, to make it a preliminary article to any negotiation that Great Britain shall agree to treat with the United States as sovereign, free, and independent.

2. You shall take especial care, also, that the independence of the said States be effectually assured and confirmed by the treaty or treaties of peace, according to the form and effect of the treaty of alliance with his most Christian Majesty; and you shall not agree to such treaty or treaties unless the same be thereby so assured and confirmed.

3. The boundaries of these States are as follows, viz: These States are bounded north by a line to be drawn from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, along the highlands which divide those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence due west in the latitude forty-five degrees north from the equator to the northwesternmost side of the river St. Lawrence, or Cadaraqui; thence straight to the south end of Nepissing; and thence straight to the source of the river Mississippi; west by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi from its source to where the said line shall intersect the thirty-first degree of north latitude; south by a line to be drawn due east from the termination of the line last mentioned in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north from the equator to the middle of the river Apalachicola, or Catahouchie; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river; and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river to the Atlantic Ocean; and east by a line to be drawn along the middle of St. John's river from its source to its mouth in the Bay of Fundy, comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforesaid boundaries between Nova Scotia on the one part, and East Florida on the other part, shall respectively touch the Bay of Fundy and Atlantic Ocean. You are, therefore, strongly to contend that the whole of the said countries and islands lying within the boundaries aforesaid, and every citadel, fort, post, place, harbor and road to them belonging, be absolutely evacuated by the land and sea forces of his Britannic Majesty, and yielded to the powers of the States to which they respectively belong, in such situation as they may be at the termination of the war. But notwithstanding the clear right of these States, and the importance of the object, yet they are so much influenced by the dictates of religion and humanity, and so desirous of complying with the earnest request of their allies, that if the line to be drawn from the mouth of the Lake Nepissing to the head of the Mississippi cannot be obtained without continuing the war for that purpose, you are hereby empowered to agree to some other line between that point and the river Mississippi; provided the same shall in no part thereof be to the southward of latitude forty-five degrees north. And in like manner, if the eastern boundary above described cannot be obtained, you are hereby empowered to agree that the same shall be afterwards adjusted by Commissioners to be duly appointed for that purpose, according to such line as shall be by them settled and agreed on, as the boundary between that part of the State of Massachusetts Bay, formerly called the province of Maine, and the colony of Nova Scotia, agreeably to their respective rights. And you may also consent that the enemy shall destroy such fortifications as they may have erected.

October 17, 1780.—The committee appointed to prepare a letter to the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States at the Courts of Versailles and Madrid, explaining the reasons and principles on which the instructions to Mr. Jay of the 4th instant are founded, reported a draught, which was agreed to as follows:

SIR: Congress having, in their instructions of the 4th instant, directed you to adhere strictly to their former instructions relating to the boundaries of the United States, to insist on the navigation of the Mississippi for the citizens of the United States in common with the subjects of his Catholic Majesty, as also on a free port or ports below the northern limit of West Florida, and accessible to merchant ships for the use of the former; and being sensible of the influence which these claims on the part of the United States may have on your negotiations with the Court of Madrid, have thought it expedient to explain the reasons and principles on which the same are founded, that you may be enabled to satisfy that Court of the equity and justice of their intentions.

With respect to the first of these articles, by which the river Mississippi is fixed as the boundary between the Spanish settlements and the United States, it is unnecessary to take notice of any pretensions founded on a priority of discovery, of occupancy, or on conquest. It is sufficient that, by the definitive treaty of Paris of 1763, article seventh, all the territory now claimed by the United States was expressly and irrevocably ceded to the King of Great Britain; and that the United States are, in consequence of the revolution in their Government, entitled to the benefits of that cession.

The first of these positions is proved by the treaty itself. To prove the last, it must be observed, that it is a fundamental principle in all lawful Governments, and particularly in the constitution of the British Empire, that all the rights of sovereignty are intended for the benefit of those from whom they are derived, and over whom they are exercised. It is known also to have been held for an inviolable principle by the United States, while they remained a part of the British Empire, that the sovereignty of the King of England, with all the rights and powers included in it, did not extend to them in virtue of his being acknowledged and obeyed as King by the people of England, or of any other part of the Empire, but in virtue of his being acknowledged and obeyed as King of the people of America themselves; and that this principle was the basis, first of their opposition to, and finally of their abolition of, his authority over them. From these principles it results, that all the territory lying within the limits of the States, as fixed by the Sovereign himself, was held by him for their particular benefits, and must, equally with his other rights and claims in quality of their Sovereign, be considered as having devolved on them, in consequence of their resumption of the sovereignty to themselves.

In support of this position it may be further observed, that all the territorial rights of the King of Great Britain within the limits of the United States accrued to him from the enterprises, the risks, the sacrifices, the expense in blood and treasure, of the present inhabitants and their progenitors. If in latter times expenses and exertions have been borne by any other part of the Empire in their immediate defence, it need only be recollected that the ultimate object of them was the general security and advantage of the Empire; that a proportional share was borne by the States themselves; and that if this had not been the case the benefits resulting from an exclusive enjoyment of their trade have been an abundant compensation. Equity and justice, therefore, perfectly coincide, in the present instance, with political and constitutional principles.

No objection can be pretended against what is here said, except that the King of Great Britain was, at the time of the rupture with his Catholic Majesty, possessed of certain parts of the territory in question, and consequently that his Catholic Majesty had and still has a right to regard them as lawful objects of conquest. In answer to this objection, it is to be considered: 1. That these possessions are few in number, and confined to small spots. 2. That a right founded on conquest, being only coextensive with the objects of conquest, cannot comprehend the circumjacent territory. 3. That if a right to the said territory depended on the conquests of the British posts within it, the United States have already a more extensive claim to it than Spain can acquire, having, by the success of their arms, obtained possession of all the important posts and settlements on the Illinois and Wabash, rescued the inhabitants from British domination, and established civil government in its proper form over them. They have, moreover, established a post on a strong and commanding situation near the mouth of the Ohio; whereas Spain has a claim by conquest to no post above the northern bounds of West Florida, except that of the Natchez, nor are there any other British posts below the mouth of the Ohio for their arms to be employed against. 4. That whatever extent ought to be ascribed to the right of conquest, it must be admitted to have limitations which, in the present case, exclude the pretensions of his Catholic Majesty. If the occupation by the King of Great Britain of posts within the limits of the United States, as defined by charters derived from the said King when constitutionally authorized to grant them, makes them lawful objects of conquest to any other Power than the United States, it follows that every other part of the United States that now is or may hereafter fall into the hands of the enemy is equally an object of conquest. Not only New York, Long Island, and the other islands in its vicinity, but almost the entire States of South Carolina and Georgia, might, by the interposition of a foreign Power at war with their enemy, be forever severed from the American Confederacy, and subjected to a foreign yoke. But is such a doctrine consonant to the rights of nations or the sentiments of humanity? Does it breathe that spirit of concord and amity which is the aim of the proposed alliance with Spain? Would it be admitted by Spain herself, if it affected her own dominions? Were, for example, a British armament, by a sudden enterprise, to get possession of a seaport, a trading town, or maritime province in Spain, and another Power at war with Britain should, before it could be reconquered by Spain, wrest it from the hands of Britain, would Spain herself consider it as an extinguishment of her just pretensions? Or would any impartial nation consider it in that light? As to the proclamation of the King of Great Britain of 1763, forbidding his Governors in North America to grant lands westward of the sources of the rivers falling into the Atlantic Ocean, it can by no rule of construction militate against the present claims of the United States. That proclamation, as is clear both from the title and tenor of it, was intended merely to prevent disputes with the Indians, and an irregular appropriation of vacant land to individuals; and by no means either to renounce any parts of the cessions made in the treaty of Paris, or to affect the boundaries established by ancient charters. On the contrary, it is expressly declared that the lands and territory prohibited to be granted were within the sovereignty and dominion of that Crown, notwithstanding the reservation of them to the use of the Indians.

The right of the United States to western territory as far as the Mississippi having been shown, there are sufficient reasons for them to insist on that right, as well as for Spain not to wish a relinquishment of it.

In the first place, the river Mississippi will be a more natural, more distinguishable, and more precise boundary than any other that can be drawn eastward of it; and, consequently, will be less liable to become a source of those disputes which too often proceed from uncertain boundaries between nations.

Secondly. It ought not to be concealed, that although the vacant territory adjacent to the Mississippi should be relinquished by the United States to Spain, yet the fertility of its soil, and its convenient situation for trade, might be productive of intrusions by the citizens of the former, which their great distance would render it difficult to restrain, and which might lead to an interruption of that harmony which it is so much the interest and wish of both should be perpetual.

Thirdly. As this territory lies within the charter limits of particular States, and is considered by them as no less their property than any other territory within their limits, Congress could not relinquish it without exciting discussions between themselves and those States concerning their respective rights and powers, which might greatly embarrass the public councils of the United States and give advantage to the common enemy.

Fourthly. The territory in question contains a number of inhabitants who are at present under the protection of the United States, and have sworn allegiance to them. These could not, by voluntary transfer, be subjected to a foreign jurisdiction without manifest violation of the common rights of mankind, and of the genius and principles of the American Governments.

Fifthly. In case the obstinacy and pride of Great Britain should for any length of time continue an obstacle to peace, a cession of this territory, rendered of so much value to the United States by its particular situation, would deprive them of one of the material funds on which they rely for pursuing the war against her. On the part of Spain this territorial fund is not needed for, and perhaps could not be applied to, the purposes of the war; and from its situation is otherwise of much less value to her than to the United States.

Congress have the greater hopes that the pretensions of his Catholic Majesty on this subject will not be so far urged as to prove an insuperable obstacle to an alliance with the United States, because they conceive such pretensions to be incompatible with the treaties subsisting between France and them, which are to be the basis and substance of it. By article eleventh of the treaty of alliance, eventual and defensive, the possessions of the United States are guarantied to them by his most Christian Majesty. By article twelfth of the same treaty, intended to fix more precisely the sense and application of the preceding article, it is declared that this guaranty shall have its full force and effect the moment a rupture shall take place between France and England. All the possessions, therefore, belonging to the United States at the time of that rupture, which, being prior to the rupture between Spain and England, must be prior to all claims of conquest by the former, are guarantied to them by his most Christian Majesty.

Now, that in the possessions thus guarantied was meant, by the contracting parties, to be included all the territory within the limits assigned to the United States by the treaty of Paris may be inferred from the fifth article of the treaty above mentioned, which declares that if the United States should think fit to attempt the reduction of the British power remaining in the northern parts of America, or the islands of Bermudas, &c., those countries shall, in case of success, be confederated with, or dependent upon, the United States. For, if it had been understood by the parties that the western territory in question, known to be of so great importance to the United States, and a reduction of it so likely to be attempted by them, was not included in the general guaranty, can it be supposed that no notice would have been taken of it when the parties extended their views, not only to Canada, but to the remote and unimportant island of Bermudas? It is true that these acts between France and the United States are in no respects obligatory on his Catholic Majesty, unless he shall think fit to accede to them. Yet, as they show the sense of his most Christian Majesty on this subject, with whom his Catholic Majesty is intimately allied; as it is in pursuance of an express reservation to his Catholic Majesty in a secret act subjoined to the treaties aforesaid of a power to accede to those treaties, that the present overtures are made on the part of the United States; and as it is particularly stated in that act that any conditions which his Catholic Majesty shall think fit to add are to be analogous to the principal aim of the alliance, and conformable to the rules of equality, reciprocity, and friendship, Congress entertain too high an opinion of the equity, moderation, and wisdom of his Catholic Majesty not to suppose that, when joined to these considerations, they will prevail against any mistaken views of interest that may be suggested to him.

The next object of the instructions is the free navigation of the Mississippi for the citizens of the United States, in common with the subjects of his Catholic Majesty.

On this subject the same inference may be made from article seventh of the treaty of Paris, which stipulates this right in the amplest manner to the King of Great Britain, and the devolution of it to the United States, as was applied to the territorial claims of the latter. Nor can Congress hesitate to believe that, even if no such right could be inferred from that treaty, the generosity of his Catholic Majesty would not suffer the inhabitants of these States to be put into a worse condition, in this respect, by the alliance with him in the character of a sovereign people, than they were in when subjects of a Power who was always ready to turn their force against his Majesty; especially as one of the great objects of the proposed alliance is to give greater effect to the common exertions for disarming that Power of the faculty of disturbing others. Besides, as the United States have an indisputable right to the possession of the east bank of the Mississippi for a very great distance, and the navigation of that river will essentially tend to the prosperity and advantage of the citizens of the United States that may reside on the Mississippi, or the waters running into it, it is conceived that the circumstances of Spain's being in possession of the banks on both sides near its mouth, cannot be deemed a natural or equitable bar to the free use of the river. Such a principle would authorize a nation disposed to take advantage of circumstances to contravene the clear indications of nature and Providence and the general good of mankind.

The usage of nations, accordingly, seems in such cases to have given to those holding the mouth or lower parts of a river no right against those above them, except the right of imposing a moderate toll, and that on the equitable supposition that such toll is due for the expense and trouble the former may have been put to. "An innocent passage (says Vattel) is due to all nations with whom a State is at peace; and this duty comprehends troops equally with individuals." If a right to a passage by land through other countries may be claimed for troops, which are employed in the destruction of mankind, how much more may a passage by water be claimed for commerce, which is beneficial to all nations.

Here, again, it ought not to be concealed that the inconveniences which must be felt by the inhabitants on the waters running westwardly, under an exclusion from the free use of the Mississippi, would be a constant and increasing source of disquietude on their part, of more vigorous precautions on the part of Spain, and of an irritation on both parts, which it is equally the interest and duty of both to guard against.

But notwithstanding the equitable claim of the United States to the free navigation of the Mississippi, and its great importance to them, Congress have so strong a disposition to conform to the desires of his Catholic Majesty that they have agreed that such equitable regulations may be entered into as may be a requisite security against contraband; provided the point of right be not relinquished, and a free port or ports below the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and accessible to merchant ships, be stipulated to them.

The reason why a port or ports, as thus described, was required must be obvious. Without such a stipulation the free use of the Mississippi would, in fact, amount to no more than a free intercourse with New Orleans and other ports of Louisiana. From the rapid current of this river it is well known that it must be navigated by vessels of a peculiar construction, and which will be unfit to go to sea. Unless, therefore, some place be assigned to the United States where the produce carried down the river, and the merchandise arriving from abroad, may be deposited till they can be respectively taken away by the proper vessels, there can be no such thing as a foreign trade.

There is a remaining consideration respecting the navigation of the Mississippi which deeply concerns the maritime Powers in general, but more particularly their most Christian and Catholic Majesties. The country watered by the Ohio, with its large branches, having their sources near the lakes on one sid :, and those running northwestward and falling into it on the other side, will appear, from a single glance on a map, to be of vast extent. The circumstance of its being so finely watered, added to the singular fertility of its soil, and other advantages presented by a new country, will occasion a rapidity of population not easy to be conceived. The spirit of emigration has already shown itself in a very strong degree, notwithstanding the many impediments which discourage it. The principal of these impediments is the war with Britain, which cannot spare a force sufficient to protect the emigrants against the incursions of the savages. In a very few years after peace shall take place, this country will certainly be overspread with inhabitants. In like manner, as in all new settlements, agriculture, not manufactures, will be their employment. They will raise wheat, corn, beef, pork, tobacco, hemp, flax, and in the southern parts, perhaps, rice and indigo, in great quantities. On the other hand, their consumption of foreign manufactures will be in proportion, if they can be exchanged for the produce of their soil. There are but two channels through which such commerce can be carried on: the first is down the river Mississippi; the other is up the rivers having their sources near the lakes; thence by short portages to the lakes, or the rivers falling into them; and thence through the lakes and down the St. Lawrence. The first of these channels is manifestly the most natural, and by far the most advantageous. Should it, however, be obstructed, the second will be found far from impracticable. If no obstructions should be thrown in its course down the Mississippi, the exports from this immense tract of country will not only supply an abundance of all necessaries for the West India islands, but serve for a valuable basis of general trade, of which the rising spirit of commerce in France and Spain will no doubt particularly avail itself. The imports will be proportionally extensive; and from the climate, as well as from other causes, will consist of the manufactures of the same countries. On the other hand, should obstructions in the Mississippi force this trade into a contrary direction through Canada, France and Spain, and the other maritime Powers, will not only lose the immediate benefit of it themselves, but they will also suffer by the advantage it will give to Great Britain. So fair a prospect could not escape the commercial sagacity of this nation. She would embrace it with avidity. She would cherish it with the most studious care. And should she succeed in fixing it in that channel, the loss of her exclusive possession of the trade of the United States might prove a much less decisive blow to her maritime pre-eminence and tyranny than has been calculated.

The last clause of the instructions, respecting the navigation of the waters running out of Georgia through West Florida, not being included in the ultimatum, nor claimed on a footing of right, requires nothing to be added to what it speaks itself.

The utility of the privileges asked to the State of Georgia, and consequently to the Union, is apparent from the geographical representation of the country. The motives for Spain to grant it must be found in her equity, generosity, and disposition to cultivate our friendship and intercourse.

These observations, you will readily discern, are not communicated in order to be urged at all events, and as they here stand, in support of the claims to which they relate. They are intended for your private information and use, and are to be urged so far, and in such forms only, as will best suit the temper and sentiments of the Court at which you reside, and best fulfil the objects of them.

August, 1782.—On the 17th of November, 1781, the delegates for Massachusetts laid before Congress the following act of the Legislature of that State:

"COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, October 27, 1781.

"It appearing to this court of the highest importance to the United States in general, and to this State in particular, that the right to the fisheries heretofore enjoyed by the subjects of the United States should, in a future settlement of peace, be acknowledged and secured to them: Therefore—

"Resolved, That the delegates in Congress for this Commonwealth be, and they are hereby, instructed to represent to Congress the importance of the fisheries to this State, and to use their utmost influence that instructions be given to the ministers appointed by Congress for negotiating a peace, in the most pressing manner to insist that the free and unmolested exercise of this right be continued and secured to the subjects of the United States of America in a future settlement of peace.

"And it is further resolved, That the secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to forward the aforegoing resolve, without delay, to the delegates in Congress from this Commonwealth."

The aforegoing, together with sundry papers relative to the fisheries, was referred to a committee, consisting of Mr. Lovell, Mr. Carroll, and Mr. Madison, who, on the 8th January, 1782, reported as follows:

The committee to whom were referred the several papers relating to the fisheries have duly considered the same, and are of opinion that the best security for this object, short of admitting it into the ultimatum for peace, will be a representation to his most Christian Majesty, through our ministers for negotiating peace, of its great importance to the United States, and of the grounds upon which it is claimed and expected; and being also of opinion that a like representation touching the other claims of the United States excluded from the ultimatum would have a tendency no less salutary, they have prepared instructions to the said ministers in this comprehensive plan, and report the same, as follows, for the consideration of Congress:

That the ministers plenipotentiary for negotiating peace, or, in case they should not be convened, the minister plenipotentiary at the Court of Versailles, be instructed to acquaint his most Christian Majesty, that notwithstanding the occasion presented to the United States, by the signal and various advantages gained over the enemy, of enlarging their ultimatum for peace, the firm reliance which Congress have on the friendship and influence of his Majesty has determined them not to depart from their resolution of the ——— day of ——— last, by which all the objects of their desires and expectations, excepting only the independence of the United States and their alliance with his Majesty, are eventually submitted to his councils. But that, in order to make him more fully sensible of the extent and foundation of these desires and expectations, have thought it expedient that some observations should be made to him relative to the several objects which are most likely to fall within the compass of negotiation.

One of these objects, and which is intimately connected with the independence of the United States, is the exterior boundary by which their extent is to be defined. On this occasion it is to be observed that our contest will be with his Britannic Majesty alone. Under his authority the limits of these States, while in the character of colonies, were established; to these limits the United States, considered as independent sovereignties, have succeeded. Whatsoever territorial rights, therefore, belonged to them before the Revolution were necessarily devolved upon them at the era of independence.

Those grounds support the assertion that the United States are bounded as they are declared to be in the instructions given to Mr. Adams on the —— day of August, 1779.

As the efforts of his Britannic Majesty will be principally directed against the western and northwestern boundary, the observations on this subject may be confined thereto.

The treaty of Paris of 1763, to which his most Christian Majesty and the British King were parties, restricted those colonies, which were before extended by their charters to the sea, to the river Mississippi. To this river, then, these States will still extend in the same manner, unless by some subsequent constitutional and rightful act their limits have been abridged.

The negotiations on this head will probably assume a variety of forms. None, perhaps, will be more strenuously urged than those which arise from his Britannic Majesty's proclamation on the 7th day of October, 1763, the treaty of Fort Stanwix, in 1768, between him and the Six Nations, and the British statute, in 1774, establishing, among other things, the boundaries of Quebec.

1. If it can be supposed that the purpose of the proclamation was to affect the boundaries of the United States, it must be remembered to be the act of the very Prince against whom we contend; that it preceded, a short time only, the manifestations of those wicked and oppressive measures which gave birth to the Revolution; and that it directly interfered with the rights accruing to the colonies by the ancient and more solemn acts of his predecessors.

But by the prohibition to the Governors of the other colonies than of Quebec, East Florida, or West Florida, to grant warrants of survey or pass patents "for the present, and until his (the British King's) further pleasure should be known," for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west and northwest, is strongly shown an opinion that there were lands beyond the heads of those rivers within the grants of the Governors.

By the prohibition, too, to grant warrants of survey or pass patents for any lands whatever which, "not having been ceded to or purchased by the British King, were reserved to the Indians or any of them," a restriction of territory could not have been designed by a King who granted the charters to the colonies, knowing that they would interfere with the rights of the Indians, who has always considered a cession or purchase from the Indians not so much the source of a title as a milder means of preventing their hostility, who, since the date of the proclamation, has granted through the prohibited Governors themselves large quantities of land beyond the heads of those rivers, and whose own geographer, in a map describing and distinguishing the British, Spanish, and French dominions in America, according to the aforesaid treaty of Paris, carries the States of Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia, as far as the Mississippi.

In a word, this part of the proclamation seems to have been intended merely to shut up the land offices, not to curtail limits; to keep the Indians in peace, not to relinquish the rights accruing under the charters, and particularly that of pre-emption.

2. The treaty of Fort Stanwix is susceptible of a similar answer, by viewing it as an instrument of peace, not the conveyance of a title. For there is reason to believe that the British King has never ratified it; and yet it is notorious that his Governors have granted lands within the cession then made.

If it be said that the authority to grant those lands was derived from the treaty of Lancaster in 1744, here, then, is a forcible illustration of our doctrine. For on what principle, but on account of peace, could the British King have attempted to procure a new cession of the same country? On the other hand, if the authority to grant those lands was not derived from the treaty of Lancaster, it can rest on no other foundation than that of his charters.

3. The Quebec act is one of the multiplied causes of our opposition, and finally of the Revolution. No stress, therefore, ought to be laid on it, even if in its operation it abridged the boundary of the States. But the provision, that nothing therein contained relative to the boundary of the province of Qubec should in anywise affect the boundaries of any other colony, excludes such an operation, and confirms chartered rights.

Should Great Britain retain that portion of the United States bordering on the Mississippi, the neighborhood of her possessions will be imminently dangerous to our peace. Should she also retain Canada and West Florida, or even Canada alone, by applying herself to the settlement of that country, and pushing on her trade there with vigor, a new nursery for her marine will speedily be established.

From a full confidence that the western territory now contended for lay within the United States, the British posts therein have been reduced by our citizens, and American government is now exercised within the same; large bounties of land have been promised to the Army; and we have relied on it as an important source for discharging the debts incurred during the war.

For a considerable distance beyond the Appalachian mountains, and particularly on the Ohio, American citizens are actually settled at this day. By the surrender, therefore, of the western territory to Great Britain, a large number of fencible men—men, too, who have not been behind any of their fellow-citizens in the struggle for liberty—would be thrown back within her power.

But a decisive objection exists against this mutilation of our country; that the principle by which it would be limited to the distance of a mile only from the Mississippi would justify mutilations to an immense extent.

Another claim is the common right of the United States to take fish in the North American seas, and particularly on the Banks of Newfoundland. With respect to this object, the said ministers are instructed to consider and contend for it, as described in the instructions relative to a treaty of commerce, given to John Adams on the 29th of September, 1779, as equally desired and expected by Congress, with any of the other claims not made ultimata in the instructions given to the ministers plenipotentiary for negotiating a peace on the ——— day of ——— last, and are therein referred to as objects of the desires and expectations of Congress. They are also instructed to observe to his most Christian Majesty, with respect to this claim, that it does not extend to any parts of the sea lying within three leagues of the shores held by Great Britain or any other nation. That, under this limitation, it is conceived by Congress a common right of taking fish cannot be denied to them without a manifest violation of the freedom of the seas, as established by the law of nations and the dictates of reason; according to both which the use of the sea, except such parts thereof as lie in the vicinity of the shore and are deemed appurtenant thereto, is common to all nations, those only excepted who have either by positive convention, or by long and silent acquiescence under exclusion, renounced that common right; that neither of these exceptions militate against the claim of the United States, since it does not extend to the vicinity of the shore, and since they are so far from having either expressly or tacitly renounced their right, that they were prior to the war, though indeed not in the character of an independent nation, in the constant, and even during the war, in the occasional exercise of it; that although a greater space than three leagues has in some instances been, both by public treaties and by custom, annexed to the shore as part of the same dominion, yet, as it is the present aim of the maritime Powers to circumscribe, as far as reason will justify, all exclusive pretensions to the sea, and as that is the distance specified in a treaty to which both Great Britain and his Majesty are parties, and which relates to the very object in question, it was supposed that no other distance could, in the present case, be more properly assumed; that if a greater or an indefinite distance should be alleged to be appurtenant by the law of nations to the shore, it may be answered that the fisheries in question, even those on the Banks of Newfoundland, being of so vast an extent, might with much greater reason be deemed appurtenant to the whole continent of North America than to the inconsiderable portion of it held by Great Britain; that Congress expect, with greater assurance, the concurrence of his Majesty in these ideas, since his own claim to the fisheries would, by a contrary doctrine, be suspended on the mere concession of Great Britain, instead of resting on the solid and honorable basis of the law of nations and of right; that if Great Britain cannot, by virtue of her occupancy of the shore, claim an exclusive use of the fisheries beyond the vicinity thereof, and a right to the common use is incident to the United States as a free and independent community, they cannot admit that they have no such right, without renouncing an attribute of that sovereignty which they are bound, as well by respect for his Majesty's honor as for their own interests and dignity, to maintain entire; that this right is no less indispensable in its exercise than it is indisputable in its principles, the inhabitants of a considerable part of the United States being dependent thereon both for a material proportion of their subsistence and for the means of their commerce; and as they were in the full enjoyment of this resource prior to the Revolution, the loss of it by an event from which very different expectations have been cherished, and which ought to bestow, as far as possible, equal advantages on all who have labored equally for its accomplishment, could not fail to be attended with disappointment and mortifying comparisons; that, from these considerations, Congress have the most earnest desire, as well as the most sanguine hope, that his Majesty's efforts will obtain for his allies a stipulation on the part of Great Britain not to molest them in the common use of the fisheries, as above stated; or, if insuperable difficulties should oppose a positive stipulation in their favor, that his Majesty will in every event find means to avoid a surrender of that common right; that whilst, however, this latter expedient is suggested to his Majesty, it cannot escape his discernment that it is so pregnant with dangerous consequences that the former cannot be contended for with too much urgency and zeal.

That with respect to the confiscated property of those who have adhered to the interests of the enemy, and which may possibly be claimed for the former owners, the aforesaid ministers are to observe to his Majesty that these confiscations having taken place, more or less, in almost all the States, and having undergone various transfers from individual to individual, a specific restitution is absolutely impracticable; and when the vast amount of them is compared with the ravages and burdens which the war will leave behind it, an equivalent restitution would be little less than impracticable; that as the general usage of nations, as well as the particular law of Great Britain, excludes aliens from holding real and immovable estates, the moment our national independence was assumed, the titles of all those who, on or prior to that event, espoused the side of the enemy, became, under strict construction, extinct; and that such as afterwards deserted to them, falling under the denomination of traitors, have forfeited not only their estates but their lives to their country; that although it were to be admitted that the peculiarity of circumstances which distinguish the present war between the United States and Great Britain from a war between two nations separate and independent at its origin affords some plea for reversing the confiscations, this consideration is far outweighed by the great value of which the citizens of these States have, contrary to the laws of war, been despoiled by the enemy, and the still greater losses which they have suffered from wanton destruction; in both which, those who have fled or been expelled from their country have been often the chief instigators and instruments; and the first of which, many of them have enriched themselves greatly beyond their losses.

That the ministers further observe to his Majesty, that any stipulations authorizing such fugitives and exiles from their country to return into it would not only be dishonorable to the Governments of these States, but so obnoxious to the people at large, and especially to such as have been the objects of their outrages, that it is the particular wish of Congress that it may be most strenuously opposed; that such a permission is the more to be dreaded as it could only be intended for such as are totally devoid both of honor and sensibility, who alone would avail themselves of a privilege that would subject them to the indignation and resentments which they had provoked.

That as it is not improbable the subject of commerce will, among others, be introduced into the negotiation, the ministers be instructed to observe thereon to his most Christian Majesty that the United States, as a free and sovereign nation, being the absolute masters as well of their commerce as of their government, no claim of right can nor probably will be pretended, with respect to the former, by those who relinquish such pretension with respect to the latter; that it is the wish and the policy of the United States to preserve their commerce as unfettered as possible with stipulations in favor of nations with which they are now unconnected, and particularly of that with which they are now at war; that this policy cannot but coincide with the sentiments of his Majesty, since it alone will leave to his allies the future opportunity of manifesting their preference of his interests to those of his enemies and rivals; that Congress do, for these reasons, most earnestly desire, expect, and entreat, that his Majesty will spare no efforts that may be necessary to exclude from a treaty every article which would restrain the United States from imposing on the trade of Great Britain any duties, restrictions, or prohibitions, which may hereafter be judged expedient, unless, and so far only, as a relaxation in this point may be essentially necessary for obtaining peace, or the several objects above mentioned.

On the 22d of January, 1782, the foregoing report was referred to another committee, consisting of Mr. Carroll, Mr. Randolph, and Mr. Montgomery, who, on the 16th day of August, 1782, reported that they have collected facts and observations as follows, which they recommend to be referred to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to be by him digested, completed, and transmitted to the ministers plenipotentiary for negotiating a peace, for their information and use.

Facts and observations in support of the several claims of the United States not included in their ultimatum of the 15th of June, 1781.

1. Our common right to take fish in the North American seas, and particularly in that part of them which goes under the name of the Banks of Newfoundland, has its origin in the natural incapacity of the sea to be appropriated.

The practice of nations hath, for the sake of safety and tranquillity, abridged this freedom of the ocean, by annexing to the coast a reasonable tract of the water; and Great Britain, by availing herself of this usage, may possibly arrogate the exclusive enjoyment of the banks, as appurtenant to the island of Newfoundland.

These banks, the nearest point of which is thirty-five leagues distant from Cape Race, are too far advanced in the Atlantic to be a dependance of the shores. There has been great division among writers in determining to what extent the sea is to be considered as incidental to the territory which it washes. Some have apportioned one hundred miles, others sixty, and others as much as could be seen from land in a fair day.—(See Anderson's History of Commerce, 2 vol., Appendix 17.)

If we pass from theory to the stipulations of treaties, we shall find better aid, but by no means uniformity. By better aid we mean British precedents; for against these a British King surely will not struggle.

In the second year of James the First Commissioners were appointed on the part of England and Scotland to treat of and conclude a union between the two Kingdoms. By the articles for the regulation of trade, the sea for the space of fourteen miles from the coast of Scotland was reserved to Scotchmen only; and it was reciprocally provided in favor of Englishmen.—(See Spotswood's History of Scotland, 483, and 2 Anderson, Appendix 17.)

Should this example be thought to lose the force of its application, from having been the agreement of the subjects of one and the same Prince, a letter may be quoted from Secretary Stanton to Lord Carlton, the English ambassador at the Hague, bearing date 21st of January, 1618. In it the ambassador is commanded to urge the States' General, in the name of King James, to publish a placard prohibiting their subjects to fish within fourteen miles of his coasts until the main business should be finally accommodated by Commissioners.

The treaty of Paris, in 1763, to which his most Christian Majesty as well as his Britannic Majesty was a party, excludes the French from the exercise of the fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence only within three leagues from the shore, extending the distance round Cape Breton to fifteen leagues.

By inspecting the ancient treaties between England and the Dukes of Britanny and Burgundy, we shall find that the portion of the sea which is supposed to belong to the coast is so far from being increased beyond fifteen miles or even three leagues, that the liberty of fishing in every part thereof is asserted.—(See treaties between Henry Sixth and the Duchess of Burgundy; Edward Fourth and Francis, Duke of Britanny; Henry Seventh and Philip Fourth, Archduke of Austria; and Duke of Burgundy and Henry Eighth and Charles Fifth, Emperor and Duke of Burgundy.)

Had the Kings of England esteemed the fisheries the property of the Crown, they would not have admitted aliens to a promiscuous fishing with their own subjects without some valuable consideration, or an acknowledgment by way of salvo jure. But, instead of a proceeding like this, they have, in a succession of ages, deliberately omitted to challenge to themselves the sole right of the fisheries.

Queen Elizabeth, too, being involved in a dispute with the King of Denmark concerning the fishery at Wardhuys, near the North Cape, instructs her plenipotentiaries to deny that "the property of the sea at any distance whatsoever is consequent to the banks." The King of Denmark does not attempt, in his reply, to establish what she had thus denied, but rests his exclusive claims upon the authority of old treaties between the two Crowns.—(See Rymer's Foedera, tom. 16th, p. 425.)

Thus it appears, upon strict principles of natural law, the sea is unsusceptible of appropriation; that a species of conventional law has annexed a reasonable district of it to the coast which borders on it; and that in many of the treaties to which Great Britain has acceded, no distance has been assumed for this purpose beyond fourteen miles.

Were these rules, then, allowed to influence the pretensions of Great Britain with respect to the Banks of Newfoundland, they would be readily condemned. Nor could they be supported were the sea appendant to the shore as far as thirty leagues, the greatest distance, perhaps, which has at any time been ceded to the King of England by treaty.

Nations may, indeed, either by positive contract or by long and silent acquiescence under exclusion, renounce their privileges in the sea. But the United States have not only never disclaimed their right of fishing therein, but have been in the constant enjoyment of it during the existence of British government, and occasionally so ever since the Revolution.

It deserves attention, that the fisheries furnish the inhabitants of a considerable part of the United States with an important proportion of their subsistence and the means of their commerce. Should they lose this resource by the accomplishment of independence—an event from which very different expectations have been cherished, and which ought to bestow equal advantages on all who have labored equally in giving birth to it—such a loss cannot fail to be attended with disappointment and mortifying comparisons.

As it is the aim of the maritime Powers to circumscribe, as far as equity will suffer, all exclusive claims to the sea, we trust his most Christian Majesty will coincide with our present doctrines. Perhaps, however, the ninth and tenth articles of the treaty of amity and commerce may be supposed, from a little ambiguity in their language, to forbid us to insist on a participation of the fisheries on the Banks of Newfoundland and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, as being frequented and enjoyed by the subjects of France. But what is the genuine construction of these articles?

The ninth begins with a general stipulation that the subjects of one party shall abstain from fishing in all places possessed or to be possessed by the other; interdicts those of France from fishing in the havens, bays, creeks, roads, coasts or places which the United States hold or shall hereafter hold, as well as the inhabitants of the United States from fishing in the havens, bays, creeks, roads, coasts, or places which the most Christian King possesses or shall hereafter possess. But this exclusion is to take place only so long and so far as an exemption shall not in this respect have been granted to some other nation.

The tenth article binds the United States and their citizens not to disturb the subjects of the most Christian King in the exercise of the right of fishing on the Banks of Newfoundland, nor in their indefinite and exclusive privileges on the coast of the island of that name, conformably to the true sense and meaning of the treaties of Utrecht and Paris.

If it can be truly said that the fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on the Banks of Newfoundland are possessed or holden by France, the citizens of the United States are entitled, according to the provisions of the ninth article, to like access with the subjects of Great Britain.

But the sea cannot be holden or possessed, these terms implying appropriation. They accord well with havens, bays, creeks, roads, or coasts; and also with "places," should this word be confined, as it ought to be, in its interpretation to waters susceptible of occupancy.

Had it been conceived that the ninth article debarred the United States from fishing on the Banks of Newfoundland, it would have been unnecessary to guard, in the tenth, against the molestation of the French in fishing there. Besides, an engagement not to disturb, does of itself import that the citizens of the United States may fish if they do not disturb.

There seems, too, a remarkable antithesis between the right of fishing and the right derived from the treaty of Utrecht, as to the coast of the island of Newfoundland. The former is called simply the enjoyment and exercise of the right of fishing; but the latter is more pointedly denominated indefinite and exclusive. In a word, we are persuaded, from our experience of the candor and friendship of his most Christian Majesty, that it was not his design to depress the United States by thrusting them from a share of the fisheries which Providence appears to have destined for their use; but rather to secure the fisheries of his own country from encroachment, and his subjects from interruption in those of America.

2. With respect to the boundaries of the States. The patent to the Council of Plymouth, bearing date the 18th of November, 1620, is the parent from which the Eastern States proceed.

New Hampshire claims under the royal commission appointing Benning Wentworth, Esq., Governor of that province, on the 13th July, in the fifteenth year of the reign of George the Second.

Massachusetts claims under the charter granted by William and Mary, on the 17th October, 1691. The treaty of Paris fixes the Mississippi as the western limit of the old colony of Massachusetts Bay, which is one of the colonies incorporated by that charter.—(See old charter of 4th March, 1628–'29.)

The charter of April 23, 1662, granted by Charles the Second to Winthrop and others, is the ground of the territorial claims of Connecticut. The treaty of Paris is allowed to restrict that State also to the Mississippi.

On the 8th July, 1662, the same Prince granted the charter under which Rhode Island claims.

New York assigns, as sources of her title, the grant from Charles Second to the Duke of York in 1663, the capitulation of the Dutch in the same year, the treaty of Westminster, 1674, and the renewal or confirmation of the Duke's grant immediately after the treaty. This State adds that the lands on the west side of Connecticut river belong to it under the further [right] accruing by the subjection of the Five Nations, the native proprietors; and that the country, as far northward as the river St. Lawrence and westward without known limits, is the property of New York, as having been formerly possessed by those Indians and their tributaries. The treaties with those nations in 1684, 1701, 1726, 1744, and 1754, are particularly referred to.

On the 23d June, 1664, the Duke of York conveyed, out of his aforesaid grant to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, the limits which New Jersey claims. Upon this ground, and the resignation of the Government into the hands of the Crown on the 14th August, 1703, is the title of this State built.

Pennsylvania claims under the charter granted by Charles the Second, on the 4th of March, 1681–'82, to William Penn.

Delaware claims under two grants from the Duke of York to William Penn, on the 24th August, 1683.

On the 20th June, 1632, Charles the First granted to Lord Baltimore the limits which Maryland claims.

Virginia claims under the charter granted by James First, on the 23d of May, 1609, to the treasurer and company, the resumption of the country into the hands of the King, and the charter of Charles Second to the colony of Virginia, on the 10th October, 1676. The treaty of Paris marks its western boundary.

North Carolina and South Carolina claim jointly, in the first instance, under the charter of 1662, to Clarendon and others, and its confirmation in 1664, with an extension of limits. The British statute of 1729, enabling the King to pay the consideration of the surrender of the proprietors, makes a material point in their case. The separate claims of these two States depend upon the act which divided them. The treaty of Paris defines the western boundary of each.

The first grant on which Georgia relies is that made to the trustees on the 8th June, 1732, and limited to the west by the treaty of Paris. The second grant is the proclamation of 1763.

Were the lands included within these limits merely such as were granted to individuals and settled, or granted and not settled, at the time of the Revolution, they could not be brought into controversy. For no question can arise concerning boundaries until the recognition of independence; and this event, by deposing the King of Great Britain from the rank of Lord Paramount and Chief Magistrate of America, destroys the only principles by which lands falling within the two preceding descriptions could return into his power. But the views, interests, and conduct of his Britannic Majesty forbid us to expect that he will acknowledge the territory remaining ungranted at the era of independence to be, in like manner, the property of the United States, or of the particular States within the limits of which it is comprised.

It is, therefore, incumbent on us to show—

First. That the territorial rights of the thirteen United States, while in the character of British colonies, were the same with those defined in the instructions given to Mr. J. Adams on the —— day of August, 1779; and,

Secondly. That the United States, considered as independent sovereignties, have succeeded to those rights; or,

Thirdly. That if the vacant lands cannot be demanded upon the preceding grounds, that is, upon the titles of individual States, they are to be deemed to have been the property of his Britannic Majesty immediately before the Revolution, and to be now devolved upon the United States collectively taken.

First. So fair are our pretensions rendered by the united operation of the grants, charters, royal commissions, and Indian cessions, enumerated above, that we shall content ourselves with reviewing the objections which will most probably be urged against them, without entering into direct proofs of our titles.

First objection. Even upon the supposition that the charter of Massachusetts is valid, so as to cover the vacant lands, still it does not follow that St. John's river is part of its eastern boundary, for that river is contended to be in Nova Scotia under the expression in the new charter of Massachusetts in 1691, which conveys the country between the province of Maine and Nova Scotia. The southwest boundary of Nova Scotia, therefore, will regulate this claim. But it is well known that in the altercation between France and Great Britain upon this very subject in 1751, Acadia, or Nova Scotia, was asserted by the latter to be bounded by Pentagoet, or Penobscot river.

Answer. It is to be observed, that when the boundaries of the United States were declared to be an ultimatum, it was not thought advisable to continue the war merely to obtain territory as far as St. John's river; but that the dividing line of Massachusetts and Nova Scotia was to be consigned to future settlement. It must be confessed, also, that this country, which is said in the new charter to border on Nova Scotia and the province of Maine, on opposite sides, and which goes under the name of Sagadahock, cannot be proved to extend to the river St. John as clearly as to that of St. Croix. But there is some reason, notwithstanding, to believe that Nova Scotia was never supposed by the British King, in any grant to his subjects, to come to the south of St. John's river, although he might have exacted from France a relinquishment of the lands to the river Penobscot, or even Kennebec, as a part of Nova Scotia.

The first notice taken of Nova Scotia by the King of Great Britain was in a grant which he made of that country to Sir William Alexander, on the 10th September, 1621. According to this grant, it was to begin at Cape Sable, to extend towards St. Mary's bay, to cross the great bay between the Etchemins and Sourigois to the mouth of the river St. Croix, to run up to the source of that river, and from thence, by a straight line drawn northwardly, to the great river of Canada. On the 12th July, 1625, a patent issued to the same Sir William Alexander, confirming to him the same.

These grants could not reach to the west of St. Croix, "because," (say the English Commissaries in their memorial of the 11th January, 1751, s. 42,) "all the country to the westward of the river St. Croix had, in the year 1620, before the date of the first of them, been granted by King James to certain of his subjects, by the name of the Council of Plymouth, of which grantees Sir William Alexander was one, and who, by virtue of an agreement among the said grantees, possessed the country lying between the river St. Croix and Pemaquid, a little to the westward of Pentagoet."

Popple's map, which was undertaken, as the author relates, with the approbation of the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, makes the St. Croix the western boundary of Nova Scotia. Champlain expressly bounds Acadia by St. Croix to the westward. We may add, as being further corroborative of this western limit of Nova Scotia, that the English Commissaries themselves, in their reply of 4th October, 1751, commend the map in the fourth volume of Purchas' Pilgrim as the first ancient map of Nova Scotia and New England deserving notice; the latter of which they assert to be bounded northwardly, as is delineated in the map, by the river St. Croix. The same Commissaries afterwards remark, that it is clear from history that the country between the rivers Sagadahock and St. Croix had been settled many years earlier than the date of the new charter of Massachusetts; and that Great Britain considered it as a part of her American colonies. It could not have been included within Nova Scotia, since it is expressly contradistinguished from it. Sagadahock, too, is granted to the Duke of York, under the description of "all that part of the main land of New England, beginning at a certain place called or known by the name of St. Croix, adjoining to New Scotland, in America."

Should it be argued that it was manifestly the opinion in England, at the time of granting the new charter, that the lands between the rivers Sagadahock and St. Croix were not included within the limits of Massachusetts, since grants of them were not valid until confirmed by the Crown, an answer arises from two considerations: First, this charter incorporates these lands into the province of Massachusetts in unequivocal terms; and secondly, one at least of the counsellors directed to be chosen yearly for the province at large was to be from the inhabitants or proprietors of lands within this territory. The Board of Trade and Plantations, on the 29th April, 1700, declared in a solemn act that New England ought of right to extend to St. Croix.—(See the act.)

It does not appear, then, that Nova Scotia hath ever been carried to the west of the river St. Croix in any British grant, or any British document relative to New England. We own that in the memorials of the Court of Great Britain to the French Court, after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, relative to the boundaries of Nova Scotia, Penobscot river is sometimes asserted to be one of its boundaries, and Kennebec at others. But nothing is proved from thence but a desire in the British King to procure an absolute release from France of all her pretensions, however distant. For a general discussion on this subject, see the British and French memorials on the occasion, and the treaties of St. Germain, on the 29th of March, 1632; of Westminster, November 3, 1655, and of Breda, July 31, 1667.

As to the territory of Sagadahock, which is synonymous with the lands between the province of Maine and Nova Scotia, conveyed by the new charter, we can only observe upon the expression already cited from the grant thereof to the Duke of York, that the "place called St. Croix, adjoining to New Scotland," must mean the territory which went by that name. Had the river only been designed it alone would have been mentioned. It seems to have been the practice of those times to denominate a country from a river which bounded it. The river Sagadahock accordingly, at first, gave its own appellation to the whole country as far as the river St. Croix, and afterwards to the country from thence to St. John's, which had before been called St. Croix. The place, therefore, called St. Croix, adjoining to New Scotland, was most likely intended to describe the lands between the rivers St. Croix and St. John's. History does not inform us that any particular spot of them was known as St. Croix. But as the first course of the grant to the Duke of York plainly runs from Nova Scotia to Massachusetts along the seacoast, it is probable that it was to begin at the first point in the country of St. Croix on the coast. This must have been on St. John's river. And as the last line of the grant is not closed, it is more agreeable to the usage of those days to adopt a natural boundary. For this purpose St. John's river was obvious as far as its head, and afterwards a line to the great river of Canada.—(See grant to the Duke of York for Sagadahock, March 12, 1663–'64.)

We are obliged to urge probabilities, because, in the early possessions of a rough unreclaimed country, accuracy of lines cannot be much attended to. But we wish that the northeastern boundary of Massachusetts may be left to future discussion, when other evidences may be obtained which the war has removed from us.

Second objection. But let the new charter of Massachusetts comprehend, by its expressions, the country from the river St. Croix to that of St. John's, and the title papers of the other States cover, by their terms, ever so much land, they cannot be supposed, at this day, to justify such wide limits as are demanded in Mr. Adams' instructions of August, 1779; for—

1. The charters of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, never had any serious western limit since the South Sea was thought to be nearer the Atlantic than it really is; and if its true position had been known, such a grant would have been too extravagant.

2. The charters of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, were granted to proprietors, and that of Georgia to trustees, and were afterwards resumed into the King's hands. It is, therefore, incumbent on those States to show either their right of succession to the proprietors and trustees, in opposition to the resumption of the Crown, or an obligation on the Crown to appropriate to them, when changed into royal governments, the same boundaries which they held when proprietary or fiduciary.

3. The treaties with the Five [Nations,] under which New England claims, transferred to that colony no title to their lands.

4. The proclamation of 1763 abridged all the colonies which claimed beyond the sources of the rivers falling into the Atlantic to those sources.

5. By the treaty of Fort Stanwix, in 1768, the King of Great Britain bought from the Six Nations, in his own name, a great part of the country claimed by Virginia to the west of the Alleghany mountains; and, by several other treaties with the Indian tribes, purchases have been made within its chartered limits, from which it may be inferred that this colony was before destitute of right to the lands so purchased; and,

6. The statute of the British Parliament, commonly called the Quebec act, in 1774, cuts off the extensive claims of the United States.

Answer to objection second, part first. It cannot be admitted that even a miscomputation of the distance between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans vitiates the charters which extend from the one to the other. In every contest among the European Powers concerning the soil of America, the validity of charters hath been conceded.—(See treaties of Germain, Westminster, and Breda, and the memorials of the Commissaries above referred to.)

The King of Great Britain will not fail to acknowledge their sacredness while he calls to mind the doctrine of the British laws, by which the charters of corporations are protected. Of how much more importance is a charter granted to the suffering explorers of the American wilderness!

It is also remarkable that during the rage for the sacrifice of American charters in the reign of Charles II, some of them were vacated by the judgments of a court by which their former legal existence was recognized; and that the arbitrary administration of a Stuart himself would not attempt to destroy a charter without the formality of legal process. An American charter, then, being thus respectable in its nature, equity will not suffer it to be annulled on account of a misconception of its contents, when the grantees could not possibly have contributed to the mistake by fraudulently withholding information upon the subject, and when the King hath never pretended that he was deceived or erred. But had the interval between those seas been precisely ascertained, it is not probable that the King of England would have divided the chartered boundaries now in question into more Governments. For perhaps his principal object at that time was to acquire by that of occupancy which originated in this western world, to wit, by charters, a title of the lands comprehended therein against foreign Powers. The seacoast, too, was not, in his opinion, more than sufficient for the territory of a single colony, as is manifested in the charter to Virginia in 1609; and the interior parts, overspread as they were by savages and distant as they must be from that relief from Europe without which the new settlements would certainly have perished, would have been a pitiful instance of royal bounty and no temptation to emigrants; nor is this merely conjectural. Let the charters which run to the South Sea be reviewed in chronological order. By this it will be found that these extensive limits did not creep in through inadvertence, as they were repeated long after the error had been removed as to the distance of that sea.

On the 23d of May, 1609, James I granted the charter under which Virginia claims.

On the 3d of November, 1620, the charter to the Council at Plymouth was granted.

On the 4th of March, 1628–'29, the charter of the old colony of Massachusetts was dated.

On the 20th of March, 1662, the first charter of Carolina was granted.

On the 20th of April, 1662, Connecticut received its charter.

On the 30th of June, 1664, the second charter of Carolina was granted.

On the 7th of October, 1691, the new charter of Massachusetts, which, among other things, re-established the old colony, was granted.

In 1732, Georgia was erected into a separate Government.

If it be necessary to seek other illustrations, an appeal may be made to the act of the British Parliament, in 1729, (2 G. 2, ch. 34,) which has already been noted, and recites the charter of Carolina as extending to the South Sea. Nay, as late as the year 1740, five Commissioners were appointed on the part of the King and five on that of Lord Carteret, to assign to his lordship his one-eighth of Carolina, which he had refused to surrender, and the South Sea was fixed the western limit of the territory allotted to him. We cannot forbear to add a general concession from the Crown in the several charters, that when doubts should arise the construction should be strict against himself and liberal in behalf of the grantees.

Answer to second part of second objection. The facts related in this branch of the second objection are true; but we shall not attempt to prove that the colonies of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, were lawful successors to the rights of the proprietors. We assume that the lands described by the charters of those colonies were, from their necessary operation, subjected to the jurisdiction of the Governments of those colonies respectively; and, therefore, that they would have constantly remained so subject during the existence of the proprietary administration, even if the proprietors had had a right to throw them off from that jurisdiction, unless some act of dismemberment had been done. But we protest against such a right of dismemberment being lodged in the proprietors, except with the assent of the people.

The charters of the abovementioned colonies were contracts, to which the King, the proprietors, and the emigrants and their posterity were parties. The consideration paid by the King for the product of mines and of future commerce was the protection of the proprietors and emigrants. The proprietors disbursed money for the expenses of the first settlement, and were the owners of the soil, and the managers of the Government. The emigrants were the actual improvers of the country, promising themselves and their descendants the superintending care of their Sovereign, a mild government of the proprietors, and a continuance of the boundaries defined in their charters. We say a continuance of the boundaries; for there were good grounds why the first planters should be opposed to an alteration of boundaries at the will of the proprietors. 1. A power to restrain the proprietors from separating them into different bodies, and obliging them to defray the charges of Government in many feeble hamlets, was essential to their welfare, if not to their safety, and was, therefore, very probably in their contemplation. 2. The southern district of British America was believed to be fertile in the precious metals. The greater, therefore, the extent of territory was which lays within a Government there, the happier was the prospect of obtaining wealth. 3. Had the proprietors been at liberty to disperse the inhabitants into distinct societies by cantoning the chartered limits into any number of new colonies, the opportunity for oppression would have been ruinous. They might have exacted some hard service, and threatened their tenants with a division of their country on failure of compliance; by which means they would have been exposed to the severe alternative of acquiescing in the tyranny or undergoing the ravages of Indian warfare from the difficulties inevitably attendant upon concentrating the force of various communities. 4. The emigrants hoped that themselves and their posterity would find a facility of living unknown in Europe, and freedom in religion. How obviously might the former, connected as it is with agriculture and manufactures, and the latter, dependant as it also sometimes is upon the association of persons of a similar persuasion, have been prevented by an arbitrary and malicious contraction of limits. 5. These ideas are supported by the charters themselves. The proprietors and settlers of South Virginia had received a charter on the 10th April, 1606, of which, and the liberties and privileges contained therein, that of 23d of May, 1609, is declared to be an enlargement and explanation, and is an express confirmation.—(Sec. 27.) These two charters then forming one system in the same manner with two laws, one of which enlarges and explains the other, it is correct to argue from both.

The first charter recites that Sir Thomas Gates and his fellow adventurers were desirous of dividing themselves into two several colonies and companies.—(Sec. 2.) In section 2 the King commends the undertaking; in section 4, gives one hundred miles square to the first colony; and the like quantity in section 5 to the second. This cannot be said to favor any subdivision of chartered territory.—(Secs. 4 and 5.) Every other subject was prohibited from planting or inhabiting behind either of the two colonies. This prohibition was plainly dictated by the danger apprehended from the establishment of distinct Governments. In no part of this charter is provision made for the government of more than two colonies. It was impossible then for the proprietors to institute different Governments. A new and separate colony erected by their authority could not have a seal, establish a coin, and convey the franchises of British natives to persons born therein of British subjects, nor designate grantees of land. In short, the charter of 1606 does constantly discountenance divisions of the territory for the purpose of additional provinces. The transition is now easy to the charter of 1609. It was granted not to the adventurers, that is, the proprietors only, but to the planters also; not from undue partiality, but from respect to their great charges, and the hazard of their lives in the discovery and plantation of the country. Here is a valuable consideration paid by the planters, equal in dignity to the merit of the proprietors, and entitling them to demand that the territory be not impaired. Like observations to those on the charter of 1606 may be used on this occasion. Had the proprietors carved out a new Government, it could have acquired its rights as such only from a fresh grant from the Crown, or the charter of 1609. If the Crown must have been resorted to, the charter could not have authorized the measure. But the truth is, that the charter enabled the treasurer and company of adventurers and planters of the city of London for the first colony of Virginia only, to plead and be impleaded; to hold lands within the limits of the charter; to distribute lands under a common seal; to have a council resident in England; to search for mines; to encourage emigration from British dominions; to be free from certain subsidies for twenty years; to seize vessels trafficking without license within the precincts of the charter; and to dispense criminal and martial law. Nor are the liberties of natural subjects granted to any person born within the limits of the charter, but as those limits constitute the first colony of Virginia. In a third charter passed to the treasurer and company of Virginia, on the 12th March, 1711–'12, the same unity is preserved to the first colony throughout, and a separation is not alluded to in the most distant way. But it is an argument of real force with respect to Virginia, that the charters of 1609 and 1611–'12 were granted to the treasurer and company as a corporation, and that it is a firm principle of British law that a corporation cannot exclude from their jurisdiction lands placed within it by the terms of its Constitution. Analogous to the charters of Virginia are those of the two Carolinas, or more properly of Carolina, respecting the indivisibility of their limits. The territory described therein, and the province of Carolina, are synonymous in many instances.

In the last clause but two in the second charter, the royal word is pledged to the proprietors, "their heirs and assigns, and to the tenants and inhabitants of the said province or territory, both present and to come, and to every of them, that the said province or territory, and the tenants and inhabitants thereof, shall not from henceforth be held or reputed any member or part of any colony whatsoever in America or elsewhere, now transported or made, or hereafter to be transported or made; nor shall be depending on or subject to their Government in anything, but be absolutely separated and divided from the same." Nay, so little was the power of altering the limits conceived to be inherent in the proprietors, that the authority to divide the territory into counties was delegated to them in positive terms.

It must, however, be confessed, that before the surrender of the charter in 1729, North and South Carolina had each a Governor, Council, and Assembly. But this separation of jurisdictions was not the creature of the proprietors alone, but was effected with the approbation of the inhabitants, some of whom labored under great inconvenience from having the metropolis and the settled country around it distant from them three hundred miles and upwards.—(See Lawson's History of Carolina, page 256.)

The example of New Jersey cannot be cited against the right of the people to demand from the proprietors an entirety of territory. For the very grant upon which they rest expressly warrants an equal division between Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret.—(See the Duke of York's grant.) The argument from hence would rather be, that when the power of division was intended it was specially mentioned.

It would be tedious to detail, in this place, the many passages in the charters to Lord Baltimore and Mr. Penn, which maintain the principle that the first limits ought to be permanent. So opposite to private emolument was the office of the trustees of Georgia, that they enjoyed no right which was not for the benefit of the people. The limits granted to the trustees were in fact granted to them.

What change, then, was wrought by the conversion of the proprietary Governments of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and the fiduciary one of Georgia, into royal?

Virginia.—It is needless to inquire whether the charter of 1609 was abolished lawfully or not. Because, as its abolition was the act of the King, he cannot contend that it was produced by violence or injustice; and the company and their successors have yielded to the resumption from 1624 to this day, without bringing it to a forensic discussion, or endeavoring to reverse it by a petition to the Crown. Either of these remedies was easy and constitutional. But a superior reason is, that a dispute between the King and company, two of the three parties to the charter, ought not to prejudice the people of Virginia, who were the third who stipulated with the proprietors for the territorial privileges in the charter with the privity, assent, and guaranty of the King, who could not profit from a rupture between him and the proprietors, and ought not therefore to be injured.

But what if the King had not been an immediate party? Surely his succession to the rights of the company brought with it a succession to their engagements respecting territory; unless James I, as King of England, was authorized to violate, in spoliation of his own subjects, that rule of natural law under the influence of which his Prussian Majesty bound himself, upon obtaining Silesia, to be answerable to the British King for encumbrances imposed on that country by the Empress of Hungary in his favor.

It is a warrantable corollary from the inability of the proprietors to mutilate the limits in the charter of 1609, that the King standing in their place was alike incapable. This reasoning is not impeached by the divisions which the chartered limits of Virginia have undergone. They were made at periods when the people could not feel an interest in opposing them; when extreme loyalty was the highest virtue; when they were weak. The quotation of their submission in this instance, as an evidence of their consciousness of the King's right, would be somewhat unnatural, since it would suppose that other men in the same circumstances would probably have acted otherwise.

The objections springing from the proclamation and Quebec statute will be discussed hereafter.

That the King of England thought himself bound to consider the colony of Virginia as possessing the limits of the charter of 1609, except in those cases in which it had been abridged before 1669, appears from the charter of 10th October, 1676. There the colony of Virginia is mentioned in general terms without definite limits. To confine it to the country then settled would be inconsistent with its professed design of encouraging the plantation, and would exclude nine-tenths of the present inhabitants. Not to confine it thereto, would demonstrate that Virginia was believed by Charles II to comprehend some vacant land, and consequently that she must hold all the vacant land within the charter of 1609; since a single foot could not be demanded through any other channel. Long ago would the people themselves have required some determinate limits, had they not imagined that the charter of 1609 described them. So far, too, has the King of England been from marking out the boundaries of Virginia in the charter of 1609, or in any instructions to his Governors, that he has by various acts corroborated our principle, that after the extinction of the charter they remained the same as before. For near thirty years has the Governor of Virginia, acting under his authority and with his knowledge, granted lands on the west side of the Alleghany mountains. In 1748-'49 Sir William Gooch, Governor of Virginia, was instructed to grant to the Ohio company lands far westward of the Alleghany mountains, but still, as the instruction and the letter enclosing it says, "On the Ohio within his Majesty's colony of Virginia." In 1753, an act was passed by the Assembly of Virginia for the encouragement of settlers on the waters of the Mississippi. To this act the royal assent was given. In 1754 an act was passed by the same Legislature for a similar purpose, in which Virginia is declared to possess lands on and near the waters of the Mississippi. A very large sum of money has been levied upon the people of Virginia for the defence of that country. All this has been done with the knowledge and consent of the British King. In the year —— the Governor and Council of Virginia granted a tract of land at the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi, bounding upon both rivers. In 1754 Mr. Dinwiddie, Governor of Virginia, promised, by his proclamation, a bounty of 200,000 acres of land on the western waters to the officers of the first Virginia regiment. The many land warrants issued by Lord Dunmore, Governor of Virginia, were directed to be located on the lands lying on the western waters. In 1773 courts were holden beyond the Alleghany mountains under the authority and particular direction of the Governor of Virginia. The general observations applied to Virginia are applicable to the two Carolinas.

Of Georgia it may be said that the proclamation of 1763 revived its chartered limits by annexing the lands between the Alatamaha and St. Mary's river to that province; for at the date of that edict a considerable part of the lands northward of Alatamaha was vacant; and to suppose that by Georgia was meant that territory alone which had been granted to individuals, would annex the country south of Alatamaha, and shut out the vacant part lying on the north side of that river.

But as no reasonable solution could be given of so whimsical an arrangement of territory, we may conclude that the vacant land on the north of Alatamaha was comprised in the term of Georgia. If so, since Georgia could claim vacant land only by virtue of the deed to the trustees, and that deed must have conveyed full limits or nothing, it follows that its territorial rights were restored, if they were affected by the surrender. But it has been already seen in what predicament the trustees stood. They were what their title imports—mere trustees for the benefit of the province. Strangely then would it sound, that upon the refusal of those benevolent men who had no personal interest in the trust to persevere in fostering this infant nation, it must lose everything, or, in other words, hang on the pleasure of the King for a restitution of former rights.

Answer to third part of second objection. New York derives its claim from the Five Nations, insisting, 1. That the King of England was lord of their soil. 2. That being so, he transferred his seignory to that then province. The Five Nations (Iroquois, or Six Nations) had from ancient days put themselves and their lands under the protection of Great Britain. The Duke de Mirepoix, in his memorial of the 14th of May, 1755, to the ministry of London, denies that the lands of the Five Nations became vested in his Britannic Majesty by the deeds; but the answer returned by that ministry on the 7th June, in the same year, contends that the 15th article in the treaty of Utrecht subjects the Five Nations to the dominion of Great Britain. That such subjection, according to the genuine interpretation of treaties, relates to the country as well as to the person; and that France is precluded from altercating these points with Great Britain, because she has once acknowledged their propriety. It will not, therefore, be insisted that the territory of the Five Nations belongs to the ancient and just limits of Canada, as the foregoing assertions were urged to confront a pretension of France to this effect; nor will it be denied that the King of Great Britain was, with respect to his subjects, at least lord of the soil of the Iroquois, by being their protector.

New York maintains, in the second place, that its legislative and executive proceedings from ——— to ——— proves that this very Iroquois territory has been supported by its blood and treasure; that this circumstance does of itself create an equitable title, which has ripened into an indefeasible one, by Great Britain having always treated the country of the Iroquois and their tributaries up to the forty-fifth degree of northern latitude as transferred from itself to the Government of New York.—(See documents to be furnished by the delegates of New York.)

Answer to fourth part of second objection. The prohibition announced to the Governors of all the colonies, except those of Quebec, East Florida, and West Florida, to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents "for the present, and until his (the British King's) further pleasure should be known," for any lands beyond the heads or sources of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west and northwest, strongly intimates an opinion that there were lands beyond the heads of those rivers within the jurisdiction of those Governors; otherwise the prohibition would have been unnecessary. Again, by the injunction "not to grant warrants of survey, or to pass patents for any lands whatever which, not having been ceded to or purchased by the British King, were reserved to the Indians, or any of them," a restriction of territory could not have been designed by a King who granted charters to his colonies, knowing that they would interfere with the rights of the Indians, who has always considered a cession or purchase from them as a milder means of anticipating their hostility rather than a source of title, who, since the date of the proclamation, has granted, through the prohibited Governors themselves, large quantities of lands beyond the heads of those rivers, and whose own geographer, Emanl. Bowen, in a map delineating the British, Spanish, and French dominions in America, according to the treaty of Paris and this very proclamation, has carried Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia, as far as the Mississippi. The single object of these parts of the proclamation was to suspend the business of the land offices, not to curtail limits; to keep the Indians in peace, not to annihilate the territorial rights of the colonies.

But it may be charged as an inconsistency to set up the proclamation as increasing the limits of Georgia, when it thereby plainly mutilates South Carolina. The fact is, that before and after the cession of Florida, South Carolina asserted a right to the lands between the rivers Alatamaha and St. Mary's. Georgia contradicted. The dispute was ended by this proclamation of the Crown, and the title of Georgia is certainly confirmed. Could South Carolina do more than represent their grievance? Having done this, did she confess the authority of Great Britain to dismember her at will because she did not fly to arms? Another reason might have induced South Carolina to relinquish its opposition with less reluctance. Peace and its incidents being the province of the Chief Magistrate of the British Empire, and the lands between Alatamaha and St. Mary's having been rendered neutral by an agreement with Spain, they were separated from South Carolina. Now, it might have been the opinion of some that this circumstance weakened the original title.—(See treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.) Upon the prerogative of the Crown to manage the affairs of peace, and the rights of France, depends the justice of limiting the American colonies to the Mississippi by the treaty of Paris.

Answer to the fifth part of the second objection. Nor can the treaty of Fort Stanwix, in 1768, militate against Virginia; for the purchase then ratified did not imply a want of right in the King, but was solely, as was observed of the proclamation, an instrument of peace. Nor yet did he render the ceded lands exclusively his own; because the relation between him and the American royal colonies required his name in all conventions with the Indians concerning territory, even when the benefit redounded to them alone, because the franchise of pre-emption had been often asserted by some of them, and particularly by New Jersey in 172—, by an act of the Legislature, approved by the royal Governor; and because, in the exercise of that franchise, the wealth of the colony, within which the purchased lands lay, was commonly expended. It is true that Virginia, in 1769, asked permission to purchase a more extensive boundary; but the causes were that the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, who had the absolute guidance of the Indian councils, could be conciliated only through the medium of the Crown, and the British Governor would have withholden his assent to any vote levying money for the purpose of such a purchase without the approbation of his master.

Answer to the sixth part of the second objection. The Quebec act was one of the multiplied causes of our opposition, and finally of the Revolution. Even if it had been designed to abridge the boundaries of the colonies, the right of the British Parliament to do so must be denied upon the grounds already shown. But the provision, that nothing therein contained relative to the province of Quebec should in anywise affect the boundaries of any other colony, destroys its operation with regard to those which are now required by us. Thus have we laid open the grounds of our claims to the boundaries specified in the instructions to Mr. J. Adams.

The second point, to wit: that the United States have succeeded as independent sovereignties to the territorial rights of the colonies.

The States claiming vacant lands before the revolution were, 1. Connecticut, a Government belonging to the Governor and company; 2. Pennsylvania, a Government belonging to a few individuals; 3. Massachusetts, possessing an express charter as a royal Government; and 4. Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, which were originally proprietary Governments, and afterwards became royal, but received no special charters as such.

1. Charles II relinquishes, in his charter to Connecticut, all titles to the lands therein described. Grants did not issue in his name, nor did escheats fall to him as lord paramount. The extinction, therefore, of the British jurisdiction in Connecticut cannot vest in the King of England a territorial right which he never enjoyed before, but must strip him of every possible authority in that State.

2. We affirm, without repeating the proofs, that the State of Pennsylvania retains its provincial limits. At the Revolution one-fourth of the ungranted soil was the property of Mr. J. Penn, and three-fourths of W. Penn. Since that era the whole has been seized into the hands of the State. Mr. J. Penn being a citizen of Pennsylvania, the King of Great Britain would grossly intrude on the sovereignty of the State were he to interest himself in the restitution of his share. Prudential and equitable considerations ought always to curb licentious invasions of private right; but in the breast of the Legislature resides the application of the property within its jurisdiction. An injured citizen must acquiesce in the dispensations of the sovereign authority, or seek redress from remonstrances, or the last expedient of oppressed freemen. Mr. W. Penn was a British subject at the Revolution, has continued to be so to this day, and is therefore an alien. His Prince may advocate his interest without an infringement of decorum, and will probably be strenuous in his behalf. He will plead that alienage, produced by the severance of an empire, differs from both [birth] under a foreign allegiance. It will not be denied that at the time of acquiring his landed rights he was not an alien. But the Revolution has placed him in an opposite predicament. As he was then a friend, so he is now an enemy; and upon the restoration of peace, no other relation will subsist between the State of Pennsylvania and him than what might have subsisted between that State and a subject of Russia. Since, therefore, he must share at the end of the war the disability to which aliens are liable upon principles of general as well as English law, as to the holding of immovable property; since, during the war, it would be dangerous to tolerate remittances of its profit, specific restitution is untenable upon any ground. Nor can compensation be solicited, although it should be absurdly thought that Pennsylvania is indebted to Great Britain for favors. Has not England set us an example in this business? While she possessed territory on the coast of France, within which it was lawful for French subjects to acquire and hold lands upon the same terms with the English, was it not her habit to wrest them from the former immediately upon a declaration of war against their Prince? Did she make compensations? It is remarkable, too, that the concessions of Mr. Penn, the original grantee to the province, allot to settlers nine-tenths of the lands within the limits of the charter. Soon should we behold a new British colony, composed of the choicest tools of tyranny, emerge in the very bosom of Pennsylvania, were Mr. W. Penn permitted to grant the vacant country. And shall we reward him because we unnerve his faculty of doing harm?

3. At this stage of our inquiry, we take for granted that the King of Great Britain could not rightfully alter the limits assigned to Massachusetts in its new charter. Perhaps, however, it may be questioned whether Massachusetts can with propriety bottom its claims as an independent sovereignty upon a charter granted to it as a dependent colony. The charter appropriated to Massachusetts, as a society, certain limits. Let the supreme power be modified as it may, as the society remains the same, so do its rights. The argument of the objection extended one step further implies that the royal patents for land granted to individuals can convey no title at this day. What is the effect of this doctrine, but that a people must groan under every tyranny, or lose every privilege. All the lands in this colony were holden of the King in free and common soccage, the well known tenure in Great Britain; and grants to individuals ran in his name. In other words, he was lord paramount. In tracing the consequences of this paramountship, analogy will justify us in pursuing as the prototype the paramountship of Great Britain. The King is lord paramount there merely because he is King. For even the ancient barons, with their numerous vassals and formidable force, never affected this character. Accordingly, if at any time during or since the vigor of the feudal system, the immediate tenant of a baron had aliened lands to an alien, they were forfeitable to the King. The same was and is the doctrine where he committed treason. These forfeitures could not be founded on a defect of heritable blood, because it would commence in the life of the alien or traitor, and because such a defect would restore the lands to the immediate lord of whom they were holden. But the forfeiture hath always devolved on the King, whose office it was, as Chief Magistrate, to guard against the residence of persons disaffected, as aliens generally are, and as traitors ever are, to the public good. That the qualities of King and lord paramount are inseparable, appears from these facts: 1. A King of Great Britain, upon his accession to the throne, receives no special investiture of power as lord paramount, but exercises it as a derivative from that of Chief Magistrate. 2. The coronation oath relates to the functions of the lord paramount; but the sanction from religion for the due discharge of them is comprehended in that for the faithful administration of the Government. 3. Upon the abdication of James II, the throne was declared vacant; and neither his successor nor the people imagined it to be necessary to tear the paramountship from him by express words. Hence it follows, that he who ceases to be a King, ceases to be lord paramount. Again, in dealing out the lands of the Kingdom, the British nation have conducted themselves with respect to the King as a bare trustee for public benefit. When William III was squandering upon his minion, the Duke of Portland, profuse grants of land, the Parliament interposed and put a stop to them. Hence it also follows, that if George III should become incapable of being their trustee, he would be also disqualified as lord paramount. If analogy be a faithful guide on this occasion, the inference is clear, that as George III was obeyed in Massachusetts as King of Massachusetts, not as King of Great Britain, and has ceased to be its Chief Magistrate, and in the nature of the thing cannot be its trustee, he is also extinct as lord paramount. For the justness of the analogy we appeal to that clause in the new charter of Massachusetts which grants to its colonists the immunities of British subjects. We defy those who shall undertake to show that the charter placed the rights of British American subjects, with regard to the paramountship, upon a different footing from those of their fellow subjects of Great Britain; and we venture to pronounce the parallelism of the cases from the identity of the tenure. We may here add another inference, that as the paramountship was an indissoluble concomitant of the Chief Magistracy, and the State of Massachusetts succeeds to those powers which the British King formerly exercised as King of that then colony, that State does also succeed to the paramountship.

4th. The last division of the second point requires for its proof nothing more than a recapitulation of what has already been shown, to wit, that the proprietors could not separate the colonies of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; that the King, upon the resumption of their charters, succeeded to the obligations of the proprietors, not only from the nature of the contract with the people, but from his own acts and those of his Governors; that these colonies became thereby royal Governments, standing in the same rank with Massachusetts; that, consequently, the King of Great Britain was lord paramount of these colonies by being the Chief Magistrate of each of them, and that this Chief Magistracy having fallen to them, carries with it the paramountship. Upon the whole, a decisive objection exists against the mutilation of the charters running to the Mississippi, according to the treaty of Paris, namely, that the principle by which they would be limited to the distance of a mile only from the river, would justify mutilations to any extent.

The third point: But if the vacant lands cannot be demanded upon the titles of individual States, they are to be deemed to have been the property of his Britannic Majesty, as Sovereign of the thirteen colonies immediately before the Revolution, and to be devolved upon the United States collectively taken. In agitating the case of these lands under this head, his Britannic Majesty will be very forward in asserting that he was seized of them; so that proof will be superfluous. The character in which he was so seized was that of King of the thirteen colonies collectively taken. Being stripped of this character, its rights descended to the United States for the following reasons: 1. The United States are to be considered, in many respects, as one undivided independent nation, inheriting those rights which the King of Great Britain enjoyed as not appertaining to any one particular State, while he was, what they are now, the superintending Governor of the whole. 2. The King of Great Britain has been dethroned as King of the United States by the joint efforts of the whole. 3. The very country in question hath been conquered through the means of the common labors of the United States.

What has heretofore been observed regards only the title of the United States. There are other considerations deserving attention. Should Great Britain retain that portion of the United States which borders on the Mississippi, the neighborhood of her possessions will be imminently dangerous to our peace. Should she, at the same time, retain Canada and West Florida, or even Canada alone, by applying herself to the settlement of that country and pushing on her trade there with vigor, a new nursery for her marine will speedily be established.

From a full confidence that the western territory now contended for lay within the United States, the British posts therein have been reduced by our citizens, and American government is now exercised within the same; large bounties of land have been promised to the Army, and we have relied on it as an important fund for discharging the debts incurred during the war. For a considerable distance beyond the Alleghany mountains, and particularly on the Ohio, American citizens are actually settled at this day. By the surrender, therefore, of the western territory to Great Britain, a large number of fencible men—men, too, who have not been behind any of their fellow-citizens in the struggle for liberty—would be thrown back within her power.

(Here follow some observations relative to the guaranty of France by the treaty of alliance, and the claims that may be set up by Spain. It then goes on:)*

There are other objects that will undoubtedly occur in the course of negotiation.

The confiscation of the property of those who preferred an adherence to the old empire, rather than to follow the fortunes of the new, was founded on those principles which have been discussed. The confiscation of the property of those who have committed treason against the United States, and are since become British subjects, has a foundation in the institutes of forfeiture in the British criminal code. Should restitution be urged in either of these cases, in defiance of the support which the measures of America derive from similar practices in England, it will be proper to represent the impossibility of making specific restitution of the personal property; the various transfers which the real has undergone from individual to individual, the great value of which the citizens of these States have, contrary to the laws of war, been despoiled by the enemy; the still greater losses which they have sustained from their wanton havoc; the burdens which the war will leave behind it; and the share which the claimants have borne in this spoliation and havoc, and by the former of which they have enriched themselves far beyond their losses.

Of absentees from their country there are three classes: 1. Those who left it before the declaration of independence. 2. Those who left it after having become citizens; and, 3. Those who were expelled. It must be readily seen how dishonorable and troublesome a stipulation for their return would be to the Governments which they have deserted; how obnoxious the persons answering to this description would be to the people at large, and especially such as have suffered from their outrages; and how much the more this stipulation is to be dreaded, as none but those who are totally devoid of both honor and sensibility would avail themselves of a privilege which would expose them to the indignation and resentments which they have provoked. Nor is it unworthy the circumspection of his most Christian Majesty to reflect, whether the restoration of those persons may not produce an unequal competition with his subjects in trade; many among them, besides the advantages which they possess from the knowledge of our language, having accurately informed themselves of the nature of our commerce from actual experience.

April 15, 1783.—Congress took into consideration the articles agreed upon at Paris on the 30th November last, entitled "Articles agreed upon by and between Richard Oswald, Esquire, the Commissioner of his Britannic Majesty for treating of peace with the Commissioners of the United States of America, in behalf of his said Majesty, on the one part, and John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, John Jay, and Henry Laurens, four of the Commissioners of the said States for treating of peace with the Commissioner of his said Majesty, on their behalf, on the other part, to be inserted in and constitute the treaty of peace proposed to be concluded between the Crown of Great Britain and the said United States; but which treaty is not to be concluded until terms of a peace shall be agreed upon between Great Britain and France, and his Britannic Majesty shall be ready to conclude such treaty accordingly;" And thereupon, Resolved, unanimously, That the said articles be ratified; and that a ratification in due form be sent to our ministers plenipotentiary at the Court of Versailles, to be exchanged, if an exchange shall be necessary.

ARTICLE 1. His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz: New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign, and independent States; that he treats with them as such, and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claim to the government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof; and that all disputes which might arise in future on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are and shall be their boundaries, viz:

ARTICLE 2. From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz, that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands, along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; from thence by a line due west on said latitude until it strikes the river Iroquois, or Cataraquy; thence along the middle of said river into Lake Ontario, through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; thence along the middle of said communication into Lake Erie, through the middle of said lake until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Lake Huron; thence along the middle of said water communication into the Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior; thence through Lake Superior northward of the isles Royal and Philipeaux to the Long lake; thence through the middle of the said Long lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through the said lake to the most northwestern point thereof; and from thence in a due west course to the river Mississippi; thence by a line to be drawn along the middle of said river Mississippi until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude. South, by a line to be drawn due east from the determination of the line last mentioned, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the equator to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catahouche; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river; and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river to the Atlantic Ocean. East, by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the Bay of Fundy to its source, and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence; comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforesaid boundaries between Nova Scotia on the one part, and East Florida on the other, shall respectively touch the Bay of Fundy and the Atlantic Ocean, excepting such islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of the said province of Nova Scotia.

ARTICLE 3. It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy, unmolested, the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other Banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea, where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish; and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use, (but not to dry or cure the same upon that island;) and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

ARTICLE 9. In case it should so happen that any place or territory belonging to Great Britain or to the United States should be conquered by the arms of either from the other before the arrival of these articles in America, it is agreed that the same shall be restored without difficulty, and without requiring any compensation.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 482. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIMS FOR PAYMENT FOR SLAVES UNDER THE FIRST ARTICLE OF THE TREATY OF GHENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 12, 1828.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The memorial of D. Bouligny and John E. Frost respectfully represents: That your memorialists are the agents of a large number of claims of citizens of the States of Georgia and Louisiana, under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, which have been established before the commission instituted for the purpose of carrying the said first article into effect by the most full and satisfactory proof; that your memorialists are impelled, by a sense of duty to those whom they represent, to employ all proper means within their power for the protection of the fund paid by the British Government to the United States, in satisfaction of all claims arising under the said first article of the treaty of Ghent against unfounded claims, in order that the persons whom they represent, and such others as shall establish their claims by full and reasonable proof, may not be deprived of that complete indemnification which it was the intention of the British Government to make for the wrong which she had done them by carrying away their property in the face of the said treaty, by which it was stipulated that she should restore all property remaining in our waters upon her evacuation of our territory; that, in the performance of their duty, in February last an application was made by them to the Senate of the United States for a continuation of the commission, for the purpose of enabling them to repel, by proof, the pretensions of a large class of claimants who seek to share in the fund before mentioned, and who insist that, having proved the taking of their negroes by the British, in the course of the war, (an act, be it remembered, perfectly consistent with the strict rights of war,) the burden of showing that they were not taken away contrary to the treaty of Ghent ought to be imposed upon the fund, which, they contend, is to be treated and considered as the representative of the British Government; upon this application the Senate thought it right to authorize a continuation of the commission for the purpose mentioned, and their bill is now before your honorable body.

Your memorialists further represent that, since the passage of the bill by the Senate, circumstances have occurred which strengthen the claims of the claimants whom your memorialists represent to a further continuance of the commission, and which they deem it their imperative duty to bring to the notice and consideration of your honorable body. These circumstances are as follows: When the application was made in February last for a continuation of the board, it was deemed advisable, lest for any cause time should not be granted, to use all possible diligence to obtain such testimony as to the disposal of the negroes taken by the British forces as could be found within the limits of the United States, and means were accordingly taken for that purpose, by which a body of important testimony, showing that the negroes who were taken by the British forces in the Chesapeake and its waters, during the war, with the exception of those which were enlisted in the black corps, and some few others, were sent out of the United States during the war by every opportunity, and were not consequently taken away by the British contrary to the treaty of Ghent, that is, after peace was restored. This testimony, though taken in strict conformity with certain new rules which the commission deemed it proper to prescribe, as will appear from the opinions of the Commissioners accompanying this memorial, was suppressed by a majority of the commission on the ground that it was not returned under seal, according to the alleged practice of all judicial tribunals; whereby the exertions of your memorialists to maintain the rights of their constituents have been rendered abortive, and, they fear, will utterly fail, unless your honorable body shall deem it just and right to continue the commission, so as to enable your memorialists to retake the testimony which has been suppressed, and to obtain from foreign archives such other testimony as will enable the Commissioners to distribute the fund which has been committed to them, according to the just rights of the claimants.

Your memorialists beg leave further to represent, as an additional reason why the said bill should be passed, that a majority of the Commissioners have recently pronounced a decision that leaves the fund, which it is the object of your memorialists to secure to those who are justly entitled to it, entirely exposed; those decisions (copies of which are hereto annexed) admit hearsay testimony to be received, and not only hearsay testimony, but the depositions of slaves to be read in evidence, in support of the claims of their masters.

Your memorialists, &c.

D. BOULIGNY.
JOHN E. FROST.

Mr. Cheves' opinion in relation to the admissibility of hearsay evidence and the evidence of slaves.

In the case of Raleigh W. Downman, (No. 325 on the docket,) a claim for ten slaves.
In the case of estate of William Waring, jr., deceased, a claim of fourteen slaves, No. 615.
In the case of William Waring, sr., a claim for two slaves, No. 616.
In the case of Benjamin T. Fendall, a claim for six slaves, No. 551.

In these several cases, as in all the cases submitted for hearing, (perhaps four or five excepted,) the taking has been satisfactorily proved; and the only question which has really occupied the attention of the board has been whether the property claimed was within the territory or waters of the United States at the date of the ratification of the treaty of peace? It is important to keep this fact always in view.

In the case of Raleigh W. Downman, the only testimony to this point was the deposition of John Hall, a slave, resident in Virginia, and there examined. In the case of the estate of William Waring, jun., and that of William Waring, sen., the only testimony to the same point consisted of the depositions of three slaves, two the property of one of the claimants, and one the property of the other, and all examined and all resident in Virginia; both cases were supported by the joint testimony of three slaves.

In the case of Benjamin T. Fendall, the only testimony to the point was the deposition of John Massey, which narrated the declarations of the runaway slaves themselves, made in Halifax in 1820, and the declarations of certain white men, who called themselves sailors, made at the same time.

To show the character and operation of this testimony, I will submit a brief analysis of that which was received in the three last mentioned cases.

In the case of the Messrs. Warings, one of the slaves, Lewis, alias Lewis Jackson, was twice examined: First, on the 21st August, 1821, when he deposed that he, with all the slaves in these two claims, (except Tom Lewis, whom he does not mention,) went off to the British, and were carried to Tangier island, and that while there four of them, Jerry, Billy, Lucy, and Rachel, died. "That Jem," he mentions him expressly, and no other, "enlisted, and went away with the expedition to New Orleans. Isaac and Anthony (he says) have since returned. All the others, to the best of the deponent's recollection, were still on Tangier when the deponent left there in the month of March, in the spring of the year 1815, and none of them have ever returned that the deponent has ever heard."

He was examined again on the 13th October, 1827, when he confirms his statement of the departure of himself and the other slaves, and in this deposition includes Tom Lewis, whom he had not mentioned before. He says nothing of the death of Jerry, Billy, Lucy, and Rachel; and states that Tom Lewis, Lewis Lewis, and James Broaddus, (in his first affidavit he mentions only Jem,) were sent, as he understood, to New Orleans, "some time before there was peace;" and he adds, that "after this news all the other slaves," not excepting Jerry, Billy, Lewis, and Rachel, whose death he proves in his first deposition, "sailed from Tangier for Bermuda, except himself, who was carried to St. George's island, where he made his escape, and returned to his master."

Anthony Champ, another of these slaves, examined on the 13th October, 1827, states that he, with all the slaves claimed, "were taken to Tangier island, where he remained until he heard there was peace, except Tom Lewis, Lewis Lewis, and James Broaddus, who were sent to New Orleans. That the said Anthony Champ sailed with all the other slaves, (not excepting those proved by Lewis Jackson to have died, nor Lewis Jackson, though he certainly never left the United States,) from Tangier island, on the 13th of February, 1814, (the treaty was ratified on the 17th February, 1815,) for Bermuda, where he and Isaac Smith, being desirous to come home, were discharged."

Isaac Smith, the last of the three slaves examined, deposes, on the 13th October, 1827, to the same general facts as the two preceding witnesses; making no mention of those who died, and says that "they sailed for Bermuda in February," without saying anything of the news of peace or the ratification of the treaty.

In the case of Benjamin T. Fendall, the witness, after a great deal of introductory matter, says, that in 1820 he was in Halifax, and went over to the town of Dartmouth, opposite Halifax, where he met all the negroes mentioned in this claim, (except, perhaps, one child;) and that "while in the aforesaid town of Dartmouth, in conversation with the aforesaid negroes, many persons calling themselves British sailors, and stating that they had been in and belonged to the British squadron that was in the Chesapeake bay, would come up, while the deponent was conversing with the aforesaid black people, and confirm what they, the said black people, would say to him, viz: that the said blacks left the Tangier islands after they got the news of peace. The deponent did not know the sailors who came up while the negroes and himself were conversing, but they were white persons, and said they were sailors and were with the aforesaid British squadron when they left the United States."

I mean not to question the truth of the witness who narrates these declarations, nor to consider whether, giving full credit to the testimony, it proves the point in controversy. The question I deal with is whether, in any case, and under any circumstances, such testimony should be received in evidence? and, to my mind, to exhibit the testimony is enough to disprove its admissibility according to the most relaxed rules that ever have been adopted in any case, and under any circumstances. In considering the question, the peculiar character of the testimony is important, independent of that testimony being hearsay, applied to a question on which hearsay never has been received. The concurrence of extraordinary circumstances in the declarations of these persons (white and black) is perfectly miraculous. Those alleged to be sailors of the British fleet leave the Chesapeake in the spring of 1815; they are men whose "home is on the deep;" who, from their duties and habits, were necessarily and inevitably separated from each other, and scattered to all the winds of Heaven on the occurrence of peace; yet many, (mark the expression,) many of them appear, five years after, to be congregated together in the obscure town of Dartmouth, opposite to Halifax, at the very moment this witness happens to meet with the negroes mentioned in the claim. These sailors know these identical negroes, after five years have elapsed, amidst hundreds with whom they were mixed, and recollect that they were some of those who left the Chesapeake after the peace. The negroes happened to be speaking emphatically about the precise time they left the Chesapeake; a circumstance which was no more talked of than any other event connected with the war, till after the Convention of St. Petersburg was published in the United States, which did not occur till the latter end of 1822, two years after this conversation; and, at this important moment, many of the sailors come up and take a particular interest in confirming this particular fact. This is the testimony which has been relied upon as full proof of the point in controversy in this case. It is true there is in the case another witness, (John Wheelwright,) who says he saw in Halifax, in 1820, two negroes, who said they had belonged to this claimant, and who also told him that they, and the other slaves mentioned in this claim, were carried off from the United States during the late war, but they were silent as to the time they left the United States, except that they state that they were carried off "during the late war."

In stating the testimony, my effort has been to do it in such a manner as to exhibit its deformity, (at least what I suppose to be so,) in a just relief, but to do it, at the same time, with accuracy, and without exaggeration; and I believe I have done so: but, if my colleagues shall, in their statements, differ from me, a reference to the original documents, which are not voluminous, will enable the reader to decide between us.

In the case of Raleigh W. Downman, it may be said the slaves were originally taken in violation of a flag of truce. This has, indeed, been denied by the British functionaries, yet I entertain no doubt of the fact; but this fact can have no bearing, more than any other circumstance of outrage occurring at the same time, on the question of fact in issue, namely, at what time were these slaves taken from the United States; and certainly no more effect than any other abuse of the usual practices of war, (of which the seduction of the slaves of the citizens of the United States is, in all the cases in which it occurred, an example sufficiently striking,) in bringing the claim within the first article of the treaty of peace. To regard it in deciding a general question of evidence, would be to mingle a circumstance of mere excitement with a question of general law, which is altogether inadmissible in sound reasoning and dispassionate investigation. But the question under consideration involves not that case alone, but all in which the testimony of slaves is adduced; and the cases of the Messrs. Warings place the question in its true light, and show the extent and operation of the principle which the board has decided. In these cases there are no extraneous facts, and they depend, distinctly and solely, on the testimony of the runaway slaves. They are, too, not only slaves, but the slaves of the claimants themselves. I think I state the fact correctly; but, lest this should be denied, let me add, that the case of the estate of William Waring, junior, is proved by two slaves belonging to that estate, and one belonging to William Waring, senior. The case of the latter is proved by one of his own slaves, and two belonging to the claimants in the other case. These cases, therefore, clearly and distinctly present the question whether the testimony of slaves alone can be received as full proof of the main question of fact on which the claim depends. If it be denied that this testimony alone has sustained these cases, I must refer to the proof itself, and ask the application of the following rule: Remove this testimony, and there will not remain a shadow of proof of the fact that the slaves claimed were taken from the United States after the ratification of the treaty of peace.

It may be said by my brethren (I have understood them so to say) that the testimony of these slaves is confirmed by some names mentioned by them, and found in the British documents; which circumstance induces them to believe the narrations of these witnesses to be true. But (without laboring to prove what is too clear to need proof, that the most erroneous and most false statements usually contain some well founded facts,) I reply, that the question here is, not whether these particular witnesses are to be believed, but whether the depositions of those slaves are admissible testimony before this board? I would much sooner believe the claimants themselves. I should do so with much more security. Some of them I know, and would implicitly confide in their statements, deliberately made, without oath. If they were bad men, I should still confide in their testimony in preference to the testimony of their slaves; because they would still be subject to the fear of punishment and of shame, which they would much more easily escape, supposing them to be acting correctly, if allowed to establish their claims through the testimony of their slaves: for, can it be contended that there is any security in the affidavit of a slave, taken under the influence of a fraudulent master? I would rather, therefore, take the allegation of these claimants, not on oath, than the testimony of their slaves, or any slaves, because I believe them to be men of character and talent, who would not state a falsehood from intention, nor be likely to make a misstatement from want of intelligence; and I should rather take the oath of any claimant, whatever his character, because he would be subject to the punishment of the law and the frowns of society, which would restrain him from rashly taking a false oath, under the control of neither of which would a slave be. But would we seriously think of admitting the testimony of a claimant, because we believed, however confidently, that he would state the truth with fidelity and accuracy? It is not enough that we believe the particular testimony adduced; it must be testimony that, at some time, under some circumstances, in some tribunals, has been received as credible testimony, to affect the rights of citizens. But is there one solitary example, even of this slender character, which can countenance the admissibility of the testimony of slaves?

I presume, however, that I am, in distinguishing between the questions of the credibility and admissibility of evidence generally, anticipating the question of admissibility of this particular testimony, which will properly be reserved until the statement and analysis of it are completed.

In several cases the board have admitted the testimony of free persons of color who are resident, and have been examined, in States where the testimony is inadmissible, in cases affecting the rights of citizens. I shall enter into no detail on this testimony, either in the statement or argument, because I consider it merged in the question of the admissibility of the testimony of slaves.

I am authorized then, I think, to say that the majority of the board have received as full proof of the fact they were respectively adduced to prove—

1st. The testimony of slaves resident in States (and examined in these States) where their testimony is expressly rejected by law.

2d. The hearsay testimony of white persons who might have been examined on oath; and,

3d. The hearsay testimony of the absconding slaves for whom compensation is claimed.

I now proceed to discuss the admissibility of this testimony; clearly there is none of it admissible in any of the permanent tribunals in the United States; nor has any such testimony been received in any temporary tribunal, like this board, on any question; nor has any law given any express or special authority to this board to receive such testimony. These are all undeniable propositions; and, if they be, it seems difficult to know on what grounds the admissibility of the testimony will be rested.

It has been agreed by the board, to prevent the possibility of unseemly controversy, that, in assigning their reasons for their opinions, where they differ, the members of it shall not reply to each other, and consequently the difficulty I have just stated is increased. Under these circumstances I will suppose the following:

1st. It will, perhaps, be said that it is discretionary with this tribunal, considering its peculiar and temporary character, to receive any testimony, on oath or not on oath, for as much as it may be worth, and the more especially as the decisions of such a tribunal cannot be considered as precedents.

2d. That though the board shall receive and weigh the testimony, it will examine it with peculiar scrupulousness, and only receive it as sustaining testimony. I state these as what I understand to be the grounds on which my colleagues rely; but, that I may not do them injustice, and that all collision between us may be avoided, I desire it may be understood, that, except so far as they shall, in their written opinions adopt them, they are to be considered as the grounds, and the only grounds, on which I suppose a plausible argument can be built to show the admissibility of this testimony.

1st. The discretion of this board. What is meant by this discretion? Is it that this board is not bound by the examples of other judicial tribunals? for this is a judicial tribunal. Is it that it is not bound by the general laws of evidence that prevail in our country as a common basis to all our systems of evidence, as a fence around our property, our lives, and our characters? Is it that this board is released from the disqualifying laws of the States where the witnesses reside? Is it that we are bound by no rules, no analogies? Is it, in short, that the discretion of each member of the board, (however honestly indulged, and however elightened,) shall be his only law? I sincerely hope not. Yet, if not, tell me on what principle, precedent, or analogy, this testimony is received?

We are undoubtedly bound by the examples of other like tribunals, and, being instituted in their very form and features, if I may so speak, their example is an implied law to us, understood so to be, alike by the Legislature which created the tribunal, and by the citizen whose rights are to be bound by it.

But in what tribunal, special or permanent, in this country, has an African slave been received to affect the rights of free citizens, and to sustain too the claims of his own master? If, with slavery existing for centuries in the United States, no time, no occasion, no circumstances can be mentioned when such testimony has been deemed admissible, either in States where slavery prevails, or in those where it is abolished, what does it prove? Surely nothing less than that it is absolutely and coextensively with the United States repudiated; for else how many occasions and interests must have called it forth? Are we at liberty to exalt into the character of competent witnesses those thus universally rejected? Will Virginia, the State in which these slaves reside and have been examined, deliberately consent, under any circumstances, to have her rights, or the rights of her free citizens, bound by the testimony of slaves? Would that State deliberately insist that the rights of the citizens of other States should be bound by such testimony? Is it believed that Congress could be induced, under any circumstances, to establish, by law, the admissibility of such testimony? If not, what have we done? We have set an example (the first and I hope it will be the last) to sustain the pretensions of those agitators, who are sometimes called by a name of fearful omen, Les amis des noirs, in one of the tenderest points affecting this property. If not the first, the loudest complaint of these people is, that slaves are not permitted to bear evidence against white persons. Ought we not to beware lest we be stirring a volcanic fire? It is supposed, however, that the acts of this board, as a temporary tribunal, cannot be regarded as precedents. If they be not it will only be because they are unworthy of us. If they shall happen to be based on law, and justice, and wisdom, and experience, they will be quoted and venerated as precedents, temporary and humble as this tribunal may be. But is that really the character of this tribunal? Is it not a national tribunal executing the high behests of sovereign States? Such a tribunal surely ought to do nothing which it believes cannot be referred to as an example worthy of imitation and beneficient in its remotest tendencies. Already have less important acts, than I deem the judgments of this board to be, been quoted as precedents affecting this very species of property. But is it not a solecism in language, and something more dangerous in principle, to talk, in this sense, of the discretion of judicial functionaries in a free State, where the citizen looks for his rights, and the judge for his duties, in a law prescribing each? Can there be, in such a State, any tribunal that is not governed by the general rules of evidence? I hope I shall never be a member of such a one. It has been as truly as eloquently said of the discretion of a judge, "that it is always uncertain; it is different in different men. In the best, it is often caprice. In the worst, it is every vice, folly, and passion to which human nature is liable."

Under a Government of laws whose foundations reach back for ages like ours, if a question arise where there are no guides to be found in the archives of its experience, either analogical or positive, it may safely be inferred that it is indefensible. But if all experience and precedent concur in forbidding, not simply not sustaining its adoption, we may with equal safety conclude that it is more than indefensible—that it is dangerous; such I consider the reception of the testimony of slaves. If not so dangerous, yet equally inadmissible do I consider the hearsay testimony,* as well of the white as the colored persons, which has been admitted in this case. As to the white sailors, if they have indeed thrown off their nautical character and become so entirely part and parcel of this Nova Scotia African glebe, as the testimony seems to indicate, why have not their depositions been adduced? As to the runaway slaves, those who know best the character of such people, (unless by travel, and prison ships, and camps, they have been much improved,) would not deem their declarations creditable in the concerns of the kitchen or the nursery; and shall I consent to execute national treaties and the compacts of sovereign States by the lights of such evidence? I cannot.

2. The scrupulousness with which the board may weigh this testimony, and the use of it only as sustaining proof. In the first place, I am yet to learn that testimony, in itself inadmissible, can be rendered competent by the mental reserve of the judge who is to weigh it. I mean nothing offensive by the expression, but use it as the most expressive term I can select to convey an idea of the proposed restraint on this testimony. But what is this proposed restraint but another form for that very judicial discretion which we have just been deprecating and refuting? It is a discretion ten times more dangerous, because ten times less responsible. I am sure it is an unheard of rule of evidence; and the fallacy of it as security, if it be relied upon on this occasion, has been demonstrated in the instant of its adoption. I have recited the testimony at considerable length for the express purpose of exhibiting this fallacy. Let the reader refer to the testimony, and he will find that, excluding this evidence, there will not remain one particle of independent testimony to establish the fact in controversy; and if there be not, will it not show how utterly vain these secondary efforts at doing right must be, even in the wisest and the purest hands. In fine, to my mind, it appears very clear, that none of this testimony is admissible; that it violates all rules and all precedents, and establishes some new ones of the worst and most dangerous kind.

* The essential rules of evidence will be the same among all nations governed by "reason, as that no man shall be a witness in his own case; that in every issue the affirmative is to be proved; that hearsay is no evidence, while the technical rules, e. g. such as respect the number of witnesses, or the mode of their examination may infinitely vary."—(2 Brown's Civil Law, p. 371.)

LANGDON CHEVES.

Mr. Seawell's opinion.

The cases of Fendall, Forde, Dade, Ledwick, Downman, Waring and others, for slaves carried off by the British forces, contrary to the provisions of the treaty of Ghent, are submitted as proven by the testimony of Wheelwright and Massey, and in some of the cases the evidence of slaves and persons of color; as regards the carrying away of the property, no difficulty whatever is felt. The point of difference is, whether there be sufficient evidence to satisfy the board that they were carried off after the treaty was ratified; the evidence as to this part of the case, as regards several of the cases, is, that in 1820, both the witnesses were in Halifax, Nova Scotia, where they saw the slaves in question, or, at least, the principal part of them. Wheelwright says he saw James and Nancy, and that Nancy told him her four children were with her; that he saw James, the husband of Nancy, who also told him that Peter and Fidelio were there. The other witness, Massey, says that he also saw Nancy and three or four children; and that he saw her husband, James, who was known to him before he left his master, as a sailor in the Chesapeake; both these witnesses say that they saw a number of Chesapeake slaves; all of whom, with many white persons, said they had been sailors in the Chesapeake during the war, declared that the slaves in question did not leave the Tangier in the United States, till after the news of peace. And the question is, whether the foregoing evidence, taken in connexion with the fact that the slaves were taken from their masters in the month of August, 1814, is a sufficient proof of the carrying away after the ratification of the treaty? and I am of opinion that it is. The rule of law prescribed for the government of courts of justice in all its strictness, never requires of any party the production of higher evidence than the nature of the fact he is required to establish necessarily presupposes in his power or possession: this may be called a rule without an exception. The application of it in this case is, that as the carrying away was in British ships, from a British camp, and by crews evidently British, which camps and ships were remote and inaccessible to any but those who belonged to the British army; and that the slaves deported remained in that situation until their arrival at Halifax; and that as it cannot, in the nature of things, be in the power of the claimants to know who the crew was, or in what vessels the slaves were carried off—the account which the slaves themselves give in Halifax must be admissible. If, however, it be said that this account should be on oath, the answer is, that the slaves are carried by Great Britain into her own country, where the claimants must be unacquainted, and unable to obtain any judicial assistance but such as she may think fit to extend to them: and if the fact be that the slaves have stated untruly, it was completely in her power to call upon persons acquainted with the transaction to confront, upon oath, the declaration of the slaves. In other words, unless this evidence be admissible, it is not in the power of the claimants, from the nature of the fact to be proven, to adduce any. But, according to the opinion I have formed of the functions of this board, I have believed that it was not so bound down, or intended so to be bound, either by the convention of St. Petersburg, or of London, or act of Congress, as to be confined in the admission of testimony to the technical niceties which prevail in courts of common law. The convention of St. Petersburg requires the Commissioners to determine the claims according to their "merits;" to examine all such persons on oath, as may come before them; and to "receive in evidence, according as they may think consistent with equity and justice, written depositions or papers, such depositions or papers being authenticated, either according to existing legal forms, or in such other way as they shall see cause to require or allow." The convention of London is silent upon the subject; and the act of Congress constituting this board requires of the Commissioners to "docket the claims and consider the evidence offered by the respective claimants, &c., and to award distribution according to their several rights." The just conclusion from which, I take to be, that as this board is not constituted as courts of common law are—the permanent tribunals to which is to be referred the numerous transactions of human intercourse, and which on that account are to be guarded with every possible barrier to prevent fraud—but is merely temporary; to decide only the claims under the imperial award; that it must be understood to have been the design of those who gave it existence, that the board was to decide according to the evidence which the transactions were susceptible of, and leave the Commissioners at liberty to decide upon such facts and circumstances as satisfied their consciences, without being restricted by common law technicalities. If, then, I am correct in regard to the nature and character of the board, my conscience and understanding are both fully satisfied that the slaves in question were carried away by the British forces after the ratification of the treaty. Who could know it better than they themselves? They had no interest in stating an untruth; they say it was not till they had the news of peace that they left the Tangier, and this is said in 1820, before the creation of the board—nay, before the convention of St. Petersburg. It is shown by a mass of testimony that until after the ratification of the treaty, and as late as March, the British had an encampment of slaves, of all sexes and ages, at that place. From the view I have taken of these cases, I have not felt it necessary to point out the instances in courts of common law, where, ex necessitate, the acts of the party, as his letter book and invoice are permitted to be given in evidence for him. I have no doubt whatever, from the evidence given, that the slaves were carried off after the ratification of the treaty; but a further difficulty has been raised in some of these cases, upon which the board is also divided. It is said that this is hearsay evidence; that it is the evidence of slaves. Who has the right to raise these objections? If by Great Britain, the answer is, that hearsay evidence is that alone which the nature of the fact is susceptible of. Who can the claimants adduce that can testify to the fact of his own knowledge? Can they adduce an American citizen? No; the Americans were at war with Great Britain, by which all intercourse was prevented. Then, can they adduce a British subject who has personal knowledge of the fact? They know not who to call upon. And how are they to obtain his testimony? If the evidence must be confined to the oath of British subjects, who is to administer it but a British functionary? To say, therefore, that the claimants shall be required to produce evidence which, from its very nature, depends upon the voluntary concession of their adversaries, and that without such evidence their claims are to be disallowed, goes to prove that the convention of St. Petersburg was created for a very idle purpose; a tribunal constituted to decide upon claims, when, by the very nature of the transaction upon which they were founded, it was impossible to obtain any proof that was admissible. But if we are to suppose that the framers of the convention were aware of the nature of the transaction upon which the claims were founded, and really intended the board constituted to award compensation to the sufferers provided for, we must necessarily suppose that they contemplated these claims to be supported by that kind of testimony which the transaction admitted of, in the same way that it is contemplated by the lawgivers of the municipal code, that where the next in blood is to succeed to the ancestor, the lineage is to be proven by that sort of evidence which it is in the power of the heir to bring; from the nature of the fact to be proven in such a case, we well know it is an established rule that hearsay common report is all that is required, though marraiges and births are registered, for the party may not know what parish to look to for the registration. This is a rule in the courts of common law where the rules of evidence seem to be more guarded to prevent fraud than studious to advance right. But a fair interpretation of the terms of the convention, requiring the Commissioners to decide the cases according to their merits; leaving to them, as they should think fit, the nature and character of the evidence; requiring the board to examine all persons who should come before them, taken in connexion with the nature of the facts to be proven, place, without doubt, in my mind, the admissibility of the hearsay evidence as to Great Britain. Then, as to the objection that it is the hearsay of slaves: that is not true. Great Britain has made them free British subjects. They are good witnesses in a British court against a Prince of the royal blood. She has made them witnesses competent to testify in all her courts, and cannot, therefore, object to their complexion any more than to their religion or forms of worship. It, therefore, to my mind, is clear that, as regards Great Britain, the evidence is as admissible under every form of the objection. Then, how is the case altered by the convention of London of 1826? The sum paid by Great Britain is in the hands of the United States as the trustee for the claimants. The United States cannot rightfully pocket one cent. She received it in the character of trustee, and must pay it to those entitled by the agreement under which it came to her hands, or must restore it. She must not disappoint the purpose of Great Britain. Have the United States received the fund under an agreement that the nature of the proof was to be changed, so as to render inadmissible that which before was competent? If the convention is to decide, there is no such provision in the nature of the whole case; and all the proofs, as applicable to the respective claims, seem to me to remain unaffected, and are now precisely as before the late convention. Then, how is it competent for such claimants as have been allowed their claims to urge these objections? How were their cases proven? By direct testification of witnesses who spoke of their own knowledge? or, was it not in a great degree from hearsay—the declarations of British officers and soldiers, that the slaves claimed were at Dauphin island, were at Cumberland, were at Tangier island, and the like? And what, indeed, is Bailey's list, but the names of slaves, or rather black persons, found by him at Tangier, whose names are taken from the account given by the very slaves themselves, not upon oath? All this evidence has been received without difficulty, and claims allowed upon it, and to the very persons now anxious to exclude it from all others. The cases are not susceptible of distinction upon application of the common law rule in relation to declarations which constitute a part of the res gesta It is only necessary to advert to what is meant by the res gesta, to show its want of application. The res gesta is "the thing done." When the thing done consists of that which requires something to be said, as, for instance, to make a tender of money, a dumb show would amount to nothing; the quo animo must be stated, for it is part of the act. It is a tender on a particular account which, of necessity, requires that the purpose should be stated when the money is offered; did the declarations of the British officers and soldiers at Dauphin island, and St. Mary's, or of the slaves at Tangier, constitute, or in any way form, part of the subsequent carrying away? It was evident that the slaves were at those places; and the ships going off, and the slaves not having returned to their owners, was satisfactory evidence that they were carried off after these declarations. But there is still a further objection, that the testimony of slaves, owned by citizens of the United States, and taken before magistrates, has been allowed as admissible evidence. Upon that point I concur, in omnibus, with the opinion of my brother Commissioner Pleasants, who has stated at large his opinion upon that point; in a word, all the evidence which has been adduced by every claimant would have been inadmissible, according to common law technicality, either as regards the manner of taking it, or the matter stated by the deponents; and the whole of it has only been allowed to operate in support of the claimants, so far as it carried the conviction of its truth; and so in respect to this latter sort of evidence, where it was supported by circumstances or other facts, and convinced us that it stated the truth, like any other mean of arriving at truth, it has had its effects, and in no otherwise; and it should not be overlooked that the same kind of testimony has, in fact, been laid before the board; I allude to the deposition of Cato Johnson, in support of a case from Georgia, and an argument offered by counsel to prove its admissibility, who, it is understood, is now objecting to it in the Chesapeake cases. It is true that, in the Georgia case, though the deposition was read, I believe there was other proof without it sufficient to sustain the claim; but the bare introduction of it is at least evidence, independently of the argument proposed, of what was the opinion of counsel in relation to its admissibility. To conclude: when the declaration of the British officers on our coasts; when the declaration of the slaves at Tangier, by which Bailey's list was made out; when the deposition of Cato Johnson, from Georgia, has actually been laid before the board, and aided by the apparent opinion of counsel, have all been received as proper for the consideration of the board in supporting claims, I feel that I am sustained in hearing other declarations and other depositions of the same character.

The particular facts and circumstances by which the testimony admitted is supported is not noticed; the point upon which the opinion is given is only as to the admissibility of the evidence, not its weight.

H. SEAWELL.

Mr. Pleasants' opinion.

In the claim of Raleigh W. Downman, depending before this board, asking compensation, under the decision of the Emperor of Russia, for certain slaves carried away by the British forces, in violation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, the deposition of John Hall, a slave, is introduced to establish certain facts; and the question is made, how far, or, if at all, the deposition of a slave, or free person of color, can be received as testimony before this tribunal?

In considering this question, we are led to inquire what persons are considered as competent witnesses in the courts and other tribunals of this country and Great Britain? Upon examination we find that all persons of sound mind, who believe in a God and a future state of rewards and punishments, are considered as competent. The words of Starkie, the most recent authority on the law of evidence, had better be given. In his 1st volume, pp. 79, 80, he says, "all persons may be sworn as witnesses who believe in an existence of a God, in a future state of rewards and punishments, and in the obligations of an oath; that is, who believe that divine punishments will be the consequence of perjury; and, therefore, Jews, Mahometans, Gentoos, or, in short, persons of any sect, possessed of such belief, are so far competent witnesses."

To this general rule all the well known exceptions of interest, debility of mind, &c., exist; and, in certain States of this Union, where the servile condition of these people exists, there are also statutory provisions prohibiting the use of their testimony against white people. I need not state to my associates the reasons of these provisions; they, as well as myself, were born and raised in States in which this state of things exits, and the motives which have induced it are well known. It is also further known that, whilst their testimony is totally excluded from bearing upon white persons, it is entirely competent before the tribunals in which these people (I mean slaves and free persons of color) are tried for offences of all descriptions, and that corporal punishments of all descriptions are continually inflicted on such testimony, and numbers of those persons executed. The propriety of this discrimination is not intended to be called in question; in the existing state of things it may be considered as proper, even necessary. But it presents this obvious reflection, whether, in questions before this board, where a conduct of the most liberal kind, in the reception of testimony, ought to characterize, and has hitherto characterized the proceedings, evidence of an intelligent person, though a slave or free person of color, entirely free from any of the exceptions to the general competency of his testimony, except the one now under consideration, may not, with safety, be heard in connexion with other testimony, not as conclusive, nor even as prima facie evidence, in all cases, but as a circumstance among others, carrying conviction to the mind that the thing, such as stated by the slave or free person of color, really existed as he or she represented it to exist. As one member of this board, I have no hesitation in saying that I think such testimony may, with entire safety, be heard by the board, examined, weighed, and cautiously considered, received, or rejected, according to circumstances. My reasons for this opinion, in addition to such as are before stated, are my knowledge of these people as they exist in the State in which I reside, and of which I am a native; for they are intelligent, far more so than they are generally supposed by those whose opportunities have not led them to examine their characters closely; they are, in general, as moral as most other persons; they are strongly religious, as much so, generally, I incline to think, as the white people, as far as my observation has extended; they have their preachers, many of them quite respectable as teachers of religion and morals, and numbers of them (the slaves) belong to the regular constituted Christian societies of different denominations. To be brief, my opinion is, that we shall hear this testimony as circumstantial evidence, and, when it is strongly corroborated by other circumstances, allow that weight to it which a credible witness of a different description would be entitled to.

Since the above remarks were written, the board has ascertained, upon inquiry, that the laws of Maryland, operating in this part of the District of Columbia, authorize, in a qualified way, the use of the testimony of colored persons in a manner as strong, perhaps stronger, than the use comtemplated to be made of it, as stated in these remarks.

JAMES PLEASANTS.

Mr. Cheves' opinion in relation to suppressed depositions.

The question in this case arises under the following circumstances: Certain claimants had fully substantiated their claims—that is to say, had proved that their property was taken away after the ratification of the treaty of peace. Certain other claimants had failed to do so, but had proved the taking of their property (slaves exclusively) at different periods before the peace. This proof, with certain circumstantial testimony on which they relied, they contended, authorized the presumption that their slaves were in the United States at the time of the ratification of the treaty, and that they were, consequently, entitled to participate equally in the fund under distribution, unless the contrary should be proved; that the burden of this proof, under the mixed commission, lay on the British Government; and that, before this board, it either lay on the opposing claimants or on the fund—that is to say, I presume, on the Government of the United States.

To strengthen this presumption, these claimants filed sundry ex parte affidavits, stating general facts, the tendency of which was to confirm the proposed presumption.

The claimants of the first class (those who had substantiated their claims) controverted these propositions, but declared their intention also to adduce proof in opposition to them. Under these circumstances, they submitted to the board the following representation:

"DECEMBER 18, 1827.

"Mr. Frost, in behalf of many claimants, stated to the board that those who sustained their cases by satisfactory evidence, under the award of the Emperor of Russia, being interested in protecting the fund paid under the convention of London, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnity under the said award against unfounded claims, are about taking testimony for the purpose of showing (what is a matter of general notoriety and history) that the negroes taken by the British forces in the years 1813 and 1814, were, from time to time, during the course of the war, with the exception of those enlisted in the service, and some few others, sent to Bermuda, Halifax, and other British possessions; and desire to know whether the board will require such testimony to be taken in any other form than that prescribed by the general regulations of the 11th of July last—and Mr. Frost moved for information accordingly.

"Whereupon it was ordered, that all depositions taken with the object stated in this motion shall be taken on interrogatories exhibited by the applicant, and cross-interrogatories exhibited by the other party in controversey, if the latter shall see fit to exhibit cross-interrogatories. The board will determine, on each occasion, on the fit notice and time for putting in cross-interrogatories. If taken in the United States, the depositions shall be taken and authenticated according to the rules heretofore prescribed by the board."

The following is the rule previously prescribed:

"Future authentications of testimony shall be good when taken before and certified under the seal of office of a notary public; or when taken before a magistrate, justice of the peace, or judge of a Superior or Inferior Court of any of the States or Territories, or the District of Columbia, and certified by the clerk of the county, corporation, or Superior or Inferior Court to which such magistrate, judge, or justice belongs, under the seal of such court, that such person is a magistrate, justice of the peace, or judge for such county, corporation, or Superior or Inferior Court, as the case may be."

The board, at a subsequent day, prescribed the mode and time of serving interrogatories.

The claimants of the first class have complied with all these rules in the most strict and faithful manner, and, under them, have taken a number of depositions, which they filed in the office of the board. To these depositions being received as evidence, the claimants of the 2d class filed exceptions, which, according to a rule of the board, were submitted to the clerk, who overruled them, and this is an appeal from that decision. A majority of the board (Messrs. Pleasants and Seawell) have sustained that appeal, and suppressed the depositions. Before proceeding to give my reasons for a contrary opinion, which lead me to dissent from my brethren, I will state some other facts.

Under the mixed commission (as the journals will show) no other authentications than those adopted by this board were prescribed, except that it was required that the signature of the magistrate should be certified to be genuine. This being unusual, was deemed a hardship, was objected to by me, and loudly condemned by the claimants. Ex parte affidavits were to be allowed before that commission in all cases and on all questions, and in none were examinations required to be under interrogatories. When the motion of Mr. Frost was under consideration, I concurred, because I thought it would lead to a better and fuller investigation on both sides, in the rule requiring the examination to be under interrogatories on the general questions; but it appeared to me that the rule should apply to both of the parties in controversy; the question, therefore, arose, whether the ex parte depositions, filed by the claimants of the 2d class, to be used on the general questions, should be received as evidence or not? and Messrs. Pleasants and Seawell were of opinion they should; and it was so decided. I was of a contrary opinion, because I thought one rule should govern both parties. These depositions appear to be, some of them, in the handwriting of the deponents; some in that of the agents; and some in that of the magistrates. They are authenticated only according to the general rule of the board, and were handed into the board by the claimants or their agents. Let it be distinctly remembered, these depositions, it is determined, shall be used as evidence on the general questions; while the depositions under consideration, authenticated in the same way, but taken with additonal strictness, and form, and solemnity, are to be suppressed.

The exceptions on the part of the claimants of the 2d class to the depositions taken by those of the 1st class, under the rules of the 18th of December last, are the following:

"1st. That many of the interrogatories are leading.

"2d. That many others call for hearsay evidence.

"3d. That the depositions do not appear to have been reduced to writing by the witnesses themselves, or the magistrates before whom they were sworn; and, for aught that appears to the contrary, were reduced to writing by the agent or counsel of the Georgia claimants, and may have been even previously prepared.

"4th. That the depositions were not returned under a sealed cover, but were delivered open to the agents of the Georgia claimants, and thus returned contrary to all the forms of practice in every tribunal.

"5th. That the depositions, for the most part, depend on hearsay and the presumption and conjectures of the witnesses, instead of being confined to facts within their knowledge.

"On these grounds it is submitted, on the part of the Chesapeake claimants, that the depositions ought to be suppressed as having been irregularly taken."

I will first notice the facts stated in these exceptions, and see how far they are before the board. Of these there is no proof whatever, except those stated in the 4th exception, and except so far as the interrogatories and depositions on their face furnish evidence of them. I have looked into the depositions, and they appear to me to be, in every instance, in the handwriting of the magistrates taking them. The interrogatories appear to me to be as little characterized by leading questions as interrogatories usually are in cases of complicated facts; and I do not think, if they had been less so, they would have been sufficiently understood by the witnesses, so as to prevent them from omitting material circumstances in their replies; some of them, too, were to be administered to witnesses whose depositions had been filed by the claimants of the second class, and were, therefore, in the nature of cross-interrogatories.

Leading questions are only such as are formed "in such a way as to instruct the witness in the answers he is to give."—Peak, 188. But they should be so framed as to prevent the witness from omitting any material circumstance—ibid.; and in cross-examinations, leading questions are unexceptional—ibid. The depositions are as free from hearsay testimony as depositions usually are; and I have great doubt whether there is a single answer which is not testimony, according to the strictest rules of evidence. Any of them having at all the character of hearsay consist principally of such as speak of the declaration of the British officers during the war, and when the transactions were in progress to their consummation, and of the declared destination of ships at the time of their sailing. Now, these are a part of the res gesta which is clearly admissible, and not, therefore, hearsay evidence; and besides, the claimants on the other side had adduced evidence, in almost every affidavit filed or relied upon, of the declarations of the British officers, and even sailors, and of the declared destination of ships; and if the testimony can be adduced in chief, it surely may be contradicted by the opposite party by like testimony. But the whole of the depositions has been suppressed—not only the whole of a deposition in which it may be alleged there are some leading interrogatories, or some hearsay testimony, but depositions against which neither objection can lie. Under these exceptions the following questions arise:

1st. Whether the whole of the depositions (admitting that the interrogatories contain leading questions, and the depositions contain hearsay testimony, both of which are denied,) should have been suppressed, or only such parts of either as were exceptionable.

2d. That whether it was necessary that the examining magistrate should have certified that the depositions were committed to writing by himself or by the witness.

3d. Whether it was necessary that the examining magistrate should have transmitted the depositions under a sealed cover.

1. The authority quoted in support of the affirmative of the first question is 2 Maddox's Chancery

Practice, p. 412. The question will hereafter be considered whether the chancery practice of a foreign nation is a binding authority in this case. But we will examine this authority to see how far it sustains the exceptions embraced by the question. The language of that authority is, "If the interrogatories are leading, the depositions, on a reference to the master, and his report that they are so, will, on motion, be suppressed. If one interrogatory be reported leading the deposition, the deposition only to that interrogatory is suppressed; so, if part of an interrogatory be reported leading so much of the deposition as relates to an answer, the leading part will be suppressed. It seems, then, that, according to the utmost strictness of the courts of chancery of England, (a practice whose forms, and complication, and delays, and expenses, bring an involuntary shuddering over the unfortunate litigant at the mere mention of them,) will not sustain the decision of the board. Only the peccant parts will be suppressed. According to that practice, too, before any part will be suppressed the master in chancery must have sustained the exceptions. Here, if we are to be assimilated to a court of chancery, our clerk must be considered the master, and he has, on the contrary, overruled the exceptions. Whether the testimony be hearsay evidence or not, is a question for the court on the hearing, when considering and weighing the testimony, and not a subject for exceptions; accordingly, the authority quoted, which embraces the whole body of the practice of chancery, does not even name it under the head of exceptions; and if the practice were otherwise, the suppression would be only partial, as in the case of leading interrogatories. Clearly, then, the whole of these depositions would not have been suppressed in the English chancery, admitting the allegations of the exceptions to have been conceded or established in extenso. But I am not aware that this board, as a board, has even looked into these depositions.

2. The next question is, whether it was necessary that the examining magistrate should have certified that the depositions were committed to writing by himself? I say that he should not have certified the fact; for, that he did commit them to writing is proved by the inspection of the depositions. And if his certificate of the fact be not necessary, though the fact were not apparent, it would be incumbent on the party excepting to sustain his allegations by testimony—which he has not done. No such certificate is required by the English chancery practice. If it be, let an authority be quoted; none such has been referred to, and none such is to be found in the authority before quoted, which is intended to contain the whole practice; and I feel satisfied none can be found. The act of Congress providing the mode of taking depositions de bene esse, in judicial cases, has been referred to.—(2d vol. Laws of United States, Bioren & Duane's edition, pp. 67 to 69.) That act provides that depositions shall be so taken, when the witness lives at a greater distance from the place of trial than one hundred miles, is bound on a voyage to sea, &c. These are the reasons which authorize the taking of such depositions. The notice and mode of taking are then prescribed; and, under the latter, it is enacted that the testimony "shall be reduced to writing, which shall be done only by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by the deponent in his presence; and the depositions so taken shall be retained by the magistrate until he deliver the same, with his own hand, into the court for which they were taken; or shall, together with a certificate of the reasons as aforesaid of their being taken, and of the notice, if any, given to the adverse party, be by him, the said magistrate, sealed up and directed to such court, and remain under his seal until opened in court." It appears, then, that no certificate is expressly required of the fact that the depositions were committed to writing by the magistrate or the witness; and it is according to well known rule of law, expresio unius est exclusio alterius, dispensed with by the naming expressly of certain points which must be certified. We will have hereafter to show that this board is, by its own act in this case, precluded from enforcing the provisions of the act of Congress, or the chancery practice, or any other code, except its own rules. At present, let it be observed that the depositions have been committed to writing by the examining magistrate, as appears by an inspection of them. That if it did not so appear, the exceptions ought to be, and are not, sustained by proof to the contrary; and that it is not required by the chancery practice, or the act of Congress, that the fact should be certified.

3. Lastly. Is it necessary that the magistrate should have transmitted the depositions under a sealed cover?

Whether it is necessary, according to the English chancery practice, cannot be discovered from the authority referred to in support of the exceptions, which is probably the latest and the best; nor perhaps from any other. It is necessary, under the act of Congress, in cases at common law, and in the admiralty; but what is necessary in the courts of the United States, in cases in equity or chancery, may depend, according to circumstances, on the laws and rules of practice of each of the twenty-four States of the Union.—(3d vol. Laws of the United States, Bioren & Duane's edition, p. 487.) Which of all those are to be our guide, and how are we to ascertain what is prescribed by them? If the chancery practice is to have the dignity of affiliation, we can hardly be allowed to prefer that of the English courts to that of the courts of the United States; and if we adopt the latter, it presents us the Augean stable of all the courts of chancery in all the States of the Union to select from; or perhaps we may be bound to embrace all, if witnesses should be found in all. They are all alike recommended to our adoption, unless some should be entitled to a preference by their superior wisdom or fitness. But who is to determine this point? None can be regarded at all as authority. The essential rules of evidence belong to all tribunals, as they do to "all nations governed by reason;" but "technical rules may infinitely vary."—(2 Brown's Civil Law, p. 371.) They do infinitely vary; and I believe an instance cannot be found in the history of jurisprudence where the technical penalties of one tribunal (much more a foreign tribunal) have been enforced by another, without previous adoption, by which all concerned were amply notified, upon the rights and interests submitted to its authority. Tribunals, however limited in duration, usually establish a code of their own, original, if easily practicable, and if not, the code of some other is embraced by express adoption. The mixed commission established its code, dure and rigid enough it was thought at the time, but it was all lenity and indulgence compared with that which results from our decision in this case. This board, also, at its first meeting, established its own code, which I thought was to govern all examinations and depositions; and I do think a stranger who had heard the agents of the claimants of the first class ask, on the 18th of December last, for the instructions of the board as to the testimony in question, would have supposed they had not read our previous rules. He would have been undeceived, however, by the order of the board which resulted, and, changing his view of these agents, would have thought them men wise at least in their own generation; but if he could have lifted the veil of futurity, and seen all their apparent wisdom and foresight turned to nothing, would he not have laughed in scorn at the vanity of human learning and sagacity?

The agents on that occasion say to this board, "We are desirous of being instructed as to every requisite the board may deem fit to impose in the modes of taking, and authenticating, and securing the validity of the depositions that we are about to take, and will conform to every direction that you shall prescribe." The board, in response, prescribe a number of additional forms and means, supposed to be calculated to secure a fair and faithful examination of the witnesses, (all which have been literally and exactly complied with.) It then adds: "If taken in the United States, the depositions shall be taken and authenticated as heretofore prescribed by the board." This also has undoubtedly been done, without the smallest defalcation. If so, have not these depositions been duly taken and authenticated, according to the rules of this board? If duly authenticated, ought they not necessarily, and as matter of clear right, to be read in evidence? What is the meaning of authenticated? Must I turn to lexicographers to show the well known meaning of this common word? The only one within my reach gives the following: "That which has everything requisite to give it authority." What means authority? "Legal power, influence, credit, testimony, credibility."

These depositions have everything requisite to give them authority according to the express and most solemnly promulged and reiterated rules of this board; and authority means "legal power, influence, credit, testimony, credibility." And yet we suppress them as utterly void and unworthy of consideration; a result that excites my wonder and astonishment. Can anything be plainer than that the board, by rules so express, and full, and clear, precluded itself from referring to any extraneous codes? I beg pardon—the board has determined otherwise. But what are the probable consequences of this decision? The board is bound to-morrow, if Congress shall so soon act on the bill before it to give further time to this board to close its business, to determine the question to which this vastly important testimony relates, unless the House of Representatives shall pass that bill; and we learn that the committee to whom it was referred have reported unfavorably of it. If this bill do not pass, the consequence is inevitable that this testimony is forever shut out, because it wants some of the circumstances of authentication which some foreign tribunal or some act of Congress happens to require; though these codes were before the board and not prescribed; though they are no more authority than any other code in which these circumstances of authentication may not be required, and though to common minds, and some legal minds, too, it would seem the board had precluded itself from taking notice of them, and defended claimants to whom they are applied, from being bound by them.

It does appear to me, (I express myself with great deference,) there never was an occasion calculated more naturally and forcibly to bring to the mind one of the maxims of the common law, one too, of philosophical wisdom and truth: Misera est servitus ubi jus est aut vagum aut incognitum.

I did understand, the claimants have understood, it has been proclaimed aloud, that the board were to be governed only by the essential rules of evidence, and that technicalities were to be disregarded. We have even let in hearsay evidence, and the evidence of African slaves, and thus relaxed, as I suppose, the essential rules of evidence which are the guides of "all nations governed by reason;" and yet one class of these claimants find themselves involved in all the technicalities of foreign tribunals and domestic tribunals, mixed up with the incompatible requisitions of our own proper regulations. Thus it has been asked truly, is the examining magistrate to trudge for long distances, from his residence to the clerk of the county, to get him to certify, from time to time, as each deposition is taken, in obedience to our own rules, that he, the magistrate, is really the character he avows himself to be, and afterwards to conform to all the technical requisitions of the English chancery practice, and the act of Congress both?

Is a peculiar practice and a peculiar strictness to be applied to this testimony? I have heard a language in reference to it which I do not understand in any sense in which I am able to apply it; it is said to be adversary testimony. Does this mean that it is testimony which is to be governed by peculiar rules, to be prejudged, and, before it is received, condemned? That is impossible; either it ought not to be received at all, or it ought to be received like all other testimony. Is there any example of two rules for the admissibility of testimony on the same issue? one for one party, of indulgence, and another for the other, of rigor. If not, what is meant by adversary testimony?

Is it meant to say that the pretensions of one of the parties are not to be favored? This certainly cannot be the views of this board. But that the question may be disabused of a character that seems to have been cast upon it, not certainly by my brethren, let us for a moment inquire what the question is. Certain citizens of the United States had their slaves taken from them during the war, according to the rights of war, (a harsh and disreputable exercise of those rights, it is true, but still they were the rights of war,) and they were carried out of our territories and waters before the ratification of the treaty of peace. In the treaty of peace all claims for these are abandoned by our own Government, but it is stipulated that all slaves within our territory or waters, at the ratification of that instrument, shall not be carried away. The treaty is violated. Indemnity is claimed and granted to all those whose slaves were taken away after the ratification of the treaty. The sum agreed to be paid is, probably, not more than sufficient to indemnify those really entitled. In this state of things some who are not entitled claim an equal participation with those who are entitled. I say those who are not entitled, for all claim this equal participation, and no one will venture to say that all the slaves taken during the war were within the territory or waters of the United States at the peace; therefore, some (how many it is neither fit, neither material nor fit, at this time to inquire) who are certainly not entitled demand an equal participation in this fund. It is unjust, unconscionable, or unusual, to put claimants like these, whose rights are doubtful, to use no stronger language, to proof, and to rebut their proof if it be unsatisfactory or unfounded. I am aware that it may be invidious to speak the truth thus explicitly on this subject, and I wish I could have avoided it, but I am accustomed to do my duty, however invidious, and I have determined to do so on this occasion. I say that no person whose slaves were carried away before the ratification of the treaty is justly or equitably entitled to one cent of the fund paid under the convention of London, and that, if any such be allowed to participate, it will be, pro tanto, a perversion of all the compacts under which we sit and act. The question is who and how many are entitled to participate of this fund? To determine that it is necessary to ascertain when the slaves severally claimed left the United States. Can it be proper to have two rules of testimony on this plain question of fact—one for the affirmative and one for the negative of it—one of indulgence and one of restriction? The search is after truth, and whether a welcome or unwelcome fact be sought, the course of investigation ought to be the same. I am sure my brethren have the same object in view, but, believing and knowing this, I ask what is meant by the idea that this is adversary testimony, and therefore to be regarded in a light different from other testimony affecting the same issue? If it be said that two rules have not been adopted in this case, I ask whether the ex parte depositions filed in support of the presumption contended for by the claimants of the second class have not been allowed without any other authentication than that required by the original rule? It will be admitted. I ask, then, whether the more solemn and formal examinations, now under consideration, taken on interrogatories, with the opportunity of cross-examination, authenticated according to the same rule, have not been suppressed? It will be admitted. Have not, then, different rules governed these respective decisions? When the depositions of the claimants of the second class were allowed, there was time to retake them according to the new rule prescribed by the board, yet they were allowed. When the depositions, now under consideration, were suppressed, there was no time to take them anew, and the testimony will be utterly shut out unless Congress grant further time. Is this dealing equally by the parties? There have then been different rules applied to evidence affecting the same issue, and these rules in reference to the two parties litigant; one of them, I contend, more indulgent than the most relaxed examples of other tribunals, and the other more rigorous than English chancery practice, with all its forms and technicalities.

Madox says, 2 vol., p. 412, "Depositions before publication will, on motion, be suppressed for having been taken by the Commissioners ready prepared, and the Commissioners will be directed to re-examine that witness; but this order does not, in cases of necessity, prevent the court having recourse to the depositions, as where, for instance, the witness could not again be examined." There the irregularity was gross and dangerous; here there is no irregularity except, as it has been determined, that the omission of certain formalities not prescribed by the board, but found only in foreign or extraneous codes, shall be such. There the testimony was used when the witness could not be again examined; here it is rejected, though the witness cannot be again examined unless an act of Congress pass which shall control the effect of the decision of the board.

LANGDON CHEVES.

Mr. Seawell's opinion.

Upon the appeal from the decision of the clerk on the regularity of the return of the adversary depositions, taken at the instance of Mr. Frost, as agent for claimants whose claims have already been allowed, a majority of the board is of opinion that the decision should be reversed and the depositions suppressed.

These depositions were taken under rules prescribed by the board, which required that they should be taken and authenticated in a particular manner, upon interrogatories filed and notice to the adverse party whom it was intended to prejudice. The depositions were taken, in every particular, conformable to the rules, but were not returned to the board closed; they were handed in open by the agent, without any envelope, as a loose sheet or common affidavit, and, upon that ground, I am of opinion they should be suppressed. This board, at its first session, without any previous rule, refused, as admissible, the affidavits of agents in support of claims. It thought the policy of preserving from the imputation of suspicion those concerned in the management of claims required such a rule. If that decision is justified by its policy, how much more is the adoption of such a rule as grows out of the present determination of the board? In what way could confidence be more abused than by the withholding such depositions as militated against the opposing claimants? Depositions, when taken upon interrogatories, as required in this case, become the property of both parties; depositions, to be admissible, should, like the oath to the witness, declare not only the truth but the whole truth. What is there, if these depositions are allowed, to prevent an agent from withholding a deposition or even making an alteration? It is no answer to say that the honorable standing of the agent in this particular case, and his known sense of propriety, would forbid it; rules must be universal as to men and apply to all equally. The rules which the board have prescribed relate only to manner of taking and authentication. It would have been impossible to point out any objection that the depositions, when taken, would be subject to. Would it be said that the deposition of an agent, the deposition of an insane man, a deposition in the handwriting of an agent, a deposition taken before a magistrate who was a party or agent, would have been allowed? Yet neither has been prohibited by the rules. It seems to me at war with the first principles of common justice to allow a man to be prejudiced by evidence when its truth or its falsehood is to depend upon the bare will of his adversary, and particularly where there is a mode by which it can be prevented and the adversary entitled to the same benefits. The decision of the board I consider as required, not only by rules of policy and justice, but sanctioned by the universal practice of all courts, whether foreign or domestic, international or municipal, whose rules I have any acquaintance with. If it be said that the same strictness is not required as to depositions adduced in support of claims, the answer is, that the opposing claimant has already had the full benefit of that rule, and obtained an allowance of his claim under it, and can with a very bad grace now object to it. For these reasons my opinion is that the depositions be suppressed.

HENRY SEAWELL.

Mr. Pleasants' opinion.

Having concurred with my colleague, Mr. Seawell, in the opinion that the depositions produced on the part of these claimants, whose cases have been favorably determined by the board, the object of which depositions is to prevent a recovery or rebut the presumptive evidence which it has been agreed exists in favor of the Chesapeake claimants generally, I concur with him in the general reasonings in support of the opinion we have given. The rules prescribing the form in which those depositions shall be taken and authenticated are silent as to the manner in which they shall be transmitted to the board; and the reason of this silence certainly was, on my part at least, and I presume on the part of the other members, that they would be forwarded in the mode prescribed by the statutory provisions or the rules of those courts where such testimony is used, which I believe to be general without exception; that is, that they shall be carefully sealed up and transmitted to the tribunal before which they are to be used. The great inferiority of written to oral testimony, in its very best form, points out, most strongly, the propriety of making use of every mean which can be devised for preserving the testimony as pure as practicable. The loose practice of forwarding depositions open, or placing them in the power of any of the parties interested, must, at first view, present such strong exceptions to them that, to my mind, it is a conclusive objection. Having relied principally on this objection, which exists in the case of these depositions, I deem it unnecessary to go into the examination of others; they, indeed, are stated as abovementioned by my colleague, and I concur generally with him.

JAMES PLEASANTS.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 483. [1ST SESSION.

REPORT FROM THE STATE OF MAINE RELATIVE TO THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY OF THAT STATE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE APRIL 14, 1828.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, APRIL 14, 1828.

Resolved, That the report of the Joint Select Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine, in relation to the northeastern boundary of that State, together with the report of the agent appointed by the Executive of said State, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on the 5th of March last, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Attest:

W. LOWRIE, Secretary.

STATE OF MAINE.

IN SENATE, January 4, 1828.

Ordered, That so much of the communication made by the Governor to the Legislature, with the accompanying documents, as relates to the northeastern boundary of this State, be referred to Messrs. Megquier, Williams, and Hathaway, with such of the House as may join, and that the committee be authorized to cause such of the accompanying documents to be published as, in their opinion, the public good requires.

Read and passed.

Sent down for concurrence.

ROBERT P. DUNLAP, President.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 5, 1828.

Read and concurred; and Messrs. Deane, of Ellsworth; Fuller, of Augusta; Vance, of Baring; Carpenter, of Howland; and Burnham, of Unity, were joined.

Report of the Joint Select Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine, in relation to the northeastern boundary of the State.

The aforesaid Joint Select Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine have considered the whole subject submitted to them by the aforesaid order, to wit: All the Governor's message which relates to the northeastern boundary, which is as follows, to wit: "In the number of our resources is one so conspicuous that it must early attract your notice. It is that of a wild and fertile territory, embracing about six millions of acres. It is not necessary now to attempt to show how evidently it is subject to your jurisdiction, nor to speak of its distinguished natural advantages, which impart to it the capacity of sustaining some hundred thousand yeomen. Valuable, or rather invaluable, as it is, we ought, without hesitation, to surrender it if we cannot with justice support that claim to it which unfortunately now stands opposed, under the difficulty of an ingenuity which has endeavored to obscure the line, and an opposition which, I trust, you will dispassionately authorize to be resisted under the limitations of a cautious and prudent, yet decided policy.

"The Government of the State, with the exemplary moderation always creditable and necessary, has for years refrained from the exercise of many of its rights. It has been induced to do so, as may be inferred, from its anxious desire to accommodate to the wishes of the Federal Administration, and its disposition to avoid collisions, inevitably unfortunate, in any result. At the same time it cannot abandon its obligations, its title deeds, and its rights. It cannot allow the citizens to be incarcerated in foreign jails. The State would shrink most dreadfully under the shame of such a submission. For the sake of being fully informed, it has for several years solicited the documents possessed by the General Government in relation to this subject. It is with great confidence that I urge its consideration now, inasmuch as all that has been requested has been supplied agreeably to what was understood to be the wish of the last Legislature. That invaluable mass of documents, now in the Secretary's office, and the copies of communications between myself and others, contain nearly all that I can offer. The delicate nature of the subject induces me to ask a particular examination in reference to publication, if that shall be proposed; yet there is no wish, on my part, that what has been written by myself shall be disposed of in one way in preference to the other. On the most thoughtful revisal I find no past deviations from my existing sentiments, and am bound to sustain the most rigorous responsibility.

"Amidst the views urged has been a primary one of that nature, requiring its being submitted to you for correction, if desired. It is in relation to the undefined, and perhaps undefinable, line of rights between States' and United States' authority, along which construction is constantly urging disputed claims, and, in general, has much the advantage in irruptions upon the States. The Executive of the Union has been considered as disposed to submit the question of the boundary of Maine, with a perfectly friendly intent, but without regarding her as a party to the umpirage of a foreign authority. The submission itself admits the possibility of an unjust and disastrous decision. While it is not presumed to cast a shadow of suspicion on the integrity with which that authority may be exercised, nor upon the motives of any person whomsoever, it has, nevertheless, been deemed a suitable precaution to urge the following propositions. It cannot be arrogance which asserts them as materials of a monument of the rights of our employers, which will become firm by time, when properly combined and cemented by your reflections. If any feeling has been displayed on my part, it has been indulged with a view of eliciting results which it was believed would be salutary and acceptable. At the same time there has been no intention to abandon those prudential considerations, entirely consistent with a free assertion of what it might be supposed the people, through their representatives, would eventually approve and sustain.

"At the period of forming the treaty of 1783, Massachusetts and the other colonies were independent of each other as to territorial rights. The United States, as such, did not exist.

"Although the colonies constituted common agents to form that treaty, the territorial rights secured did not, by virtue of that instrument, accrue to the nation, but were merely acknowledged and confirmed by it to the existing individual corporations according to pre-existing grants, crown lands only being excepted.

"When the Union of the States was framed in that happy arrangement we are still permitted to witness, and which created a general guardianship, without extinguishing a particular independence, the compact left Massachusetts the proprietor, as one party in severalty, of all her soil. She held it fully, with undiminished interest, and has conceded her jurisdictional control only by that magnanimous act, usually called the Separation, which received validity from the concurrence of Congress.

"The Union having no right to cede the territory, the treaty making power, as only a constituent part, cannot exercise a function beyond the grasp of the delegated power over the whole, nor, indirectly, by an umpire, do what it could not accomplish without; that is, consent to the alienation, or the possibility of an alienation of territory, which I will show is solemnly acknowledged through the President to be ours.

"It has, therefore, been believed to be due this State to advance the doctrine that the submission of its boundary to an umpire, unknown to herself, and upon terms not confided to her consideration, will leave her at liberty to act upon the result, as to the country and herself may be dictated by the most just and patriotic inclinations. Yet, if it be true that the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent has involved much of federal authority, beyond the limits which many eminent statesmen have contended to be the true ones, as the treaty exists, the delicacy of the case, in relation to public faith, ought to have some influence upon our assertion of our claim, although an entire concession cannot be expected. It ought to be distinctly understood that there is a perfect harmony of sentiment with the Federal Administration in a most essential particular, in regard to which, the language of Mr. Clay, the Secretary of State, is calculated to be highly satisfactory. It is as follows: 'The Government of the United States is fully convinced that the right to the territory is with us and not with Great Britain. The convictions of Maine are not stronger in respect to the validity of our title than are those which are entertained by the President.'

"Whatever may be the character of the proposed umpirage, it seems necessary to adopt some rule of procedure, as to the duties to be discharged, before its results shall be known; and I cannot but hope to learn from you, in some way, what measures you will consider to be proper if such acts as that of the arrest and incarceration of Baker shall be repeated. There will be no wish to go beyond your direction, nor to fall short of it; and, thus far, while the object has been to give no assent to injustice, there has been a steady view to your contemplated consultations and probable commands. It was an arrest which the testimony seems to me to condemn; yet it cannot but be hoped that the neighboring Government will place right the hasty acts of unthinking agents, and that we, expecting that generous conduct which springs from the character of an Englishman, should not suddenly and unnecessarily engage with him in contentions. While we were acquiescing in the abeyance of our rights, as connected only with property, the call for interposition was not imperative; but when unauthorized power was applied to the persons of our citizens along the Aroostook, and in other places, it seemed proper to ascertain the facts, in order to submit them to your consideration, and to that of Massachusetts and the nation; both of which will feel an interest, not only in the protection of our fellow citizens in Maine, but in the other relations of the subject. A letter was, therefore, sent to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, containing a request that he would cause information of the facts relating to the arrest of Baker to be returned. While, in his reply, he acknowledged, in favorable terms, the amicable disposition professed by this Government, so far as, on the occasion, it was represented, he declined to make the explanations requested, excepting to those with whom he is directed to correspond, or under whose orders he is placed.

"It must be known to you that, in addition to the means above mentioned, Mr. Daveis was appointed to obtain the information which all have appeared to consider desirable. From what has transpired there is no doubt in my mind of the intention of the Government of New Brunswick to extend its jurisdiction, and to confirm it, if possible, over the whole disputed territory.

"I cannot but profess to you the disposition, on my own part, subject to your direction, to offer some difficulties against such a course; but it is not to be doubted that the United States Government and that of Great Britain will perceive, on being furnished the facts, that the Government of New Brunswick has advanced beyond the line of tenable ground, and seems not to have listened to those recommendations of mutual forbearance which have been rung so loud that we did not notice its invasions.

"Another of the objects of the mission of Mr. Daveis was to obtain the release of Mr. Baker, whose arrest was thought to be not only cognizable by the United States, but by the particular State of which he is a citizen. His confinement in the jail at Frederickton was an act of power which, considering the nature of the facts as far as developed, required early attention; and the course pursued was accordingly adopted, not however without a careful examination of principles and precedents. If you shall think the measure as involving any excess in the exertion of State power, it would seem to be desirable not to allow it to pass without the expression of your dissent, which would be received, on my part, with the utmost respect and deference.

"The minister plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty has communicated to Mr. Clay what are called, by the former, 'sufficient proofs of the decided resolution of his Majesty's Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to maintain the disputed territory in the same state in which his excellency received it after the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent.' It certainly would not be desirable to put his Majesty's Lieutenant Governor's decided resolution to the test on this point; but it may be imperatively required to determine how far the treaty of Ghent and previous actual jurisdiction may sanction his authoritative approaches beyond the terms of that treaty without a reasonable expostulation, not however to be followed by any unnecessary resort to forcible resistance.

"It is not to be anticipated that the deplorable event of a war with Great Britain may not occur again. If that melancholy result of human frailty shall be produced, the situation of Maine will require great resolution and activity. The concentration of the British forces, with the view of dividing the Union, by an occupation of New York, will not be attempted again; but the seaboard and the interior frontier of Maine will be—the one a line of maritime invasion, and the other of excursions and incursions, according to the emergencies relating to our defence. The effort will be probably to cut off this State, or at least for this we ought to be prepared, so as not to admit any repetition here of such scenes as occurred during the last war. It would appear to be proper to solicit of the General Government the erection of some strong fortresses on our interior frontier. Its own disposition, and the obvious utility of works so situated, in anticipation of others where the country is better guarded, would, it may be hoped, assure to a representation of this nature a favorable reception."

The committee aforesaid ask leave to observe, they are unable to perceive that there is anything uncertain in our claim arising out of any obscurity in the treaty of 1783, or any of the documentary evidence, or arguments and discussions which led to the description of the boundary therein contained; nor are they informed that the Government of Great Britain, or any of their negotiators, ever claimed the northern part of this State as a right, but requested it as a cession. It is, therefore, concluded that their strong and persevering endeavors to excite doubts and embarrass the subject are elicited by the zeal of their essayists, and their subordinate agents or negotiators, who, while they recommend themselves to the mother government as zealous, loyal subjects, and faithful agents, are disposed, at the same time, to gratify other feelings arising from other causes.

This subject has on several occasions occupied the attention of the Government of this State, and has been the subject of reports and resolves, and all may have been done which the state of knowledge on that subject rendered proper, or the occasion required. The subject is now, from a variety of considerations, assuming a more interesting character. Such is the state of public inquiry, that it may be expected of this Legislature that they will fairly and candidly spread the evidence of title, and the subject of controversy, before the people, to the end that they may see, examine, and reason for themselves, and form their own conclusions. This, however, would be deemed unnecessary, were it not the fact that what is said, and much of the documentary evidence touching the boundaries of the provinces prior to the treaty of 1783, is in the hands and within the reach of very few.

With a view, therefore, of spreading the evidence of our title fairly before the people of this State, and by the same means before the people of the United States and the world, it is proposed to pursue, generally, the chronological order of events; noticing particularly such as have any direct relation to the subject, and incidentally such as tend chiefly to show the connexion between them.

The discovery of America produced an excitement and a spirit of maritime enterprise among the nations of Europe. Cabot sailed in 1497, under the orders of Henry VII, of England, and discovered Newfoundland and North America, and coasted from Labrador to Florida. The spirit of discovery thus early excited in England subsided, and was not revived for many years. The French prosecuted voyages of discovery to North America, and as early as 1535 attempted a settlement on the St. Lawrence. From this period the voyages of the Europeans to the northern parts of North America were principally confined to the fisheries and to the prosecution of a trade in furs with the natives, and it was not until 1604 that any settlement was commenced which became permanent.

In 1603 Henry Fourth, of France, granted to De Monts all the country in North America between the fortieth and forty-sixth degrees of north latitude, by the name of Acadie. De Monts, to secure to himself the benefits of his grant, with Champlain and other adventurers, fitted out vessels and sailed for America. They first touched on the eastern coast of the grant, then sailed round Cape Sable to the Bay of Fundy, touched at Port Royal, now Annapolis, at the St. John, which river they sailed up some distance, and thence followed the coast to the mouth of a river which they afterwards called St. Croix, where, upon a small island, they erected houses and defences, and established themselves for the winter. In the spring, they, for some cause, determined on quitting the island, and took what they could of the materials of the buildings, and moved, and established themselves at Port Royal, where they lived and prosecuted the business of their settlement for several years.

In 1607 the British commenced a settlement in Virginia, which became permanent. As early as 1613, for the purpose of getting rid of their neighbors, who might at some future period annoy them, as well as for asserting their claim to the whole country, and appropriating it to themselves or the British Government, they fitted out a small expedition, under Sir Samuel Argall, to dislodge the French in Acadie. Sir Samuel dislodged the French at Mount Desert, destroyed all which De Monts had left on the island where he first wintered, and captured the French at Port Royal. Some of the French went to Canada, and some united with the natives. The expedition was attended with no important result, further than it probably suggested to Sir William Alexander the idea of obtaining a grant of the country—and, therefore, after companies had in England obtained grants of various parts of North America, to which they gave their favorite names, such as Virginia and New England, he obtained a grant, which, from its relative situation to New England, or to perpetuate the name of his native country, he called Nova Scotia.*

The grant was made in 1621 by James I, and contained "all the lands of the continent from Cape Sable, thence along the coast of St. Mary's bay; thence across the Bay of Fundy to the river St. Croix, to its remotest spring head; thence by an imaginary line northward to the river St. Lawrence; thence by the shores of the river to the haven* or shore commonly called Gaspe, and thence southward, &c. Sir William seems to have engaged with some zeal, and incurred great expense in fitting out two vessels to take possession of and settle his grant; but all his efforts produced little or no effect, and he abandoned it, and in 1630 sold a part or all of his grant to La Tour, a subject of France. In the year 1628 or 1629 Canada and Acadie were both captured by the British, and were restored in 1632 by the treaty of St. Germains. In 1652 the British fitted out an expedition, and took possession of Penobscot, St. John, Port Royal, and several other places. In 1655 a treaty of commerce was entered into between the French and British, and the question of title to Acadie was referred to Commissioners.

† In 1663 Charles II granted to his brother, the Duke of York, the country called the Duke of York's territory, next adjoining New Scotland, and extending from the river St. Croix to Pemaquid, and up the river thereof to the furthest head of the same as it tendeth northward; and extending thence to the river Kimbequin, and upwards by the shortest course to the river of Canada northward.

In 1667, by the treaty of Breda, Acadie was again restored to France. In 1689 another war broke out, and the following year Sir William Phipps conquered Port Royal and other French ports in Acadie.

‡ October 7, 1691, by the charter of William and Mary, the real province of Massachusetts Bay was erected, consisting of the former provinces of Massachusetts Bay, New Plymouth, Nova Scotia, District of Maine, and all the territory between Nova Scotia and the District of Maine and the river Sagadahock and every part thereof, and the St. Lawrence, or great river of Canada. It will at once be perceived that the province of Massachusetts Bay was, in the northern part, bounded west by a line drawn north from the westernmost head of the waters of the Sagadahock to the river St. Lawrence, north by the river St. Lawrence, east and south by the Atlantic Ocean. The charter contained a limitation in the exercise of the granting power as to all the tract of country lying beyond the Sagadahock, but it contained no other limitations to its exercise of sovereign power which were not contained in all other charters granting powers of or establishing Governments. Massachusetts exercised some acts of jurisdiction over Nova Scotia, appointed some civil and other officers; but it being so distant, and she having so many other posts, and such extent of other frontier to defend, and the expense being so great, which she must incur for her protection against the assaults of the French and natives, that she was not solicitous to retain it, and in the course of a few years gave it up, and the British Government made it a separate province.

In 1697, by the treaty of Ryswick, Acadie was again restored to the French. In 1702 war was again declared between France and Great Britain, and Acadie, in the course of the war, was again captured by the British, and was, in 1713, by the treaty of Utrecht, ceded by the French to the British, by the description of Nova Scotia, otherwise called Acadie, according to its ancient limits, with some reservations of islands, such as Cape Breton and the islands in the St. Lawrence which were not ceded. For many years Nova Scotia, or Acadie, thus ceded, seems not to have engaged much of the attention of the British Government. They did, in 1719, appoint Richard Phillips Governor,† who, for want of subjects, had to select his council from his garrison. The French inhabitants lived in a state of independence, without acknowledging the right or authority of the British colonial Government; and the object of the British seems to have been to keep possession of the country, to the end that they might hold it and extinguish the claim of France. By the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1745, Commissioners were provided to be appointed to settle the boundaries of Nova Scotia, or Acadie, as ceded by the treaty of Utrecht, about the limits of which the British and French could not agree. Colonel Cornwallis was made Governor of Nova Scotia, or Acadie,‡ in 1749, and came with soldiers of the late army and others, between three and four thousand, and settled and built the town of Halifax.

Commissioners, provided to be appointed by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, were appointed in 1750, and began and continued their discussions for some years, the British contending for, and endeavoring to maintain, one construction of the treaty of Utrecht, and the French another construction. The discussions were broken off by the war of 1756. The treaty of Paris, of February 10, 1763, which terminated the war of 1756, ceded both Canada and Nova Scotia to the British in full sovereignty. At this time the power of the French became extinct, and they never made any subsequent effort to regain it. Until this period, although with the British Nova Scotia had been the subject of grants, of conquests, and cessions, they always recognized the St. Lawrence as its northern boundary, never extending their claim beyond, or stopping short of it. When Canada became a territory of Great Britain, it became necessary for her to establish a Government for it, and the King, for that purpose, by his proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763, among other Governments, established the Government of Quebec,§ bounded as follows: "On the Labrador coast, by the river St. John, and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river, through the Lake St. John, to the south end of Lake Nipissim, from whence the said line, crossing the river St. Lawrence and the Lake Champlain in 45 degrees of north latitude, passes along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, and also along the north coast of the Bay des Chaleurs and the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosiers, and from thence crossing the mouth of the river St. Lawrence by the west end of the island Anticosti, terminates at the aforesaid river St. John."

From this description, it is evident that it was the intention of the Crown, in establishing the province of Quebec, to embrace within its territory, after passing Lake Champlain, the sources of all the streams which flowed into the St. Lawrence, and for that purpose the most fit and appropriate words are adopted. It cannot be supposed that it was intended, by this description, that the line, as it run eastward from Lake Champlain, was to pursue a range of mountains, or to run from peak to peak of the highest mountains between the river St. Lawrence on the one hand, and the Atlantic Ocean on the other. The line was the highlands. What highlands? The highlands which divide the waters; any land, therefore, of any elevation, whether plains or mountains, hills or dales, which are at the sources of the respective rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence and the sea, are the highlands by the proclamation intended, and the most apt words are used to describe them. This line leaves all the waters of the Connecticut, Androscoggin, Kennebec, Penobscot, St. John, and Restigouche, falling into the sea, on one hand, and the streams flowing into the Lake Memphremagog, and through it into the river St. Lawrence, the Chaudierre, the Ouelle, Green, Metis, and many other rivers falling into the river St. Lawrence, on the other. The line, it will be observed, pursues the northern coast of the Bay of Chaleurs and not the middle of the bay; there cannot be any pretence, therefore, that the river Restigouche was, within the meaning of the proclamation, a river flowing into the St. Lawrence, but, on the contrary, it is clearly a river falling into the Atlantic Ocean.

Prior to this proclamation the provinces of Massachusetts Bay and Nova Scotia were bounded north by the river St. Lawrence; the proclamation varied the boundary by transferring it from the shores of the river St. Lawrence to the sources of the rivers which emptied themselves into it; and the aforesaid provinces were then bounded north by the same line, to wit: the range of land, be what it might, high or low, in which the rivers respectively had their sources, leaving the rivers St. John and Restigouche partly in the province of Massachusetts Bay and partly in the province of Nova Scotia, the sources being in the former and the mouths in the latter province. This line has not since been altered, except between Lake Champlain and Connecticut river, where, instead of pursuing the highlands, it was fixed to the parallel of forty-five degrees north latitude.

‖ The line thus established by proclamation has often since, by the acts of the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain, been recognized. October, 1763, in the commission to Montague Wilmot, revoking the commission to a former Governor, and constituting him to be Captain-General and Commander-in-chief of the province of Nova Scotia, is the following description of boundary: "Bounded on the westward by a line drawn from Cape Sable, across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy, to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn north from thence to the southern boundary of our colony of Quebec; to the northward by the said boundary as far as the western extremity of the Bay des Chaleurs," &c.

*In the commission to William Campbell, in 1767, there is the same description of boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia, and the same are again repeated in the commission to Francis Legge in 1771. The proclamation of 1763 was further recognized and confirmed by the act of Parliament of the 14th of George III, by which it is enacted "that all the territories, islands, and countries in North America belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees of northern latitude, on the eastern bank of Connecticut river."† The limits of the several provinces were the same at the time of concluding the treaty of 1783.

The question may well be asked, where was the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the northeast angle of the province of Massachusetts Bay before the treaty? Had Nova Scotia two northwest angles? It has already been shown by the charter to Sir William Alexander that the northwest angle of his grant was on the shore of the river St. Lawrence; and although, by the charter of William and Mary in 1691, it became a part of the province of Massachusetts Bay, when it was afterwards separated from it its boundaries were the same as before, and its northwest angle still on the shores of the St. Lawrence. Here the angle remained fixed and stationary until 1763, when the boundaries were transferred from the shore to the land from which the streams falling into the river St. Lawrence flowed and had their source. Nova Scotia had, therefore, but one northwest angle. Here the line became fixed and permanent, and on this line, and to the northward of the heads of all the streams which did not flow into the river St. Lawrence, was the northwest angle of Nova Scotia.

When the boundaries between the provinces of Quebec and Massachusetts Bay were thus clearly defined, and limited to that range of land in which the streams falling into the St. Lawrence at the northward and the St. John at the southward, and continued easterly to the head of the Bay of Chaleurs, and southwestwardly to the head of Connecticut river; and when the boundary between the provinces of Nova Scotia and Massachusetts Bay were thus clearly defined and limited to the river St. Croix, and a line drawn north from it to the aforesaid range of land, the boundary of the Government of Quebec, the repeated acts of arbitrary power exercised by Great Britain towards the provinces comprising the thirteen United States caused them to assert their rights; they maintained them successfully; and to terminate the unprofitable struggle Great Britain acknowledged their existence as an independent nation. When their existence as an independent nation was thus secured, it became necessary for the two nations, to prevent new and unprofitable contests, to fix and establish boundaries between themselves. This was first done in the provisional articles of peace concluded at Paris November 30, 1782, and by the provisions of that instrument were incorporated into and became a part of the definitive treaty of peace concluded at Paris September 3, 1783.

The acknowledgment of independence and the boundaries established are described as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE 1. His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, to wit: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign, and independent States; and that he treats with them as such; and for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquishes all claims to the government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof. And that all disputes which might arise in future on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are and shall be their boundaries, to wit:

"ARTICLE 2. From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to wit, that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands, along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; from thence by a line due west on said latitude until it strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraguy; thence along the middle of said river into Lake Ontario, through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; thence along the middle of said communication into Lake Erie, through the middle of said lake until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Huron; thence along the middle of said water communication between that lake and Lake Superior; thence through Lake Superior, northward of the isles Royal and Philipeaux, to the Long Lake; thence through the middle of said Long Lake, and the communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through said lake to the most northwestern point thereof; and from thence on a due west course to the river Mississippi; thence by a line to be drawn along the middle of the said river Mississippi, until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude. South, by a line to be drawn due east from the termination of the line last mentioned, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the equator, to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catahouche; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river; thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river to the Atlantic Ocean. East, by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the Bay of Fundy to its source; and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence, comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between the lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforesaid boundaries between Nova Scotia on the one part and East Florida on the other, shall respectively touch the Bay of Fundy and the Atlantic Ocean, excepting such islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of the said province of Nova Scotia."

The first article describes by name the several States composing the United States, and, had the treaty stopped here without describing their boundaries more minutely, there could have been no doubt but that all the territory embraced within the charter limits, or within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts Bay, passed by that description. Here, from the use of the term Massachusetts, was an evident intention to conform to the lines as they existed before the treaty, which have been already shown from the documents hereinbefore cited, which are of that clear and explicit character which relieves the subject from all uncertainty and doubt.

But when the subject is still further pursued, and the boundaries are more minutely described, what was clear before is still made more clear and explicit. To be more particular: the northwest angle of

*Appendix 9. †Appendix 10.

Nova Scotia, after it is ascertained by the rule given in the treaty, is the point from which the northern line starts. "From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to wit, that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the river St. Croix to the highlands." Here we may ask what angle was intended? Was it an angle to be formed on the side line of the province, one hundred or more miles from the real and true northwest angle of Nova Scotia, or was the real and true angle of the province at the point where its western line intersected the line of the province of Quebec? The true construction is too obvious to admit a doubt. It is perfectly clear, from the plain and most natural and obvious construction of the language used, that by the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was truly intended the northwestern extremity of that province.

The description then proceeds: "Along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean." The idea that the words of the treaty require a range of mountains to form the line is totally false and absurd. If the Commissioners intended to describe a line pursuing the highest range of mountains between the Atlantic on the one hand and the river St. Lawrence on the other, they would have used the terms fittest for such description, and not have used the words which plainly and distinctly were intended to embrace any height of land from the lowest to any other elevation, provided it did divide the waters falling into the river St. Lawrence from those falling into the Atlantic Ocean. If mountains were found there, they were intended; if there were no mountains or hills, and the lands only ascended gently from the river St. Lawrence, and again descended towards the main streams falling into the Atlantic, constituting in fact a long and extended plain, from the highest parts of which the streams run northwardly and westwardly into the river St. Lawrence, and southerly and easterly into the Atlantic—such a plain is the highland truly intended by the treaty, and the line is on that part of the plain from which the waters flow in different directions; if the lands are only high enough for the water simply to pass off in different directions, as completely and exactly corresponds with the description in the treaty, and are the highlands truly and eminently intended by it.

The treaty describes but two classes of rivers as having any connexion with this part of the boundaries of the United States, to wit: such as flow into the river St. Lawrence and those which fall into the Atlantic. Although the river St. Lawrence itself falls into the Atlantic Ocean, it is alluded to in a peculiar manner to distinguish it from all other rivers, and to place it and its tributary streams in opposition to them, whether they flowed into Long Island sound, Kennebec bay, Penobscot bay, the great Massachusetts bay, the Bay of Fundy, or the Bay of Chaleur, or into any other part of the Atlantic Ocean. The language of the treaty being thus clear and explicit, it leaves no doubt on the mind that the highlands of the treaty which divide the waters was intended that range of lands, whether high or low, in which the tributaries of the St. Lawrence have their sources and from which they flow. To search, therefore, for mountain ranges, or for the greatest height of land between the river St. Lawrence and the Atlantic Ocean to fulfil the terms of the treaty, is absurd and preposterous. In the latter part of the article quoted, in describing the east boundary, the descriptive language of the first part of the article is nearly repeated: "East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the bay of Fundy to its source, and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands which divide the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

Although, from the French having erected their crosses at the mouths of various rivers, and having at various times given them names from that circumstance, and the part of the country between the rivers St. John and Penobscot not having been early settled, and seldom visited except for the purpose of traffic with the natives, doubts reasonably might arise as to the true river St. Croix; still, when those doubts were removed and the river clearly ascertained, a certain point was fixed, from which the due north line was to start, and nothing remained but to employ artists to survey the line and erect its monuments. This seems to have been a point conceded in the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London November 19, 1794, and in all the discussions under the fifth article thereof.

Upon the clear and explicit language of the treaty itself, before any intelligent and impartial tribunal the question of boundary and jurisdiction might be safely placed with a perfect confidence in the issue. But the treaty, though definite in its descriptions and requiring no foreign aid in its interpretation, only adopted the boundaries of provinces which had been defined, established, and recognized by the Crown and Government of Great Britain in their different acts from 1621 to 1775, which will appear by a recurrence to the descriptive language contained in the patents, charters, proclamations, and acts of Parliament before quoted, and nearly in the same language. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the ministers of both Governments intended to adopt, and did adopt, in the treaty of peace, as the boundary of the United States, the boundaries between the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia on the one part and Massachusetts on the other part, which had been established by, and had long been familiar to, the Government of Great Britain. This construction, if any further support were necessary, is amply and fully supported by the discussions which led to, and the manner in which the boundaries were concluded by the ministers who negotiated the provisional treaty of peace. The negotiation was carried on in form with Mr. Oswald, who advised with Mr. Fitzherbert, the minister to the Court of Versailles, but in fact with the British Cabinet. Mr. Oswald did little or nothing more, not having authority, than to make such propositions as the British Cabinet, from time to time, according to circumstances, commanded, and received such as our ministers made, until near the close of the discussion, when he was clothed with full powers.

A provision in favor of the loyalists was long and ardently urged by the British, and as ardently resisted by our ministers; the right to the fisheries was urged and insisted on by our ministers, and made a sine qua non by a part, and resisted by the British, but finally adopted; both of which topics occupied much time. The fixing and defining the boundaries of the United States also occupied much time, and no part or portion of it was so diligently examined and discussed as the eastern and northern boundaries of the present State of Maine. The British, in the first place, insisted upon the Piscataqua as the eastern limit of the United States, then retreated to the Kennebec, and, as a last resort, would consent to go as far as the Penobscot. During this, as during the other parts of the discussion, messengers were continually crossing and recrossing the channel. Among the messengers and aids to the British the ancient clerk of the Board of Trade and Plantations appeared, with volumes of records from that Department, from which he read whatever there was which tended to show the district of Maine, or any part of it, was not, before that time, within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts Bay. The American ministers, in their turn, produced sundry acts of the colonial Government of Massachusetts Bay, showing the jurisdiction which had been exercised by her; the report of the Attorney and Solicitor Generals, who had, upon the matter being referred to them, decided upon the sundry petitions, applications, and claims made for all the country between the Sagadahoc (Kennebec) and St. Croix; and their decision, after examining all the evidence, was against them and in favor of the jurisdiction of Massachusetts Bay; also Governor Hutchinson's report, wherein the right of Massachusetts Bay is discussed, and a volume of the doings of the Commissioners at Paris.

When the British insisted upon limiting the United States to the Piscataqua, the Kennebec, or the Penobscot, the ministers of the United States, or some of them, insisted upon going to the St. John, but finally agreed to adhere to the charter of Massachusetts Bay. That they did do that most manifestly appears from a comparison of the treaty with the patents, charters, proclamations, and acts of Parliament hereinbefore quoted.

That it was the intention of the Commissioners to adopt the boundaries between the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia on the one part, and Massachusetts Bay on the other part, was expressly conceded and admitted on the part of the British in the discussions under the fifth article of the treaty of 1794. It even, if possible, was more than admitted; it is one, if not the chief, basis of the whole argument, and was enforced with great ability.

The British agent, in his memorial of claim, says: "By the said second article, hereinbefore recited, of the treaty of peace, it appears to be clearly intended that no part of the province of Nova Scotia should be thereby ceded by his said Majesty to the said United States; but that the same province of Nova Scotia, according to its ancient and former limits, should be and remain a part of the territory of his said Majesty, as his said Majesty then and before that time had held and possessed the same." Again, in his argument, he says: "To facilitatet he investigation of the present question, there appears to be one leading principle that appears to be explicitly established by the very terms of the treaty of peace, and which might, indeed, be fairly considered as an axiom in the present discussion, to wit: That it was clearly intended by the second article of the treaty that no part of the province of Nova Scotia should be thereby ceded by his Majesty to the United States." The words made use of in that article will not admit of a different construction, the United States being expressly bounded east by the eastern boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia. The description of the treaty in this part of the boundaries of the United States is as follows: "From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to wit, that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix to the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those that fall into the Atlantic Ocean." Now, if the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, agreeably to these clear and express words of the treaty, is formed by such a north line from the source of the St. Croix to the highlands, that north line and those highlands must be the western and northern boundary of Nova Scotia.

And the British agent, in pursuing his argument further, says that, by the treaty of 1763, "all the French possessions upon the continent of North America were ceded to Great Britain; the province of Quebec was created and established by the royal proclamation of the 7th of October of that year, bounded on the south by the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Sea or Atlantic Ocean, thereby altering the northern boundary of the province of Nova Scotia from the southern shores of the river St. Lawrence to those highlands; there being no longer any apprehension of disturbance from the French, it now became necessary for the settlement of the country that had been in dispute between the two nations to ascertain the boundary line between the provinces of Nova Scotia and Massachusetts Bay."

Having quoted in the preceding pages the main documents on which our title rests, there will not, in the sequel, be a necessity for anything more than general allusions. By a recurrence to the history of that time it will be seen that the treaties were opposed in the British Parliament; but they were opposed by those who had lately been in power, and opposition to the ministry seems to have constituted the leading objection. So far as the treaty with the United States came in question, the objections raised were on account of there being no provision in favor of the loyalists, and the right to the fisheries being secured to the United States; but there was no objection to it on account of the boundaries therein prescribed to the eastern part of the United States. If the boundaries had not been such as were well known and familiar from their own records, the variance would have produced scrutiny; and if any objection could have been raised against it on that account, it would have been brought forward to increase and enforce their other objections.

When the river St. Croix had been consecrated by De Monts in 1604, and by its being the first resting place of Europeans who became permanent settlers in the northern parts of North America; and when, from that circumstance, and from the expedition of Sir Samuel Argall, its name found its way across the Atlantic, yet, from the imperfect geographical knowledge at that time, the position of it could not have been known to the Europeans; and when, in the prosecution of the settlement of the country, other places became more alluring, and the river St. Croix and the country on its borders did not become the site of any settlement or military post, and the natives were there left to pursue their fisheries and the chase without molestation; and when, also, many other rivers on the coast were afterwards designated by the same name; and when all the maps prior to the American Revolution were imperfect, it is not wonderful that doubts, and serious doubts, arose as to which river was intended as the boundary between the province of Massachusetts Bay and the province of Nova Scotia. Hence, as the river St. Croix was a part of the boundary between the provinces, when the settlements on the coast began to approach each other it became necessary to ascertain the river truely intended, to prevent collision and the conflict of jurisdiction.

Before the American Revolution, and as early as the year 1764, it had become the object of the serious research and investigation of the respective provinces. From the researches of the agents of the province of Massachusetts Bay, made on the spot from the concurrent information of all the natives, and from all the maps in their possession, they were convinced that the river Magaguadavic was the river St. Croix. Such was the tradition, and such was the conclusion.

It generally was considered and believed, in the province of Massachusetts Bay, that it was bounded east by the river Magaguadavic, and by a line drawn due north from its source to the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, or, in other words, by a line drawn due north from the source of the said Magaguadavic river to the southern line of the province of Quebec, which had, by proclamation, been created the preceding year. The province of Nova Scotia, on the other hand, believed that the province extended westward to the river Schoodic, and was bounded west by the east line of the province of Massachusetts Bay, and north by the aforesaid south line of the province of Quebec. Impressed with such a belief, the Governor of Nova Scotia, as the settlements extended westward, and individuals wished for grants of land made them, and from the year 1765 to 1774, made sundry grants of land lying between the Magaguadavic and the Schoodic rivers.

Such were the different opinions entertained at the commencement of the Revolution, and such they continued to be when the provisional treaty and the treaty of peace were concluded. When the provinces were cut asunder, and ceased to be under the control of the same general sovereignty, and after the close of the war, the loyalists settled on the eastern banks of the Schoodic, and extended their settlements between that and the Magaguadavic rivers, under the grants of the province of Nova Scotia or the Crown. The attention of Massachusetts was aroused, and called distinctly to the subject; and the Government, July 7, 1784, passed a "Resolve for appointing agents to the eastern part of this State, to inform themselves of encroachments made by the British subjects, and instructing them how to proceed." The agents were appointed, repaired to the place where the dispute existed, viewed the rivers, and made all such other inquiries as were within their power, and became convinced that the river Magaguadavic was the river St. Croix of the treaty of 1783. In answer to inquiries made by the Lieutenant Governor of Massachusetts, dated Autevil, near Paris, October 25, 1784, the late John Adams, one of the negotiators of the provisional and the treaty of peace, says: "We had before us, through the whole negotiation, a variety of maps, but it was Mitchell's map upon which was marked out the whole boundary line of the United States; and the river St. Croix, which was fixed on, was, upon that map, the nearest to the St. John's; so that, in all equity, good conscience, and honor, the river next to the St. John's should be the boundary. I am glad the general court are taking early measures, and hope they will pursue them steadily until the point is settled, which it may be now amicably; if neglected long, it may be more difficult." Massachusetts became confirmed in her claim as her inquiries and researches were extended. She pressed her claim upon the consideration of Congress and upon the consideration of the Governors of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Representations were made by Congress to the Government of Great Britain through the minister of the United States.

The different parties, so far from settling the difficulties, probably became more and more confirmed in their different opinions. After the organization of the Government of the United States under the Constitution, by a resolve passed February 1, 1790, it was "Resolved, That his excellency the Governor be, and he hereby is, requested to write to the President of the United States, in behalf of this Commonwealth, informing him that the subjects of his Britannic Majesty have made, and still continue to make, encroachments on the eastern boundary of this Commonwealth, in the opinion of the Legislature contrary to the treaty of peace; and that his excellency be requested to forward such documents as may be necessary to substantiate the facts." Thus Massachusetts called on the Government of the United State to protect them in the possession of their territory.

The doubts which had arisen extended no further than to what river was intended by the river St. Croix in the treaty of 1783, the treaty only describing it by its namen; or could they, for when that was settled, the rule was clearly and distinctly given for finding the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. That is clearly implied in the first part of the fifth article of the treaty of 1794, for it says: "Whereas doubts have arisen what river was truly intended under the name of the river St. Croix, mentioned in the said treaty of peace, and forming a part of the boundary therein described, that question shall be referred to the final decision of Commissioners." The same article made it the duty of the Commissioners, "by a declaration under their hands and seals, to decide what river was the river St. Croix intended by the treaty, and further to describe the river, and to particularize the latitude and longitude of its mouth and its source." If any other doubts could have existed, or if the residue of the line could not have been ascertained by a survey, or if it had not been considered that ascertaining the river St. Croix settled the whole dispute, and if such were not the convictions of the contracting parties, it is not unreasonable to suppose that further provisions would have been introduced into the treaty.

It was contended by the agent of the United States, before the Commissioners, that the river Magaguadavic was the river St. Croix truly intended by the treaty of 1783, and he founded his claims and argument on many depositions of the natives, and of the persons who first settled in that part of the country, on the examination and reports of agents on the letters and testimony of several other persons and on sundry maps.

It was contended by the agent for his Britanic Majesty that the river Scoudiac was the river St. Croix truly intended by the treaty of 1783, and he founded his argument on the grant to Sir William Alexander, Les Carbot and Champlain's histories of the voyages of De Monts, and their description of the country, the commissions to Governors of Nova Scotia from 1719 to 1771, the proclamation of 1763, and two acts of Parliament of the 14th of George III, and sundry maps* and depositions. His argument, and the facts and documents upon which he founded it, clearly admits and demonstrates that the only uncertainty was as to what river was intended by the river St. Croix, and that from the source of the river which the Commissioners should decide and designate according to the treaty of 1794, the eastern boundary line of the United States and the western boundary of the province of Nova Scotia must commence and continue due north to the highlands, to wit, the highlands between the river St. Lawrence and the Restigouche or the St. John, according as the source should be fixed further east or further west. He expressly admits that the line due north from the St. Croix will, in any event, cross the river St. John to the highlands between that and the river St. Lawrence, to wit, the lands which divide the streams which flow into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic.†

The discussion was closed in 1798, and the time had not then arrived when, from "cupidity," or a desire to establish a line from which they could attack the United States in the rear, while their Navy should attack them on the seaboard, when they were determined to acquire, by effrontery or sophistry, the territory which they had sought in vain as a cession.

The Commissioners, on the 25th of October, 1798, made the declaration, under their hands and seals, deciding what, and describing the river also which was truly intended by the river St. Croix in the treaty of 1783.‡ Prior, however, to their making their final declaration, they had agreed, and were about making it the final declaration, that the river Schoodic, from its mouth at Joes Point to the lake Genesagranagum-sis, now called the Round lake, being the lowest of the western Schoodic lakes, was the river St. Croix of the treaty; which declaration they did not make, but by the agreement or consent of the agents of the United States and Great Britain and the advice of the British minister.§ They adopted the branch called the Cheputnetecook to its source as a part of the river which they were to decide and designate. If the British Government gained no advantage in the decision of the Commissioners, as, from the evidence submitted, the Commissioners might well have decided that the Magaguadavic was the river St. Croix intended by the treaty, they did, in fact, gain a most decided and important advantage in the adoption of the source of the Cheputnetecook, instead of the source of the other branch of the Schoodic river, where it issues from the lake Genesagranagum-sis, being the first lake on the western branch of the Schoodic, above its junction with the Cheputnetecook. By an inspection of the map it will appear that the British have gained a tract of land, by a change of the declaration of the Commissioners as to the source of the river St. Croix, of more than one hundred and forty miles in length by more than ten miles in breadth. These facts are not named because there is any disposition on our part to violate the good faith pledged in the treaty and the decision which was thus amicably made. The British, if they be, as they declare themselves to be, "a great, honorable, and magnanimous nation," ought equally to abide the decision and its consequences in good faith, more especially as they gained so much by the result. Here every real doubt or difficulty of any importance was settled and removed, and nothing remained but to run and mark the line and erect its monuments. Trifling differences in surveying the line might occur, arising from the variation of the needle, and from the peculiar situation of the land on the line of the Government of Quebec at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, one of which would tend to change the longitude and the other the latitude of the angle possibly a mile, but not in any instance to a distance of any importance to either Government.* Some trifling differences might also arise in surveying the line between the Government of Quebec and Massachusetts in running the line southwesterly from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, as to the precise points which divide the waters and the lines which should connect those points; but all such differences are within a very narrow compass. That the only subject of doubt or difficulty of any importance was what river was truly intended by the river St. Croix is not only conceded by the treaty of 1794, but is demonstrated by the documentary evidence produced by the agent of his Britannic Majesty, to wit: the patents, charters, proclamations, and acts of Parliament, and his arguments founded upon these documents; his arguments being, in fact, founded upon this plain and simple proposition, that the lines described by the treaty of 1783 were, and were intended to be, the lines which had before been estsblished between the province of Massachusetts Bay on the one hand, and the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia on the other.*

When the subject is again recurred to by the respective Governments it is not treated as a subject involving anything more than possible difficulties of trifling importance. Hence, in a convention between his Britannic Majesty and the United States, which was dated the 12th day of May, 1803, but which was not ratified by the United States, instead of reciting that whereas doubts have arisen, &c., as in the treaty of 1794, says: "Whereas it has become expedient that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, mentioned and described in the treaty of peace between his Majesty and the United States, should be ascertained and determined, and that the line between the source of the river St. Croix and the said northwest angle of Nova Scotia should be run and marked, according to the provisions of the said treaty of peace." And again, when the subject is recurred to, in a paper delivered to Lord Harrowby, September 5, 1804, the following language is used: "By the treaty of 1783, between the United States and Great Britain, the boundary between those States and Nova Scotia and Canada is fixed by a line which is to run along the highlands bounding the southern waters of the St. Lawrence." The same subject is once more recurred to by our ministers at the Court of St. James, in April, 1807, and the same language is used in a proposed article on the same subject as was used in the unratified convention of 1803, before recited.

The subject is not again recurred to between the respective Governments until 1814, in the correspondence which preceded, and in the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent. In order to arrive at a full and perfect knowledge of the facts, to the end that the just and true interpretation of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent may more fully appear, a particular examination of the correspondence which preceded it between the ministers of the respective Governments of the United States and Great Britain, connected with the great chain of evidence of title, and implied, and direct, and positive concessions of the British is deemed important. The correspondence touching the subject in discussion is as follows:

In the protocol made by the American Commissioners of the first two conferences held with the British Commissioners, the third point presented by the Commissioners on the part of the British as subjects of discussion is, "the revision of the boundary line between the territories of the United States and those of Great Britain adjoining them in North America."†

In the protocol of conference of August 8, 1814, among the subjects stated for discussion by the British Commissioners, the third is, "a revision of the boundary line between the British and American territories, with a view to prevent future uncertainty and dispute."‡

In a letter dated Ghent, August 12, 1814, from the American Commissioners to the Secretary of State,§ the British Commissioners stated three subjects as those upon which it appeared to them that the discussions would be likely to turn, and on which they were instructed. The third subject stated is, "a revision of the boundary line between the United States and the adjacent British colonies." With respect to this point they expressly disclaimed any intention on the part of their Government to acquire an increase of territory, and represented the proposed revision as intended merely for the purpose of preventing uncertainty and dispute. In a letter dated Ghent, August 19, 1814, from the American Commissioners to the Secretary of State, the third subject stated by the British Commissioners is, "a direct communication from Halifax and the province of New Brunswick to Quebec to be secured to Great Britain. In answer to our question, in what manner this was to be effected, we were told that it must be done by a cession to Great Britain of that portion of the district of Maine (in the State of Massachusetts) which intervenes between New Brunswick and Quebec, and prevents their direct communication."‖

In a note of the British Commissioners, dated Ghent, August 19, 1814, they say: "As they are desirous of stating every point in connexion with the subject which may reasonably influence the decision of the American plenipotentiaries in the exercise of their discretion, they avail themselves of this opportunity to repeat, what they have already stated, that Great Britain desires the revision of the frontier between her North American dominions and those of the United States, not with any view to an acquisition of territory as such, but for the purpose of securing her possessions, and preventing future disputes."¶

Then follows a proposition that the military possession of the lakes shall be left in the hands of the British; then the note proceeds, "if this can be adjusted, there will then remain for discussion the arrangement of the northwestern boundary between Lake Superior and the Mississippi, the free navigation of that river, and such a VARIATION of the line of frontier as may secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax."

In a letter dated Ghent, August 24, 1814, from the American to the British Commissioners, they say: "The undersigned further perceive that, under the alleged purpose of opening a direct communication between two of the British provinces in America, the British Government require a cession of territory forming a part of one of the States of the American Union, and that they propose, without purpose specifically alleged, to draw the boundary line westward, not from the Lake of the Woods, as it now is, but from Lake Superior. It must be perfectly immaterial to the United States whether the object of the British Government in demanding the dismemberment of the United States is to acquire territory as such, or for purposes less liable, in the eyes of the world, to be ascribed to the desire of aggrandizement. Whatever the motive may be, and with whatever consistency views of conquest may be disclaimed while demanding for herself or for the Indians a cession of territory more extensive than the whole island of Great Britain, the duty marked out for the undersigned is the same. They have no authority to cede any part of the territory of the United States, and to no stipulation to that effect will they subscribe."*

In a letter dated Ghent, September 4, 1814, from the British to the American Commissioners, they say: "With respect to the boundary of the district of Maine, and that of the northwestern frontier of the United States, the undersigned were not prepared to anticipate the objections contained in the note of the American plenipotentiaries, that they were instructed to treat for the revision of their boundary lines, with the statement which they have subsequently made, that they had no authority to cede any part, however insignificant, of the territories of the United States, although the proposal left it open for them to demand an equivalent for such cession in territory or otherwise.

"The American plenipotentiaries must be aware that the boundary of the district of Maine has never been correctly ascertained; that the one asserted at present by the American Government, by which the direct communication between Halifax and Quebec becomes interrupted, was not in contemplation of the British plenipotentiaries who concluded the treaty of 1783, and that the greater part of the territory in question is actually unoccupied. The undersigned are persuaded that an arrangement on this point might be easily made, if entered into with the spirit of conciliation, without any prejudice to the interests of the district in question. As the necessity for fixing some boundary for the northwestern frontier has been mutually acknowledged, a proposal for a discussion on that subject cannot be considered as a demand for a cession of territory, unless the United States are prepared to assert there is no limit to the territories in that direction, and that, availing themselves of the geographical error upon which that part of the treaty of 1783 was founded, they will acknowledge no boundary whatever, then, unquestionably, any proposition to fix one, be it what it may, must be considered as demanding a large cession of territory from the United States."*

In a letter dated Ghent, September 9, 1814, from the American to the British Commissioners, the American Commissioners say: "With regard to the cession of a part of the district of Maine, as to which the British plenipotentiaries are unable to reconcile the objections made by the undersigned with their previous declarations, they have the honor to observe that, at the conference of the 8th ultimo, the British plenipotentiaries stated, as one of the subjects suitable for discussion, a revision of the boundary line between the British and American territories, with a view to prevent uncertainty and dispute; and that it was on the point thus stated that the undersigned declared that they were provided with instructions from their Government; a declaration which did not imply that they were instructed to make any cession of territory in any quarter, or to agree to a revision of the line, or to any exchange of territory where no uncertainty or dispute existed.

"The undersigned perceive no uncertainty or matter of doubt in the treaty of 1783 with respect to that part of the boundary of the district of Maine which would be affected by the proposal of Great Britain on that subject. They never have understood that the British plenipotentiaries who signed that treaty had contemplated a boundary different from that fixed by the treaty, and which requires nothing more, in order to be definitely ascertained, than to be surveyed in conformity with its provisions. This subject not having been a matter of uncertainty or dispute, the undersigned are not instructed upon it, and they can have no authority to cede any part of the State of Massachusetts, even for what the British Government might consider a fair equivalent.†"

In a letter dated Ghent, September 19, 1814, from the British to the American Commissioners, they say: "With respect to the boundary of the district of Maine, the undersigned observe, with regret, that although the American plenipotentiaries have acknowledged themselves to be instructed to discuss a revision of the boundary line with a view to prevent uncertainty and dispute, yet, by assuming an exclusive right at once to decide what is or is not a subject of uncertainty and dispute, they have rendered their powers nugatory or inadmissibly partial in their operation."‡

In a letter dated Ghent, September 26, 1814, from the American to the British Commissioners, they say: "The undersigned are far from assuming the exclusive right to decide what is or what is not a subject of uncertainty or dispute with regard to the boundary of the district of Maine. But until the British plenipotentiaries shall have shown in what respect the part of that boundary which would be affected by their proposal is such a subject, the undersigned may be permitted to assert that it is not."

The treaty of 1783, described the boundary as "a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the Bay of Fundy, to its source, and from its source, directly north, to the highlands which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence, and thence along the said highlands to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river." "Doubts having arisen as to the St. Croix designated in the treaty of 1783, a provision was made in that of 1794 for ascertaining it; and it may be fairly inferred, from the limitation of the article to that sole object, that, even in the judgment of Great Britain, no other subject of controversy existed in relation to the extension of the boundary line from the source of that river. That river and its source having been accordingly ascertained, the undersigned are prepared to propose the appointment of Commissioners by the two Governments to extend the line to the highlands, conformably to the treaty of 1783. The proposal, however, of the British plenipotentiaries was not to ascertain, but to vary those lines in such a manner as to secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax, an alteration which could not be effected without a cession by the United States to Great Britain of all that portion of the State of Massachusetts intervening between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec, although unquestionably included within the boundary lines fixed by that treaty. Whether it was contemplated on the part of Great Britain to obtain a cession with or without an equivalent, in frontier or otherwise, the undersigned, in stating that they were not instructed or authorized to treat on the subject of cession, have not declined to discuss any matter of uncertainty or dispute which the British plenipotentiaries may point out to exist, respecting the boundaries in that or any other quarter, and are therefore not liable to the imputation of having rendered their powers on the subject nugatory or inadmissibly partial in their operation."*

In a letter dated Ghent, October 8, 1814, from the British to the American Commissioners, they say: "The British Government never required that all that portion of Massachusetts intervening between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec should be ceded to Great Britain, but only that small portion of unsettled country which interrupts the communication between Halifax and Quebec, (there being much doubt whether it does not already belong to Great Britain.")† In the letter dated Ghent, October 21, 1814, from the British to the American Commissioners, they say: "On the question of boundary between the dominions of his Majesty and those of the United States, the undersigned are led to expect, from the discussion which this subject has already undergone, that the northwestern boundary, from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, (the intended arrangement of 1803,) will be admitted without objection.

"In regard to other boundaries, the American plenipotentiaries, in their note of August 24, appeared in some measure to object to the proposition then made by the undersigned as not being on the basis of uti possidetis. The undersigned are willing to treat on that basis, subject to such modifications as mutual convenience may be found to require; and they trust that the American plenipotentiaries will show, by their ready acceptance of this basis, that they duly appreciate the moderation of his Majesty's Government, in so far consulting the honor and fair pretensions of the United States, as, in the relative situation of the two countries, to authorize such a proposition."‡

In a letter dated Ghent, October 24, 1814, from the American to the British Commissioners, they say: "Amongst the general observations which the undersigned, in their note of August 24, made on the propositions then brought forward on the part of the British Government, they remarked that those propositions were neither founded on the basis of uti possidetis nor that of status ante bellum. But so far were they from suggesting the uti possidetis as the basis on which they were disposed to treat, that in the same note they expressly stated that they had been instructed to conclude a peace on the principle of both parties restoring whatever territory they might have taken. The undersigned also declared in that note that they had no authority to cede any part of the territory of the United States, and that to no stipulation to that effect would they subscribe; and in the note of September 9, after having shown that the basis of uti possidetis, such as it was known to exist at the commencement of the negotiation, gave no claim to his Britannic Majesty to cessions of territory founded upon the right of conquest, they added, that even if the chances of war should give to the British arms a momentary possession of other parts of the territory of the United States, such events would not alter their views with regard to the terms of peace to which they would give their consent.

"The undersigned can only now repeat those declarations, and decline treating upon the basis of uti possidetis, or upon any other principle involving a cession of any part of the territory of the United States; as they have uniformly stated, they can only treat upon the principle of a mutual restoration of whatever territory may have been taken by either party. From this principle they cannot recede; and the undersigned, after the repeated declarations of the British plenipotentiaries that Great Britain had no view to the acquisition of territory in this negotiation, deem it necessary to add that the utility of its continuance depends on their adherence to this principle."§

In a letter dated Ghent, October 25, 1814, from the American Commissioners to the Secretary of State, they, after stating that an article had been reduced to writing securing merely an Indian pacification, had been agreed to be accepted, subject to the ratification or rejection of the Government of the United States, say: "But you will perceive that our request for the exchange of a project of a treaty has been eluded, and that in their last note the British plenipotentiaries have advanced a demand, not only new and inadmissible, but totally incompatible with their uniform previous declarations that Great Britain had no view in this negotiation to any acquisition of territory. It will be perceived that this new pretension was brought forward immediately after the accounts had been received that a British force had taken possession of all that part of the State of Massachusetts situated east of Penobscot river."‖

It having been shown in the first part of this report what the lines between Massachusetts and Nova Scotia, and Massachusetts and the province of Quebec, as formed and established by the Government, were prior to the provisional treaty and the definitive treaty of peace of 1783; and the investigation which took place, and the care and diligence with which the subject was examined by the Commissioners of both Governments and the Cabinet of Great Britain, and that it was the intention of both Governments to adopt the lines above mentioned as a part of the boundary of the United States; and that the treaty itself, in describing the boundary, contains almost the precise language which the British had often used in relation to the same lines; it having also been shown that the only difficulty in relation to the line arose from the uncertainty as to what river was truly intended by the river St. Croix, and which uncertainty arose from facts and circumstances which existed long before, and at the time of concluding the treaties, and which were not removed by the treaty, in consequence of the river St. Croix not being designated with any more particularity than it was before in the patents, charters, acts of Parliament, and documents, in which it had been mentioned; and also that in the discussions on the subject between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain it had been admitted, more especially by the agent for the latter, that let the Commissioners designate what river they would as the river St. Croix trulyintendedby the treaty of peace, from the source of that river the line run due north to the highlands, the southern line of the Government of Quebec, and the northern line of Massachusetts and the province of Nova Scotia; and, in any event, even if they adopted the most western point, which he described as the head of the river St. Croix, the line running north must cross the river St. John to the highlands dividing the waters which fall into that river from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence.¶

It also having been further shown that, since 1798, when the river St. Croix was designated by the Commissioners under the treaty of 1794, from all the correspondence and treaties which had been formed or proposed to be formed by the Commissioners of the two Governments, the right of the United States had not been considered any way doubtful, and the whole object of the arrangements thus attempted to be made had been limited to surveying and marking the line.

With a recurrence to these facts and circumstances, a more particular attention to the correspondence which preceded the treaty of Ghent, which is hereinbefore quoted, to the end that the true intent and meaning of the contracting parties in the fifth article of that treaty may be more clearly ascertained and better understood, is not deemed unimportant.

The British Commissioners ask a revision of the boundary line between the United States and the adjacent British colonies, disclaiming expressly, at the same time, any disposition to acquire an increase of territory, and limiting their proposition to the simple fact of so ascertaining the line as to prevent uncertainty and dispute. Such was their first proposition; but as the conferences progressed, they in some measure varied their proposition, and instead of asking simply a revision of the line, to prevent uncertainty and dispute, they ask a direct communication from Halifax and the province of New Brunswick to Quebec; and when they are requested to explain, explicitly declare that it must be done by a cession of that portion of the district of Maine which intervenes between New Brunswick and Quebec and prevents a direct communication.

Here they clearly and distinctly ask the territory as a cession, thereby conceding the title is not in them, which the subordinate agents, since appointed, have had the ingenuity to claim as a right. The American Commissioners most clearly and explicitly deny any authority on their part to cede any portion of the territory asked of them, whether to secure the right of passage between their different provinces or otherwise, and the denial is repeated as often as the subject recurs in the conferences or correspondence.

The British Commissioners, in giving a construction to their own proposition for securing a direct communication between New Brunswick and Quebec, say: "Their proposal left it open to the American Commissioners to demand an equivalent for such cession in territory or otherwise." Here our right is again conceded in language which admits no doubt, for the supposition that the British would consent to purchase of us that territory to which they had title is absurd and preposterous. The British are too vigilant in their negotiations to overlook their claims, whether well or ill founded. They are not generous beyond what their interests dictates, nor are they liable to the imputation of undue or disinterested generosity in their negotiations.

The American ministers most explicitly stated that they were not instructed to agree to any revision of the line where no uncertainty or dispute existed; and that they could perceive no uncertainty or matter of doubt in the treaty of 1783, with regard to that part of the boundary of the district of Maine, which would be affected by the proposal of Great Britain on the subject; that they never understood that the British plenipotentiaries who signed that treaty had contemplated a boundary different from that fixed by the treaty, and which requires nothing more, in order to be definitively ascertained, than to be surveyed in conformity with its provisions. The subject not having been a matter of uncertainty or dispute, they were not instructed upon it, and had no authority to cede any part of the State of Massachusetts, even for what the British might consider a fair equivalent.

To which the British ministers replied, that although the American Commissioners acknowledged themselves to be instructed to discuss the revision of the boundary line, yet, by assuming to decide for themselves what was or what was not a subject of uncertainty or dispute, they had rendered their powers nugatory or inadmissibly partial.

The American Commissioners having stated their construction of the treaty of 1783, as it applied to the line between Maine and the provinces of Nova Scotia and Canada, say that they have not pretended to assume anything, but shall persevere in their opinions until the British Commissioners should point out in what respect the part of the boundary which would be affected by their proposal is such a subject of uncertainty or dispute. That all the doubts which could have ever existed in relation to the line were settled under the treaty of 1794, and were prepared to propose the appointment of Commissioners to extend the lines to the highlands in conformity to the treaty of 1783. That the proposition of the British was to vary those lines, by obtaining a cession of the territory between New Brunswick and Quebec, although that territory was unquestionably included within the boundary lines fixed by the treaty.

Although the subject is again thus clearly pressed upon the consideration of the British Commissioners, and they are called upon to point out any uncertainty or dispute, or cause of uncertainty or dispute in relation to the boundary, with a perfect understanding that their acquiescence would be taken as the admission of the fact, to wit, that there was no uncertainty or dispute as to the boundary line; they pointed out no uncertainty, but contented themselves by saying, the "British Government never required that all that portion of Massachusetts which intervenes between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec should be ceded to Great Britain, but only that small portion of territory which interrupts the communication between Halifax and Quebec, (there being much doubt whether it does not already belong to Great Britain.") Here no uncertainty or dispute is pointed out; they do not once say the line stops at Mars Hill, or any other point, but admit that it does not, by invariably asking the territory, or a communication between New Brunswick and Quebec, or Halifax and Quebec, as a cession. Instead of meeting the proposition of the American Commissioners in the frankness and candor with which it was made, they do no more than superadd a doubt, which the whole correspondence shows they did not believe, perhaps with a glimmering hope that the British Government might find some daring agent who would have the hardihood to claim, and by ingenious sophistry endeavor to maintain, as a right, that which, from their convictions of right and justice, they requested only as a cession; some one who would not be restrained by that highminded and honorable course which ought ever to be preserved to maintain the relations of peace and harmony between nations, but would sacrifice every consideration of that kind to acquire a temporary advantage, regardless of its future results.

After the British had taken military possession of Castine, and claimed from that circumstance the military possession of the territory of the State of Maine, east of Penobscot river, and having altogether failed, even in the prospect of obtaining any part of the State of Maine by cession, they change their proposition, and, to effect the same object, proposed the principle of uti possidetis as the basis, subject to such modifications as mutual convenience may be found to require. To this proposition the American Commissioners promptly and unequivocally, as they had done on all other occasions, refused treating "on the principle of uti possidetis, or upon any other principle involving a cession of any part of the territory of the United States."

Can it for a moment be supposed, that when the British Commissioners so often requested the territory as a cession, and expressed a disposition to give an equivalent if it would be received, and when they were as often and peremptorily denied on the ground of total want of authority to cede, that it was the intention of the Commissioners to do anything more than to provide for the survey and marking of the lines, and to guard against any possible difficulties of a minor character, such as the variation of the needle, or the precise spot where the corner, to wit, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, should be fixed, on the range of highlands, limiting the sources of those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, or some other possible difficulties of a similar character; none of which would vary the lines materially, or in any important degree, to either Government. When the whole is fairly and candidly examined, such must be the conclusion. No other conclusion can be made, unless it be on the ground that the American Commissioners undertook to exercise a power which they so often and explicitly declared to the British they did not possess; and if they did exercise a power which they did not possess, their acts were not obligatory upon the Government.

A careful examination of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent does not involve a conclusion that the Commissioners departed from the powers given them and their repeated and reiterated declarations. The part of the article relating to the point under discussion is as follows: "Whereas neither that point of the highlands lying due north from the source of the river St. Croix, and designated in a former treaty of peace between the two Powers as the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, nor the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, has yet been ascertained; and whereas that part of the boundary line between the dominions of the two Powers, which extends from the source of the river St. Croix, directly north, to the abovementioned northwest angle of Nova Scotia; thence, along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence, down along the middle of that river, to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence, by a line due west on said latitude, until it strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraguy, has not yet been surveyed: it is agreed that, for these several purposes, two Commissioners shall be appointed, sworn, and authorized to act exactly in the manner directed, with respect to those mentioned in the next preceding article, unless otherwise specified in the present article. The said Commissioners shall have power to ascertain and determine the points above mentioned, in conformity with the provisions of the said treaty of peace of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, and shall cause the boundary aforesaid to be surveyed and marked according to the said provisions. The said Commissioners shall make a map of said boundary, and annex it to a declaration under their hands and seals, certifying it to be a true map of said boundary, and particularizing the latitude of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and of the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, and of such other points of said boundary as they may deem proper."

Here the question may be repeated: Has Nova Scotia two northwest angles, or an ideal one placed where the "cupidity" or the interested views of either party may dictate; or is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia the northwest angle of Nova Scotia as established by the Crown and Government of Great Britain, adopted by the treaty of 1783, and recognized in the discussions by the agents under the fifth article of the treaty of 1794, and also recognized by all subsequent discussions between the United States and Great Britain? It cannot be reasonably supposed that the Commissioners had any other angle in view, especially as the article seems to recognize and place the location of the angle on the construction of the treaty of 1783, explained as it was by the treaty of 1794, and the discussions under that treaty. It cannot be supposed that the British Commissioners expected to gain that which they had requested as a cession, or the American Commissioners expected to lose anything which they had denied, from the language used and references made in the article above quoted; but it is to be supposed that both parties, in agreeing to the article, limited to the description in the treaty of 1783, as the same had been defined, and the rights of the parties under it had been explained by direct and implied acknowledgments of its true construction, from the time of its adoption, intended simply to provide for the survey and marking of the line. No other conclusion can follow, unless it be supposed that the highminded and honorable men who negotiated the treaty did, on the one part, resort to the most despicable chicanery, and the other to a gross and palpable violation of the power and authority to them delegated; neither of which can be true. It follows, then, that to fulfil this article nothing more was required than to survey and mark the lines, and that the difficulties which could arise, if any, were of minor consequence, not involving in any event but a trifling extent of territory, and of little importance to either Government, and by no means involving the title to the intervening territory between New Brunswick and Quebec, which had often been sought as a cession to secure a direct communication, and as often denied.

If the Agents and Commissioners of the two Governments have departed from this plain and natural interpretation of the treaty, they must have erred from causes which are creditable to neither. If a line were to be established contrary to this obvious construction, it is to be foreseen that the party thus deprived of its rights would imbibe a spirit not to be subdued, and which would seek its redress whenever it could at any sacrifice. If the British colonists were to be governed by their true interests, they would not endeavor to acquire anything by construction, against the true and common sense interpretation of all the treaties, because in that they would discover the germs of eternal hostility.

If, in the prosecution of the duties under this article, the Agent of the United States has misconstrued and extended its application beyond its plain and obvious construction, or had not a clear and distinct view of the meaning of the terms "highlands which divide the waters," in the treaty of 1783, or was bewildered by mountains, or mountain ranges, when even mole hills answer the description precisely, if they do "divide the waters which flow into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic;" and if the British agent, in the prosecution of his duties under the same article, has pretended that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is at Mars Hill, and that the line of the United States runs southwestwardly from that point, when the territory extending north, northwest, west, and southwestwardly, is claimed as a part of the ancient province of Nova Scotia, thereby destroying the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, which had been established by a series of acts of the British Government, and acknowledged by them to this time, and substituting therefor a southwest angle; and if from the course, so absurd and preposterous in itself, ingenuity should obtain a temporary triumph over right, a question will arise, growing out of the nature of and the organization of the State and National Governments, has the United States any constitutional authority to cede any part of an independent sovereignty composing one of its members?

The Commissioners of the United States who negotiated the treaty of Ghent uniformly denied the right of cession; but whether they founded their denial on the want of authority in the instructions given them, or upon the Constitution of the United States, is not perfectly clear. If upon the first, they adopted a right course; if upon the last, their course was also right; and there must be perfect harmony of opinion, because either principle preserves the rights of the individual States. On this subject it may be important to consider the object and nature of the association of the States which led to the adoption of the Constitution.

The General Government, which had originated in the oppression of Great Britain, and had been sustained by the pressure of an external enemy, and had carried the country through the Revolution, when peace was restored, was found to be too feeble for any valuable purpose to the States. Its inherent defects had, by a few years' experience, been shown, and the States, for want of general union, were in danger of degenerating and falling into anarchy, and of becoming a prey to each other or any foreign nation. The independent sovereignties saw the necessity of associating anew, which they did, and in that association mutually delegated limited parts of their sovereign power for the greater security of those retained.

As in the first confederation mutual defence and protection was a primary object, so it was in the last confederation; a mutual protection, not limited to the personal right of individuals, but extended to the full and free exercise of the whole sovereign power, not delegated to the extent of the territorial jurisdiction of the State. With this view of the object of the confederation, composed as it was of independent sovereignties, it cannot be supposed that they ever intended to give to the General Government any power by which they might be destroyed and consolidated, or by which even their rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction might be abridged. It has never been pretended that Congress has the power of taking from one State and giving to another, or to incorporate new States within the limits of old ones; nor has it ever claimed to exercise such a power. The most it has ever done, or has a constitutional right to do, has been to give its consent to the compact made between the parties immediately interested, and to admit the new State into the Union.

If Congress do possess the power of ceding any portion of an independent State, they possess a power to break down the State sovereignties by which they were created, and at their pleasure to produce a consolidation of those sovereignties—a power which was never delegated or intended. If, therefore, the Congress of the United States attempt to exercise such a power, the State thus deprived of or limited in its rights of sovereignty must submit or enforce its rights.

The rights of protection in the exercise of the sovereign power of the State are equal, whether it is an exterior or interior State, and Congress can have no more constitutional right to take from Maine and cede to New Brunswick, than they have to take from Virginia a part of her territory and cede it to North Carolina. Congress has not claimed to exercise such a power, for the construction of the treaty of Ghent, hereinbefore given, does not involve such a power, unless from a misconstruction of its provisions, limiting as it does the whole power of the commission to the surveying and marking of the lines and erecting its monuments, according to the treaty of 1783.

But it will at once be seen, if the Government of the United States yield to the misconstructions of the agents, so far as to be endangered by the result, that by the misconstructions of the one and the ingenuity of the other, arising from a strong desire to acquire for his country the territory which had been so often but unsuccessfully sought as a cession, and by its final result the lines of the State of Maine are materially changed, she will be as much dispossessed of her territory and sovereignty as she would have been by a direct exercise of the power of cession. The one mode, equally with the other, involves an assumption of power which was never delegated. If such an unfortunate occurrence ever arises, from any cause, the duty which the State owes herself and her sister Republics is plain.

While it is the duty as well as the interest of individuals, as well as States, to yield a peaceable and quiet obedience to every exercise of constitutional power on the part of the Government of the United States, it is equally their duty and their interest to resist all encroachments on the rights which they have reserved. If a part of the State of Maine should be surrendered by the Government of the United States, either by a direct or indirect exercise of the power of cession, it will then be a duty which she owes herself to consider whether she has, by such an invasion of her rights, lost her right of sovereignty and jurisdiction. Such an exercise of power can have no obligatory force; and unless Maine quietly and peaceably submits, it will be a duty of the States, the duty imposed by the Federal Government, to afford her aid and protection, and to aid her in regaining her rights.

From the provisional treaty of peace, in 1782, to the treaty of Ghent, for a period of more than thirty-two years, the British always conceded our title and our rights whenever the subject was presented in the discussions between them and the United States. Even in the argument of the British agent, under the fourth article of the treaty of Ghent, delivered before the Commissioners in September, 1817, after the board, under the fifth article of the same treaty, and the agents had made their agreement for a survey, he unequivocally admits and shows our title. He says: "That the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, mentioned in the treaty as the commencing point in the boundary of the United States, is the northwest angle of the said province of Nova Scotia, designated in the grant to Sir William Alexander in 1621, subject only to such alterations as was occasioned by the erection of the province of Quebec, 1763."

Since the treaty of Ghent, and the entire failure on the part of the British to obtain the territory by cession or purchase, and since September, 1817, they have pretended to claim it as a right, and do, in fact, pretend to claim a much greater extent than they had ever sought by way of cession, by extending the claim much further south and west than is necessary to secure a communication between Halifax and Quebec.

The idea of claim, as they at present make it, probably originated with some of their subjects in the provinces, who, having a great desire to hold the country, endeavored to stimulate the Government of Great Britain that she might, by some means, be induced to obtain it. In order to show the origin as well as the substance of their claim as they now make it, the following extract is made from a work published a little before the organization of the commission under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, entitled "A Topographical Description of the Province of Lower Canada, with remarks upon Upper Canada, and on the relative connexion of both provinces with the United States of America. By Joseph Bouchette, Surveyor General of Lower Canada, Col. C. M." This work was dedicated to the present King, George IV, then Prince Regent, and was accompanied with splendid maps. Colonel Bouchette was attached to the commission under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, at the commencement, as principal surveyor on the part of the British.

He says: "The height of land on which the boundary is supposed to pass runs to the northeast, and divides the waters that fall into the St. Lawrence from those flowing into the Atlantic; and which height, after running some distance upon that course, sends off a branch to the eastward that separates the head of the Thames, falling into Lake Temiscouata and river St. John, and by that channel into the Bay of Fundy, from those that descend in a more direct course to the Atlantic.

"The main ridge, continuing its northeasterly direction, is intersected by an imaginary line prolonged in a course astronomically due north from the head of the river St. Croix, and which ridge is supposed to be the boundary between Lower Canada and the United States; at least such appears to be the way in which the treaty of 1783 is construed by the American Government, but which ought to be more fairly understood, as follows, to wit: That the astronomical line running north from the St. Croix should extend only to the first easterly ridge, and thence run westerly along the crest of the said ridge to the Connecticut, thereby equitably dividing the waters flowing into the St. Lawrence from those that empty into the Atlantic within the limits of the United States, and those that have their streams within the British province of New Brunswick. It is important, and must always have been in contemplation, that an uninterrupted communication and connexion should exist between all his Majesty's North American possessions; but by the manner in which the treaty is insisted upon by the opposite party, a space of more than eighty-five miles would be placed within the American limits, by which the British provinces would be completely secured; it would also prove the inconvenience of having the mail from England to Quebec carried over that distance of American territory, and which may be deemed either a matter of indulgence or complained of as an encroachment, according to the transfer of the times. Within this tract is also the Madawaska settlement, consisting of nearly two hundred families, all holding their grants from the British Government. England, at all times highminded and generous, never shrinks from the fulfilment of her engagements, even though, from the want of political acuteness in the persons employed, they may have been formed in a manner prejudicial to her interests. But at the same time she has a right to require that the interpretation of them should not be overstrained or twisted from the obvious meaning and intent by a grasping cupidity after a few miles of country, which could be of little advantage to the opposite party."

The above extract has been made because it shows the whole of the British claim as they have since made it, as well as the substance of all the arguments they have urged in its support. All which has since been done by them, whether in making surveys, collecting documents, or making arguments, for a period of more than five years, has not placed their pretensions in a stronger light. If subsequent occurrences have given their claim any additional plausibility, it can only be attributed to the agents having transgressed the authority given them by the treaty, and discussed a claim which was not submitted. Here it is wholly unnecessary to repeat the facts and documents herein before quoted or referred to; a mere recurrence to them, and placing them in opposition to the British argument, shows, to use no harsher term, its total absurdity.

The argument seems to be addressed to the pride of the British and vanity of the Americans. As it relates to the British, the argument has had its effect; but as it relates to the Americans, it has been a little too gross to deceive. If the discovery had been made more seasonably it might have acquired a temporary appearance of plausibility; but when the subject had come before Parliament, and had also been under discussion by the Commissioners and agents of the two Governments; and, last of all, when the British Commissioners had perseveringly sought the territory in every form as a cession from 1782 to 1814, a period of thirty-two years, the argument is not calculated to deceive, and ill accords with the character always "highminded and generous, and which never shrinks from the fulfilment of its engagements."

The territory, from all our researches, never has been claimed as a right by the British Government, or any of its Commissioners or agents, until 1817, after the commission under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent was organized; but, on the contrary, as has been before shown, the right has always been conceded to be in the United States. Now, their claim, stripped of its verbiage and translated into plain language, rests on this plain and simple proposition: The country lies between two of our provinces; it will be useful to us, not only by facilitating communication, but it is important also in a military point of view; we could not obtain it by cession, though we were willing to give an equivalent; but we want it, and we will have it.

The State of Massachusetts, considering her right of sovereignty and jurisdiction coextensive with her title, did not anticipate any disturbance or intrusion, and did not consider herself under any necessity of cultivating her whole territory, or of keeping up a military force for its protection; relying upon the good faith which had appeared to manifest itself on the part of the British in the negotiations and discussions between them and the United States, and presuming, also, that the British, whenever they were found to have crossed her lines, would disavow the act and restore the country, she had, from time to time, made grants of her unappropriated public lands, as the same were sought for public and private purposes. She early granted Mars Hill to some of the soldiers of the Revolution.

In September, 1806, Massachusetts conveyed two half townships—one to Deerfield and the other to Westfield Academies—lying west of the township of Mars Hill, pursuant to a survey and plan made in conformity with the provisions of a resolve which had passed some time before. In December, 1807, she conveyed one township lying on both sides of the Aroostook, and near the meridian line, from the source of the St. Croix, according to a selection, survey, and plan made under a resolve passed in March, 1806. In January, 1808, she conveyed ten thousand acres lying west of the aforesaid township, and on both sides of the Aroostook, pursuant to a survey and plan made under a resolve of March, 1806. Had the residue of territory been applied for she would have continued granting it, in large or small tracts, until she had granted the whole, provided the objects of the grants had met her approbation. Hence she not only exercised sovereign power coextensive with her title, but also individual acts of sovereignty, and to what extent she pleased.

The restrictive system adopted by the Government of the United States, commencing about this period, checked the general business of the country, and, at the same time, allayed the spirit of improvement and settlement, and entirely put a stop to speculations in wild lands; and there being no more applications for grants of wild lands, she had no occasion to make them. The war succeeded, which still further checked the progress of improvement and settlement, and several years were required to recover from the diversions occasioned by it. Hence, from a coincidence of circumstances, no grants were made.

Entertaining no suspicion that any claim would be made by the British or discussed by the agents inconsistent with everything which had transpired, and especially in all the correspondence which had preceded, and in the treaty of Ghent itself, she could have had no reason to presume that claims would be made and urged which could infringe her rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction. Hence she reposed in perfect confidence that the lines would be run and marked, and monuments erected, according to her title, as it had always been understood by her and conceded by the British, and therefore made no inquiries to ascertain the claims urged, or the progress of the commission. In 1819 she passed the act of separation between her and the district of Maine, which was approved by Congress the next session, and Maine was admitted into the Union as an independent State. By the act of separation, Massachusetts retained the fee simple of a moiety of the wild lands, but the residue, and the entire sovereignty and jurisdiction, was vested in Maine. Maine having thus become an independent State, and more than three years having elapsed after the organization of the commission under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, (a time more than sufficient to have performed all which was submitted,) and there being reports that the British agent was vigilant and the American remiss, and that surveys were going on in quarters wholly unanticipated, she of course became anxious, and had reason to fear the subject was taking a direction never in the contemplation of the Commissioners who negotiated or involved in the treaty itself. The Governor of the State noticed the subject in the first message, which was delivered June 2, 1820, to both branches of the Legislature. He says: "What progress has been made, under the fifth article of the British treaty, in settling the eastern boundary of the State against the province of New Brunswick, and the northern boundary against that of Lower Canada, I am unable to inform you. As this State and Massachusetts have so deep an interest in the settlement of these boundaries, there would seem to have been a propriety in the agent appointed on the part of the United States being taken from one of these two States. But, under existing circumstances, you will consider whether the interest of the State does not require from you the adoption of such arrangements as are best calculated to afford the present agent such information in relation to this important subject as the people in this State have it in their power to give."

The message was answered on the 12th of June, 1820, wherein it was, among other things, resolved, "That the Governor of this State be requested to transmit to the President of the United States a copy of the resolve, accompanied with such representations in relation to this subject as he shall think proper and best calculated to effect the object." The request was complied with by the Governor, who, in July, 1820, transmitted a copy of the resolve to the President, and, among other things, observed to him: "When it is considered that Massachusetts and Maine have the right of soil; that Maine has also a State jurisdiction; that the people here have not the honor of an acquaintance either with the Commissioner or agent, and have not been advised of any reason for the delay to the present time, it will not be considered a matter of surprise that their extreme solicitude should be such as to render desirable information on the subject so generally interesting."

"It is not unknown to the people of this State that the British agent has been very attentive to the business in which he has been engaged, and that he has caused the country near the lines to be examined and explored in the most particular manner, while it is not understood that comparatively anything has been done on the part of the American agent. With impressions such as these, the boundary being an extensive one, it would be highly satisfactory to the people of this State, should it comport with the views of the Executive of the United States, to designate a person to assist the present agent in his important duties, that the boundary may not only be more expeditiously, but more satisfactorily adjusted."

The substance of the reply which was made appeared in the next message of the Governor.

This year, in the exercise of their general powers of sovereignty and jurisdiction, the marshal of Maine, under a law of the United States, took the census of the inhabitants settled on the St. John river and its tributary streams west of the meridian line from the monument at the source of the Saint Croix, and the south line of the province of Quebec, or Lower Canada.

In the autumn of the year 1820 an agent was sent by the Governor and Council to explore the public lands upon the St. John and its branches west of the meridian line from the monument, which service he performed.

The Governor again, in his message which was delivered January 11, 1821, to both branches of the Legislature, called their attention to the subject of the preservation of the timber on the public lands, and, after enumerating several places as the scenes of depredations, says: "It appears that trespasses within our acknowledged territory, particularly on the rivers Aroostook, De Chute, Presquille, and Meduxnekeag, committed by persons residing in the British provinces, are very great. Accordingly, arrangements have lately been adopted with a view to prevent such predatory incursions in future."

He also states that he forwarded the resolve of the prior session of the Legislature to the President and Secretary, transmitted a copy of the same to the American Commissioners, who, in reply, "gave a reasonable ground of expectation that the final decision of the points in controversy respecting those lines would have been made in October last," and, from information obtained from other sources, adds: "All reasonable hope of a speedy adjustment seems therefore to have vanished."

The Governor, after having received information that British subjects were trespassing on the timber lands of Maine and Massachusetts, on the Aroostook, appointed Benjamin J. Porter, Esq., with the advice of Council, to proceed immediately to that place, and to notify the persons whom he should find trespassing on the timber lands aforesaid west of the line which had been run by order of the Commissioners appointed by the United States and Great Britain, from the monument at the source of the St. Croix to the line of the province of Lower Canada, that if they would pay a proper consideration for the timber that they had cut, and desist from any further depredation on that part of our territory, he was authorized to settle with them on those principles; but if they declined, he was directed to proceed to Houlton Plantation, and adopt the necessary measures, and obtain such assistance as, in his judgment, would be required to take the trespassers and their teams and bring them to Houlton Plantation, and there keep them until the Executive could be advised of the measures adopted.

The agent, thus appointed and instructed, proceeded to the Aroostook and found British subjects trespassing there, with whom he settled, and received also the assurances required that they would not return, and would desist from cutting the timber.

The efforts thus far made not having produced the intended results, the Legislature, January 16, 1822, passed a resolve requesting the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States to collect information touching the causes of the differences between the American and British Commissioners under the treaty of Ghent, respecting the boundary line between this State and the British provinces of Lower Canada and Nova Scotia, and the extent and nature of the claims set up by the said British Commissioners. The resolve was duly communicated. No progress was, however, made, and the object of the resolve was not answered. In February, 1822, an agent was appointed with full power to prevent trespassing upon the timber in the public lands on the Aroostook, Maduxnekeag and Presquilla rivers, and their branches west of the meridian line from the monument; and he entered immediately upon the duties of his agency, and visited the places required, and accomplished the objects of his appointment. The subject is again recurred to January 10, 1824, by the Governor in his message, which led to no specific act on the part of the Legislature. January 7, 1825, the Governor again calls the attention of the Legislature to the subject of the northeastern boundary, stating also that he had understood from respectable sources that depredations had been committed on our timber lands on the Aroostook and Madawaska, and other streams emptying into the St. John; and that unless energetic measures are speedily adopted on the part of the State, our valuable timber in that region will be soon destroyed; and that, from the representations, the depredations were committed by British subjects.

This led to an investigation as far as the limited means possessed by the Government of this State permitted, and a resolve passed January 24, 1825, among other things requesting the Governor of this State to correspond with the Governor of the province of New Brunswick, relative to the depredations which had been committed by British subjects on the timber on the public lands of this State, west of the boundary line between this State and the province of New Brunswick, as heretofore recognized, and to ascertain whether that Government had authorized any persons to cut timber upon these lands or to settle thereon.

The land agent of Maine was instructed, in conjunction with such person as should be designated by Massachusetts, or, if none should be appointed, without that agent, forthwith to take effectual measures to ascertain the extent of the depredations on the lands belonging to this State and Massachusetts, or on lands belonging to this State; by whom the same have been committed, and under what authority, if any, such depredations were committed.

The Governor was also requested to forward each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State a copy of the report of the committee on the part of the Governor's message relative to depredations on the public lands, and of the resolves, and also to request them to take the necessary measures to obtain an early adjustment of the northeastern boundary of this State.

The Governor enclosed and forwarded the same on the 25th of January, 1825. During the same session of the Legislature, February 22, 1825, they passed a resolve respecting the settlers on the St. John and Madawaska rivers: "Whereas there are a number of settlers on the undivided public lands on the St. John and Madawaska rivers, many of whom have resided thereon for more than thirty years; therefore, Resolved, That the land agent of this State, in conjunction with such agent as may be appointed for that purpose on the part of Massachusetts, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make and execute good and sufficient deeds, conveying to such settlers in actual possession, as aforesaid, their heirs and assigns, one hundred acres each of land by them possessed, to include the improvements on their respective lots, they paying the said agent, for the use of the State, five dollars each, and the expense of surveying the same."

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, June 11, 1825, did provide, by resolve, among other things: "Whereas there are a number of settlers on the St. John and Madawaska rivers, many of whom have resided there more than thirty years; therefore, Resolved, That the land agent of this Commonwealth, in conjunction with such agent as has been or may be appointed for that purpose on the part of the State of Maine, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and directed to make good and sufficient deeds, conveying to such settlers in actual possession, as aforesaid, their heirs and assigns, one hundred acres each of land by them possessed, to include their improvements on their respective lots, they paying to the said agent, for the use of this Commonwealth, five dollars each, and the expense of surveying the same."

The agents thus authorized did, in the autumn of that year, proceed up the St. John to the Madawaska settlement, and thence to the mouth of the Maryumpticook, and surveyed and conveyed two lots of land, on the 3d of October, to John Baker and James Bacon, citizens of this State. They had settled above the French neutrals on the St. John and its waters; and at the time when the settlements on the lots were commenced, there was no settlement within several miles of them. They also posted up notices, stating their authority, and proposing to give deeds, according to the resolves under which they acted.

This year Maine and Massachusetts, in continuing their surveys of the undivided lands, surveyed all which had not been previously done, and conveyed two ranges of townships on the meridian line, running north from the monument at the source of the St. Croix, and above Mars Hill, to a place within a few miles of the river St. John. The two grants of Massachusetts, made in December, 1807, to the town of Plymouth, and in January, 1808, to William Eaton, on the river Aroostook, according to surveys made in 1807, compose a part of the ranges.

In a letter bearing date May 23, 1825, from the British minister at Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States, in answer to his of the 27th of March preceding, complaining of the encroachments of the inhabitants of New Brunswick, committed upon lands of Maine and Massachusetts, in cutting and carrying away timber within the boundaries of those States, and the places where the trespasses were committed were also described in the accompanying papers to be on the Aroostook and Madawaska rivers.

The British minister, in reply states that he had made inquiries of Sir Howard Douglass, the Governor of New Brunswick, and had been assured by him that the charge, as far as the Government of the provinces was concerned, was unfounded, and that he should use his best endeavors to put a stop to practices in themselves so disgraceful. It was further stated by Sir Howard, "that in assuming the Government of New Brunswick, he found that licenses to cut timber, and other acts of sovereignty, had long been exercised on the part of Great Britain over certain tracts of land in which the Bistook" (Aroostook) "and Madawaska were included, heretofore well understood to belong to New Brunswick, but subsequently claimed by the Commissioners of the United States appointed to negotiate with the British Commissioners for adjusting the boundary line of the respective provinces; to these claims no disposition was ever shown on the part of Great Britain to accede."

It is not supposed that Sir Howard intended to misrepresent facts, because it would be entirely inconsistent with the honorable character which he is supposed to sustain; but, acquitted of that charge, his representations must be attributed to ignorance of the subject, or want of research into the premises. Compare the history of the negotiation of the provisional treaty of peace in 1782; the doings of the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of 1794; more especially the argument of the British agent, and all the correspondence which preceded the treaty of Ghent, wherein the British Commissioners so often and so repeatedly ask the country in which the Madawaska settlement is included as a cession, and are so often denied by the American Commissioners, on the ground that they possess no authority to make a cession, and no further comment is necessary to show the falsity of his representations.

It is further said by Sir Howard: "In fact, by a reference to documents in the possession of the British Colonial Department, it appears that the settlement at Madawaska, in the province of New Brunswick, was made under a grant from the Crown upwards of thirty years ago; so late as the year 1810 no claim had been advanced by the United States, although the settlement had been established at the time for upwards of twenty years, under a grant from the Government of New Brunswick, and had been constantly designated the Madawaska settlement.

Admitting the fact, as to the antiquity of the settlement, to be as stated, giving the utmost extent to both modes of expression, it commenced under grants about the year 1790, long after the treaty of 1783.

Unless the grants were within the province of Nova Scotia they were intrusions. That they were not within the province abundantly appears from all the documents before quoted in relation to the boundaries. No valid claim of national sovereignty can be based on such acts in the forum of honor, conscience, or law; and no jurisdiction can, with any semblance of propriety, be claimed beyond the actual possession. It cannot, without violating the acknowledged principles in such cases, be extended by construction. If such were the facts, and the settlements had been made as early as 1790; if the British considered that they had any claim to the territory on that account, it is extraordinary that they should have been entirely overlooked by the Government, its ministers and Commissioners, and never have been discovered until 1817, or since that time; more especially, when the treaty of 1794, and the discussions under the fifth article of it, wherein it was conceded that the line due north from the source of the St. Croix, wherever it should be established, crossed the St. John to the line of the Government of Quebec, and by a reference to the map it will at once be seen that, had the most westerly point been adopted which the British agent contended for, the Madawaska settlement is west of the meridian, and at all events within the United States. When, also, the subject of surveying the boundaries had been discussed on several occasions between that time and the treaty of Ghent, and when, also, during the whole discussion which led to the treaty of Ghent, that territory is sought as a cession, and with great perseverance, by a resort to every mode which circumstances or their own ingenuity suggested.

But the facts as stated are not admitted; the settlement at Madawaska did not succeed, but had preceded many years grants which Sir Howard states, and therefore cannot be said to be made under the grants. The settlement was made principally by French neutrals, whose ancestors had lived near the Bay of Fundy previous to the American Revolution. They, to avoid the British laws, moved up the river St. John to a place called St. Anns, now Fredericton. After the close of the war, when the British established a town and military post at that place, and circumscribed them in their quarters, stimulated by their repugnance to the British, and desirous of living under their own regulations, they pursued their course up the river, and established themselves at Madawaska, where they lived many years probably entirely unknown to the world. Some of their countrymen joined them from Canada. If the settlers or some of them now have grants from the province of New Brunswick, the reason for making such grants does not now appear. The intention of the Government can be inferred only from the facts disclosed; from which it most clearly follows that they did not, by the intrusion, consider themselves as extending their rights of property or jurisdiction, not having stated the fact for that purpose until long since the treaty of Ghent. If the fact had been relied on by them as giving any claim, the ministers who negotiated the treaty of Ghent, while they were endeavoring by every means in their power to obtain the territory in which the Madawaska settlement is situated by cession, would not have been guilty of the omission.

Sir Howard still further says: "With regard to the timber cut by British subjects on the river Bistook, (Aroostook,) the very circumstance of its having been seized by Mr. Porter, of the State of Maine, proves that the inhabitants of that State consider themselves as at full liberty to appropriate all the timber in that district to their own use. In truth, that territory is especially represented by the Senate of Maine as lying within the acknowledged boundaries of that State. Now, this is notoriously not the fact; the British Government contend that the northern boundary line of the United States, running from the source of the river St. Croix to the highlands, is terminated at Mars Hill, which lies at the southwest of the Bistook, (Aroostook;) at least, therefore, the British territory declared to be the undoubted property of the State of Maine is but a point in abeyance. Both parties claim, and it appears have exercised, an equal right over it."

That the British pretended any claim to the territory to the westward of the meridian line from the source of the St. Croix, and southerly of the line of the province of Quebec or Lower Canada, was totally unknown to the United States until long after the treaty of Ghent, and it seems to have been equally unknown to the British. The observation, "this was notoriously not the fact," can only apply to a period subsequent to the treaty; when it had been deemed proper by individuals and the subordinate agents of the British Government to acquire by some means the territory which they could not demand as a right. The above observation does not appear to be true, from anything which had transpired of a public character between the American and British Governments. Such pretended and unfounded claims could not have been and were not anticipated. But after all the pretensions, the claim and exercise of right he admits to be equal, which is extraordinary when the whole is taken into consideration and contrasted with the recent origin of and bold assumptions on which they are founded.

It has already been shown that Massachusetts has made several grants before 1808, some of which were on the Aroostook near the meridian line, from the monument at the source of the river St. Croix, and that she and Maine had, in addition to their general jurisdiction, exercised all necessary acts of particular jurisdiction. And the British subjects found there committing depredations on the timber by Mr. Porter were there as mere trespassers, not claiming any right or authority from any source. It was not until long after this period that any persons were there under licenses from the province of New Brunswick, which caused the mention of it in the Governor's message in January, 1825. The British claim, as they make it, is even void of plausibility; they ought not to have claimed the territory upon the Bistook (Aroostook) and upper part of the St. John and its tributary streams as a part of the ancient province of Nova Scotia; but they ought to have continued the line from Mars Hill eastward to the Bay of Chaleurs, and have insisted that that was the northern line; thereby yielding a part of Nova Scotia, and have left the upper part of the St. John and its tributaries, and the Restigouche river, in the province of Quebec or Lower Canada; and if by that means they had violated one of their favorite principles of exposition, to wit, that the province which has the mouth, ought also to have the sources of the river, still the whole would have been within the general sovereignty of Great Britain, one province only gaining more than the other lost. Yet, such a claim, though more plausible, by relieving them from the solecism of destroying the northwest angle, or rather converting the northwest angle of Nova Scotia into a southwest angle, which can only be arrived at by running first north for more than forty miles from the monument at the source of the river St. Croix, and then southwesterly for more than one hundred miles, would have been no better, nor would it be based on a more solid or substantial authority.

The British minister then observes: "The Governor of New Brunswick informs me he does not consider himself at liberty to alter, in any way, the existing state of things, as far as regards the district above mentioned, but he assures me that he will take especial care to keep well within the limits of the line of duty marked out for him; and, considering the shape which this question is now assuming, he will feel it imperative on him to apply immediately for still more precise instructions for guidance of his conduct in a matter of so much delicacy."

More notice has been taken of the foregoing letter than its importance otherwise demanded, on account of its being the first document of an official character in the archives of this State which goes to show the British claim as it had been made by their agent under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent.

The Secretary of State, November 25, 1825, wrote the Governor of this State, enclosing a copy of a note from the British minister to him, and a copy of a note from Sir Howard Douglass to the British minister. On the 25th of December, 1825, the Governor of this State transmitted to the Secretary of State of the United States a letter, with a copy of the resolve of this State, respecting the settlers on the St. John and the Madawaska rivers, under which the agent of the State acted; a copy of the resolve of the Legislature of Massachusetts respecting the same; also the report of the land agent of Maine, detailing particularly the transactions of the two agents under said resolves. From which report it appears that the land agents had pursued the authority given them by the resolves, and had not done some of the acts complained of by the British.

The subject of the northeastern boundary was again noticed by the Governor in his message to both branches of the Legislature, the 7th January, 1826, which was answered by the Legislature in a report on the 17th January, and a resolve on the 26th of January of the same year: "That the Governor, for the time being, be authorized and requested to take such measures as he may think expedient and effectual, to procure, for the use of the State, copies of all such maps, documents, publications, papers and surveys, relating to the northeastern boundary of the United States described in the treaty of 1783, and such other information on that subject as he may deem necessary and useful for this State to be possessed of."

"That the Governor of this State, in conjunction with the Governor of Massachusetts, (provided the said Commonwealth shall concur in the measure,) be authorized to cause the eastern and northeastern lines of the State of Maine to be explored, and the monuments upon these lines, mentioned in the treaty of 1783, to be ascertained in such a manner as may be deemed most expedient."

The surveys of the unappropriated lands of Maine and Massachusetts were continued, and five ranges of townships were surveyed, and extending from the line drawn west from the monument, and extending from that line to Fish river, and near the river St. John.

The Fish river road, extending from the east branch of the Penobscot river northwardly to Fish river, was laid out also under the authority of the States.

The resolve was communicated to the Senators of this State in the Congress of the United States, and enclosed by the Governor on the day of its passage. And there was procured, in consequence of it, a copy of the general map compiled by the United States surveyors from surveys made under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent.

The subject was again presented to both branches of the Legislature by the Governor in his message on the 4th of January, 1827. And the Governor also, by special message, communicated a letter from the Secretary of State of the United States, dated January 29, of the same year, accompanied by a letter of Charles R. Vaughan, Esq., the British minister, dated January 7, 1827, wherein he complains of the acts of Maine and Massachusetts, in surveying and laying out townships and roads, and concludes by saying: "I think it advisable to make you acquainted, without delay, with the communication which I have received from the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, whom, I beg leave to assure you, cautiously abstains on his part from exercising any authority in the disputed territory which could invite encroachments as a measure of retaliation." All which were considered and became the subject of a report in the Legislature on the 12th day of February, 1827, and a resolve was passed thereon, on the 23d day of the same month, respecting the northeastern boundary of the State, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to take all such measures, both in acquiring information and in procuring a speedy adjustment of the dispute, according to the treaty of 1783, as he may deem expedient and for the interest of the State."

To this period nothing of any importance had been obtained under the resolves of the State, although they had been regularly communicated; and all the information which was in possession of the Government of this State consisted in the few, and very few, copies of letters from the British minister, which had been elicited by the resolves of the Sate of Maine; and beyond that, there was no official information of the proceedings of the commission under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, nor the claims set up by the British, except what was derived from public reports, vague in their nature, and uncertain in their character. It was not until long after the Commissioners had terminated their labors that any official communication was made which tended to show the British claim; and even that, from the looseness of its phraseology, seemed to convey no other distinct idea than that the British, from causes known to themselves, claimed all the country north and west of Mars Hill as a part of the ancient province of Nova Scotia, and even that did not appear until near the middle of the year 1825. The delay to give information to the State of Maine, when it had been so often requested, particularly in the letter of the Governor of July, 1820, to the Executive of the United States, containing a request that some one might be added from the State of Maine to assist in the examination of the subject; and considering that the sovereignty of the whole country to which the British had, in such an extraordinary manner, and so contrary to the discussions which preceded the treaty of Ghent, pretended a claim was in Maine, and that the Government of the United States had no constitutional authority to cede any portion of an independent sovereignty, directly or by construction, is certainly very extraordinary. And it cannot fail to appear extraordinary that the same policy on the part of the Government of the United States should be continued, when, by uniting Maine in the controversy, all reasonable ground of complaint on her part would have been removed; at least, if she had in her sovereign capacity engaged in the controversy, she must have been concluded by the result. If she had mismanaged her concerns, that could never have been brought up as a reasonable cause of complaint against the United States. Maine, as she was in a state of profound ignorance, had no opportunity to aid or assist the United States; nor does she claim that she has a right to interfere in the course its Government chooses to adopt; but she has the right of reading the Constitution of the United States, of judging for herself, and if she is deprived of the exercise of her sovereignty and her property she has a right to remonstrate and assert her rights; and by force of the original compact, she is entitled to the aid and assistance of the independent sovereignties constituting the United States to reinstate her in that of which she has been deprived by an unjust and unconstitutional exercise of power.

The promptness, decision, perseverance, and ability with which the Governor has executed the request contained in the last resolve merits the encomiums and approbation of the State. If further comment were necessary, the fact that all the information which had been so long but unsuccessfully sought was obtained speaks a language more satisfactory to him and the State than anything we could add. As to the positions taken and maintained by the Governor, they must be in accordance with the views and common sense of the State, and we cannot present his discussions in a clearer or more acceptable light than to request a fair, candid, and impartial examination of them. With these remarks, and without further comment, the correspondence between him and the Government of the United States is annexed.

Thus we have detailed at some length the principal facts and circumstances touching the title and the extent of the title of the State to territory and jurisdiction; from which it appears that our title is perfect to all the territory bounded by the southern line of the province of Lower Canada, to wit: by the line drawn from the head of Connecticut river along the lands which limit the sources of the rivers that fall into the river St. Lawrence, to the head of the Bay of Chaleurs, and westward of the line drawn due north from the source of the river St. Croix to that line, being the line described and adopted by the British Government long before the Revolution, and being the lines which are also described and adopted by the provincial and definitive treaties of peace. That the British Government have always, directly and indirectly, conceded our title, in all the negotiations and discussions on the subject, prior to the discussions under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, and made no claim of title founded on any intrusion of theirs; the ministers, who sought it as a cession not having urged or even stated the fact, except by way of allusion, and that Massachusetts and Maine have always exercised jurisdiction according to the title of Maine, and have continued their progress of surveys, sales, and settlements, and other acts, and that the United States have always exercised general jurisdiction, and did in 1820 exercise acts of jurisdiction as far as there was any occasion for it. That there was no reason, from any knowledge in possession of the United States, until very recently, and still more recently in possession of this State, more immediately interested, to suppose that, if the British Government had crossed the above described lines, she would not, as soon as the lines were surveyed, withdraw, and cease to commit like acts of intrusion; and it has also appeared, from representations made by the British minister to the Secretary of State, "that the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick had given assurances that he would cautiously abstain from all acts of authority which could invite encroachments as a measure of retaliation."

But notwithstanding all these facts, circumstances, and assurances, John Baker, a citizen of the State of Maine and the United States, was arrested in his own dwelling-house, situated on the land he purchased of and holds by the deed from Massachusetts and Maine, on a warrant and other process served by the sheriff of the county of York, accompanied by armed men, and in the night time, at least before Baker had risen from his bed, and was carried to Frederickton and thrown into prison, where he is now confined. Processes have also been served within our territory, on the Aroostook, and the cattle and property of our citizens have been taken away by the civil officers of New Brunswick. Baker is charged, among other things, with an intrusion and trespass on the premises he holds under Massachusetts and Maine.

When the Governor of this State had received notice that the sovereignty of the State, by the officer of the Government of New Brunswick, had been violated, in the abduction and imprisonment of one of its citizens and other acts, he issued his proclamation, and commissioned an agent of the State to proceed to the province of New Brunswick to inquire into the cause of the arrest, and the other violations of the State sovereignty, and to demand of the Government of New Brunswick the restoration of Baker; all which will more fully appear in the documents annexed. The Governor has in this, with his usual promptness, discretion, and ability, performed his duty to the State and its citizens. The agent, in prosecution of the object of his commission, proceeded to Fredrickton, the capital of New Brunswick, and notified the Government of his arrival and official capacity. He was not received in his official capacity. From what cause that arose, whether from their own policy, or their misconstruction of the power and authority of the Governor of this State, is not certain. It seems to us there would have been no objection to the recognition of the agent of this State, had his commission been only to demand a fugitive from justice, or that the Governor of New Brunswick would consider that he was transcending his power were he to send an agent to this State to demand a fugitive from his own Government. Notwithstanding he was not received in an official character, we are happy to have it in our power to say that he was politely received by the gentlemen of the place. The object of his agency, therefore, so far as it related to the arrest and imprisonment of Baker, totally failed, as it did also in some other respects.

His official capacity embraced two objects:

1st. To demand a delivery of persons.

2d. To obtain public information.

If not recognized for any other purpose, he might have been permitted as a person authorized to inquire into the truth of facts, important to the rights of the people of the State and peace of the country.

From all the facts, we cannot perceive on what ground they can justify the violation of the State and national sovereignty in the arrest of Baker on his own soil and freehold, which he holds in fee under the States of Massachusetts and Maine, and the other acts of their officers on the Aroostook. On the ground of title they have no justification, and they can only justify themselves on the ground of a possession de facto, which cannot, by the acknowledged principles of law, be extended beyond actual occupation. In the case of Baker, the settlement on his lot was commenced not within even a possession de facto, feeble and slender as that would be; and in relation to the Aroostook, there is not even a possession of any kind, unless it has been acquired by the lawless depredations of individuals, for which they have, from time to time, atoned by settlements with the agents of the State of Maine. Even the few who have settled on the Aroostook, settled there considering it to be within this State, and intending, also, to settle out of the province of New Brunswick. The course pursued by the British must be accounted for on another principle than "a cautious abstinence of the exercise of authority which could invite encroachments as a measure of retaliation."

When the British are thus attempting to extend their intrusion, and imprisoning and otherwise harassing, by legal process, citizens of Maine, they have constitutional claims on her protection; and although Massachusetts and Maine, from the treaty of peace, have exercised the same jurisdiction over all the wild lands which had not been particularly appropriated for cultivation to this time, if such acts are repeated it cannot be expected that Maine will be a quiet spectator. It will be her duty to enforce her laws within her own jurisdiction, and to protect her own rights and the rights of her citizens.

The Government of the United States have a duty to perform towards the State and its citizens, not less towards those who are forcibly taken from the territory and imprisoned than towards those who are taken from the national marine. An agent has been sent to the province of New Brunswick, who has returned, and we have confidence that the whole business will be adjusted, and that the constitutional rights of the State and the liberties and rights of the citizens will be protected and preserved.

Your committee, impressed with the importance of the subject to this State and the United States, and approving most cordially of the measures taken by the Governor, believe, from the past, that the State has a well founded assurance that its best interests will be protected and its constitutional rights preserved.

APPENDIX.

No. 1.

An extract from the grant of James 1*st to Sir William Alexander, (afterwards Lord Sterling,) passed September* 10, 1621.

We do by these presents give, grant and convey to the said Sir William Alexander, his heirs and assigns, all and singular the lands upon the continent, and the islands situate, lying, and being in America, within the head or promontory commonly called Cape Sable, in the latitude of forty-three degrees nearly, or thereabouts, from that promontory along the shore, stretching to the west to the bay commonly called

St. Mary's bay; thence to the north by a direct line crossing the entrance or mouth of the great bay, which extends eastward, between the countries of the Siroquois and Etchemins, so commonly called, to the river commonly called by the name of the Holy Cross, or the St. Croix, and to the furthest source or spring, upon the western branch of the same, which first mingles its waters with those of the said river; thence by an imaginary direct line, to be drawn or run through the country, or over the land to the north, to the first bay, river, or spring emptying itself into the great river of Canada; and from thence running to the east, along the shores of the said river of Canada, to the river, bay, or harbor, commonly called and known by the name of Gachepe or Gaspee; and from thence southeast to the islands called Baccalaos or Cape Breton, leaving the same islands upon the right, and the gulf of the said river or bay of Canada and Newfoundland, with the islands thereunto belonging, upon the left; and from thence to the head or promontory of Cape Breton aforesaid, lying near the latitude of forty-five degrees or thereabouts; and from the said promontory of Cape Breton to the southward and westward to Cape Sable aforesaid, the place of beginning, including and comprehending within the said coasts and shores of the sea, and the circumferences thereof, from sea to sea, all the lands upon the continent, with the rivers, torrents, bays, shores, islands or seas, lying near to or within six leagues from any part thereof, on the western, northern, or eastern parts of the said coasts and precincts of the same, and to the southeast where Cape Breton lies, and to the southward thereof where cape Sable lies, all the seas and islands to the south, within forty leagues of the said shores, including the great island commonly called the Isle of Sable or Sablon, lying south-southeast in the ocean, about thirty leagues from Cape Breton aforesaid, and being in the latitude of forty-four degrees, or thereabouts.

All which lands aforesaid shall at all times hereafter be called and known by the name of Nova Scotia, or New Scotland, in America. And if any questions or doubts shall hereafter arise upon the interpretation or construction of any clause in the present letters patent contained, they shall all be taken and interpreted in the most extensive sense, and in favor of the said Sir William Alexander, his heirs and assigns aforesaid. Moreover, we, of our certain knowledge, our own proper motion, regal authority, and royal power, have made, united, annexed, erected, created, and incorporated, and we do, by these our letters patent, make, unite, annex, erect, create, and incorporate the whole and entire province and lands of Nova Scotia aforesaid, with all the limits thereof, seas, &c., officers and jurisdictions, and all other things generally and specially above mentioned, into one entire and free dominion and barony, to be called at all times hereafter by the aforesaid name of Nova Scotia.

Extract from the grant of Charles the 2d to James, Duke of York, dated 12th of March, 1663.

Know ye, that we, for divers good causes, &c., have, &c., and by these presents, &c., do give and grant unto our dearest brother, James, Duke of York, his heirs and assigns, all that part of the main land of New England, beginning at a certain place called or known by the name of St. Croix, next adjoining to New Scotland, in America; and from thence extending along the seacoast unto a certain place called Pemaquie or Pemaquid, and so up the river thereof, to the furthest head of the same as it tendeth northward; and extending from thence to the river Kimbequin, and so upwards, by the shortest course to the river of Canada, northward. And also all that island or islands commonly called by the several name or names of Matowacks or Long Island, situate, lying and being towards the west of Cape Cod and the Narrow Higansets, abutting upon the main land between the two rivers, there called or known by the several names of Connecticut and Hudson's river; together, also, with the said river, called Hudson's river, and all the lands from the west side of Connecticut river to the east side of Delaware bay. And also all those several islands, called or known by the names of Martin's Vineyard, and Nantukes, or otherwise Nantucket.

Extract from the charter of the Province of the Massachusetts Bay, in New England, dated 7th of October, 1691, 3d William and Mary.

William and Mary, by the grace of God, King and Queen of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, &c., to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting: We do by these presents, for us, our heirs, and successors, will and ordain that the territories and colonies commonly called or known by the names of the colony of the Massachusetts Bay and colony of New Plymouth, the province of Maine, and the territory called Acadie, or Nova Scotia, and all that tract of land lying between the said territories of Nova Scotia and the said province of Maine, be erected, united and incorporated; and we do by these presents unite, erect, and incorporate the same into one real province, by the name of our province of the Massachusetts Bay in New England; and of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, we have given and granted, and by these presents, for us, our heirs, and successors, do give and grant unto our good subjects, the inhabitants of our said province or territory of Massachusetts Bay, and their successors, all that part of New England, in America, lying and extending from the great river commonly called Monomack, alias Merrimack, on the north part, and from three miles northward of the said river to the Atlantic, or western sea or ocean, on the south part, and all the lands and hereditaments whatever lying within the limits aforesaid, and extending as far as the outermost points or promontories of land called Cape Cod and Cape Malabar, north and south, and in latitude, breadth, and in length, and longitude, of and within all the breadth and compass aforesaid, throughout the main land there, from the said Atlantic or western sea and ocean, on the east part, towards the south sea, or westward, as far as our colonies of Rhode Island, Connecticut, and the Narragansett country; and also all that part and portion of Maine land, beginning at the entrance of Piscataqua harbor, and so to pass up the same into the river of Newichwannock, and through the same into the furthest head thereof, and from thence northwestward, till one hundred and twenty miles be finished, and from Piscataqua harbor mouth aforesaid, northeastward along the seacoast to Sagadehock,* and from the period of one hundred and twenty miles aforesaid, to cross over land from Piscataqua harbor, through Newichwannock river; and also the north half of the Isles of Shoals, together with the Isles of Capawack and Nantucket, near Cape Cod aforesaid; and also the lands and hereditaments lying and being in the country or territory commonly called Acadie or Nova Scotia; and all those lands and hereditaments lying and extending between the said country or territory of Nova Scotia, and the said river of Sagadehock, or any part thereof.

That it shall and may be lawful for the said Governor and General Assembly to make or pass any grant of lands lying within the bounds of the colonies, formerly called the colonies of the Massachusetts Bay, and New Plymouth, and province of Maine, in such manner as heretofore they might have done by virtue of any former charter or letters patent, which grants of lands, within the bounds aforesaid, we do hereby will and ordain to be and continue forever of full force and effect, without our further approbation or consent. And so as nevertheless, and it is our royal will and pleasure, that no grant or grants of any lands lying or extending from the river of Sagadehock to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Canada rivers, and to the main sea northward and eastward, to be made or passed by the Governor and General Assembly of our said province, be of any force, validity, or effect, until we, our heirs, or successors, shall have signified our approbation of the same.

Copy of Colonel Phillipps' commission for the Government of Nova Scotia, 1719.

George, by the grace of God, &c., to our trusty and well beloved Richard Phillipps, Esq., greeting:

Know ye, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage, and loyalty of you, the said Richard Phillipps, out of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint, and by these presents do constitute and appoint you, the said Richard Phillipps, to be our Governor of Placentia in New Foundland, and our Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia or Acadie, in America: and we do hereby require and command you to do and execute all things in due manner that shall belong unto your said command, and the trust we have reposed in you, according to the several powers and directions granted or appointed you by this present commission, and the instructions herewith given you, or by such further powers, instructions or authorities as shall at any time hereafter be granted or appointed you under our signet and sign manual, or by our order in our Privy Council, and according to such reasonable laws and statutes as shall hereafter be made and assented to by you, with the advice and consent of our Council and Assembly of our said province, hereafter to be appointed.

And for the better administration of justice and management of the public affairs of our province, we hereby give and grant unto you, the said Richard Phillipps, full power and authority to choose, nominate, and appoint, such fitting and discreet persons as you shall either find there or carry along with you, not exceeding the number of twelve, to be of our council in our said province, till our further pleasure be known, any five whereof we do hereby appoint to be a quorum.

Draught of a commission for the Hon. Col. Cornwallis, to be Governor of Nova Scotia, April 29, 1749.

George the Second, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c., to our trusty and well beloved the Hon. Edward Cornwallis, Esq., greeting: Whereas we did, by our letters patent, under our great seal of Great Britain, bearing date at Westminster, the 11th day of September, in the second year of our reign, constitute and appoint Richard Phillipps, Esq., our Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia or Acadie, in America, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances whatever thereunto belonging, for and during our will and pleasure, as by the said recited letters patent, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear: Now know you, that we have revoked and determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine, the said recited letters patent, and every clause, article, and thing therein contained; and further know you, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage, and loyalty of you, the said Edward Cornwallis, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint, and by these presents do constitute and appoint you, the said Edward Cornwallis, to be our Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over the province of Nova Scotia or Acadie, in America, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances whatever thereunto belonging.

18th March, 1752. The commission given to Peregrine Thomas Hopson, as Governor of the province of Nova Scotia, is the same, mutatis mutandis, as that given to Edward Cornwallis, Esq.

* The following words, viz: "And up the river thereof to the Knybecky river, and through the same to the head thereof, and under the land northwestward, until one hundred and twenty miles be ended, being accounted from the mouth of Sagadehock," as inserted in George's grants, (from which the descriptive part of the boundaries of Maine, in this charter, is taken,) appear to have been inadvertently omitted, being necessary to render those boundaries intelligible, and should follow the word Sagadehock, to which the asterisk is affixed.

Extract from the proclamation of the King of Great Britain of the 7th of October, 1763, establishing four Governments.

BY THE KING, A PROCLAMATION.

GEORGE R.

Whereas we have taken into our royal consideration the extensive and valuable acquisitions in America, secured to our Crown by the late definitive treaty of peace, concluded at Paris the 10th day of February last; and being desirous that all our loving subjects, as well of our Kingdoms as of our colonies in America, may avail themselves, with all convenient speed, of the great benefits and advantages which must accrue therefrom to their commerce, manufactures, and navigation: we have thought fit, with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this our royal proclamation, hereby to publish and declare to all our loving subjects that we have, with the advice of our said Privy Council, granted our letters patent, under our great seal of Great Britain, to erect within the countries and islands ceded and confirmed to us by the said treaty four distinct and separate Governments, styled and called by the names of Quebec, East Florida, West Florida, and Grenada, and limited and bounded as follows, viz:

First, the Government of Quebec, bounded on the Labrador coast by the river St. John, and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river, through the lake St. John, to the south end of the lake Nipissim; from thence the said line crossing the river St. Lawrence and the lake Champlain in forty-five degrees of north latitude, passes along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea; and also along the north coast of the Baye des Chaleurs, and the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosieres, and from thence, crossing the mouth of the river St. Lawrence, by the west end of the island of Anticosti, terminates at the aforesaid river St. John.

Representation to his Majesty, with the draught of a commission for Charles Lawrence, Esq., to be Governor of Nova Scotia:

To the King's most excellent Majesty:

May it please your Majesty: In obedience to your Majesty's order in Council, dated the 18th instant, we have prepared the draught of a commission for Charles Lawrence, Esq., to be Captain General and Governor-in-chief of your Majesty's province of Nova Scotia, in America, which, being in the usual form, we herewith humbly lay it before your Majesty, and shall prepare the necessary instructions for him with all possible despatch.

Which is most humbly submitted.

Governor Ellis' commission, April 1, 1761.

George the Third, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c., to our trusty and well beloved Henry Ellis, Esq., greeting: Whereas our late royal grandfather, of blessed memory, did, by his letters patent, under the great seal of Great Britain, bearing date at Westminster, the ——— of ——— in the ——— year of his reign, constitute and appoint Charles Lawrence, Esq., Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia, or Acadie, in America, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances whatever thereunto belonging, for and during his late Majesty's will and pleasure, as by the said recited letters patent, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear: Now know you, that we have revoked and determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine the said recited letters patent, and every clause, article, and thing therein contained; and further know you, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage, and loyalty of you, the said Henry Ellis, Esq., of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint, and by these presents do constitute and appoint you, the said Henry Ellis, to be our Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia or Acadie, in America, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances whatever thereunto belonging.

Draught of a commission for Montague Wilmot, Esq., to be Governor of Nova Scotia, dated October, 1763.

George the Third, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c., to our trusty and well beloved Montague Wilmot, Esq., greeting: Whereas we did, by our letters patent, under the great seal of Great Britain, dated at Westminster, the——day of——in the first year of our reign, constitute and appoint Henry Ellis, Esq., Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia or Acadie, in America, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, for and during our will and pleasure, as by the said recited letters patent, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear: Now know you, that we have revoked and determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine the said recited letters patent, and every clause, article, and thing therein contained.

And further know you, that we, reposinge special trust and confidence in the prudence, courage, and loyalty of you, the said Montague Wilmot, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint, and by these presents we do constitute and appoint you, the said Montague Wilmot, to be our Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia, bounded on the westward by a line drawn from Cape Sable across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our province of Quebec to the northward by the same boundary as far as the western extremity of the Baye des Chaleurs; to the eastward by the said bay and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to the cape or promontory called Cape Breton, in the island of the same name, including that island, the island of St. John, and all other islands within six leagues of the coast; and to the southward by the Atlantic Ocean, from said cape to Cape Sable aforesaid, including the island of that name, and all other islands within forty leagues of the coast, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging.

Governor Legge's commission.

George the Third, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c., to our trusty and well beloved Francis Legge, Esq., greeting: Whereas we did, by our letters patent, under our great seal of Great Britain, bearing date at Westminster, the eleventh day of August, in the sixth year of our reign, constitute and appoint William Campbell, Esq., commonly called Lord William Campbell, Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia, in America, bounded on the westward by a line drawn from Cape Sable across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our colony of Quebec; to the northward by the said boundary as far as the western extremity of the Baye des Chaleurs; to the eastward by the said bay and the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the cape or promontory called Cape Breton, in the island of that name, including that island, the island of St. John, and all other islands within six leagues of the coast; and to the southward by the Atlantic Ocean, from the said cape to Cape Sable aforesaid, including the island of that name, and all other islands within forty leagues of the coast, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging, for and during our will and pleasure, as by the said recited letters patent, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear. Now, know you, that we have revoked and determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine the said recited letters patent, and every clause, article, and thing therein contained; and further know you, that we, reposing especial confidence and trust in the prudence, courage, and loyalty of you, the said Francis Legge, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, we have thought fit to constitute and appoint you, the said Francis Legge, to be our Captain General and Governor-in-chief of our said province of Nova Scotia, bounded on the westward by a line drawn from Cape Sable across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our colony of Quebec; to the northward by the said boundary as far as the western extremity of the Baye des Chaleurs; to the eastward by the said bay and the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the cape or promontory called Cape Breton, in the island of that name, including that island and all other islands within six leagues of the coast, excepting our said island of St. John, which we have thought fit to erect into a separate Government; and to the southward by the Atlantic Ocean, from the said cape to Cape Sable aforesaid, including the island of that name, and all other islands within forty leagues of the coast, with all the rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging.

And we do hereby require and command you to do and execute all things in due manner that shall belong unto your said command, and the trust we have reposed in you, according to the several powers and authorities granted or appointed you by the present commission, and the instructions herewith given you, or by such further powers, instructions, and authorities as shall at any time hereafter be granted or appointed you under our signet and sign manual, or by our order in our Privy Council, and according to such reasonable laws and statutes as are now in force or shall hereafter be made or agreed upon by you, with the advice and consent of our Council and the Assembly of our said province under your government, in such manner and form as is hereafter expressed.

The act of the British Parliament of the 14*th year of George III,* 1774, relating to the province of Quebec, provides as follows:

That all the territories, islands, and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs along the highlands which divide the rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea to a point in the 45th degree of north latitude on the eastern branch of the river Connecticut, keeping the same latitude directly west through Lake Champlain, until in the same latitude it meets the river St. Lawrence; from thence up the eastern bank of said river to Lake Ontario; thence through the Lake Ontario and the river commonly called Niagara; and thence along by the eastern and southeastern bank of Lake Erie, following the said bank until the same shall be intersected by the northern boundary granted by the charter of the province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected; and from thence along the said north and west boundary of the said province until the said western boundary strikes the Ohio; but in case the said bank of said lake shall not be found to be so intersected, then following the said bank until it shall arrive at that point of the said bank which shall be nearest to the northwest angle of the said province of Pennsylvania; and thence by a right line to the said northwest angle of said province; and thence along the western boundary of said province until it strikes the Ohio, and along the bank of the said river westward to the bank of the Mississippi, and north to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the merchants, adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay; and also all such territories, islands, and countries which have, since the 10th day of February, 1763, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland, be, and they are hereby, during his Majesty's pleasure, annexed to and made a part of the province of Quebec, as created and established by the said royal proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763.

No. 11.

Extract from the British Agent's argument before the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between the United States and Great Britain, at London, November 19, 1794.

By the 12th section of the act entitled "An act to restrain the trade and commerce of the province of Massachusetts Bay and New Hampshire, and colonies of Connecticut and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in North America, to Great Britain, Ireland, and the British islands in the West Indies, and to prohibit such provinces and colonies from carrying on any fishing on the Banks of Newfoundland or other places therein mentioned, under certain conditions and limitations," they say, it is provided and enacted "that the river which emptieth itself into Passamacadie or Passamaquoddy bay on the western side, and is commonly called or known by the name of the St. Croix river, be held and deemed, for all the purposes in this act contained, to be the boundary line between the provinces of Massachusetts Bay and Nova Scotia."

This act creates no new boundary; it merely recognizes, confirms, and establishes the river St. Croix as a boundary between the provinces of Nova Scotia, in the patent to Sir William Alexander, in 1621, which was agreed upon, settled, known, and acknowledged as the boundary between the province of Nova Scotia and the territory of New England, granted to the Council of Plymouth in the year 1620, which, after the surrender of their grand charter, was the boundary between Nova Scotia and the territory granted to the Duke of York in 1664, which was recognized as the western boundary of Nova Scotia by the charter of William and Mary to the province of Massachusetts Bay in 1691, and which, from the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, was the boundary between the provinces of Massachusetts Bay and Nova Scotia, received and established by the Crown, and known, acknowledged, and acquiesced in by the Gov ernment of Massachusetts Bay.

That from the time of the passing of this act of Parliament, in 1774, the boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia remained unaltered to the treaty of peace, in 1783, will not, it is presumed, be denied. And it will not be difficult now to show that the river Scoudiac, under the name of the river St. Croix, formed a part of the boundary described in that treaty.

It is sufficient here to observe, that at the time the treaty of peace was made in 1783 the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia belonged to and were in the possession of the Crown of Great Britain, and that his Britannic Majesty at that time had an undoubted right to cede to the United States of America such part of these territories as he might think fit; and that, in making the cession of the territory comprised within the boundaries of the United States, as described in the second article of the treaty of peace, his Majesty must be supposed to have used the terms describing these boundaries in the sense in which they had been uniformly understood in the British nation, and recognized in public documents and acts of Government. In this sense, and in no other, could they have then been understood, or can they now be claimed or insisted upon by the United States. In this sense, and in no other, is his Majesty bound to give the possession. Whatever river was at that time known and recognized by his Majesty and the British Government as the river St. Croix, forming a boundary between the province of Massachusetts Bay and Nova Scotia, that river, and no other, can now be claimed as a part of the eastern boundary of the United States. It is sufficient that in this act of Parliament the river St. Croix is described by a particular location and boundaries which cannot be mistaken, known to both parties at the time, and assented to on the part of the United States by their accepting the act, and not giving any local designation of the river which they now claim, or of any other river than that thus ascertained by precise description, and known by them to have been established, and at the time contemplated by Great Britain, as the boundary between the provinces.

If this principle were once departed from there would be no check to construction on the subject, though it would be fortunate to his Majesty's interests if he were not thus bound, as it might be clearly shown in that case that the river Penobscot, once, indiscriminately with other rivers upon this coast, called the St. Croix, was the true boundary by which Nova Scotia or Acadie was ceded to his Majesty by the treaty of Utrecht, and ought, in such case, by the principles of the law of nations, to be established as the eastern boundary of the United States.

But the words in the twelfth section of the act of Parliament above recited do not in anywise relate to or suppose any subsisting doubts about the locality or identity of the river called or known by the name of the St. Croix river, but have reference, as has been fully shown, to the ancient limits of the province of Nova Scotia, as established by the original grant of it to Sir William Alexander from King James I, in the year 1621, recognized in all subsequent public documents and transactions relating thereto, and claimed by the province of Massachusetts Bay as their eastern boundary under the charter of King William and Queen Mary in 1691.

The most accustomed and convenient rule in cases of this kind is to leave to each Power, respectively, the sources of those rivers that empty themselves, or whose mouths are within its territory upon the sea-coast, if it can be done consistently or in conformity with the intent of the treaty. If it can be shown that this rule, in the present case, can be adopted consistently with what has been shown to be the intent of the treaty, it will form an unanswerable argument in favor of a compliance with the rule, more especially if a different construction will involve the inconveniences intended to be avoided by so just a principle of interpretation.

Let us, in this view, attend to the words made use of in the treaty describing the first station or boundary from which all the other boundaries of the United States are to be traced, viz: From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz., that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean. It appears from a map actually compiled in most instances from actual surveys, an authentic copy of which is now before the board, that a line drawn due north from the source of the Cheputnatecook river, or northern branch of the river Scoudiac or St. Croix, will not intersect the highlands here described, but will intersect the river Restigouche, which empties itself into the Bay of Chaleurs, which falls into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and will also intersect the Metabediac lake, which is the head or source of the river likewise falling into the Bay of Chaleurs. In addition, therefore, to the argument drawn from the inconvenience resulting from its cutting off the sources of those rivers which discharge themselves within the British territory upon the seacoast, the source of this branch of the Scoudiac or St. Croix cannot be the source intended by the treaty of peace, because in such case we cannot arrive at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, which is the first bound or station upon which the other boundaries depend, as they must be traced from thence, that is to say, "that angle which is found by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean." For, if the fact be as above stated, should a line be traced due north from the source of the Cheputnatecook, if the highlands in such case are on this side or to the southward of the river Restigouche, they will divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean or Bay of Fundy from those that fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence; if they are between the river Restigouche and the Metabediac lake they will divide the rivers which, from different sources, unite and fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence; if they are beyond this lake, they will divide the rivers which fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence; the requisite angle therefore will not be found upon this line. But if a line is traced due north from the source of the western or main branch of the river Scoudiac, or St. Croix, it will run to the westward of the sources of all the rivers that fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and will strike the highlands which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, and consequently give the requisite angle or first bound.

There is certainly a clear distinction in the grant to Sir William Alexander between the river St. Lawrence and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or rather of Canada; the boundary line by this grant, after striking that river, is to follow the course of it eastward to Gaspee, which lies to the northward of the Bay of Chaleurs, and afterwards the gulf is mentioned, and the words made use of in the grant seem to impoft a considerable distance eastward, between the line where it strikes the river of Canada or St. Lawrence and Gaspee.

It is far from being certain that the ridge of highlands which divides the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, is continued to the eastward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence; but whether thus continued or not, the inference is clear, from the foregoing facts and reasoning, that neither the Cheputnatecook, nor consequently the Magaguadavic, or any other river whose source is eastward of the source of the Cheputnatecook, can be the river intended under the name of the river St. Croix in the treaty of peace.

But to apply these facts to the point more immediately under consideration, whether a line due north from the source of the western or main branch of the river Scoudiac, or St. Croix, will leave to each of the parties to the treaty the sources of those rivers that empty themselves, or whose mouths are within its territory upon the seacoast respectively.

The effect, so far as it regards the United States, is completely secured by the treaty in all events, and thence we have further reason to suppose it was intended to be reciprocal in this respect, if a just interpretation will warrant it.

A line due north from the source of the western or main branch of the Scoudiac, or St. Croix, will fully secure this effect to the United States in every instance, and also to Great Britain in all instances except in that of the river St. John, wherein it becomes impossible, by reason that the sources of this river are to the westward, not only of the western boundary line of Nova Scotia, but of the sources of the Penobscot and even of the Kennebec, so that this north line must of necessity cross the St. John; but it will cross it in a part of it almost at the foot of the highlands, and where it ceases to be navigable. But if a north line is traced from the source of the Cheputnatecook, it will not only cross the river St. John, within about fifty miles from Frederickton, the metropolis of New Brunswick, but will cut off the sources of the rivers which fall into the Bay of Chaleurs, if not of many others, probably of the Meramichi, among them which fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and thereby be productive of inconvenient consequences to the two Powers, if not of contention between them, instead of "terminating their differences in such a manner as may be best calculated to produce mutual satisfaction and good understanding," which is one of the principal and avowed objects of the treaty.

Had the treaty intended that this north line should intersect a number of rivers which empty their waters through a British province into the sea, a right of navigation or passage down those rivers would doubtless have been secured to the United States by the treaty. That this was not the intention of the treaty, not only appears from the facts and reasoning that have already been adduced, but from a further consideration, that in most, if not all the maps of the interior country, published before the year 1783, although the sources of the river St. Croix are very inaccurately laid down, still it is very uniformly made to terminate in a lake near the eastern branch of the Penobscot; and a line drawn north from that termination upon those maps will not intersect any of the rivers which empty themselves into the sea to the eastward of the mouth of the river St. Croix, except the river St. John. This furnishes an unanswerable argument, so far as any fair conclusions can be drawn from those maps, in proof not only that the river Scoudiac is the true ancient river St. Croix, and consequently intended by the treaty of peace under the name of St. Croix, but that its true source is upon that western branch, in a lake, near to an eastern branch of the river Penobscot.

If, then, there were any doubt remaining which is the true source of the river St. Croix from which the line due north to the highlands is to be traced, the inconveniences above mentioned would form the strongest argument against a decision from which they would result, and in favor of that by which they will be avoided; much more so when the latter decision will correspond with and be supported by so many other incontestable proofs and arguments, clearly establishing the river Scoudiac, to the source of the western branch, to be the river St. Croix, truly intended under that name, in the treaty of peace, and forming a part of the boundary therein described; and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia mentioned in the same treaty, to be formed by a line drawn due north from that source to the highlands described in the treaty.

Whether, therefore, we follow the words of the grant to Sir William Alexander, by which we must be at all events concluded, or follow the main branch of the river retaining the same name, or are governed by the uniform decision of geographers and historians of credit upon the subject, and the rules and principles of the law of nations for the interpretation of treaties, we shall be led to the same place as the source of the river from which the line due north must be traced to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia.

But even if it had not been known at the time of the grant to Sir William Alexander that this river had two branches, and the grant had been expressed generally to the furthest source of the river St. Croix, still the main branch, or that retaining the name of the river at its mouth, must have been followed to its source, not only to satisfy the words of the grant, but to give it its intended construction and operation.

It clearly appears to have been the intention of the grant to give as large a territory to be erected into the province of Nova Scotia as the river St. Croix could give by tracing a line due north from its source to the great river Canada; and it is expressly provided in the grant, contrary to the general rules for the construction of the King's grants, that if any questions or doubts should thereafter arise upon the interpretation or construction of any clause contained in the grant, that they should all be taken and interpreted in the most extensive sense, and in favor of the said Sir William Alexander.

Having traced the original boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia to the furthest source or spring of the river St. Croix, upon the western branch thereof, and thereby found the utmost western limits of the province, it remains only to discover its utmost northern limits in order to ascertain the northwest angle we are in search of.

The province of Nova Scotia, at the time of the treaty in 1783, was, as has already appeared, bounded to the northward by the southern boundary of the province of Quebec, which boundary was established by the royal proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763, and confirmed by the act of the 14th George III, c. 83, passed in the same year with the act of Parliament already cited, by which it is enacted that all the territories, islands, and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point, in forty-five degrees of northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the river Connecticut, &c., be annexed to, and made a part and parcel of, the province of Quebec.

As then, at the treaty of peace in 1783, the northern limit of the province of Novia Scotia was "a line along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea," it unquestionably follows that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, at the time of the treaty of peace in 1783, was that angle which was formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the river St. Croix to those highlands. If we now compare this angle with the northwest angle of Novia Scotia, described in the treaty of peace, viz: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the same highlands, can it be said, with any degree of propriety, that "the limits and boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia were unknown at the time of the treaty of peace in 1783, and that it, therefore, became necessary to give it a western boundary by the treaty itself, in these words, to wit, that angle which is formed by a line due north from the source of the river St. Croix to the highlands?"

Can it be believed, or for a moment imagined, that in the course of human events so exact a coincidence could have happened between the actual boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia and the boundaries of it described in this treaty, if the latter had not been dictated and regulated by the former?

Can any man hesitate to say he is convinced that the Commissioners at Paris, in 1783, in forming the second article of the treaty of peace, in which they have so exactly described this northwest angle, had reference to, and were governed by, the boundaries of Nova Scotia as described in the grant to Sir William Alexander, and the subsequent alteration of the northern boundary by the erection of the province of Quebec?

Will not this conviction become irresistible when he adverts to the reservations made to his Majesty, in this article of the treaty, "of such islands as then were, or theretofore had been, within the limits of the said province of Nova Scotia, and to the islands included and comprehended within those limits as described in the grant to Sir William Alexander, some of which might have belonged to the United States, as lying within the limits of those States, but for the exception of them in the treaty?

Let us now compare the western boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia, granted to Sir William Alexander, with the corresponding eastern boundaries of the United States. As the river St. Croix is not included in the grant to Sir William Alexander, as stated by the agent of the United States, and as it was not intended to be included, because, as has been made to appear, this river St. Croix was an agreed boundary between the province of Nova Scotia, erected by this grant, and the territory of New England, granted to the grand council of Plymouth, it follows that the line of this grant to Sir William Alexander must legally be construed to run through the middle of the river, the river not being assigned inclusively to either territory.

Upon this principle, then, this part of the western boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia, in the grant to Sir William Alexander, will be a north line across the mouth of the Bay of Fundy to the river commonly called by the name of St. Croix, and through the same to the furthest source or spring upon the western branch thereof, including and comprehending all islands within six leagues to the westward, northward, and eastward, and within forty leagues to the southward of any part of the premises described in the grant.

And the corresponding eastern boundary of the United States, by the second article of the treaty of peace, is, "a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the Bay of Fundy, to its source, including such islands as then were, or theretofore had been, within the limits of the said province of Nova Scotia;" referring to the province of Nova Scotia, of which the northwest angle, before described, was made the first station or boundary from which the boundaries of the United States were traced.

As it has already been shown that the source of this river St. Croix, otherwise called Scoudiac, upon the western branch and near to a branch of the Penobscot, to which there is a portage or carrying place from it; the same place is evidently contemplated as the source from which the line due north to the highlands is to be drawn, both in the grant to Sir William Alexander and in the second article of the treaty of peace, and, consequently, this part of the western boundary of Nova Scotia, in the grant, is precisely the same with the corresponding eastern boundary of the United States in the treaty.

Thus, the first principle stated in this argument is established beyond all contradiction, "that by the second article of the treaty of peace it was intended that no part of the province of Nova Scotia should be thereby ceded to the United States, but that the province of Nova Scotia, according to its ancient limits, should be and remain a part of the territories and dominions of his Majesty, as his Majesty had before that time held and possessed the same."

And this principle being established, the necessity of examining into and ascertaining precisely the ancient boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia, in the manner that it has been done, is clear and obvious, and the result of that examination, compared with the boundaries in the treaty of peace, thus serves in its turn to confirm the principle.

This principle being evident from the words of the treaty of peace itself, no explanation of the treaty, by either party, inconsistent with this true and obvious intention of it, can be received consistently with any of the rules and principles of the laws of nations, universally acknowledged and admitted obligatory in such cases, as has already been made to appear, and will be more fully shown in a more particular reply to the arguments advanced in support of the claim of the United States.

From the foregoing facts and arguments, the underwritten agent feels himself warranted in concluding that the river Scoudiac is the river truly intended, under the name of the river St. Croix, in the treaty of peace, and forming a part of the boundary therein described; and that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, intended by the treaty, is that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the furthest source or spring of the western main branch of the Scoudiac to the highlands described in the treaty.

As the final declaration to be made by this honorable board, deciding what river is the river St. Croix intended by the treaty of peace, must particularize the latitude and longitude of its mouth, as well as of its source, it may be proper, and perhaps necessary, in this place, to say a few words respecting the mouth of the river Scoudiac, which has been so fully proved to be the river St. Croix intended by the treaty.

By an inspection of the plan of the surveys now before the board, it will appear, in conformity to Champlain's authority, that its proper mouth is where it empties itself into that part of Passamaquoddy bay which was formerly called the Bay of St. Croix, and is now called St. Andrew's bay, and this mouth is traversed by a line drawn from the north point of St. Andrew's harbor, commonly called Joe's Point, across the river to the opposite point upon the western shore, near to the place where Mr. Brewer now lives. In confirmation of this, the Indians produced and examined before the board as witnesses on the part of the United States have testified that from Brewer's upwards the waters are called Scoudiac, and from thence downwards Passamaquoddy bay.

And the author of the History of the District of Maine also speaks of the proper mouth of this river being at or near St. Andrew's, where, he says, "The English now possess the country as far west as the east bank of the Scoudiac at its mouth."

It being established that the river Scoudiac, under the name of the river St. Croix, made a part of the original boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia, and continued to be a part of its western boundary at the time of the treaty of peace in 1783, it may be proper now to inquire whether that province has, in fact, exercised its jurisdiction agreeably to those limits; and to ascertain this fact, as far as it regards this western boundary, we can go no further back, with any degree of accuracy, than the treaty of peace in 1783, for, previous to the war immediately preceding that period, this part of Nova Scotia, or Acadie, had been, with little interruption, in the hands of the French, notwithstanding the treaty of Utrecht, by which it was fully ceded to Great Britain.

The whole country coming into the possession of his Britannic Majesty by the treaty of 1763, we are from thence to date our inquiries respecting the jurisdiction in fact exercised over this part of the country, down to the peace in the year 1783.

The boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia, as described in the commissions to the Governors of it from his Majesty during that period, conformed, as we have seen, to the boundaries of it as described in the grant to Sir William Alexander, without any material variation, except the alteration of its northern limits, occasioned by the erection of the province of Quebec.

No. 12.

Copy of the declaration executed by the Commissioners, viz:

By Thomas Barclay, David Howell, and Egbert Benson, Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the fifth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, finally to decide the question "what river was truly intended under the name of the river Saint Croix, mentioned in the treaty of peace between his Majesty and the United States, and forming a part of the boundary thereindescribed?"

DECLARATION.

We, the said Commissioners, having been sworn "impartially to examine and decide the said question, according to such evidence as should, respectively, be laid before us on the part of the British Government and the United States," and having heard the evidence which hath been laid before us by the agent of his Majesty and the agent of the United States, respectively, appointed and authorized to manage the business on behalf of the respective Governments, have decided, and hereby do decide: The river hereinafter particularly described and mentioned to be the river truly intended under the name of the river St. Croix in the said treaty of peace, and forming a part of the boundary therein described, that is to say, the mouth of the said river is in Passamaquoddy bay, at a point of land called Joe's Point, about one mile northward from the northern part of Saint Andrew's island, and in the latitude of forty-five degrees five minutes and five seconds north, and in the longitude of sixty-seven degrees twelve minutes and thirty seconds west from the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, in Great Britain, and three degrees fifty-four minutes and fifteen seconds east from Harvard College, in the University of Cambridge, in the State of Massachusetts; and the course of the said river, up from its said mouth, is northerly to a point of land called the Devil's Head, then, turning the said point, is westerly to where it divides into two streams, the one coming from the westward and the other coming from the northward, having the Indian name of Cheputnatecook or Chibniticook, as the same may be variously spelt; then up the said stream, so coming from the northward to its source, which is at a stake near a yellow birch tree hooped with iron, and marked S. T. and J. H., 1797, by Samuel Titcomb and John Harris, the surveyors employed to survey the above mentioned stream coming from the northward. And the said river is designated on the map hereunto annexed, and hereby referred to as further descriptive of it by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, K, and L. The letter A being at its said source, and the course and distance of the said source, from the island at the confluence of the above mentioned two streams, is, as laid down on the said map, north five degrees and about fifteen minutes west, by the magnet about forty-eight miles one-quarter.

In testimony whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, the twenty-fifth day of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight.

Copy of unexecuted declaration.

"By the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the fifth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, finally to decide the question, what river was truly intended under the name of the river St. Croix, mentioned in the treaty of peace between his Majesty and the United States, and forming a part of the boundary therein described?"

DECLARATION.

We, the said Commissioners, having been sworn impartially to examine and decide the said question, according to such evidence as should, respectively, be laid before us on the part of the British Government and of the United States, and having heard the evidence which has been laid before us by the agent of his Majesty and the agent of the United States, respectively, appointed and authorized to manage the business on the part of the respective Governments, have decided, and hereby do decide, that the river described, as follows, viz: The source of it is where it issues from the lake Genesagranagrum-sis, one of the Scoudiac lakes, and distant above five miles and three-quarters, in a direct course, from where the Cheputnatecook falls into it, and about twenty miles and a half, also on a direct course, from the point of land called the Devil's Head, and from its said source, as far at least as to the said point of land, it has the Indian name of Scoudiac, and its course for that extent is easterly; and then turning the said point and leaving Oak Point bay on the north, its course is southerly to its mouth, which is where it empties itself into Passamaquoddy bay, at a point of land called Joe's Point, about one mile northerly from the northern point of the island of St. Andrew's, and in the latitude of forty-five degrees five minutes and five seconds north, and in the longitude of sixty-seven degrees twelve minutes and thirty seconds west from the Royal Observatory of Greenwich, in Great Britain, and three degrees and fifty-four minutes and fifteen seconds east from Harvard College, in the University of Cambridge, in the State of Massachusetts, is the river truly intended under the name of the river St. Croix, mentioned in the said treaty of peace, and forming a part of the boundary therein described; and the map of it, hereunto annexed, is hereby referred to as further description of it.

In testimony whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, the ——— day of ———, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight.

PROVIDENCE, October 23, 1798.

SIR: I have considered with attention your letter of this day, and it appears to me evident that the adoption of the river Cheputnatecook as a part of the boundary between his Majesty's American dominions and those of the United States, in preference to a line drawn from the easternmost point of the Scoudiac lakes, would be attended with considerable advantage. It would give an addition of territory to the province of New Brunswick, together with a greater extent of navigation on St. John's river, and, above all, a larger stretch of natural frontier, calculated to prevent future difficulties and discussions between the two countries. If, therefore, by assenting to the proposal of the American agents, you can bring about the unanimous concurrence of the Commissioners in this measure, I am of opinion that you will promote his Majesty's real interest, and I will take the earliest opportunity, with a view to your justification, of expressing these my sentiments on the subject to his Majesty's Secretary of State.

I have the honor to be, with great truth and regard, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT LISTON.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PORTLAND, March 20, 1827.

SIR: Having had the honor to receive your letter of January 29th last, I transmit, in reply, the accompanying* report and resolves relative to the northeastern boundary of the State of Maine. The attention which you have heretofore paid to the adjustment of the United States boundary, especially in another part of the Union, assures me that you will receive the documents I have mentioned with that interest to which they are entitled. With the confidence which belongs to the patriotic and paternal character of the Government of the Union, and without complaining of it in any particular, I may be permitted to say that the growing importance of the country claimed against the United States and Maine carries along an increasing desire to have an open or confidential development of the material facts.

The report and resolves contain the evidence of the present disposition and purposes of the State, which will receive my official co-operation with the same zeal and fidelity that will cheerfully be applied, if requisite, in aiding to carry into effect any Federal measure applicable to the protection of the rights in question. The anxiety of a sovereign State to possess the documents (or copies of them) which contain the evidence of a title to soil, and of a jurisdictional authority, which it will, under the United States, maintain, if it shall discharge its duty either to those States or to itself, will be duly appreciated by yourself and by the President.

While that anxiety is here entertained by all the citizens, it is not only with reference to an important local concern, but is connected with their inclination to a harmonious action with all who consent to admit of it. In pursuance, therefore, of the resolve of the Legislature of Maine, I have the honor to solicit such information relative to the northeastern boundary of that State as the President may deem proper to consent to have communicated. It is also my duty to add that great benefit will be derived from an early determination of a claim harassing to the State, interrupting its best pursuits, threatening to some of its best hopes, and believed to be unfounded.

No. 15.

Letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to the Governor of Maine.

WASHINGTON, March 27, 1827.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which your excellency did me the honor to address to me on the 20th instant, with a copy of the report of the joint select committee of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine enclosed, both of which I have submitted to the President. The deep interest which is taken by the State of Maine in the settlement of our northeastern boundary with Great Britain is very natural; and I assure you that it is a subject on which the President feels the most lively solicitude. Mr. Gallatin is charged with, and has actually entered on, a negotiation concerning it, but which was not brought to a close at the last dates from him, nor is it probably yet terminated. At that period the prospect was that there would be no other alternative than that of referring the difference between the two Governments to arbitration, according to the provisions of the treaty of Ghent. Much difficulty was experienced even in adjusting certain preliminary points necessarily connected with the reference, and they have not yet been finally arranged.

When an application was made during the session of Congress prior to the last, by the Senators of Maine, for copies of all the papers in this Department respecting the disputed boundary, it was not deemed expedient to furnish copies of the reports and arguments of the Commissioners, the publication of which, it was believed, would be prejudicial. Copies of any surveys, maps, or documentary evidence, were offered. The same considerations which then existed are still believed to be opposed to letting copies go from this Department of those reports and arguments. With that exception, copies of any of the other papers returned by the Commissioners will be furnished whenever application is made for them.

It is stated in the report of the joint select committee that "We cannot view the acts complained of by the British Government as encroachments upon the rights of New Brunswick or Great Britain, for they relate, and were only intended to relate, to the territory within the description of the treaty." Although the President might be disposed entirely to coincide in this opinion with the State of Maine, it must not be forgotten that an opposite opinion is entertained by Great Britain, with whom we are now treating. If, whilst the controversy is unsettled, and during the progress of a negotiation, each party proceeds to take possession of what he claims to belong to him, as both assert title to the same territory, an immediate collision is unavoidable. The British Government has abstained, according to the assurances given through their minister here, from the performance of any new acts which might be construed into an exercise of the rights of sovereignty or soil over the disputed territory; and they so abstained on our representation, and at our instance. Under these circumstances, the President continues to think that it is most advisable that we should practice the like forbearance, as recommended in the letters which I had the honor of addressing to your excellency on the 4th of January of the last, and the 29th of January of the present year. This mutual forbearance is believed to be essential to the harmony between the two countries, and may have a favorable tendency in the amicable adjustment of the difference between them.

It is worthy also of consideration, that, although Maine is most, she is not the only State interested in the settlement of this question.

Your excellency may be perfectly persuaded that every effort will be employed to obtain as satisfactory and as speedy a decision of this matter as may be practicable; and that not less attention will be paid to it than has been shown on the part of the Executive of the United States in the adjustment of their boundary in another part of the Union, to which you refer, whilst it is hoped that some unpleasant incidents which occurred there may be avoided in the northeast.

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of your excellency, an extract from a despatch of Mr. Gallatin, under date the 30th October last.

No. 16.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PORTLAND, April 18, 1827.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter, bearing date March 27 ultimo, to which it is my duty, as the only organ of communication of the people of Maine, at this time, and on this occasion, to reply.

The rights to which my care will appear to you to be now directed are not, as I trust, jeoparded; but they are so interesting as to demand the sedulous attention of those functionaries of this State who are placed in relations which enable them to represent, through you, to the President the feelings and principles requiring of Maine its special regard, and which may be respectfully offered to the country and the administration.

Without bringing the subject to that test of deep and general anxiety by which, in a certain contingency, it must be tried at last, I shall offer a frank and sincere reply.

The extracts from Mr. Gallatin's communication, with which you favored me, being the foundation of some of your remarks, allow me to advert to a view of the subject to which he informs you he was led by procedures of the Legislature of New Brunswick. I now refer to what he has said as to propositions of compromise by agents of Maine and Massachusetts relating to the boundary line. The danger of inferences, under such circumstances, from the "proceedings of the Legislature of New Brunswick" is so evident that you will not be surprised by a denial of their correctness.

Assenting to the idea that "propositions on our part inconsistent with our construction of the treaty, and which would not secure to us all the waters which empty into the St. John's west of the line running north from the source of the St. Croix, would be dangerous," and being also prepared to admit that Maine would be inconsistent and unjust to herself in making such propositions, I shall satisfy you that she has not been off her guard in the manner which called forth your friendly intervention. And first allow me to assure you that there is no occasion for alarm on the part of the administration, or its minister in England, that Maine will jeopard the common welfare by failing to insist on the justice and indefeasible character of its claim, or by shrinking from a firm assertion in any alternative.

The agents, whose supposed acts "would seem, from certain proceedings of the Legislature of New Brunswick," to have been as incautious as is represented, had no authority to propose any compromise as to our boundary, and if any was offered it was officious and unwarrantable; but I am enabled to inform you that the affair has been misrepresented to Mr. Gallatin, and I should offer the proofs of the correctness of this assurance in detail if I did not believe it improper to pursue the consideration of inofficial acts and of statements ill founded or, if otherwise, inconsequential. Grateful, therefore, for the attention evinced by the caution he has given, however unnecessary, we will receive it as the pledge of his vigilance and ability.

In concluding, as to this point, let me fortify you against any apprehension that Maine will yield too much by declaring to you plainly that it is not believed that either the treaty-making or executive power of the United States extends to the cession or exchange of the territory of any State without its consent, and that, for a stronger reason, no State can barter that domain in which the Union has also an interest, and that jurisdiction which the highest political duty requires it to exercise. Maine will surely, I believe, so far maintain these principles as to warrant a reliance against indiscreet and unconstitutional concessions and a confidence in the application of her means to the repulsion of aggression. I have full reliance upon her disposition and ability to render the President all the aid which can be desired against the unfounded and presumptuous claims made equally against her and the Union to promote an object suggested and supported only by an ambition and cupidity which, although natural, is, nevertheless, on our part, altogether objectionable. If these views shall not satisfy the President of the confidence to which Maine is entitled, as to the assertion and defence of her rights, I shall with pleasure offer those further proofs which I omit at present only from the desire of engaging your indulgence for a few additional observations.

It was with much regret, not unmingled with mortification, that I considered your denial of the use of the reports and arguments of the Commissioners under the treaty of Ghent. From the want of that information, which it was hoped the United States would yield to a party having the same interests with themselves, and only desirous to sustain them, it is assumed that there are reasons for your decision through which that respect will be commanded, now, from great deference, proffered in anticipation. Wishing to act in full coincidence with the views entertained by the Federal Administration, the State must be bound to believe in a mutual regard, and to endeavor to avoid any embarrassing applications on her own part, but it may not be unsuitable for her to expect a degree of confidence in return.

All that forbearance which the occasion requires will, as I may safely assure you, be exhibited by this State. While her extensive and valuable tracts of wild land, which might otherwise soon be improved, remain unsettled; while her progress in wealth and power is checked in a most disastrous manner at the period most favorable to giving an impulse to her prosperity; while many important resources are left dormant during the pendency of the dispute as to her property and jurisdiction; while a frontier, which might soon be made strong, remains unfortified by the freemen anxious to occupy it, she will, I doubt not, forbear, on the request of the General Government, until the imperious call of duty shall summon her to occupy her inheritance. Seeking to promote, by all suitable concessions, the amicable adjustment you refer to, she will only withdraw her deference and submission when a claim unjust in itself may seem to expose a portion of her territory to incorporation with a province. With this spirit of forbearance she has sought information only as to an interest vital to herself, as well as important to the country, without any purpose calculated to excite distrust, with only such patriotic views as have rendered the refusal to comply with her request a subject of that species of surprise which a friend, predetermined to take no offence, feels when he is not treated with correspondent confidence.

Maine, sir, was with great difficulty introduced into the Union, but, if I recollect rightly the arguments which were used, she was introduced as a sovereign and independent State.

As a free, sovereign, and independent Republic, may we not be permitted to have communication with the authorities of the Union, or do they mean that we shall submit implicitly to their direction, however wise it may be, at the same time that they declare their conviction of the propriety of withholding information? The general concerns of the Union are, of course, communicated only to the whole, but that which relates to a particular community, where its daily intercourse demands information, seems to warrant the request I have made, and which I am reluctantly impelled to renew, with this modification, that any communication made in return will be received, if so required, subject to a restriction on publicity beyond a communication to the Legislature in the usual terms of confidential communications. If the President will not consent to this we must yield with the deference we owe to the station he holds, to the claims he has on our affections and confidence, to the information he possesses, and the prudence he displays, to any extent within which the absolute and indefeasible rights of Maine may not be compromitted. Will you permit me to add that, as to all beyond that, this State may probably claim the right to use her moral and physical energies as she may be directed by the future emergencies, and I am sure, if her good will shall impel her, with power enough to sustain her right to soil and jurisdiction wherever she may probably claim them against any probable foreign and arrogant assumption, especially with the aid of the General Government.

I do not wish to weary your patience by urging the particular arguments which might sustain my proposition. It is true, sir, that Maine is not the only State interested. The Union is interested, and each State is severally interested, in having a powerful community on our northeastern boundary, which may, like New York in the last, be the pride and defence of the nation in the next war. Whenever again there shall be a struggle between the natives and armies of this Republic and Great Britain, the position of Maine will require activity, strength, and confidence. She will be exposed to a large portion of danger and suffering, and will be, I hope and believe, resolute to acquire the glory to which such exposure, with unimpaired means, will invite her.

Politically peninsulated, with three foreign Governments pressing upon her borders, with the high ambition inspired, and the high responsibility created by her destination, can it be believed that she will relinquish her resources, suffer her landmarks to be removed, and yield to a most presumptuous arrogation of a foreign Power? I trust you will more highly appreciate her intelligence and spirit than to imagine that so degrading and pernicious a surrender can be consented to by her.

But is she authorized even to consider this question and to determine the extent of her municipal jurisdiction and that of the territorial limits within which she will exercise it? If a mandate of the Executive of the United States, under an act of the treaty-making power, is, upon principle, imperative, she ought to be silent and passive; but if not, however confidently she may rely upon her safety, as guarded by wisdom and patriotism, she ought to announce her wishes and her principles.

While, under treaties with Great Britain, the boundary in dispute has been settled, the difficulty has occurred only as to the application of the rule in those treaties contained to the surface of the ground. The right to the full extent of the first treaty is perfect. It was not created by that treaty, but its existence was prior to it, and no surrender could then have been made without the consent of the proprietor and the Sovereign. No surrender was made, and there is not a moral or political, in other words, a governmental force, sufficient to change the true, honest determination of the landmark. And there is nothing but sophistry and that ignoble spirit of compromise, which exists not in this Republic, which will consent to the obvious and monstrous falsehoods to which ambitious and artful pretensions have led the enemies of Maine.

In regard to the sentence which you have extracted from the report of the joint select committee, as it contains a sentiment approved by the Legislature and acquiesced in by the people, I shall trouble you with a brief comment in regard to it. It rests upon the idea before suggested, that Maine, with Massachusetts, has a perfect title in the disputed territory, and that the former State has a vested, indefeasible jurisdictional control over it, the exercise of which it may irresponsibly apply. It is a proposition which has been demonstrated by yourself so clearly as to have commanded general respect, that the abstraction of the territory of the United States cannot be made by the treaty-making or executive power. Much more, then, must the domain of a State within its acknowledged limits be sacred, and much more and more is it evident that neither Department of the Federal Government, nor all, can be the exclusive and final arbiter as to the ascertainment of a boundary already established in description; because, if one Department, or all, have this power, they may ascertain the line falsely, indirectly cede our State, converting it into a British dependency, and thus, by the arguments I had the invaluable satisfaction of hearing applied in another case, violate the Constitution. If, therefore, the committee have fallen into error, it has not been in the principle of their judgment as to the rights of this State abstractly considered, but in their view of the extent of our territory, and of the application of our authority over it. They, in fact, substantially assert that the treaty of 1783, in connexion with original grants and subsequent and correlative circumstances, established and defined our bounds, so as to preclude just complaint of our public acts within the scope of those legitimate powers which, at the discretion of the State, it may, within those bounds, anywhere apply. The doctrine of the committee can only be refuted by proving that the national authority is exclusive as to the adjustment of our exterior boundary; but let it be recollected that the present case only admits the ascertainment of a line by a rule prescribed, and not the creation of one arbitrarily, or, in other words, by arbitrament. A right was vested in a third party before the Union existed, and has been confirmed by it since. In short, the committee, it is believed, may be considered as claiming such respect as may be attached to those who have truly exhibited the sentiments of this community.

Anxious, as in my situation I cannot avoid being, for the preservation, during my continuance in office and always after, of the rights of the State, I must express my alarm at a portion of Mr. Gallatin's letter. He says: "An umpire, whether a king or farmer, rarely decides on strict principles of law; he has always a bias to try, if possible, to split the difference," &c. And yet I am informed that there has been in progress an arrangement of the preliminary points for constituting such an umpire. I cannot but hope that no arrangement will be effected which will endanger the half, from the mere circumstance of a wrongful claim to the whole, under the pitiful weakness which is liable to split the difference between right and wrong.

Let me add, in this particular part of my letter, most respectfully, but solemnly, the sentiment that Maine is bound to claim at the hands of the Federal Government the protection of the integrity of her territory, the defence of her sovereignty, and the guardianship of her State rights. She is called upon to urge this, that she may be rather permitted to rest on the parental care of the Union than driven to any independent agency, in any form, in relation to this concern.

That you may not be surprised that the State, after having fruitlessly sought information, should have determined on its course without it, give me leave to say, that, while she cannot be presumed to be informed in all particulars as to the relations of a deeply interesting character in which she is placed, she is called upon to judge as to others, and is not without the premises necessary to correct conclusions.

Whatever intelligence she might have been permitted to receive as to her relative situation, she would, as she will hereafter, cheerfully co-operate with the General Government to prevent an assumption of our territory, to whatever extent, by the King of Great Britain.

In executing the resolve of the Legislature, it will be convenient to me to possess a schedule of those documents which may be communicated. I will, therefore, hope the favor of being furnished with such an index for the direction of my inquiries.

No. 17.

Letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to the Governor of Maine.

WASHINGTON, May 7, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 18th ultimo, and to inform you that I have submitted it to the President. The solicitude which is felt by your excellency and the Legislature of Maine in regard to the settlement of our northeastern boundary, so interesting to that State and so important to the whole Union, is perfectly natural, and justly appreciated by the President; and he is entirely disposed to communicate any information in the possession of the Executive of the United States on that subject which can, in his opinion, be communicated without the danger of public detriment. Accordingly, when, at the session of Congress before the last, an application was made at this Department by the Senators from Maine for copies of all the papers, maps, and other documents reported by the Commissioners who were appointed under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, it was stated to those gentlemen that the copies would be furnished whenever requested, with the exception of the reports and arguments of the Commissioners, transcripts from which, considering their peculiar character, in the then state of the question, the President did not think it expedient to allow to be taken. The Senators from Maine availed themselves of the permission, and obtained copies of some of the maps. Copies of all the papers reported by the Commissioners, which are very voluminous, would require the services of two or three copyists for many weeks; but the labor of preparing them would be cheerfully encountered for the accommodation of the State of Maine.

The negotiation with Great Britain is still pending, but there is reason to expect that it will soon be brought to some conclusion, perhaps in a shorter time than would be requisite to copy and transmit the papers reported by the Commissioners to your excellency. The President continues to think that the public interest requires that the communication of transcripts of the reports and arguments of the Commissioners, even under the limitation proposed by your excellency, should be postponed for the present, and until it can be made without the risk of any injurious effect upon the state of the negotiation. Your excellency's experience in public affairs will enable you to make a just estimate of the reserve and delicacy which ought to be observed in all negotiations with foreign Powers involving subjects of deep national interest. This consideration has such weight that it is the uniform practice of Congress, as no one knows better than your excellency, to annex a qualification to the calls which are, from time to time, made for papers relating to the foreign negotiations of the Government. There would not be the smallest objection to an exhibition to the inspection of your excellency, or, confidentially, to any person that you might think proper to designate, of all the papers, without exception, reported by the Commissioners. I abstain from a particular notice of many of the topics of your excellency's letter, not from the least want of respect (on the contrary, I entertain the highest, personally and officially) for your excellency, but from a persuasion that the discussion of them is without utility. It has been thought most profitable to limit my answer to the specific requests contained in your letter.

I transmit herewith, in conformity with your wish, a list of the papers reported by the Commissioners, copies of any of which may be procured for the use of the State of Maine whenever desired, with the exception which has been stated.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to the President of the United States.

PORTLAND, May 19, 1827.

SIR: The situation in which this State is placed in consequence of the unexecuted provision of the treaty of Ghent relative to its northeastern boundary imposes upon me a duty which I am not permitted to compromise by my feelings of respect for yourself and the high authority with which you are invested. However discouraging may have been the correspondence I have had with the Secretary of State, I cannot decline a course deliberately determined upon, or admit the belief that a representation relating to the welfare of Maine can be unwelcome. It is not the comparatively light concern of a passing favor or the import of a transient measure that I am about to urge; but it is that of making a memorial for consideration and record as to the demesne and jurisdiction of this member of the Union.

Obliged to depend principally for information upon rumor, the tenacity of knowledge, which is power, has not, however, concealed the fact that the British Government has made a claim embracing a large tract of country adjacent to the province of New Brunswick. Information from various sources cannot fail to have produced on your mind a just impression of the importance communicated to that territory in reference to value and jurisdiction, by its qualities of soil, its variety of native productions, its streams, its situation, and all those properties calculated to render it not only a strong interior barrier to invasion, but fruitful of the means of prosperity to our maritime frontier. The State of Maine claims the propriety in an undivided moiety, and the entire jurisdiction, as far as consistent with the paramount power of the United States, in relation to that extensive tract. Having learned that the title thereto is involved in the details of a diplomatic arrangement, conducted under the sanction of the Executive Department of the Federal Government, Maine, although not consulted, yet bound from deference to pay a due respect to reasons, the nature and force of which she is, from a studious and mysterious reserve, rendered unable to comprehend, believes she ought to present her expostulations in regard to any measures threatening her with injury.

The Secretary of State has informed me that the disputed claims to land along our northeastern boundary are to be submitted to arbitration. By arbitration, I understand a submission to some foreign Sovereign or State, who will decide at pleasure on the whole subject; who will be under no absolute obligations or effectual restraint by virtue of the treaty of 1783; whose conscience will not be bound to impartiality and justice by the solemn sanction of an oath; and whose feelings may naturally be biased against a Republic accused of inordinate ambition, and in whose peace and prosperity there is an interesting lesson and example for nations.

The treaty-making power of the United States on one side, and his Britannic Majesty on the other, engage to consider the decision of the arbitrator final and conclusive. Let me say that to a surrender of territory, involved as a possibility, it will, I trust, be made evident that there is another party not to be an indifferent spectator of its own delaceration. The mind, in contemplating our prospects, is carried to the Courts of Europe, and led to scan the tribunals to which you may refer this subject. It would be unsuitable for me to comment on the dispositions or talents of foreign Sovereigns or States; but it is not in cold blood that I can anticipate the committing the destinies of Maine to an irresponsible arbiter, to be found in a distant land, and necessarily unqualified to act in the case. The character of this arbitership has been portentously exhibited by Mr. Gallatin in that letter in which, on the authority of intelligence from New Brunswick, he most erroneously ascribed an interposition by the agents of Massachusetts and Maine as to a compromise of our boundary. Suffice it to say that the proposed arbitration will jeopard, without her consent and against her will, the rights of Maine; and allow me to add that, if called upon to make the required sacrifice, she will be compelled to deliberate on an alternative which will test the strictness of her principles and the firmness of her temper.

The acknowledgment of the mother country, and the exercise of the inherent power of the people, formed Massachusetts into a body politic, orignally independent of the present Union and of every foreign Government. All the territorial and jurisdictional rights which she could acquire were absolutely her own, and remain so to this day, excepting so far as she has granted them to the United States or to Maine. The treaty of 1783, containing the acknowledgment of her emancipation and exaltation to self-government, was not with the States, exclusively, as a federal body, but partially, at least, as independent communities—that is to say, if in some points of view they appeared as forming a national, in other they were regarded as being an allied association; hence the acknowledgment of independence applied distinctly to each State, as did also the relinquishment by the King of Great Britain of "the propriety and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof." It is necessary to notice that, at the period of the negotiation of the treaty of peace, the confederation, to a slight extent, and in reference to a few objects, drew the States into concert, and gave them a unity of character; but the most superficial examination shows that the confederacy had not a common interest in territory or territorial rights, and that the recognition of these bore upon the ancient colonies only as they held under their charters, or as the fruits of their wisdom and valor, in fee simple and absolute sovereignty.

When, by the ratification of the conventions of the States, Massachusetts surrendered to a superintending agency a portion of her power, she yielded no right to dispose of her soil or to abstract any part of it from her jurisdiction. She imparted no authority to enter into new engagements, or, what may be equivalent, to modify the means of enforcing an existing provision of an original compact made in part with herself, nor to expose, without her own consent or that of her successor and representative, to the fate of foreign arbitrament her dearly purchased and sacred rights. On the contrary, Maine, now standing in the place of her parent Republic, may deem the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent as having led to a course endangering her rights, and rendered more painful and alarming by her exclusion from a proper intercommunication and legitimate consideration as a party in the case.

Whatever character appertained to the confederation, or to those who entered into that holy league, it is manifest that the States were not identified and confounded with the Union in relation to the question here presented, under the original treaty of peace and limits. I must, therefore, respectfully urge that, however the policy and principles of the Executive Department of the Federal Government may dictate the imposition upon Maine of silence and forbearance, and however plainly may be indicated the disposition to treat the subject as if merely national, she will not observe any procedure by the United States and Great Britain for the severance of her territory and the abrogation of her authority without a sensibility too serious to be passive. She holds that her domain is not the subject of partition.

I pause, to render more obvious the relevancy of these remarks. Of two principles on which it depends, it may be sufficient to state but one. The power of subjecting to arbitration, with an absolute right in the arbiter to form and establish a territorial limit, is equivalent to the power of ceding territory. The arbiter is the legal substitute and mutual agent of the parties, in this case assumed to be the United States and Great Britain; his acts are their acts, and there is a positive pledge to an unconditional obedience to his behest. It is the delegation of the sovereignty of a despot. The effect may be the cession of all Maine, or of only a part; but if of any, the Government of the United States will participate, by an unauthorized submission, in the injustice of the umpire.

It is not controverted that the control of our foreign relations belongs to the United States as to objects which have arisen under the Constitution or existing laws; but in regard to rights acquired by an independent party, and interests in property vested by acts anterior to the existence of that compact, the interposition by the Federal Executive, without an express grant of power, seems to be gratuitous. No statesman will assert that the treaty-making power is competent to an act transcending the scope of the combined trusts of the Government.

I advert to principles familiar to your mind because it is my duty to present the opinions here entertained. What, then, is the authority or agency which, it may be assumed, would produce no remonstrances from the State the most deeply concerned? Not surely that which admits of what is termed by Mr. Gallatin splitting the difference, nor of conceding property which does not belong to the United States, nor curtailing a jurisdiction above their rightful control. Whatever may be urged to the contrary, it is confidently asserted, not only that the provision of the treaty of 1783 is imperative, but that it describes our boundary with a precision which shames the British claim, and, connected with the making of that claim, casts a shade over the lustre of the British character. By negations we may sometimes arrive at an affirmative. I say, then, that the boundary on the surface of the earth does not rest along the Penobscot, which the British, then perhaps contemplating that vast empire they anticipated in North America, insidiously and surreptitiously seized during the late war. That boundary cannot be established there. It does not rest where the British minister has presumed to place it. The making the claim does not determine its justice, nor the obstinacy of persisting in it create with this powerful nation the necessity of a concession, which will as surely be followed by a more enormous one as it is certain that the Roman Empire was ignominiously subjugated through the base spirit of submission to incipient wrong. Enough has been said to meet the obvious and natural inquiry, what is expected of the Government, or, may I not say, what is demanded of it? It knows the demerit of the British claim; it is conscious of the rights of Maine; and hereafter it cannot be said that her views have not been exhibited. She might therefore be forever justified in the exercise of her jurisdiction and sovereign State rights over the disputed ground. Her faith is not pledged, nor is that of the Union, to permit any reduction of her actual territory; and there is no artifice of construction or force of authority to break off that great component part of her domain now assailed, and to bind her judgment to acquiescence. The cession would be nugatory; and if for a time she should be compelled to submit to it, the abeyance produced by power will not preclude the right of resumption which justice may at some period award.

It has been urged that this concern is so exclusively national that Maine is obtrusive in presenting her views to the consideration of the Executive. It is, nevertheless, believed that she is under high obligations vigilantly to supervise her interests, freely to assert her rights, and not to yield readily to the discouraging but perfectly natural inclination to see in her conduct the humblest deference, and an entire, unquestioning, improvident obedience. She commits no intentional error, and communes with the frankness which belongs to her independence, her character, and her station with her sister Republics and with the Union. In doing so she evinces her respect for their integrity, intelligence, and patriotism; and she avoids, by a prudent forecast, that danger of collision, bred from present distrust, and that querulous and exasperated temper usually exhibited when the evils of measures are experienced, and when causes are appreciated by their effects.

Repeating to you the expression of my regret that you have been pleased to refuse that information contemplated by a resolution of the State, I shall nevertheless continue to hope for the preservation, under the protecting care of Government, of that now exposed territory, destined, under any proprietor, to be soon occupied by a numerous population, engaged in all the pursuits which sustain human life and adorn human nature.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PORTLAND, April 29, 1827.

SIR: I am induced by considerations which I deem important to avail myself of your obliging offer to obtain copies of all the papers in your office relative to the boundary between this State and New Brunswick which the President may permit to be transmitted. This request applies to maps, with the exception of the map already furnished of the country explored in the years 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820, by order of the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, by Hiram Burnham, United States surveyor.

I have the honor also to solicit transcripts of the arguments of Mr. Chipman and Mr. Sullivan, as agents under the commission for determining the true St. Croix, and of the arguments of Mr. Austin and Mr. Chipman, under the fourth article of the treaty of Ghent, together with the report of the Commissioners in both cases.

Excuse me for adverting to the punctilio of expense, which I shall wish to see liquidated.

I have made a communication to the President on the subject of our northeastern boundary, which, you will perceive, from its nature, was necessarily directed immediately to him.

Letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to the Governor of Maine.

WASHINGTON, June 9, 1827.

SIR: The President has received the letter which your excellency addressed to him under date the 29th ultimo, and I am charged by him to convey to you his assurances that your observations on the interesting subject of our northeastern boundary shall receive attentive and respectful consideration. I beg leave to add, that in no contingency is any arbitration of the difference between the United States and Great Britain, relative to that boundary, contemplated, but that for which provision has been solemnly made by treaty. It would afford great satisfaction to the President if a resort to that alternative for quieting the dispute could be avoided, by obtaining from Great Britain an explicit acknowledgment of the territorial claims of Maine in their whole extent. Candor, however, compels me to state that the prospects of such an acknowledgment at the present time are not encouraging.

No. 23.

Letter from Daniel Brent, Esq., of the Department of State of the United States, to the Governor of Maine.

WASHINGTON, June 15, 1827.

SIR: I was directed by the Secretary, before his departure from this city, a few days ago, on a visit to Kentucky, to have copies prepared of the books, &c., &c., requested in your letter to him of the 29th of May, and to transmit them to your excellency with all possible despatch; and I have just collected together the manuscript books containing the arguments of Mr. Chipman and Mr. Sullivan, agents under the commission for determining the true St. Croix, and those containing the arguments of Mr. Austin and Mr. Chipman, agents under the 4th article of the treaty of Ghent, together with the reports of the Commissioners in both cases, fourteen in number, and averaging each about two hundred and fifty pages of close writing on foolscap paper; transcripts of these being particularly noticed by you as wanting. Added to those, the arguments, reports, and papers, including the maps, under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, which come, it would seem to me, within the scope of your request, embrace a mass of writing nearly as voluminous as that of these books. I take the liberty, under these circumstances, of troubling your excellency with this communication, to apprise you of the extent of the transcripts which appear to be thus required, and of the delay which must, of consequence, attend the execution of your excellency's commission, as it is at present understood by me.

I beg leave, however, to state that the subject is involved in so much obscurity, from the prolix and complicated arguments, reports, and replies of the several Commissioners, agents, astronomers, and surveyors, that I do not like to venture upon making a selection for the copyists, though I feel fully persuaded that this might be advantageously done, to the great abridgment of their work, and to the expediting of the fulfilment of your wish. The Senators from your State, Messrs. Holmes and Chandler, have seen the books, and, as well as I recollect, were furnished with copious extracts from them; and perhaps they might favor this Department, through your excellency, with some suggestion leading to a convenient curtailment, which should, nevertheless, be entirely compatible with your excellency's object, in reference to the copies required by you.

No. 24.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to Daniel Brent, Esq., of the Department of State of the United States.

PORTLAND, July 14, 1827.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter, referring me to the Hon. Messrs. Holmes and Chandler, as to reducing the amount of the draught I had made on the proffered kindness of the Secretary of State. I have availed myself of all possible benefit from your suggestion, but am still disposed to accept, without reservation, the favor he so politely tendered; which is done with the greater sense of obligation, because that favor cannot embrace the principal objects first contemplated, and is, therefore, rendered more valuable as to the residue. It is also believed that Maine ought not to lose the opportunity of placing among her archives all those documents which she can obtain relating to a concern so important as that of a third of her territory.

Extract of a letter from the Governor of Massachusetts to the Governor of Maine, dated EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT OF MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, July 2, 1827.

"I beg also to avail myself of this opportunity to acknowledge the receipt of several interesting communications from your excellency, in reference to the northeastern boundary, which will receive the most respectful and faithful consideration. My own opinion of the importance of the general views which you have, in detail, and with great force, presented on this subject, has been heretofore expressed in official communications to the Legislature of this Commonwealth and in a correspondence had with the Department of State of the United States."

No. 25.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PORTLAND, September 3, 1827.

SIR: Since I had the honor of addressing you on the subject of the northeastern boundary of this State facts have been placed within my knowledge which, more imperatively than any other, urge me to solicit the attention of the President to the situation in which we are placed. It is now rendered evident that the representation made to you, and communicated in your letter of the 27th of March last, that the British Government has abstained from the performance of any new acts which might be construed into an exercise of the rights of sovereignty or soil over the disputed territory, was entirely incorrect. That representation, connected with the recommendation by the President, has undoubtedly had much influence with Maine in producing a forbearance which will probably be objected against her, in comparison with the opposite course by Great Britain, as containing an implied acknowledgment of the rightfulness of the jurisdiction which has been exercised for years, by a foreign Power, in the manner and to an extent which I beg leave now to exhibit, as presented to me by credible testimony. Along the St. John's river, following it up westwardly from the junction of the Matawascah, is a very flourishing settlement, containing a considerable number of peaceably disposed and industrious inhabitants. Among these is a proportion of American emigrants, some of whom hold their land under deeds from Massachusetts and Maine, and the others, or nearly all of them, are anxious to obtain titles in the same way. The latter at present occupy as tenants at sufferance, and neither recognize the lands as being Crown lands, nor do they voluntarily submit to British authority. These persons the Government of New Brunswick treats in all respects as aliens, denies their right to hold real estate, assesses upon them the alien tax, and refuses to permit to them the transmission of their produce as American. I forbear to speak of many acts of violence and petty vexation of which they also complain. The other inhabitants are uniformly treated as British subjects, and new acts of jurisdiction, even to requirement of military duty, are as frequently exercised as the ordinary operations of a municipal control require. Before expressing to you the sentiments which should be connected with the exhibition of these facts, allow me to ask your attention to the sacrifice to which Maine is submitting while her formidable adversary is thus industriously fortifying his positions. She owns, as it is believed, as clearly as she owns any other portion of property, a tract not less than six millions of acres, which, with the exception of about a million and a half situated northeastward of the St. John and Matawascah, is generally valuable for soil and timber, so that the latter along one river has been estimated to be worth $180,000, which is only equal to an average of $150 per square mile. The use of these vast resources is forbidden to her by the circumstance that a claim is made upon it by a foreign Power, and by the respect she entertains for the President's recommendation of a mutual forbearance; yet that Power is in the meantime applying its jurisdiction in the same manner as if the representations of its minister created no pledge and no obligations to sustain their correctness. While it is natural that the same Power should seek to render the province of New Brunswick wealthy and powerful by the prize it hopes to win, it might have been expected that there should be no repugnance between its acts and declarations. The case which will be presented must, as you perceive, necessarily require of Maine a consideration of the duties she owes to her citizens, not left in the condition of neutal subjects without government, as has been supposed, but actually subjugated.

To allow our lands to remain uncultivated, and our public improvements to be postponed through a State necessity, is a sacrifice capable of being endured, compared with that of seeing dominion usurped over those who owe us allegiance, and to whom protection is due. It has been the doctrine of the Government, and of a great portion of the people of the United States, at times when Great Britain was heretofore prosecuting claims against this country, more extensive but not less unjust than the present, that an injury to a single citizen inflicted a wound upon the body politic; and that an evil inflicted upon a part demanded the making a common cause for its remedy.

In such a sentiment, believed to be now as fully as ever entertained, I find my apology for this renewed appeal for protection of the interests of Maine against the reduction of its territory and the oppression of its citizens through foreign interposition.

Availing myself of the present opportunity to offer the President a further view of this subject, which I omitted purposely on former occasions, it is flattering to be able to bring in aid the analogy of the opinions understood by the nation to have been uniformly entertained by our statesmen and jurists in the case of the Mississippi. It being assumed that the protection solicited will be yielded, and that the property demanded cannot be surrendered in any form, or under any mode of procedure, except as superior force may compel submission to a cession of State territory, it is natural to advert to the value of the property at stake. That value is so enhanced as to place it beyond calculation when we apply the doctrine applied to the navigation of the Mississippi, that the ownership of the headwaters of rivers gives the right of free navigation to their sources. The doctrine, subject to some modification of a political and fiscal character, has the same application under the laws of nature and nations, in reference to our right of navigation through the St. John, as this nation always demanded for it in connexion with the great question with Spain, which called it into view. Let me entreat you, then, to look at once to the exciting cause of the cupidity of Great Britain, and the anxiety of Maine as to this profligate claim. The materials for ship building on the disputed territory may be called inexhaustible, and the soil is so fertile that the Matawascah settlement exports many thousand bushels of grain. The towns near the Bay of Fundy, both on the Scoodic and St. John, under the exclusive policy of Great Britain, derive immense annual profits from ship building, and they look with an unholy interest and intent on the extensive forests of Maine. If the merits of the case admitted more measured terms I should use them. But believing that all posterity would reprobate the weakness of yielding what is once so rightfully ours, and so important, I use the freedom which the occasion demands. Beyond what I have urged, let me add that there will be, if you shall defeat the claim upon our territory, a facility of artificial water communication, which, regarding its extent, is unparalleled in the geography of this country. It will embrace all the waters of the St. John, Penobscot, Kennebec, and St. Lawrence.

If the General Government will employ an agent of this State, it will, I am sure, be responsible for proving to him the correctness of all I have stated, to his entire satisfaction and in the most authentic forms.

I cannot close without assuring you of my confirmed belief that Maine will never assent to the result of an arbitration unfavorable to her interests in the great concern in reference to which my duty has compelled me to trouble you with my repeated communications.

No. 26.

Letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to the Governor of Maine.

WASHINGTON, September 14, 1827.

SIR: I have received the letter which your excellency did me the honor to address to me on the third instant, and I have lost no time in transmitting a copy of it to the President of the United States, who will no doubt give it the most respectful and deliberate examination. In the meantime I have also transmitted an extract from it to the British minister, accompanied by the expression that the necessary orders will be given on the part of the British Government to enforce that mutual forbearance from any new acts tending to strengthen the claims of either party to the disputed territory which it has been understood, in the correspondence between Mr. Vaughan and myself, would be on both sides.

No. 27.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick.

PORTLAND, October 22, 1827.

SIR: It has been represented to me, as Governor of the State of Maine, that one of its citizens, of the name of John Baker, while residing on its territory, has been arrested and is detained in jail at Frederickton. A circumstance so interesting to the peace and character of the State and country compels me to solicit information, which I do with the respect and amicable disposition due authorities of a neighboring Government. It is hoped that you will be pleased to communicate all the facts in the case, and that the result will be to allay the anxiety produced by the impression that the privileges of an American citizen and the jurisdiction of a sovereign Power has been invaded. Maine has not only a wish to be amicably connected with New Brunswick, but her interests impel her to seek a friendly intercommunication; yet you must be aware that honor and justice demand of her the utmost respect and devotion, on her part, to the rights of every citizen.

The attempt to extend the jurisdiction of New Brunswick over the disputed territory will compel counteraction from Maine. The result must be productive of so much evil that it is not deemed indelicate or disrespectful to advert to it. The arrest of our citizens, on what we believe to be a part of our State, will demand its utmost energies for resistance.

Mr. Daveis' appointment.

STATE OF MAINE.

SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE, Portland, November 5, 1827.

SIR: I am directed to inform you that you have this day been appointed by the Governor of this State an agent, with authority to act in behalf of the State of Maine, in obtaining information, either informal or by authenticated statements, as to all objects relating to rights of property and jurisdiction between the Governments of the said State and the province of New Brunswick.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

AMOS NICHOLS, Secretary of State.

CHARLES STUART DAVEIS, Esq., Portland.

No. 29.

Letter from the Governor of the State of Maine to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick.

PORTLAND, November 5, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to solicit your friendly reception of Charles S. Daveis, Esquire, appointed to obtain information relative to our border difficulties. It has been considered due to yourself to select for this agency a gentleman of high character, and who, in the most acceptable manner, may inquire into concerns calculated to produce a war between the United States and Great Britain, unless, by the forbearance of injuries by New Brunswick and Maine, it may be prevented.

In whatever point of view you may regard this subject, I have full confidence that you will permit Mr. Daveis, if only in the capacity of a stranger and a gentleman, to pass, with your countenance, through the territory over which you preside, to the different portions of country he may wish to visit, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts relative to complaints of violence and injustice committed on the citizens of Maine.

This measure has been adopted not to interrupt, but to cherish, the most respectful sentiments and amicable disposition between all those who may be concerned.

Mr. Daveis' authority does not specially designate his object, but you are requested to consider him as fully empowered to demand the release of John Baker, a citizen of Maine, said to be confined in the jail at Frederickton, and that the persons who arrested him and conveyed him there may be delivered up to be tried by the laws of this State, and dealt with as justice may require.

No. 30.

Letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to the Governor of Maine.

WASHINGTON, October 30, 1827.

SIR: I have committed to the charge of Mr. William Prentiss, who will have the honor to deliver them and this letter to your excellency, and who is employed for that purpose, twenty-four manuscript volumes of books, according to the accompanying list, on the subject of the north and northeasterly boundary lines of the United States, prepared at this office for the State of Maine, conformably with the suggestions and desire expressed by your excellency. From the extent of these manuscripts, it is more than probable that they embrace copies of a great deal more, in documents, discussion, and argument, than was in the contemplation of your excellency, or than was desired for the use of your State; but to secure a full compliance with your excellency's views, and to guard against any deficiency, I gave directions to have a transcript made of everything which might by possibility be useful or interesting upon the occasion, having the remotest bearing upon the subject, with the limitation stated in my previous correspondence; and as the selection was necessarily committed to others who may not have had a very accurate view of the extent of the commission intrusted to them, it is not improbable that it may comprise much which may be found superfluous.

I send, also, forty-two copies of maps, likewise prepared with the same views, and under the same circumstances, which Mr. Prentiss will also have the honor to deliver to your excellency.

No 31.

Letter from the Governor of Maine to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PORTLAND, November 16, 1827.

SIR: I have received the documents you caused to be transmitted with the satisfaction naturally excited by so valuable a testimonial of regard for the wishes of this State. An attention which has occasioned so much trouble cannot fail to produce a strong sentiment of respect, and to call into action a proper sensibility, in acknowledgment of a burdensome service, from those very deeply interested in obtaining it.

I have also this day received your communication of the date of the 10th instant. From its contents, I am made sensible that the objections I have had the honor to urge against the submission to a foreign umpire of the territorial and jurisdictional rights of Maine, without consulting or advising her as to the conditions, have not been deemed available. If any injury shall result to her, the appeal will be made to the people of this country and to posterity. It has not seemed arrogant or presumptuous to have expected a recognition of her rights, and to have asked that if she is to be made a sacrifice, she might not be devoted without some consideration, on her part, of the terms.

It is not probable that your various important engagements can have allowed to my former communications more than the cursory glance which enables the officer in most cases to despatch business, especially in those cases in regard to which he has marked out his course; but, to save repetition, I must ask your indulgence to refer to those communications as containing statements and principles near to the hearts and interests of this community. When you cautioned us against suggestions of compromise and acts of precaution, it was not believed that it was that you might the more easily throw us within the power of an umpire, but that you intended to intimate that the powerful arm of the Federal Government was holding its ample shield before us. At last we learn that our strength, security, and wealth, are to be subjected to the mercy of a foreign individual, who, it has been said by your minister, "rarely decides upon strict principles of law," and "has always a bias to try, if possible, to split the difference." I cannot but yield to the impulse of saying, most respectfully, that Maine has not been treated as she has endeavored to deserve.

The painful duty of laying before you the testimony to prove the aggressions committed upon the citizens of this State by the inhabitants of New Brunswick was seasonably discharged. It is feared that the violence committed has been but the commencement of a system. The President will surely bestow his attention upon the case of John Baker, who is stated to have been arrested on land conveyed to him in fee simple, in the year 1825, by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of Maine. The conveyance was virtually a certificate of citizenship and a pledge for protection. It was also an act of State policy, a deliberate political measure, and the "Old Commonwealth" and this Republic may well call upon the President and Secretary of State to be their protectors. All those who have contended against the impressment of the sailor in our ships will resent the arrest of the yeoman on the frontier. Connecting this injury with others which have been suffered and threatened, it has been deemed proper to appoint an agent of the State, to inquire, in a friendly and respectful manner, into the facts, whose report will enable me to answer fully and correctly the questions you have proposed. It is, with great deference, submitted, that every investigation of this subject will satisfy the Federal Government that the representations I have had the honor to present might have been worthy a serious consideration, which I doubt not they have received, although possibly too late. The communications to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick and other documents will accompany this letter.

Proclamation by the Governor of the State of Maine.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, Portland, November 9, 1827.

Whereas it has been made known to this State that one of its citizens has been conveyed from it by a foreign Power to a jail in the province of New Brunswick, and that many trespasses have been committed by inhabitants of the same province upon the sovereignty of Maine, and the rights of those she is bound to protect:

Be it also known that, relying on the Government and people of the Union, the proper exertion will be applied to obtain reparation and security.

Those, therefore, suffering wrong, or threatened with it, and those interested by sympathy on account of the violation of our territory and immunities, are exhorted to forbearance and peace, so that the preparations for preventing the removal of our landmarks and guarding the sacred and inestimable rights of American citizens may not be embarrassed by any unauthorized acts.

ENOCH LINCOLN.

No. 33.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to the Governor of Maine.

WASHINGTON, November 27, 1827.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which your excellency did me the honor to address to me on the 16th instant, with its accompaniments, all of which have been laid before the President. He sees, with great regret, the expression of the sentiment of your excellency, that "Maine has not been treated as she has endeavored to deserve." Without engaging, at this time, in a discussion of the whole subject of our dispute with Great Britain about the northeastern boundary of the United States, in which the State of Maine is so deeply interested, which would be altogether unprofitable, I am sure I shall obtain your excellency's indulgence for one or two general observations, which seem called for by the above sentiment.

By the treaty of Ghent, on the contingency which unhappily occurred, of a non-concurrence between the British and American Commissioners in fixing that boundary, they were directed, respectively, to report to their Governments, and the difference thus left unadjusted was to be referred to a Sovereign arbitrator. Your excellency, in the course of the correspondence which has passed between you and this Department, has protested against this reference, and your objections to it have received the most respectful consideration. The fulfilment of the solemn obligations imposed upon the United States by the faith of treaties, and the duty with which the President is charged by the Constitution, of taking care that the laws (of which our treaties with foreign Powers form part) be faithfully executed, did not appear to leave him at liberty to decline the stipulated reference. If any other practical mode of settling the differences had occurred, or been suggested by your excellency to the President, it would have received friendly and deliberate consideration.

It is certainly most desirable that nations should arrange all differences between them by direct negotiation rather than through the friendly agency of third Powers. This has been attempted, and has failed. The Government of the United States is fully convinced that the right to the territory in dispute is with us and not with Great Britain. The convictions of Maine are not stronger in respect to the validity of our title than those which are entertained by the President. But Great Britain professes to believe the contrary. The parties cannot come to the same conclusion. In this state of things what ought to be done? National disputes can be settled only amicably or by an appeal to the sword. All will agree that before resorting to the latter dreadful alternative every friendly and peaceful measure should be tried and have failed. It is a happy expedient, where nations cannot themselves adjust their differences, to avail themselves of the umpirage of a friendly and impartial Power. It multiplies the chances of avoiding the greatest of human calamities. It is true that it is a mode not free from all objection; and Mr. Gallatin has adverted to one in the extract which you give from one of his despatches. But objectionable as it may be, it is better, and not more uncertain, than the events of war. Your excellency seems to think that the clearness of our right should prevent the submission of the controversy to an arbitrator. But the other party professes to be equally convinced of the indisputable nature of his claim; and if that consideration were to operate on the one side, it would equally influence the other. The consequence will be at once perceived. Besides, the clearness of our title will attend it before the arbitrator, and, if we are not deceived in it, his favorable decision is inevitable.

The President regrets, therefore, that in conducting the negotiation with Great Britain he could not conform to the views of your excellency by refusing to carry into effect a treaty to the execution of which the good faith of the nation stood pledged, and which was, moreover, enjoined by the express terms of the Constitution.

But if he could have brought himself to disregard this double obligation under which he is placed, how could the interests of Maine have been advanced? Both parties stand pledged to each other to practice forbearance, and to abstain from further acts of sovereignty on the unoccupied waste, until the question of right is settled. If that question cannot be settled by the parties themselves, and may not be settled by arbitration, how is it to be determined? The remaining alternative has been suggested. Whether the time has arrived for the use of that does not belong to the President, but to another branch of the Government, to decide.

I cannot but hope that your excellency, upon a review of the whole subject, in a spirit of candor, will be disposed to think that the Executive of the United States has been endeavoring, with the utmost zeal, in regard to our northeastern boundary, to promote the true interests of the United States and of the State of Maine; and this respectable State has been treated neither with neglect nor injustice.

No. 34.

Letter from the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to the Governor of Maine.

FREDERICKTON, N. B., November 15, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 22d October, requesting me to communicate all the circumstances respecting the arrest of the individual named in your excellency's letter.

It is not for me to question the propriety of your excellency's opening a correspondence with the Government of this province on a question now pending in negotiation between his Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, as contracted under the treaty of Ghent; but it would neither be consistent with my sense of duty nor in conformity with my instructions to give the explanations your excellency requests to any persons excepting those with whom I am directed to correspond, or under whose orders I am placed.

Should any reference be made by the General Government of the United States to his Majesty's minister upon this or any other matter connected with the Government of this province, it will be my duty to afford his excellency the fullest information, to enable him to give whatever explanation he may deem proper.

Although, for these reasons, I must decline any further correspondence with your excellency on this subject, yet it is in entire unison with the sentiments and disposition which I know to animate his Majesty's Government that I take this occasion to assure your excellency of my sincere and cordial desire to do all in my power, so far as I personally am at liberty to use any discretion in the duties with which I am imperatively charged, to meet with respect and consideration the amicable disposition which your excellency professes. I trust my conduct will be found to evince a just and manifest solicitude to repress and punish any acts on the disputed territory which might lead to the interruption of a good understanding between the two countries, and to keep the question in a state propitious for a speedy and amicable adjustment.

IN THE SUPREME COURT.—Exchequer side.

YORK, to wit:

Be it remembered, that Thomas Wetmore, Esq., Attorney General of our sovereign lord the King for this his Majesty's province of New Brunswick, who prosecutes for our said lord the King, comes, in his own proper person, into the court of our said lord the King, before the justices of our said lord the King, at Frederickton, on the seventeenth day of September, in the eighth year of the reign of our sovereign lord the now King, and, for our said lord the King, gives the court here to understand and be informed—That whereas a certain tract or parcel of land situate in the parish of Kent, in the county of York, in the said province, and lying on both sides of the river St. John, between the mouth of the Madawaska river and the river St. Francis, and containing, in the whole, fifty thousand acres, in the hands and possession of our said lord the King, on the first day of February, in the first year of his reign, and before, and continually after, was, and of right ought to be, and yet ought to be, in the right of his Imperial Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and as part of the dominions of our said lord the King, in this province, and for so long a time as there is no remembrance of any man to the contrary has been in the possession of the said lord the King and his predecessors, the Kings and Queens of Great Britain and Ireland, and a part of the dominions of the said Crown: Nevertheless, one John Baker, of the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, farmer, the laws of the said lord the King in nowise regarding, but intending the disherison of the said lord the King in the premises, on the first day of February, in the second year of the reign of our said present sovereign lord the King, and on divers days and times, before and since, with force and arms, and without any lawful authority, in and upon the possession of the said lord the King, of a part of his said lands, to wit: one hundred acres thereof, lying on the westerly side of the Land Turtle or Mariumpticook river, a branch of the said river St. John, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, intruded and entered, and erected and built thereon a certain house and other edifices, and cut and fell divers, to wit: five hundred timber and other trees thereon standing and growing, of the value, together, of one hundred pounds, and took and carried away the timber and wood arising from the said trees, and of his own will disposed thereof, and the issues and profits of the same lands accruing, received, and had, and yet doth receive and have, to his own use, and still holds and keeps possession of the lands; and the said trespass aforesaid, hitherto and yet continuing, to the great annoyance of our said lord the King, in contempt of our said lord the King, and contrary to the laws and against the peace of our said lord the King.

JOHN RUGGLES, Speaker.

Report of Charles S. Daveis, Esq., agent appointed by the Executive of the State of Maine to inquire into and report upon certain facts relating to aggressions upon the rights of the State, and of individual citizens thereof, by inhabitants of the province of New Brunswick.

PORTLAND, January 31, 1828.

SIR: I have already acquainted your excellency with my proceedings at Frederickton, and the manner in which I had performed the duty assigned to me, by your appointment, within the province of New Brunswick.

In pursuance of the further appointment to inquire into the nature of aggressions complained of as having been committed by inhabitants of New Brunswick upon persons residing near the frontier, within the limits of this State, I endeavored to prosecute the inquiry, and to obtain correct information by the best means that were in my power. In the actual condition in which your excellency will perceive the whole inhabited portion of the country bordering upon the river St. John, or any of its branches, within our boundary, or the region that is now termed disputed territory, to be, it will be for your excellency to judge with what benefit I could have proceeded to the highest points of American settlement without the advantage of a sanction from the adjoining authority. It happened, however, that I was enabled, in company with the gentlemen appointed to make corresponding inquiries by the President of the United States, to see several persons who had come to Houlton from the country above the river Madawaska, in consequence of the state of things there existing, or who were engaged in opening a winter road, as a communication for the people living on the river Aroostook, direct to that plantation. The statements of these persons were taken under oath, at my request, before a magistrate of the county of Washington. Other testimony has been also collected in the same form by another respectable magistrate of the same county, among the settlers on the Aroostook; and other evidence has likewise been obtained, from which your excellency may be able, in some measure, to fill up the outline thus exhibited in regard to the true state of affairs in that quarter. It is proper for me to say, that I should not have been deterred from undertaking to complete it by any apprehension of inconvenience, but my situation was not perfectly free from embarrassment; time had been consumed by circumstances beyond my expectation or control, and obstacles existed to my progress which would have rendered it difficult to procure positive testimony anywhere in the district of country upon the river St. John, extending above the river Madawaska.

The first course of inquiry relates to the condition of settlers on the river Aroostook. The rights of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts were exercised upon the territory situated on this river at a very early period after the source of the St. Croix was settled under the convention of 1794. In executing this convention it was distinctly admitted by the representatives of the British Government in this country that the boundary line of the treaty of 1783 crossed the St. John. Grants were accordingly made by the Legislature of Massachusetts of sections of land embracing both banks of the Aroostook and bordering on the boundary line, namely, one to the town of Plymouth and one to General Eaton. Locations of these lands were made, and surveys were commenced under the authority of Massachusetts, and lines were run around one of the tracts more than twenty years ago, and lottings were made in the year 1812.

These acts were performed in the presence of the Provincial Government established on the borders of the river St. John. That stream afforded the only communication then open to this country, and thence supplies and assistants were procured for the purpose of making the above survey in 1806 or 1807. It is not known that any further acts were exercised on behalf of the original proprietors of these granted lands, or that any improvements were made upon them prior to the late war with Great Britain. The further occupation of this remote frontier for the purpose of agriculture was necessarily suspended during that period; nor is it known that there was a single settler of any description upon the Aroostook when this interruption ceased, at the conclusion of peace in 1815. This event was succeeded by a course of seasons and circumstances unfavorable to the progress of population and improvement in that quarter, and also by the measures which ensued for the separation of Maine. Upon the establishment of this State the survey of this section of country was resumed by a joint commission of the two States, for the purpose of dividing their common property, pursuant to the provisions of the act of separation, according to the direction of their respective Legislatures. The progress of these surveys was observed in the province of New Brunswick, and they have been extended over nearly all the country in the territory of Maine watered by the Aroostook.

It was discovered that trespasses were committed on this territory, by persons belonging to the province, in cutting timber. Opportunity has existed for pursuing such practices with impunity, in the open and unguarded state of the country, from the ease of access thereto, by persons engaged in that business from the river St. John. This operation was arrested by the authority of this State, and partial indemnity obtained for the trespasses that had taken place, and, upon objection being made, the practice of granting licenses for this purpose, which it was presumed had issued improvidently, was relinquished by the Government of New Brunswick. Subsequent to the last census, and the adoption of the above proceedings by the authority of this State, in connexion with Massachusetts, a number of persons, some citizens of the United States and others formerly belonging to the British provinces, principally descendants of persons born in this country, out of the province of New Brunswick, before the Revolution, have settled on this territory. A few foreigners are intermixed with the Americans, and a small number of Irish are understood to have planted themselves in the neighborhood of the line. Some seem to have gone on under the persons who have cut timber. With whatever impression the original trespassers may have gone on, the present settlers appear to have established themselves generally in that country under the opinion that it was American territory. They understood that they were within the boundary line, as it had been repeatedly run. They were so informed by respectable persons, and assured to the same effect by public agents. They learned that a part of the land had been granted by the Government, and knew that the country was surveyed by the States; and their object was to obtain title of confirmation to their possessions either from the proprietor or the States. It is believed that these remarks apply to all the native Americans, and the only exceptions to them are understood to be individuals of foreign extraction. The population of this settlement is represented to be of the same general description which has been formed on the new American settlements in the vicinity of Houlton. The traits of character by which their appearance and conduct are chiefly marked are industry, activity, hardihood, sense, and honesty.

These settlers have only an equitable title to their lands, some of which they have cleared up and cultivated, and from which they have taken good crops for several successive seasons. They have made some attempts to avail themselves of the advantages afforded upon their streams for the erection of grist-mills, which have not been fortunate, and their means for this purpose are quite inadequate.

The settlers of this section have been peculiarly situated. They are nearly isolated from the rest of the community. They have not enjoyed the benefit of any legal magistracy, nor the advantage of any internal intercourse, being surrounded with wilderness, except by the circuitous course of the St. John, toward Houlton. The connexions of these people have been necessarily with that river, where they have sought a market or conveyance for their produce, and whence they have been obliged to derive their supplies. The American inhabitants, whose concerns have carried them towards the river St. John, have been exposed to a system of municipal regulations or inhibitions operating on articles of domestic produce, and subjecting it to seizure anywhere in its transit. The manner in which some of these regulations have been put in force will appear from affidavits of persons belonging a considerable distance below the Aroostook. Instances of this description are complained of as numerous; but, as they principally relate to acts of authority performed within the province of New Brunswick, as some of the offices which produced these vexations have been abolished, and as some modification has lately taken place in the provisions of province law on this subject, the effect of which is not fully understood, the inquiry has not been extended how far they have been applied to any individuals above. Seizures, however, under some pretext, seem to have been committed on the Aroostook.

The settlers upon the Aroostook, in addition to their ordinary privations, have been affected by the general depression occasioned by the recent embarrassment of business and injury to credit among the larger dealers upon the river St. John; and it is natural to suppose that they may have thus found it difficult to obtain the means to satisfy debts, generally small, which they owe upon the river, and they are not able to defray the expenses attached there to litigation. On the other hand, the American territory has afforded them no asylum. No acts of pretended authority, however, in violation of the jurisdiction of this State, under pretext of judicial power, are known to have taken place until a comparatively late period. Mr. George Morehouse resides at Tobique, on the opposite bank of the St. John, within a parish recently formed by the name of Kent; he formerly bore the commission of a subaltern officer in the army, and at present, it is stated, actually exercises a commission of the peace for the county of York. For two or three years past he appears to have been in the habit of issuing precepts, directed to the constables of the parish of Kent, for the recovery of small demands against inhabitants on the Aroostook. One other person, supposed to be a provincial magistrate, is mentioned as having issued a single precept in like manner; and service of these precepts is made upon inhabitants many miles within the boundary line by persons undertaking to act as constables of the parish of Kent. The manner in which these persons proceed to execute their offices, some with more mildness and civility, and one who is represented as generally coming armed, and treating them with greater harshness, is detailed in several affidavits. In the execution of these precepts it appears that the cattle and movables of the inhabitants are subjected to be taken and immediately carried away, to be disposed of within the British territory; and that the practice is extended to take articles of property belonging to the debtor, which are exempted from attachment and execution by the laws of this State. In one instance it appears that the same cow, being the last and only one, was taken twice on a warrant or warrants from Mr. Morehouse, issued on the same demand, the second seizure being on account of costs. The inhabitants themselves have also been arrested on these precepts, and not being able to find bail where none could be legally taken, are removed as fast as possible over the lines to places of safety within the province, where they may be able to procure sureties, or settle the debts, or otherwise make their peace with the officer or the magistrate.

This practice appears to have prevailed with some frequency. One or two cases appear to have occurred in connexion with this practice of Mr. Morehouse, in which precepts have been served, either from him or from authority further below, by a Mr. Craig, deputy sheriff of the county of York. One of the settlers on the Aroostook was solicited by Mr. Morehouse to act as constable for the parish of Kent, but after being qualified by him declined to serve. It is possible that instances have occurred in which settlers above the line, from want of other resort, may have been led incautiously, or from different motives induced to apply to Mr. Morehouse.

But the difficulties to which the inhabitants have been subjected in consequence of this practice, the disproportionate amount of expenses attached to the collection of small demands, and the certainty of the law, as they consider it to be administered by Mr. Morehouse, seem to have produced an endeavor to adjust disputes among themselves by a species of submission to referees, and thereby avoid the authority undertaken to be exercised among them by the officers of the parish of Kent or the county of York.

That this state of things should have resulted in the collisions that have occurred between the persons despatched by Mr. Morehouse and the people living on the Aroostook, is rather a subject of regret than a matter of surprise. In the absence of any regular administration of justice, having adopted the principle of an equitable arbitration, to which they undertook to yield voluntary deference, the inconvenience of having its first operation overruled by the order of Mr. Morehouse seems to have led to a sort of after consideration or inquiry respecting the bounds of the parish of Kent, and consequently into a question concerning the applicability of Mr. Morehouse's authority within the American boundary. Admitting that authority to extend to the settlement on the Aroostook, the opposition into which Dalton and others, who undertook to aid Arnold in the recovery of his cow, were betrayed, would be clearly without justification. At all events, it is obvious that the state of doubt which has thus been cast upon their condition has led to the unfortunate consequences of irregular reprisal; and however it may be deemed a measure of venial offence against unauthorized aggression, it has involved the well-meaning and otherwise unoffending inhabitants of this settlement in the evils of a state of border warfare. Several illustrative details are exhibited in the affidavits. The inhabitants of the Aroostook, while they have thus been subject to process from Mr. Morehouse, do not seem to have been considered by him as being entitled to the protection of the Government which he undertakes to personate. Early last spring he appeared among them and forbid their working on the lands and continuing their usual labors of clearing and cultivation to get a living. He posted up written notices to this effect on the Eaton grant and in different places, and marked some small parcels of lumber which they had cut for seizure. It was shortly after this period that George Field, whose affidavit is exhibited, appears to have left the country in consequence, he says, of the inconveniences to which he was exposed, and went with his family to Houlton. These settlers seem to have been generally regarded by Mr. Morehouse in some light as a sort of outlaws, or wild people, who had no proper habitancy, and were liable to be dealt with in any manner that might please the province of New Brunswick or its proper officers. In no legal light do they seem to have been regarded as subjects, except as trespassers and intruders on Crown lands liable to judicial process; and under color of some such character measures appear to have been subsequently applied to divest them of their property and expel them from their possessions.

Early in the month of July last Daniel Craig came with the first writ from Mr. Morehouse to take the cow that Arnold had of M'Crea; and also delivered summonses to the settlers to appear forthwith before the court, which was then on the point of sitting at Frederickton, to answer to the King of Great Britain in pleas of trespass and intrusion on Crown lands. This process was served by him indiscriminately on all the inhabitants, including the citizens of the United States as well as those born in the provinces, or others. This sudden proceeding naturally produced a state of confusion and consternation among the settlers. No time was afforded them to deliberate. It was necessary to set out immediately, in order to arrive in season. Some concluded to go, and others determined to stay. Some proceeded part way and then returned home. Others kept on their journey to Frederickton, among whom were some of the Americans. Those who continued to the end were subjected to severe privations, and were obliged to remain several days without means of support or being able to obtain any other satisfaction than that it would be necessary to appear again the present winter. The narrative of these circumstances is contained in some of the affidavits, and may suffice to convey an impression of the embarrassment and distress occasioned among these settlers by the service of this process.

The affair which followed soon after, respecting the taking and retaking of the cow, which was adjudged by the referees to belong to Arnold, on the warrant of Mr. Morehouse, accompanied with a sense of their having exposed themselves to his displeasure, and perhaps to the whole force of authority from New Brunswick, operated, with the menaces of the constable employed on that occasion, and the conduct of the Irishmen at the lines, and the reports which they received now and then from below, to keep the inhabitants of Aroostook in a continual state of agitation and alarm. They were particularly threatened with a visit by a larger party than the former, to punish those who were engaged in that affray, and put an end to any further spirit of opposition by destroying all means of resistance, or removing the inhabitants from the settlement. The reality of the apprehensions entertained by the persons who were concerned in that affair is attested by the circumstances of their being afraid to occupy their own habitations, lodging about in different places, in barns or in the woods, mustering together for the night in larger or smaller parties, or separating for greater security. The statements of several of the settlers on this subject relate to particulars within their experience or knowledge.

A circumstance that may seem not to have diminished the ground of these apprehensions occurred some time in the month of November last. The dwelling of Ferdinand Armstrong was entered about break of day by a small party from below, who seized his brother, James Armstrong, soon after he had risen from bed, and conveyed him in a canoe, without loss of time, out of the territory. He was obliged to give up articles of wearing apparel, and part with what means he had in order to obtain his release, the party pretending to have authority to compel payment of a debt and costs. Threats were also uttered that men and horses were coming up the first sledding to take those who were concerned in the offence about taking the cow away. Richard Inman, who was particularly mentioned as of the coming party, appears to be one of the persons previously employed by Mr. Morehouse, and whom the settlers were most afraid of in consequence of his practice of visiting them with arms.

In consequence of these occurrences and impressions, the inhabitants of the Aroostook have been afraid to go down to the river St. John, either to mill or to obtain their necessary supplies, and have undertaken, the present winter, to effect a communication with Houlton by cutting out a road altogether within the American territory. They were employed upon it the last of December, and judged they were about abreast of Mars Hill, and hoped to accomplish it in about thirty working days. The pioneers employed to mark out the direction had found their way out at Foxcroft, after enduring intense cold and suffering most severe hardships.

The condition of the inhabitants of the Aroostook may be shortly summed up. They are of the same general description as those that have made purchases and improvements within the new townships or plantations on the American territory, living in the neighborhood of each other and of the river St. John. They are upon land, of which grants and surveys were commenced several years ago, sometime before the war with Great Britain, under the authority of Massachusetts, without remonstrance or objection from New Brunswick. They have settled upon the territory along thirty miles into the interior, without title, subject to the rights of the proprietor or the proprietaries, and to the laws of this State then established. They acknowledge its authority, and, as it would seem to follow, are entitled to its protection.

The authority of New Brunswick cannot apply to them on the ground that any of them had been formerly inhabitants of that province any more than that of Maine extends to its citizens in New Brunswick. A Government has no power to cause precepts to be executed upon its own subjects in a foreign jurisdiction. The Government of the United States shields aliens who are residents and are well affected towards its principles and wish to become citizens. But several of them are American citizens.

The actual survey and occupation of this whole country, under the public authority of Maine and Massachusetts, were entitled to consideration from the province of New Brunswick. These acts were at least to be respected, as assertions of right, on the part of those two States; and some regard might have been had to the circumstance, that this right was originally exercised under ignorance of any adverse claim, and long before any was advanced. On the other hand, no act had ever been exercised on this territory by the Government of New Brunswick, except in permitting its subjects to cut timber the same as on Crown lands.

So irregular a practice could not be sanctioned or sustained, and, in compliance with the sense of the superior Government, it is supposed that the pretension was relinquished as untenable, with a fairness of profession which gave it credit. The power of removing the trees from the territory brought into dispute has been abandoned, and a new practice has taken place, to wit: that of removing the people there planted. If this principle can be supported, it abrogates the whole authority of the State of Maine over this portion of its territory.

The next course of inquiry relates to the state of things upon the territory of Maine upon the river St. John, within the boundary line which crosses that river about three miles above the Grand Falls, where the navigation of the river is interrupted, and where it was contemplated on the part of Great Britain, in determining the St. Croix, that the meridian would cross. It may be proper, in the first place, to advert to the situation of a colony of French settlers which planted themselves within our territory, principally, if not entirely, since the acknowledgment and establishment of the bounds of Massachusetts by the treaty of 1783. This settlement was composed of ancient French neutrals, who had originally endeavored to escape from the Government of Nova Scotia, or of their descendants, who had been expelled from their farms and improvements on the establishment of the province of New Brunswick, and who have been joined, from time to time, by their countrymen from Canada, who have not chosen to continue under the Government established on its conquest.

It is not known whether any individual of European origin existed on this territory at the peace of 1782; nor that, excepting aborigines, any other than descendants of French ancestors had made any occupation prior to the peace of 1815. The Acadians had retired with the Indians from the presence of the population which took possession of that ancient part of Nova Scotia after it was yielded to Great Britain, and settled by emigrants from the United States, who adhered to the British Government; and have always lived in great harmony among themselves, as a distinct race, preserving their own language, habits, and manners. Situated near the borders of the American territory, at a distance from any officers of Government, they appear to have also preserved their neutral character, and to have remained as a people by themselves, so far as they might be permitted by their position toward the province of New Brunswick. Without having any sympathy with the system established in that Government, they have not been in a condition to oppose the exercise of any power that might be exerted over them. Little occasion could be presented for the employment of criminal process among the relics of a primitive population, represented as of a "mild, frugal, industrious, and pious character," desirous of finding a refuge under the patriarchal and spiritual power of their religion. It has been customary for them to settle their civil affairs of every description, including their accidental disputes and differences, among themselves, by the aid of one or two arbiters or umpires, associated with the Catholic priest, who is commonly a missionary from Canada. Without any predilection toward a foreign faith or Power, they have had a natural desire to be quieted in their possessions; and it is stated that one or two of them, under circumstances not exactly known, either obtained or accepted grants of certain parcels of their property at an early period from the province. The propriety of relinquishing any practice of that kind, after the determination of the St. Croix, was obvious; and the benefit of a sanction might have been allowed to the previous facts of this description, without attaching to them any injurious motive or effect. The whole country, however, not in the actual possession of any cultivator, was considered by the French settlers as open to occupation at the period of the last peace with England.

In 1817 an American was invited to seat himself near the mouth of the Madawaska river, where he was assured that no one had any right of property; and when it was afterwards claimed by virtue of a title, the fact was denied by the Indians, on the ground that the right belonged to them. This American, one who went from Kennebec, accordingly moved away from the place which he first took to a situation near the St. Francis, where he still lives, unless recently removed.

It appears that a military post formerly existed at the Grand Falls, immediately below the boundary, and it is said that a militia authority was exercised among the inhabitants of Madawaska. Some power of this kind might, perhaps, have been used at an early period, before the territory was explored and the boundary of New Brunswick determined under the convention of 1794, and it is not probable that the French would have resisted any measure taken to compel them to train as militia. The works at the Grand Falls have been suffered to go to decay, and there is no reason to presume that a superfluous military organization was maintained among the remote inhabitants of Madawaska.

It is not presumable that any usurpation of that nature existed for a long period, especially after the settlement was known to fall within the American territory. If such a use of form or force was continued, however, it is to be inquired whether it can be viewed in any other light than that of aggression upon the rights of the State, and those under its jurisdiction and entitled to its protection. The recent formation of militia companies in that district presents itself as an act of the same character; and it is reported that a foreigner, by the name of Francis Rice, has stationed himself in this settlement, and undertakes to act as an adjutant of the militia of New Brunswick.

Difference of religious faith and diversity of habits have naturally tended to prevent an intermixture between the American and French population. The country in general, above as well as below the river Madawaska, has taken the popular description of that river, and the name is generally made use of by the Americans residing upon the higher and more remote branches of the St. John. The Madawaska settlement extends several miles down the branch of the St. John, below the mouth of the Madawaska river. Several settlers were also scattered above, and a space existed of several miles above the mouth of that river, which has recently been occupied by French settlers, some from Canada and others from the settlement below, and formed into a new settlement, by the name of Chateauqua. They have undertaken to erect a church, and it is stated that a militia company has been formed among them, by authority out of this State. This new settlement extends from the mouth of the Madawaska river to the vicinity of the mouth of the Mariumticook stream, where the American settlement, properly so called, commences. Whether any foreign measures have been taken in forwarding the progress of the new French settlement is not known. They are without titles to their lands, except by occupation, and they have not been disturbed in their possession. Fines, however, have been imposed upon some of them for refusing to perform militia duty, from abroad, during the past year, without regarding the objection that has been made among them to train, on the ground of their being within the American Government.

The situation of the recent settlement seems to merit some attention, from the circumstance of its now forming the connecting link between the former French settlement below and the American settlement immediately above. It is also brought into notice by the attention apparently bestowed upon it by the province of New Brunswick, which extends the demand of militia duty as high as this settlement, and considers all the Americans who are settled above it as aliens. It may be proper to remark in this place, that any occupation which the Government of New Brunswick may have held within the American territory, being without right and against right, its operation is not to be enlarged by any favorable construction.

Before passing from the consideration of the French settlement in this State, it may be proper to remark, that the population of the whole community, according to the census taken by the authority of the United States in 1820, amounted to over eleven hundred. The computation probably included a number of American settlers who had come into the country not long before, and were enrolled in the same manner with them in the body of American citizens. If, since that period, any of these persons have been induced to go into the province in order to give their votes; if provincial magistrates have been allowed to send civil process into this settlement; if individuals have been employed to officiate in executing the provincial police; these can only be viewed as acts which it is extremely difficult to reconcile with sentiments of respect for the opinion signified by the Government of the United States. After this French settlement was found to fall within the survey of the American boundary, these settlers, being in no other sense to be regarded as British subjects than as they might happen to reside in British territory, it would have manifested a decent respect to the authority of the United States, beyond the most repeated exterior demonstration, to have abstained from direct exercises of supreme jurisdiction.

The first American settlement was made above the French, and commenced, from the clearest information, in the year 1817. It consisted of several persons, then citizens of Massachusetts, who moved from the Kennebec, and established themselves, with their families, on different spots, the lowest at the mouth of the Mariumticook, and the highest not far from the mouth of the St. Francis. It was well known in the province of New Brunswick that these emigrants considered they were on American territory, and that their object was to obtain a title under the American Government. It was also understood that they carried with them a magistrate, and that they intended to procure an incorporation. Whether any, or what measures may have been taken by persons within the province, acting upon this information, it is not within my power to detail. It may be remarked, however, that, according to the best account, the whole territory of which they entered into occupation was previously uninhabited and unimproved. The Provincial Government had never made any grant above the river Madawaska. The American settlers on the St. John were above any French settler. They and their assigns have since continued in the occupation of their lands, and a portion of the original settlers still remain.

In 1825 grants were made by George W. Coffin and James Irish, Esquires, acting as joint agents for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of Maine, by virtue of resolves of the respective Legislatures, bearing date February 26 and June 11, 1825, to John Baker and James Bacon, severally, describing them as inhabitants of a plantation called and known by the name of the Madawaska settlement, in the county of Penobscot, situate upon the river St. John. The land granted to Baker was described as beginning at Mariumticook stream or point, on the St. John river, and bounded to contain an hundred acres. This was the same point of land which was originally taken up by his brother, Nathan Baker, one of the original emigrants from Kennebec, then deceased. It was a mill seat, where there have been erected a saw-mill and a grist-mill. John Baker married his brother's widow, and has brought up his family. He has been building a new house, which would have been finished last fall. The land granted to Bacon was below the grant to Baker, between the point and the new French settlement. Since the foundation of the American settlement before mentioned, a number of other American settlers had taken possession, and made improvements, without interfering, except by purchase, with any previous occupation.

The land agents of Massachusetts and Maine appointed provisionary agents, with authority to grant permits to cut pine timber on the territory of the United States. Without a permission of this kind, it it may be noticed, the mill at the mouth of the Mariumticook would have been useless. The Government of New Brunswick became informed of this fact. A considerable quantity of lumber, partly purchased by John Baker before mentioned, and partly made at his mill, was afterwards seized in passing down the river St. John. Timber cut on Crown lands within the province by British subjects was allowed to be redeemed by paying a certain duty. This composition was a privilege denied to Baker, whose property on that occasion appears to have been confiscated on the ground that he was not a British subject. All the Americans settled above the river Madawaska are regarded as aliens by the Provincial Government of New Brunswick and a certain fine or tax has been demanded of them, called the alien tax. This is a species of joint military and civil action, exercised in the first place by provincial officers of militia, and enforced by justices of the peace. One or two cases have occurred in which precepts have been sent among the American settlers on civil suits by Mr. Morehouse, who resides upwards of fifty miles below, on the river St. John. On one occasion, an American above Chateauqua was arrested on a warrant from Mr. Morehouse, on a charge of larceny by one of the settlers; but the evidence against him being insufficient, no final proceedings took place, and he was discharged. The real culprit was afterwards discovered, and on his confession the Americans were proceeding to conduct him to Houlton, nearly an hundred and forty miles distant; but on their way he made his escape in the woods. The American settlers have been subject to these and similar inconveniences, no doubt in consequence of the absence of any civil officers, such as were recommended to be appointed by the land agents; and occasions have thus been afforded for admitting the agency of Mr. Morehouse as a civil magistrate, which would not otherwise have existed; and for which some possible apology might be found in the circumstances of the country. An exercise of this intrusive authority, however, in the course of the past year, appears to have given rise to a species of opposition among the Americans, which was construed by Mr. Morehouse as resistance to his authority.

It appears that some difficulty took place in procuring the service of a writ which was sent by Mr. Morehouse against James Bacon, and it may be suitable to state the circumstances accompanying that transaction. It seems that reflection on their situation, combined with a sense of the inconvenience to which they were exposed from the acts of Mr. Morehouse, led to an understanding among them to avoid any employment of his authority, and, having no regular magistrate, to endeavor to settle their affairs as well as they could among themselves. The unfavorable opinion cherished by Mr. Morehouse, in respect to the Americans at that settlement, may have contributed to increase their aversion; and his occasional visits to view their proceedings may have tended to strengthen a mutual dislike Mr Morehouse had formerly demanded Bacon's deed from the agents, and knew the title under which he held. He had also made inquiry into the authority given to Bacon by the land agents respecting the cutting of timber, and satisfied himself on that subject. Recently he sent a person with a writ to arrest Bacon on a small demand in favor of one of the inhabitants; and the deputy sent by him returned without effecting service. Another person was then sent, accompanied by a considerable party, with a view, probably, to make effectual service. Bacon collected a number of his friends about him at his house, which is on the land granted to him below Baker's, and, supported by their presence, signified his refusal to submit to the mandate of Mr. Morehouse.

The principle on which they placed their determination was that they were Americans, on American ground, and that Mr. Morehouse had no right to extend his authority over them. Some resentment was manifested by them towards the individual who had the indiscretion to apply to Mr. Morehouse; but no violence used towards any of the party who came to arrest Bacon. The leader of the party, who officiated on that occasion as a constable of the parish of Kent, became convinced of the inexpediency of proceeding to execute his precept, and professed to respect the ground of their determination. It was agreed to settle the demand by amicable reference, which was accordingly done, and the affair terminated, except that the constable afterwards pretended to have an execution from Mr. Morehouse for the costs. The spirit of opposition to the power of Mr. Morehouse discovered on this occasion assumed the form of a general agreement among the American inhabitants to avoid all applications of foreign authority, and extended to an outright denial of the British provincial jurisdiction. For the legality of this position they reasoned and relied upon their original character as American citizens, the circumstances of their settlement, in that capacity, upon vacant American territory, and the assurances of the land agents, which they understood decidedly to that effect. Whether they were deceived in the ground they took by officious and unwarrantable acts, or whether any errors they may have committed may be imputable to omissions on the part of either State to provide for the security of property and preservation of citizenship, it belongs only for those to consider by whom the powers in fact exercised were imparted. The measures now made use of by Mr. Morehouse were directly brought to bear upon the right of the two States to make the grant to Bacon. This being the lowest grant upon the river St. John, was the only barrier against a general inroad of authority from the quarter below, where Mr. Morehouse resided, to the American territory above; and the taking of the person of Bacon, without remonstrance, from the position in which he was placed by the act of the two Governments, might have removed the only obstruction and determined the practical question. A paper writing was accordingly drawn up and signed by the American inhabitants generally, constituting a sort of compact, by which they agreed to adjust all disputes among themselves by virtue of referees, without admission of British authority, and that they would support each other in abiding by this determination. This was to be a provisional agreement, to continue in force only for one year; and, in the meantime, application was to be made to the Government, in order to be made certain of their condition, and to obtain, if possible, the benefit of some regular authority. Of the propriety of this resolution, or of the proceedings by which it was accompanied, it is not for me to express an opinion. It may suffice to say that it seems to have been dictated by the necessity of their situation; that, as citizens of Maine, some reference was proper to the rights and sentiments of the State; and that, in any judgment of their actions, some respect should be had to the authority of Maine.

As a prelude to this arrangement, the Americans generally assembled on land conveyed to John Baker by the States of Maine and Massachusetts, and there erected a staff and raised a rude representation of the national eagle. They also partook of a repast provided by Baker, and enjoyed the festivity in the manner that is usual to Americans in celebrating that occasion. One of the French was hired as a musician, and a few others were attracted by the spectacle and invited to the table. The same thing has been sometimes done by Americans transiently collected in the provinces, on the same anniversary, without affording offence. But on the present occasion there is no ground to doubt that it was deliberately done to advertise Mr. Morehouse of the manner in which they viewed their own rights and his authority; and when he appeared, as was probably expected, to inquire into the meaning of this ensign, it was explained to him. Mr. Morehouse thereupon gave order for its removal to Baker, which the latter refused to obey. It is known that either of these persons had any more direct authority for his proceeding than the other; which had the better right may admit of a distinct question. But the object was to apprise Mr. Morehouse of their opinion. Neither Baker nor Bacon pretended to exercise any authority among their fellow-citizens on this occasion, although they probably rendered themselves conspicuous to Mr. Morehouse. The epithet of general was one that was not bestowed on Baker until after this affair. Mr. Morehouse also demanded the paper of agreement that had been entered into by the Americans, which they declined to deliver. Mr. Morehouse was informed that the paper had been offered to one Peter Markee, a French lad who was at the American settlement. If this was done with any intention, it was a circumstance which took place in the absence of Mr. Baker, and was contrary to the original purpose, which was to confine the step to Americans exclusively. Mr. Baker, hearing a report that the route of the mail was altered, (a change which the Americans had no wish to take place, as it was a matter of convenience to them,) and meeting the carrier in his canoe, inquired whether such was the fact. This inquiry was undoubtedly misconstrued by the Frenchman who carried the mail, and the circumstance might have been exaggerated to Mr. Morehouse. Upon information of this kind, however, together with his own knowledge, Mr. Morehouse subsequently proceeded to issue a warrant for the arrest of Baker, and, it is also understood, of James Bacon and Charles Stutson. In the meantime the inhabitants agreed upon referees, and appointed Baker and Bacon a deputation to proceed to the seat of Government with a request to have their case laid before the Legislature at its next session, and to inquire of the executive authority whether they were recognized as citizens of the State, and entitled to the protection of its Government. Having received an answer in the affirmative, to be communicated to their constituents, with injunctions to observe the utmost caution in their conduct, and having left their application to be laid before the Legislature, they returned through the wilderness by the way they came, and arrived at home a short time before the execution of Mr. Morehouse's precept.

Early in the morning of the 25th of September last, soon after their return, while Baker and his family were asleep, his house was surrounded by an armed force, and entered by persons of a civil character, and others, armed with fusees, &c., who seized Baker in his bed, and conveyed him without loss of time out of the State. The particulars relating to this circumstance are detailed in the statement of Asahel Baker, a nephew of John Baker, who was first awakened by the entry, and which, although not exhibiting any solemn attestation, may, nevertheless, be relied upon as substantially correct. It is proper to add, that the person conducting the execution of the warrant proved to be of high official character and personal respectability in the province of New Brunswick. He was informed that papers were in possession of Baker under the authority of the States, but he replied that it was not in his power to attend to any remonstrance. No resistance was made by Mr. Baker, and no opportunity was afforded him to have intercourse with any of his friends and neighbors, from whom it is reasonable to suppose opposition might have been apprehended. Mr. Baker was carried before Mr. Morehouse in obedience to the warrant. It does not appear that any examination took place, however, but that he was conveyed to Frederickton, and there committed to jail. The letter from your excellency to the American inhabitants at the upper settlement was delivered by him to the authority under which he was imprisoned, and, after some detention, restored to him.

The immediate impression produced among the inhabitants of the settlement by this circumstance may appear from the further statement of Asahel Baker. He was the person employed to bring a representation from them of the arrest of Baker, which was deposited by him in the first post office he reached in Kennebec. He was absent a number of days, and on his return found that several of the inhabitants had departed. It appears that in the interim the alien tax had been again demanded, and process had been served upon the American settlers generally, similar to that which had been previously served on the Aroostook indiscriminately, to appear at Frederickton in October to answer to suits for trespass and intrusion on Crown lands, under the penalty of an hundred pounds. It is understood that the service of this process was extended to the American settlers towards the St. Francis and upon the Fish river, where the road laid out by the Legislatures of the two States terminates. In consequence of these circumstances, it appears that three of the American settlers, viz: Charles Stutson, Jacob Goldthwraite, and Charles Smart, have parted with their possessions, and removed from the settlement into the plantation of Houlton, where they are at present seeking subsistence. Stutson was a blacksmith, in good business, and was concerned in the measures relating to Mr. Morehouse. The motives and particulars of their departure are stated by them in their respective affidavits. In the precarious state of their affairs it is probable that no certain estimate can be formed of their sacrifices; but it is evident that the measures made use of towards the inhabitants in general, for whatever purpose, have had the effect to expel a portion of them and to intimidate the remainder. It is not understood that these measures have been extended to the French settlers on the Madawaska, who are without title to their lands, and it is probably not the case; but it is evident that a corresponding application of judicial proceedings has been made from the province of New Brunswick upon all the settlements above and below the French occupation of Madawaska, tending to their extermination; and that the inhabitants are awaiting, in a state of fearful anxiety, the final measures of execution, from which they see no prospect of relief. The plantation of Houlton is the common place of refuge to which they direct their feet, as it was the custom in the earlier annals of New England for the frontier settlers, in case of apprehension, to gather toward a garrison.

In pursuing the inquiry concerning the nature of aggressions complained of as committed by inhabitants it may not come within the terms of my appointment to ascertain how far any proceedings that have been adopted may be traced to the authority of the Government of New Brunswick. The general application of judicial process, however, from the province of New Brunswick to all parts of the settled territory comprehended in the claim of Great Britain seems to give rise to such an inquiry. The summonses served on the settlers on the Aroostook and upon the St. John, from the Mariumticook to the Fish river and St. Francis, appear, by comparison of numerous copies, to be all in the same form, for trespass and intrusion on Crown lands. A copy of an information served on John Baker since his imprisonment describes the land of which he is in occupation as lying within the parish of Kent, in the county of York. It may be, therefore, pertinent to inquire into the history of the parish of Kent, and refer to other measures of the Provincial Government preliminary to the above mentioned process.

The act of incorporation of the parish of Kent is dated 1821. It is entitled "An act to erect the upper part of the county of York into a town or parish," and provides that "all that part of the county of York lying above the parish of Wakefield, on both sides of the river St. John, be erected into a town or parish by the name of Kent." The parish of Wakefield was incorporated in 1803, by an act also entitled "An act for erecting the upper part of the county of York into a distinct town or parish." A statistical account of New Brunswick, published in Frederickton in 1825, describes the parish of Kent as extending on both sides of the river from the Grand Falls to Wakefield. The parish of Wakefield, it is understood, extended above the military post at Presque Isle, a station which was abandoned the year following the creation of the parish of Kent.

A succinct statement may be made of the measures adopted by the Government of New Brunswick the present season. By an official act of the 9th of March last, reciting that satisfactory assurances had been conveyed to his Majesty's Government of the earnest wish of the Government of the United States to reciprocate the conciliatory disposition shown in regard to the disputed territory at the upper part of the river St. John, it was declared to be most desirable, until the present question thereto should be finally settled, that no new settlement should be made, or any timber or other trees felled in the wilderness parts of that territory, nor any act done which might change the state of the question as it existed when the treaty of Ghent was executed.

Instructions were accordingly issued, addressed, in general terms, to all magistrates residing in the vicinity of what was termed disputed territory, directing them how to proceed in the event of "any depredations being attempted by either party on the lands in question." They were required to be vigilant and use their utmost diligence to discover any attempts which might be made by any of his Majesty's subjects to intrude upon the territory with a view to make settlements or to cut timber, and to make immediate representation thereof to his Majesty's Attorney General, that legal steps might be taken to punish such intruders and trespassers. And should they discover "similar attempts to be made by any other person, whether unauthorized or acting under color of authority," to use their best endeavors to ascertain the names of such persons and report them to the secretary of the province, with affidavits to establish the facts, for the Lieutenant Governor's consideration.

Information of these proceedings was communicated to the Government of the United States by the British minister in September last, as furnishing proof of the friendly disposition which animated the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick. Mr. Clay was at the same time informed by Mr. Vaughan that no attempt had ever been made to form new settlements, and that the Lieutenant Governor had abstained from exercising any authority over the unoccupied parts of the disputed territory, except for the purpose of preserving it in its present state, and assured Mr. Clay that it was the wish and the duty of the Lieutenant Governor to avoid giving the slightest uneasiness to the Government of the United States on the territory which had unfortunately remained so long in dispute between the two Governments.

The letter of the British minister to Mr. Clay, of September 17, is in answer to a communication from the Secretary of State, conveying a representation from your excellency to the Government of the United States respecting certain acts of the Government of New Brunswick which were considered an undue exercise of jurisdiction in the settlement on the river St. John, composed of the grantees under Massachusetts and Maine and other American settlers. In his answer to this communication, the British minister observes, that "it appears from Governor Lincoln's statement that the settlement in question is a British settlement upon the river St. John, westward of the Madawaska, and that it is composed of the original settlers and of emigrants from the United States."

In what manner the settlement west of the Madawaska can be considered a British settlement can only be explained by a subsequent passage in the same letter, in which the British minister says, that "ever since the province of New Brunswick was established, in the year 1784, the territory in dispute (between Great Britain and the United States) has always been considered as forming part of it, and the rights of sovereignty have in consequence been exercised by the British Government." He therefore protests against the validity of any title to lands in the ancient British settlements granted by the States of Maine or Massachusetts "until a change in the right of possession shall have been effected in consequence of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent."

To support this position the British minister refers to a map of Nova Scotia, published by the Board of Trade in 1755, including the territory in dispute in the province of Nova Scotia: by a map of this territory, published by order of the British House of Commons, June 29, 1827, the territory in question is not included in the province of New Brunswick.

In a subsequent letter from the British minister to Mr. Clay, dated November 21, he speaks of the "proceedings of the magistrates acting under the authority of his Britannic Majesty, in the province of New Brunswick, against two citizens of the United States, established in British settlements upon the rivers Aroostook and Madawaska." These proceedings, he observes, are supported by two affidavits transmitted by your excellency, viz: one of "William Dalton, residing upon the Aroostook," and the other of Jonathan Wilson, relating "to the arrest at Woodstock, upon the Madawaska river, within sixty-five miles of Frederickton, of Mr. Baker, for having interrupted the passage of the mail from New Brunswick to Canada."

The British minister states to Mr. Clay "that the sovereignty and jurisdiction over the territory claimed by the British Commissioners, according to the line laid down by them, running by Mars Hill, comprehending in that portion of the territory of New Brunswick the rivers Aroostook and Madawaska, have consequently remained with Great Britain, having been in the occupation and possession of the Crown previously to the conclusion of the treaty of 1783; and that the opposite claim of the United States cannot furnish any pretext for an interference with, or an interruption of, the exercise of the jurisdiction within that territory by magistrates acting under British authority, on the part of the citizens of the United States who may choose to reside in those ancient settlements." He adds, that he has already communicated to the Secretary of State sufficient proof of the decided resolution of his Majesty's Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to maintain the disputed territory in the same state in which his excellency received it after the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent; and that he is convinced that a mutual spirit of forbearance animates the General Government of the United States. The British minister further acquaints Mr. Clay that Sir Howard Douglass deems it his duty, as Lieutenant Governor, not to abandon any right of practical sovereignty which has been exercised in the disputed territory "which has been held, occupied, and located as British settlements," for any period within the past century, or even later. That, considering the conduct of Baker fit matter for cognizance of the law officers of the Crown, his excellency had directed the Attorney General to take such measures as he might deem necessary to enforce the municipal law of the province: and that there could be no grounds for complaint of an undue and illegal exercise of jurisdiction, whatever motive their might be for remonstrance against the severity with which the laws might be executed.

I take occasion to collect these details from the correspondence of the British minister in this country, and present them to your excellency's attention, in order to exhibit the principles on which the acts in question may have been performed, and also because the conclusions which he deduces from them are so undeniable. The character of this avowal is so peremptory that it puts an end to all ground of inquiry on the part of Maine, as the position thus taken on behalf of the British Government extends to justify the exercise of every species of power for which a precedent can be found in the past century, or even the present; and Maine has no right to find fault with the manner in which the laws of the province may be executed in New Brunswick. So remarkable a proposition, however, is not well calculated to diminish our concern on account of the cause for which so large a proportion of territory may be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the State, although it may allay your surprise at the determination of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to decline any intercourse with the executive authority of the State, of the kind that has heretofore existed between adjoining Governments.

If it be the correct state of fact, as thus represented, that the territory in question has ever continued in the occupation and possession of the British Crown since the treaty of 1783, it affords a strong color, unquestionably, to the claim insisted upon to the absolute sovereignty; as in a dubious case of right, where lines have become obscured, an open, notorious, and exclusive possession for a great length of time, in the presence and without the reproof of an adverse claimant, must necessarily have great weight in determining the title. And the principle thus strongly assumed gives an important aspect to the demand which has been made upon Maine and Massachusetts, under the form of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent.

It is to be doubted, however, whether your excellency will be able to discover evidence of the existence of any British settlement whatever within the boundary of Maine. The act of undertaking to remove all the settlers upon the territory to which the British Government lays claim, except the French, as trespassers and intruders, certainly does not tend to give any portion of the territory the character of a British settlement by reason of their residence. Whether the act establishing the parish of Kent was intended to form a British settlement beyond the boundary, may depend upon the limits assigned to it, if it have any other than those of the disputed territory.

The summonses to the settlers on the Aroostook were dated May 19, and served early in July, before any movement of the Americans in the upper settlement on the St. John. On the 11th of August Mr. Morehouse transmitted a list of American citizens settled on the river St. John, above the French settlements. The summonses to the latter, as far as seen, were dated September 17. It is not known that there was any one of the American occupants in that quarter, where all are American citizens, omitted in the process. Warrants were also out against Bacon and Stutson, on charges similar to those against Baker, but had not been executed. It is due to say that I derived valuable benefit from Mr. Barrell, to whom I also endeavored to afford all the aid in my power.

The result of this inquiry, from the justification advanced, is, that the Government of New Brunswick recognizes the acts committed by her magistrates, and adopts them in all their bearings. It is now perfectly understood that the Government of New Brunswick claims to extend the laws of the province over a large portion of the territory of Maine. The operation is not merely left to inference. The design is not affected to be concealed. The pretension is publicly announced in official papers and communications, speaking the unequivocal language of the Government. We have a frank exposition of the views which are entertained by the British minister in this country, and the sentiments and spirit which animate the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick. The whole tract of country which has been the scene of late complaints is challenged as being within the allegiance of his Britannic Majesty, under his sovereignty and jurisdiction, and subject to the municipal regulations and control of his Government. No persons are considered as lawfully residing therein, except by the authority or sufferance of the Provincial Government. No inhabitants of this territory, whatever time they have been on, are deemed to be possessed of any estate therein, except by virtue of the province laws. No residents are entitled to acquire any rights in real estate except British subjects. All other occupants of the soil are treated as trespassers and intruders. All other inhabitants are liable to the disabilities of aliens, and to the restrictions imposed upon their actions, intercourse, and industry, by the enactments of provincial legislation; and likewise in respect to the right of bearing arms. Every American citizen is required to report himself, within two months after his arrival, to a regimental quartermaster, and is subjected to an annual assessment for the maintenance of the provincial militia. The residue of the territory, excepting such small portions as may be parcelled out, is reserved as Crown lands; and trees are forbidden to be cut among the royal forests, upon the penalty of the province laws. Grants and licenses are withheld or suspended for profound considerations. In other respects the authority and laws of the province are put in active operation and asserted in full vigor. This description is to be understood as applying to a large part of the State of Maine.

The consequence is, that the class of cases concerning which the Government of Maine is anxious to extend its inquiry is not considered as coming within the scope of her constitutional care and cognizance. The individuals on whose behalf her solicitude is excited are intruders upon the lands not within the State of Maine. Although citizens of that State, they have put themselves out of its power, and lay no longer claim to its protection, but are liable to be dealt with only according to the laws of New Brunswick, and placed under its provincial police. This is the broad ground taken by the Government of that province. While it is certain that no undue severity of motive can be attributed to the superior Executive of New Brunswick, it is equally apparent that the Provincial Government undertakes to exercise, in all respects, the rights of the most incontestable jurisdiction.

The facts are shortly these: Citizens of Maine, and others, settled on lands surveyed and granted by its authority, living within its ancient and long-established limits, are subjected to the operation of foreign laws. These are applied to them in the ordinary course of civil process, in taking away their property, and also their persons. American citizens in this State are proceeded against as aliens, for sedition and other offences and misdemeanors against the Crown of Great Britain; and one of them, a grantee of Massachusetts and Maine, seized on the land granted, remains in prison on charges of that description. A portion of this State, of considerable magnitude, is thus actually incorporated into the adjoining province; and his excellency the Lieutenant Governor, a person of great virtue, is unable, from his situation, to afford the explanations which these acts obviously require, except to those under whose orders he is placed or with whom he is obliged to correspond.

In begging leave to submit these circumstances to your excellency's consideration, and requesting permission to refer to accompanying papers, I am sensible of the occasion there is to solicit your indulgence in performing the duty I owe to yourself and to the State.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

C. S. DAVEIS.

His Excellency Governor LINCOLN.

STATE OF MAINE.

A RESOLVE in relation to aggressions upon the northeast frontier of the State.

Whereas the sovereignty of this State has been repeatedly violated by the acts of the agents and officers of the Government of the British province of New Brunswick, and that Government, by its agents and officers, has wantonly and injuriously harassed the citizens of this State residing on the northeastern frontier of the same and within its limits, by assuming to exercise jurisdiction over them, in issuing and executing civil and criminal process against them, by which their property has been seized and some of them arrested and conveyed out of the State, and subjected to the operation of the laws of that province; in establishiug military companies within the territory of this State; imposing fines for neglect of military duty; imposing upon our said citizens an alien tax, and requiring payment of the same. And whereas, by the exercise of the aforesaid unwarranted acts of jurisdiction by the Government of the said province, some of our citizens have been deprived of their liberty, their property destroyed, many of them driven from their lands and dwellings, the tranquillity and peace of all of them disturbed, and the settlement and population of that part of the State adjoining said province greatly retarded, if not wholly prevented: Therefore,

Resolved, That the present is a crisis in which the Government and people of this State have good cause to look to the Government of the United States for defence and protection against foreign aggression.

Resolved further, That if new aggressions shall be made by the Government of the province of New Brunswick upon the territory of this State, and upon its citizens, and seasonable protection shall not be given by the United States, the Governor be, and he hereby is, requested to use all proper and constitutional means in his power to protect and defend the citizens aforesaid in the enjoyment of their rights.

Resolved further, That in the opinion of this Legislature, the Executive of the United States ought, without delay, to demand of the British Government the immediate restoration of John Baker, a citizen of this State, who has been seized by the officers of the province of New Brunswick, within the territory of the State of Maine, and by them conveyed to Frederickton, in said province, where he is now confined in prison, and to take such measures as will effect his early release.

Resolved further, That the Governor be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested, with the advice and consent of council, from time to time, to extend to the family of the said John Baker such relief as shall be deemed necessary; and he is hereby authorized to draw his warrant on the Treasury for such sum or sums as shall be required for that purpose.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES BY PRUSSIA ABOLISHED AS REGARDS THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 16, 1828.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

By a communication received from the Chargé d'Affaires of Prussia, a translation of which is herewith transmitted, it appears that in the ports of that Kingdom all discriminating duties, so far as they affected the vessels of the United States and their cargoes, have been abolished since the 15th of April, 1826. I recommend to the consideration of Congress a legislative provision, whereby the reciprocal application of the same principle may be extended to Prussian vessels and their cargoes which may have arrived in the ports of the United States from and after that day.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 16, 1828.

Mr. Niederstetter to Mr. Clay.

[Translation.]

The undersigned takes the liberty of again submitting to the consideration of his excellency the Secretary of State a subject which, by order of his Government, he has before had the honor of introducing at the conferences which have just ended in the conclusion of a treaty of commerce, &c. It regards the abolition of discriminating duties which, as relates to vessels of the United States and their cargoes, has taken place in the ports of the Kingdom of Prussia from the 15th of April, 1826, and been made applicable even to vessels not coming directly from the ports of the United States, but from any other country. This measure has been ordered by the Government of Prussia in the well founded expectation that a project of a law framed for the same object, and at that time before the Congress of the United States, would be put into operation. Thus has Prussia unhesitatingly granted, beforehand, the advantages enjoyed in her ports by national vessels and their cargoes, to vessels of the United States and their cargoes, without, so far, being admitted to that just reciprocity which she had expected in issuing this ordinance.

In the course of the conferences above referred to, the undersigned has readily acceded to the wishes of his excellency, by renouncing the insertion in the said treaty of an article providing for the restitution of that part of the duties on tonnage, &c., which may have been levied in the ports of the United States on Prussian vessels and their cargoes since the 15th April, 1826, contrary to the principles of perfect reciprocity laid down in the said treaty, on condition that an arrangement to this effect would be made by a particular legislative act; and the undersigned has not hesitated to confide in the assurances given by his excellency that he would make to the President of the United States the necessary recommendations of that object.

To complete the evidence of the measure adopted in Prussia, the undersigned has the honor to enclose a translation of the order given to that effect on the 15th April, 1826, by the Minister of the Interior; and, at the same time, avails himself of the occasion to offer to his excellency the Secretary of State the renewed assurances of his highest consideration.

[Translation.]

In consequence of the official information just received, that the proposition of the President of the United States of America, "to treat all foreign vessels and their cargoes on the same footing as national vessels, even in case of indirect navigation, on condition of a perfect reciprocity," has been sanctioned, on the 26th of January of the present year, by the consent of the Senate, so that, at this time, Prussian vessels have, on condition of reciprocity in the ports of Prussia, acquired the right, even in case of indirect navigation, to be placed, together with their cargoes, in the ports of the United States, on the same footing as national vessels, it is necessary to inform the public interested in navigation and commerce that a perfect reciprocity, or a treatment precisely equal to that of Prussian vessels and their cargoes, has been granted to the vessels of the United States of America in Prussian ports, even in the case where such vessels should enter them in the course of an indirect navigation.

In the same manner, and by virtue of the reciprocity agreed upon, Prussian vessels shall have the right to enter into the ports of the United States of America precisely on the same footing as national vessels, even in the case of not proceeding directly from Prussian ports; as, for instance, having taken their cargoes in the ports of Russia, Great Britain, or France.

I request your excellency to cause the necessary information to be immediately published in all the ports of the province under your authority.

TREATY OF LIMITS WITH THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, APRIL 21, 1828.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, for their consideration and advice, a treaty of limits between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, concluded by the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments on the 12th of January last. A copy of the treaty and the protocols of the conferences between the plenipotentiaries during the negotiation are enclosed with it.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, April 21, 1828.

TREATY OF LIMITS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 21, 1828.

The following treaty was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed, in confidence, for the use of the Senate.

Treaty of Limits between the United States of America and the United Mexican States.

The limits of the United States of America, with the bordering territories of Mexico, having been fixed and designated by a solemn treaty, concluded and signed at Washington on the twenty-second day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, between the respective plenipotentiaries of the Government of the United States of America on the one part, and of that of Spain on the other. And whereas the said treaty having been sanctioned at a period when Mexico constituted a part of the Spanish monarchy, it is deemed necessary now to confirm the validity of the aforesaid treaty of limits, regarding it as still in force and binding, between the United States of America and the United Mexican States.

With this intention the President of the United States of America has appointed Joel Roberts Poinsett their plenipotentiary, and the President of the United Mexican States their excellencies Sebastian Camacho and José Ignacio Esteva.

And the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE FIRST. The dividing limits of the respective bordering territories of the United States of America and of the United Mexican States being the same as were agreed and fixed upon by the above mentioned treaty of Washington, concluded and signed on the twenty-second day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, the two high contracting parties will proceed forthwith to carry into full effect the third and fourth articles of said treaty, which are herein recited, as follows:

ARTICLE SECOND. The boundary line between the two countries, west of the Mississippi, shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea, continuing north along the western bank of that river to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches or Red river; then following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the degree of longitude one hundred west from London and twenty-three from Washington; then crossing the said Red river, and running thence by a line due north to the river Arkansas; thence following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source, in latitude forty-two north; and thence, by that parallel of latitude, to the South Sea; the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen. But, if the source of the Arkansas river shall be found to fall north or south of latitude forty-two, then the line shall run from the said source due south or north, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude forty-two, and thence along the said parallel to the South Sea. All the islands in the Sabine, and the said Red and Arkansas rivers, throughout the course thus described, to belong to the United States; but the use of the waters, and the navigation of the Sabine to the sea, and of the said rivers Roxo and Arkansas, throughout the extent of the said boundary, on their respective banks, shall be common to the respective inhabitants of both nations.

The two high contracting parties agree to cede and renounce all their rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories described by the said line, that is to say, the United States hereby cede to his Catholic Majesty, and renounce forever, all their rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories lying west and south of the above described line; and, in like manner, his Catholic Majesty cedes to the said United States all his rights, claims, and pretensions to any territories east and north of the said line; and, for himself, his heirs, and successors, renounces all claim to the said territories forever.

ARTICLE THIRD. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a Commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of this treaty at Natchitoches, on the Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red river, and from the Red river to the river Arkansas, and to ascertain the latitude of the source of the said river Arkansas, in conformity to what is agreed upon and stipulated, and the line of latitude forty-two to the South Sea; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings; and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ARTICLE FOURTH. The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within the term of four months, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed the same, and have hereunto affixed our respective seals.

Done at Mexico this twelfth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, in the fifty-second year of the Independence of the United States of America, and in the eighth of that of the United Mexican States.

Tratado de Limites entre los Estados Unidos de Megico y los Estados Unidos de America.

Habiendose fijado y designado los limites de los Estados Unidos de America con los territorios limitrofes de Megico, por un tratado solemne concluido y firmado en Washington, a veinte y dos de Febrero de mil ochocientos diez y nueve, entre los plenipotenciarios respectivos del gobierno de los Estados Unidos, por una parte, y de España, por la otra; portanto, y en consideracion à que dicho tratado recibió su sancion en una epoca en que Megico formaba una parte de la Monarquia Española, se ha creido necesario, al presente, declarar y confirmar la validez de dicho tratado, considerandolo vigente y obligatorio, entre los Estados Unidos de Megico, y los Estados Unidos de America:

En consecuencia han sido nombrados los respectivos plenipotenciarios, a saber, el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de Megico, a sus excelencias los Señores Sebastian Camacho, y José Ignacio Esteva, y el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de America, al Señor Joel Roberts Poinsett, su Enviado Extraordinario y Ministro Plenipotenciario, cerea del gobierno de los Estados Unidos de Megico; los que, despuès de haber cambiado sus plenos poderes, y hallados en buena y debida forma, han convenido y concluido los articulos siguientes.

ARTICULO PRIMERO. Siendo los limites divisorios de los Estados Unidos de Megico, y de los Estados Unidos de America, en los terrenos colindantes de ambas Republicas los mismos que se acordaron y fijaron en el dicho tratado de Washington, fhô a veinte y dos de Febrero de mil vehocientos diez y nueve, se procedera inmediatamente à poner en ejecucion entre las dos dichas partes contratantes los articulos percero y cuarto de dicho tratado, que, a continuacion se insertan.

ARTICULO SEGUNDO. La linea divisoria entre los dos paises, al occidente del Misisipi, arrancara del seno Megicano, en la embocadura del rio Sabina, en el mar, seguirá al norte por la orilla occidental de este rio hasta el grado 32 de latitud; desde allì, por una linea recta al norte, hasta el grado de latitud en que entra en el rio Rojo de Natchitoche, Red river, y continuará, por el curso del rio Rojo al oeste hasta el grado 100 de longitud occidental de Londres, y 23 de Washington, en que cortará este rio, y seguira, por una linea recta al norte, por el mismo grado, hasta el rio Arkansas, cuya orilla meridional seguirá hasta su nacimiento en el grado 42 de latitud septentrional, y desde dicho punto, se tirará una linea recta, por el mismo paralelo de latitud, hasta el mar del Sur: todo segun el mapa de los Estados Unidos de Melish, publicado en Filadelfiia y perfeccionado en 1818. Pero si el nacimiento del rio Arkansas se hallase al norte o sur de dicho grado 42 de latitud, seguirá la linea desde el origen de dicho rio recta al sur, ò norte, segun fuese necesario, hasta que encuentre el expresado grado 42 de latitud, y desde allì, por el mismo paralelo hasta el mar del Sur. Pertenecerán à los Estados Unidos todas las yslas de los rios Sabina, Rojo de Natchitoche, y Arkansas, en la extension de todo el curso descrito; pero el uso de las aguas, y la navegacion del Sabina, hasta el mar, y de los espresados rios Rojo y Arkansas, en toda la estension de sus mencionados limites en sus respespectivas orillas, será comun à los habitantes de las dos naciones.

Las dos altas partes contratantes, convienen en ceder y renunciar todos sus derechos, reclamaciones y pretensiones sobre los territorios que se describen en esta linea, a saber; los Estados Unidos de America ceden a S. M. C. y renuncian para siempre, todos sus derechos, reclamaciones y pretensiones, a cualesquiera territorios situados al oeste, y al sur de dicha linea, y S. M. C. en igual forma, renuncia y cede para siempre, por si, y a nombre de sus herederos, y sucesores, todos los derechos que tiene sobre los territorios al este y al norte de la misma linea arriba descrita.

ARTICULO PERCERO. Para fijur esta linea con mas precision, y estableur los mojones que señalen con ecsaititud los limites de ambas naciones, nombrará cada una de ellas un comisario, y un geometra, que se juntarán antès del termino de un año, contado desde la fecha de la ratificacion de este tratado, en Natchitoches, en las orillas del rio Rojo, y procederán á señalar, y demarcar dicha linea, desde la embocadura del Sabina, hasta el rio Rojo, y de este hasta el rio Arkansas, y averiguar con certidumbre el origen del espresado rio Arkansas, y fijar, segun queda estipulado, y convenido en este tratado, la linea que debe seguir desde el grado 42 de latitud, hasta el mar Pacifico. Llevaran diurios, y levantarán planos de sus operaciones, y el resultado convenido por ellos se tendra por parte de este tratado, y tendra la misma fuerza que si estuviese inserto en èl, debiendo convenir amistosamente los dos gobiernos en el arreglo de cuanto necessiten estos individuos y en la escolta respectiva que deban llevar, siempre que se crea necesario.

ARTICULO CUARTO. El presente tratado será ratificado, y las ratificaciones serán cambiadas en Washington en el termino de cuatro meses, ì antés, si posible fuere.

En fé de locual, los respectivos plenipotenciarios han firmado el presente, sellandolo con sus sellos respectivos.

Fecho en Megico, à los doce dias del mes de Enero, del año del Señor mil ochocientos veinte y ocho, octavo de la independencia de los Estados Unidos de Megico, y 52° de la de los Estados Unidos de America.

No. 117.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Mexico, February 22, 1828.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, by Mr. Edward T. Tayloe, a treaty of limits between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, signed on the 12th day of January last, and a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, signed on the 14th day of this month.

You will perceive, in the latter, that all the alterations suggested by the Senate of the United States have been introduced, except that in relation to the duration of the treaty. I have already given you my reasons for not insisting upon that alteration, which I hope will prove satisfactory to the President. I thought it the less important because it is provided, by the thirty-fourth article, that at the end of six years, to be counted from the day on which the ratifications of this treaty are exchanged, such important points as may require revision and a special convention shall be taken into consideration by the parties; and the articles which may then be concluded shall be considered as making a part of this treaty.

I desired to fix the term of nine years for carrying into effect the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty; but the Mexican plenipotentiaries objected, that the term of ten years had been adopted in all their treaties, where the principle of perfect reciprocity had been introduced, and the alteration I proposed might occasion some difficulty and delay on the part of this Congress in the ratification of the treaty. They said, too, that it was unnecessary, as the instant the principle went into operation with one nation it would of course be extended to us. As this conversation was informal it was not extended upon the protocols; nor did I think it necessary to do so, as this consequence necessarily follows upon the principle of the most favored nation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, Washington.

[With Mr. Poinsett's No. 117.—Translation.]

FEBRUARY 6, 1828.

The undersigned have the honor to communicate to Mr. Poinsett that they have meditated with the greatest attention the reasons he advanced in the last conference in favor of the addition which the Senate of the United States wishes to see introduced into the sixteenth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, signed the 10th day of July, 1826, and which has given rise to a renewal of the negotiations, as your excellency suggested in your note to the Government of the 27th May.

The undersigned have to observe that the reasons alleged are reduced simply to the same which were advanced by your excellency, with the same intention, in the conferences held on the 13th and 17th of June, 1826, and which were extended with more exactness in your note of the last date; but as all those were refuted at that time by the arguments of the undersigned, and as your excellency, on that account, agreed to adopt the stipulation of the principle without any limitation, they do not perceive any reasonable motive at present which could justify their conduct if they were to change their opinion and accede to the exception proposed by your excellency, in conformity to the wishes of your Government.

It is true that the Mexican United States have not now the powerful obstacle which, at the period of the first negotiations, prevented them from admitting an exception in some manner odious, and which might, on that account, have retarded the conclusion of the pending treaties with a third Power. But it is likewise true that, after having celebrated those treaties, the good faith and honor of the Government are interested; that, on the part of Mexico, there should be no variation in the principle of conduct which it had proposed to follow invariably, and which probably had an influence on the minds of the other party in settling those conventions.

The undersigned, in virtue of these reasons, cannot persuade themselves that the Government of the United States of America should insist upon the insertion of the proposed addition to the sixteenth article as a sine qua non, as it is not absolutely necessary for the application of a principle which is not become general among nations, and as it was not introduced by the said States in their transactions with other nations until the year 1819.

The undersigned have the honor, on this occasion, to renew to your excellency the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

CAMACHO.
ESTEVA.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Mexico, February 8, 1828.

The undersigned has received their excellencies' note of the 6th instant, and has given to the arguments it contains the most serious consideration.

The undersigned did not consider the arguments he had used during the former conferences and in his note of the 17th June, 1826, as refuted by the Mexican plenipotentiaries.

He yielded the point in dispute at that time to his earnest desire not to embarrass the negotiations then pending between Mexico and Great Britain. Neither was he aware of the resolution of his Government not to admit any nation to a participation of the advantages offered by the principle of "free ships making free goods," unless accompanied with a provision that the flag of the neutral shall not cover the property of enemies whose Government does not acknowledge this principle.

This qualification is absolutely necessary in order to render the application of the principle just and fair towards all nations. Without it, supposing that Mexico did not admit the principle, the goods belonging to citizens of this Republic, on board vessels of the United States, would have been protected from being captured by Spanish cruisers, while the goods of Spanish subjects, in like situation, would be liable to capture by Mexican ships. So that the nation which did not admit the principle of free ships making free goods would have been the most favored. Whereas, by the qualification adopted in all the modern treaties formed by the United States and existing in that with Spain, the principle is applicable to those nations only which acknowledge it, and to none other. If, therefore, Mexico refuses to adopt the principle, the goods of her citizens found on board vessels of the United States are liable to seizure by Spanish cruisers, from which they will hereafter be free, if the Mexican plenipotentiaries agree to adopt the principle and the qualification, for the one will not be admitted by the undersigned without the other.

The undersigned will not take up your excellencies' time by urging the vast advantages that must accrue to an infant maritime State by the adoption and extension of this important principle, whether it is considered as advancing the interests of agriculture and trade, when one of the contracting parties is in a state of war, by enabling its citizens freely to export its produce through the medium of neutral vessels, or, when itself neutral, between two belligerent Powers, might enrich itself by carrying the produce of both of them without danger of violence from either.

These advantages are fully understood and have been acknowledged by your excellencies.

The rule is alike politic and humane; but to make it just the qualification proposed is absolutely essential. It has been adopted in this manner by all the new Republics of America with whom the United States have celebrated treaties, and it would be unjust towards them to form a convention with Mexico wherein the principle was admitted without the exception.

The only alternative the undersigned can offer is to omit the principle altogether. If it be inserted at all in the treaty, it must be accompanied by the proposed qualification.

With respect to the obligation which it is supposed that Mexico has contracted in her negotiations with Great Britain, the undersigned will merely observe that there exists the most positive proof that Mexico would have obtained the same terms from that nation even if the principle and proposed qualification had been introduced into the former treaty. Great Britain had no right to exact or to expect that Mexico should renounce an important rule, affecting her most vital interests, after having made a treaty with Colombia, subsequent to that concluded between the United States and that Republic, in which the principle of "free ships making free goods," together with the proposed qualification, had been introduced. It is not probable, therefore, that the circumstance of the omission of the proposed qualification in our former treaty had any influence on the negotiations between this country and Great Britain.

If the great maritime Powers, with only one exception, have deemed it politic to adopt this salutary rule, how much more important must it be to the rising but infant States of America.

To the undersigned it appears of the last importance to settle by treaty, in this hemisphere, a question which has occasioned so many acts of violence and so many wars in the other. The States of America ought to be governed in their intercourse with each other by the strictest rules of humanity and justice, and every means resorted to that human wisdom can suggest in order to avoid future cause of war, of which the converse of the principle here contended for has proved so fruitful a source.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellencies the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

J. R. POINSETT.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the protocol of a conference held with one of the Mexican plenipotentiaries, at his request, in order to explain some points which had appeared doubtful to this cabinet. I hope the President will be satisfied with my explanation.

With regard to the article relative to fugitive slaves, I used very strong language, because I thought it politic so to do. I do certainly consider that article as very important to the future good understanding between the two nations, and shall use every means in my power to have it ratified by this Congress.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

OPINION OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL ON THE AWARD OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA UNDER THE TREATY OF GHENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 22, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

A copy of the opinion of the Attorney General, dated May 17, 1826, upon the construction of the award of the Emperor of Russia, under the treaty of Ghent, and upon certain questions propounded to him in relation thereto, subjoined to a report from the Secretary of State, are herewith communicated to the House, in compliance with their resolution of the 17th instant.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, April 22, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 21, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 17th of this month requesting the President of the United States to lay before that House, if it would not, in his opinion, be injurious to the public interest, a copy of the opinion given by the Attorney General, on the 17th of May, 1826, upon the construction of the award of the Emperor of Russia, under the treaty of Ghent, and upon certain questions propounded by the President in relation thereto, has the honor to submit to the President a copy of the opinion of the Attorney General required by the House.

Respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, May 17, 1826.

SIR: I have considered carefully the questions which you have done me the honor to submit for my opinion, on the construction of the award of the Emperor of Russia and the convention of St. Petersburg, made in subservience to that award, and have examined with great attention the documents touching these questions, transmitted to me by your communication of the 8th instant. The questions are—

"1st. Is interest a part of the indemnity awarded by the Emperor?

"2d. Is the refusal of the British Commissioner to refer to the arbitration of the convention the disagreement between him and his American associate, on the point of interest, warranted by the convention?"

After the most deliberate consideration of all the arguments which have been urged, pro and con, I am clearly of the opinion that interest, at least, is a necessary part of the indemnity awarded by the Emperor; and that the refusal of the British Commissioner, stated in your second question, is not warranted by the convention.

The topics on both sides of these questions have been so fully and ably arrayed and exhausted that it would be a useless consumption of your time, and would load the files of your Department to no good purpose, for me to travel again over the whole of this extended discussion.

The questions seem to me to lie within a very narrow compass; and the error of the argument on the other side, as it regards the claim of interest, arises, I humbly conceive, from a mistake of the character of the convention of St. Petersburg. That convention is not an original treaty, arranging, for the first time, and by way of compromise, the matters of dispute between the British and American Governments. It is not an original treaty at all. It is a mere subsidiary instrument to give effect to the Emperor's award. Such is the avowal of its character upon its own face. It does not profess even to explain the award, much less to alter and narrow that award, or to control its construction in any respect whatever. On the contrary, by the express avowal of one sole purpose, it excludes the supposition of all others, and declares its character as explicitly as if words of negation and exclusion had been positively used. Thus the preamble, after reciting the Emperor's award verbatim, proceeds: "Now, for the purpose of carrying into effect this award of his Imperial Majesty," &c.; not for the purpose of modifying or explaining, but for the simple purpose of carrying that award into effect. After this ascertainment of the mere subsidiary character of this convention to regard it as the predominating instrument, and to seize upon any insulated expressions which may be found in it for the purpose of controlling the construction of the award itself, is wholly inadmissible in any fair consideration of the subject. On the contrary, the award is the principal, the overruling, nay, the sole authority in estimating the extent of the indemnity; and the convention, which was formed for the single purpose of giving effect to that award, not to explain or control it, is not to be resorted to for the purpose of explaining or controlling it. Suppose that there are expressions in the convention of an ambiguous character, susceptible of two constructions—the one consistent with the award, and the other inconsistent with it—can there be a rational doubt that that shall be preferred which is consistent with the award? Would it not be to unsettle and to reverse one of the best established rules of construction, as well of action, that require that the principal shall yield to its subsidiary? Now, the utmost that candor, and even liberality, can be required to admit, in this case, is, that some of the details of the convention, considered as standing alone, are sufficiently ambiguous to admit of two constructions: one of which stands consistently with the natural sense of the award; and the other of which is in opposition to the natural sense; which are we to prefer?

It seems to me that it requires only to bestow a thought on the relation between the award and the convention to answer that the award is to give the law. Let me even go further: let me suppose (for the purpose of argument merely) that the convention, standing alone, would furnish even a strong implication of a narrower meaning than the award itself would import; which is to give the law? If the convention had professed to expound or explain the award, such a hypothetic difficulty would deserve great consideration; but the convention proposes no such thing. On the contrary, acknowledging the final and conclusive supremacy of the award, it comes in only for the humble and ancillary purpose of giving it effect according to its own sense. His Britannic Majesty had already agreed, by the convention of London of the 20th October, 1818, that the award should be final and conclusive. It would, therefore, have been disingenuous in the extreme, and utterly inconsistent with the high character of the British Sovereign, under the guise of a subsequent convention, to carry the award into effect, to introduce expressions calculated to narrow its just operation, and then to stand upon these expressions as a construction of the award. It would be an evasion of the engagement that the award itself should be final and conclusive. And it would be no answer to the charge of such an evasion to say, "here is your own construction of the award in the convention of St. Petersburg," an instrument not professing to give any such construction, but professing, on the contrary, a totally different purpose—that of carrying the award into effect according to its own sense.

I forbear the re-examination of the provisions of the convention of St. Petersburg, and a comparison of them with the award of the Emperor, for the purpose of showing whether there is any conflict or ambiguity between them, or to what extent it exists, because this has been already fully and ably done by the British and American ministers. It is sufficient for my purpose to have shown that if there be any such conflict the award alone is to give law.

And then the only remaining inquiry is, what is the award? It is that the United States are entitled to a just indemnification for the slaves and other property carried away by the British forces in violation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent. What is a just indemnification for a wrong? Is it the reparation of the one-half or two-thirds of that wrong? Is it anything less than a reparation of the whole wrong? On these few simple ideas the whole question turns. If an injury is justly redressed which is only half redressed, then the British Commissioner is right; but if an injury is only redressed when the redress is commensurate with the whole extent of the injury, then he is wrong. Let us put aside the emphatic and striking word just and take the word indemnification alone. What does the word indemnification mean? The saving harmless from damage who is left to bear one-half of the damage himself? The question seems to me too plain for discussion.

The British Commissioner, Sir John Nicholl, who composed part of the board under the 7th article of the treaty of 1794, seems to have entertained a very different opinion on this subject from his countryman, who is now sitting to execute the Emperor's award. His words are: "To reimburse the claimants the original cost of their property, and all the expenses they have actually incurred, together with interest on the whole amount, would, I think, be a just and adequate compensation. This, I believe, is the measure of compensation usually made by all belligerent nations for losses, costs, and damages, occasioned by illegal captures." Now, at the time of the wrongs now under consideration, we were, as to Great Britain, neutrals and friends, and stood protected by the most sacred of all instruments—a treaty of peace.

In violation of this treaty, the slaves and other property of American citizens were carried away in the year 1815, and have been detained from them ever since. They have thus lost the use of this property for eleven years. Is the meagre return of the average value at the time the slaves and other property thus taken from them a just indemnification of the whole wrong? That the act of taking away the property was a wrong is no longer a question. Whatever disposition there may be to make it a question, it has been settled by the tribunal of the party's own choice, and can no longer be made a question. The first act of dispossession being thus established to be a wrong, is the continuance of that dispossession for eleven years no wrong at all? Is it consistent with that usage of nations which Sir John Nicholl recognizes to redress an act of wrongful violence by the return, at any distance of time, of the naked value of the article at the date of the injury? Such is certainly not the notion of the British courts sitting to administer the laws of nations, upon an intimate knowledge of whose cause of action Sir John Nicholl founded the concession which has been quoted; and the American Commissioner has, I observe, produced a striking example of the truth of this position in the decision of Sir William Scott in the case of the Acteon.

The British Commissioner objects to the application of the principle of the law of nations laid down by Sir William Scott in that case, because that was a suit, and this, he says, is a case of compromise. I am not able to discover in which of its features this is a case of compromise. The rights in question are founded on the award of the Emperor of Russia. Surely that award is no more a compromise than the decision of the Court of King's Bench can be said to be a compromise. It is the solemn and authoritative decision of a regularly constituted tribunal on the rights of the parties litigant before it, and disputing the question with no compromising spirit, not a result gained by the mutual concessions of the parties. The rights of the American citizen do not depend on any concession proceeding from the voluntary grace of Great Britain; they flow from the stern justice of the tribunal to which the decision was referred. Were it a gift which Great Britain was conferring, she might measure out her bounty as she pleased; but it is a right which the United States are exacting under the authority of the judge by whose decision Great Britain stipulated that she would be bound. Where, then, is the compromise to be found? Is it in the convention of St. Petersburg? But there is no modification of the award by that convention, nor consequently of the rights growing out of the award. As we have already seen, that convention leaves the award to stand in full force and to rest upon its own construction.

The idea of a compromise seems to me, therefore, to be totally out of the question, and, consequently, to have no effect at all in withdrawing this case from the operation of the principle and usage of nations laid down by Sir John Nicholl and Sir William Scott.

Upon the whole, sir, I am of the opinion that the just indemnification awarded by the Emperor involves, not merely the return of the value of the specific property, but a compensation also for the subsequent and wrongful detention of it in the nature of damages. If the actual damages in each case could be ascertained, they ought, under the award, to be decreed; but since this, if not impracticable, would be a work of great labor and time, I am of the opinion that the interest, according to the usage of nations, is a necessary part of the just indemnification awarded by the Emperor of Russia.

The British and American Commissioners having disagreed in opinion on this point, that is, in the amount of the claim to be allowed, the American Commissioner has proposed to call in an arbitrator, according to the mode provided by the convention made to settle this difference, to which the British Commissioner objects, on the ground that this is not one of those disagreements in which the convention contemplated that an arbitrator should be called in.

Your second question, therefore, is, whether this refusal on the part of the British Commissioner is warranted by the convention?

The provision of the convention is, (article V,) in the event of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, or their disagreement upon any question which may result from the stipulations of this convention, then, and in that case, they shall draw, by lot, the name of one of the two arbitrators, who, after having given due consideration, &c.

Now, the two Commissioners have not agreed in a particular case under examination; they have not agreed in the amount to be awarded to the claimant. The case, therefore, is a case for an arbitrator. Again: the stipulation of the convention is, that these Commissioners shall settle the amount of the indemnification; they have disagreed on a question growing out of this stipulation, to wit: on the question whether interest shall or shall not be allowed. Now, again, the convention calls for the interposition of an arbitrator. And, lastly, the same oath is prescribed by the convention, both to the Commissioners and arbitrators, clearly manifesting that the range of judicial duties was the same with regard to both; for the Commissioners are considered as acting upon oath at every judicial step; and, since the same oath is administered in the same terms to both, it would seem to indicate the clear purpose of the framers of the convention that, whenever the Commissioners, in the discharge of their judicial functions, might differ in opinion, an arbitrator might be called on to decide the difference.

Were it otherwise, one Commissioner would have the whole subject under his sole control; first, by disagreeing with his associate, and then by refusing to call in an arbitrator. This would certainly be executing the award of the Emperor in one of the senses of that word, but not in that, I presume, which the convention intended.

I am of the opinion that the refusal of the British Commissioner to call in an arbitrator is wholly unwarranted by the convention.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM WIRT.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, State Department.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 487. [1ST SESSION.

TREATY OF AMITY, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION WITH THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, APRIL 25, 1828.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, for the exercise of their constitutional authority thereon, a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, signed by their respective plenipotentiaries on the 14th of February last, with a copy of the treaty, and the protocols of conferences during and subsequent to the negotiation.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, April 24, 1828.

TREATY OF AMITY, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES.

The United States of America and the United Mexican States, desiring to establish, in an equitable and permanent manner, the rules which ought to govern the commercial intercourse and friendly relations that happily prevail between the two parties, and considering that this end can be obtained only by taking for the basis of their agreement the most perfect equality and reciprocity, and by avoiding all preferences to other nations, but reserving to each party the liberty of admitting them, at its pleasure, to a full participation of the same advantages, have resolved to conclude, on this basis, a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation.

With this intention, the President of the United States of America has appointed for their plenipo-tentiary, Joel Roberts Poinsett, a citizen of the United States of America, and their Envoy Extraordinary near the United Mexican States; and the President of the United Mexican States, his excellency Don Sebastian Camacho, Secretary of State and of Interior and Exterior Relations, and his excellency Don José Ignacio Esteva:

And the said plenipotentiaries, having exchanged their full powers, have concluded and agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE FIRST. There shall be a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, in all the extent of their possessions and territories, and between their people and citizens, respectively, without distinction of persons or places.

ARTICLE SECOND. The United States of America and the United Mexican States, desiring to take for the basis of their agreement the most perfect equality and reciprocity, engage, mutually, not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely if the concession was freely made or on allowing the same compensation if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE THIRD. The citizens of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty, freely and securely, to come with their vessels and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories of the United States of America and of the United Mexican States to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any part of the said territories, respectively; also, to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce, and to trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce.

And they shall not pay other or higher duties, imposts, or fees, whatsoever, than those which the most favored nations are or may be obliged to pay, and shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, with respect to navigation and commerce, which the citizens of the most favored nations do or may enjoy; but subject always to the laws, usages, and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

The liberty to enter and discharge the vessels of both nations, of which this article treats, shall not be understood to authorize the coasting trade permitted to national vessels only.

ARTICLE FOURTH. No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United Mexican States of any article the produce, growth, or manufacture of the United States of America than those which the same or like articles the produce, growth, or manufacture of any other foreign country do now or may hereafter pay; nor shall articles the produce, growth, or manufacture of the United Mexican States be subject, on their introduction into the United States of America, to other or higher duties than those which the same or like articles of any foreign country do now or may hereafter pay. Higher duties shall not be imposed in the respective States on the exportation of any article to the States of the other contracting party than those which are now or may hereafter be paid on the exportation of like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be established on the exportation or importation of any article the produce, growth, or manufacture of the United States of America or of the United Mexican States, respectively, in either of them, which shall not, in like manner, be established with respect to other foreign countries.

ARTICLE FIFTH. No other or higher duties or charges, on account of tonnage, light or harbor dues, pilotage, salvage, in case of damage or shipwreck, or any other local charges, shall be imposed in any of the ports of Mexico on American vessels than those payable in the same ports by Mexican vessels, nor in the ports of the United States of America on Mexican vessels than shall be payable in the same ports on American vessels.

ARTICLE SIXTH. The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the territories of Mexico of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America, whether such importation shall be in Mexican or American vessels; and the same duties shall be paid on the importation into the territories of the United States of America of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of Mexico, whether such importation shall be in American or Mexican vessels. The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties and drawbacks allowed, on the exportation to Mexico of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America, whether such exportation shall be in Mexican or in American vessels; and the same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties and drawbacks allowed, on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Mexico, to the United States of America, whether such exportation shall be in American or in Mexican vessels.

ARTICLE SEVENTH. All merchants, captains, or commanders of vessels, and others, citizens of the United States of America, shall have full liberty, in the United Mexican States, to direct or manage themselves their own affairs, or to commit them to the management of whomsoever they may think proper, either as broker, factor, agent, or interpreter; nor shall they be obliged to employ, for the aforesaid purposes, any other persons than those employed by Mexicans, nor to pay them higher salaries or remunerations than such as are, in like cases, paid by Mexicans; and absolute freedom shall be allowed, in all cases, to the buyer and seller to bargain and fix the price of any goods, wares, or merchandise, imported into or exported from the United Mexican States, as they may think proper, observing the laws, usages, and customs of the country.

The citizens of Mexico shall enjoy the same privileges in the States and territories of the United States of America, being subject to the same conditions.

ARTICLE EIGHTH. The citizens of neither of the contracting parties shall be liable to any embargo, nor shall their vessels, cargoes, merchandise or effects be detained for any military expedition, nor for any public or private purpose whatsoever, without a corresponding compensation.

ARTICLE NINTH. The citizens of both countries, respectively, shall be exempt from compulsory service in the Army or Navy, nor shall any forced loan be imposed upon them, nor shall they be subjected to any other charges, or contributions, or taxes, than such as are paid by the citizens of the States in which they reside.

ARTICLE TENTH. Whenever the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or asylum in the rivers, bays, ports, or dominions of the other with their vessels, whether merchant or war, public or private, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity, with the precautions which may be deemed expedient on the part of the respective Governments in order to avoid fraud, giving to them all favor and protection for repairing their vessels, procuring provisions, and placing themselves in a situation to continue their voyage, without obstacle or hinderance of any kind.

ARTICLE ELEVENTH. All vessels, merchandise, and effects, belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting parties, which may be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high seas, and may be carried into or found in the rivers, bays, ports, or dominions of the other, shall be delivered up to the owners, they proving, in due and proper form, their rights before the competent tribunals; it being well understood that the claim shall be made within the term of one year, counting from the capture of said vessels or merchandise, by the parties themselves, or their attorneys, or by agents of the respective Governments.

ARTICLE TWELFTH. When any vessel belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be wrecked, foundered, or shall suffer any damage on the coasts, or within the dominions of the other, there shall be given to it all assistance and protection, in the same manner which is usual and customary with the vessels of the nation where the damage happens, permitting them to unload such vessel, if necessary, of its merchandise and effects, with the precautions which may be deemed expedient on the part of the respective Governments in order to avoid fraud, without exacting for it any duty, impost, or contribution whatever, until they be exported.

ARTICLE THIRTEENTH. In whatever relates to the succession of estates, either by will or ab intestato, disposal of such property, of whatever sort or denomination it may be, by sale, donation, exchange, or testament, or in any other manner whatsoever, the citizens of the two contracting parties shall enjoy, in their respective States and territories, the same privileges, exemptions, liberties, and rights as native citizens; and shall not be charged, in any of these respects, with other or higher duties or imposts than those which are now or may hereafter be paid by the citizens of the Power in whose territories they may reside.

ARTICLE FOURTEENTH. Both of the contracting parties promise and engage, formally, to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, of all occupations, who may be in the territories subject to the jurisdiction of the one or of the other, transient or dwelling therein, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice for their judicial recourse, on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or citizens of the country in which they may be, for which they may employ in defence of their rights such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors, as they may judge proper, in all their trials at law; and said citizens, or their agents, shall enjoy, in every respect, the same rights in the prosecution or defence of their persons or property as the citizens of the country where the cause may be tried.

ARTICLE FIFTEENTH. The citizens of the United States of America, residing in the United Mexican States, shall enjoy, in their houses, persons, and properties, the protection of the Government; and continuing in the possession of what they now enjoy, they shall not be disturbed or molested, in any manner, on account of their religion; provided they respect that of the country where they reside, and its constitution, laws, usages, and customs; they shall likewise continue to enjoy the privilege of burying in places which now are or may hereafter be assigned for that purpose such citizens of the United States of America as may die within the aforesaid United Mexican States; nor shall the funerals or sepulchres of the dead be disturbed in any manner nor under any pretext.

The citizens of the United Mexican States shall enjoy, throughout all the States and territories of the United States of America, the same protection, and shall be allowed the free exercise of their religion, in public or in private, either within their own houses or in the chapels and places of worship set apart for that purpose.

ARTICLE SIXTEENTH. It shall be lawful for all and singular the people, citizens, and inhabitants of the United States of America and of the United Mexican States, respectively, to sail with their vessels with all manner of security and liberty, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandise laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who now are or may hereafter be at enmity with the United States of America or with the United Mexican States. It shall likewise be lawful for the aforesaid citizens, respectively, to sail with their vessels and merchandise before mentioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security, from the places, ports, and havens of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy before mentioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same Government or under several; and it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed free and exempt which shall be found on board the vessels belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free vessel, so that, although they be enemies to either party, they shall not be made prisoners or taken out of that free vessel unless they are soldiers and in actual service of the enemy. By the stipulation that the flag shall cover the property, the two contracting parties agree that this shall be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ARTICLE SEVENTEENTH. It is likewise agreed that, in the case where the neutral flag of one of the contracting parties shall protect the property of the enemies of the other by virtue of the above stipulation, it shall always be understood that the neutral property found on board such enemies' vessels shall be held and considered as enemies' property, and, as such, shall be liable to detention and confiscation, except such property as was put on board such vessels before the declaration of war, or even afterwards, if it were done without the knowledge of it; but the contracting parties agree that two months having elapsed after the declaration, their citizens shall not plead ignorance thereof. On the contrary, if the flag of the neutral does not protect the enemy's property in that case the goods and merchandises of the neutral embarked in such enemy's vessel shall be free.

ARTICLE EIGHTEENTH. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandises, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband; and under this name of contraband or prohibited goods shall be comprehended, first, cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fusees, rifles, carabines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, spears, halberts, and grenades, bombs, powder, matches, balls, and all other things belonging to the use of these arms; secondly, bucklers, helmets, breastplates, coats of mail, infantry belts, and clothes made up in the military form and for a military use; thirdly, cavalry belts, and horses with their furniture; fourthly, and generally, all kinds of arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass, and copper, or of any other materials, manufactured, prepared, and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

ARTICLE NINETEENTH. All other merchandise and things not comprehended in the articles of contraband explicitly enumerated and classified as above shall be held and considered as free, and subjects of free and lawful commerce, so that they may be carried and transported in the freest manner by both the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, excepting only those places which are at that time besieged or blockaded; and, to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared that those places only are besieged or blockaded which are actually besieged or blockaded by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

ARTICLE TWENTIETH. The articles of contraband before enumerated and classified which may be found in a vessel bound for an enemy's port shall be subject to detention and confiscation, leaving free the rest of the cargo and the vessel, that the owners may dispose of them as they see proper. No vessels of either of the two nations shall be detained on the high seas on account of having on board articles of contraband whenever the master, captain, or supercargo of said vessel will deliver up the articles of contraband to the captors, unless the quantity of such articles be so great and of so large a bulk that they cannot be received on board the capturing vessel without great inconvenience; but in this and all other cases of just detention the vessel detained shall be sent to the nearest convenient and safe port for trial and judgment according to law.

ARTICLE TWENTY-FIRST. And whereas it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so situated may be turned away from such port or place, but shall not be detained; nor shall any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after warning of such blockade or investment from the commanding officer of the blockading forces, she shall again attempt to enter the aforesaid port, but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she may think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either of the contracting parties that may have entered into such port before the same was actually besieged, blockaded or invested by the other be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo; nor, if found therein after the surrender, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but she shall be restored to the owner thereof.

ARTICLE TWENTY-SECOND. In order to prevent all kind of disorder in the visiting and examination of the vessels and cargoes of both the contracting parties on the high seas, they have agreed, mutually, that whenever a vessel of war, public or private, shall meet with a neutral vessel of the other contracting party, the first shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send its boat, with two or three men only, in order to execute the said examination of the papers concerning the ownership and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence, or ill-treatment, for which the commanders of the said armed ships shall be responsible with their persons and property; for which purpose the commanders of said private armed vessels shall, before receiving their commissions, give sufficient security to answer for all the damages they may commit. And it is expressly agreed that the neutral vessel shall, in no case, be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting her papers, or for any other purpose whatever.

ARTICLE TWENTY-THIRD. To avoid all kind of vexation and abuse in the examination of papers relating to the ownership of vessels belonging to the citizens of the two contending parties, they have agreed, and do agree, that in case one of them should be engaged in war, the vessels belonging to the citizens of the other must be furnished with sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the vessel, and also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of said vessel, in order that it may thereby appear that the vessel really and truly belongs to the citizens of one of the contracting parties; they have likewise agreed that such vessels, being laden, besides the said sea-letters and passports, shall also be provided with certificates containing the several particulars of the cargo, and the place whence the vessel sailed, so that it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same, which certificate shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the vessel sailed in the accustomed form; without which requisites the said vessel may be detained to be adjudged by the competent tribunal, and may be declared legal prize, unless the said defect shall be satisfied or supplied by testimony entirely equivalent, to the satisfaction of the competent tribunal.

ARTICLE TWENTY-FOURTH. It is further agreed that the stipulations above expressed, relative to the visiting and examination of vessels, shall apply only to those which sail without convoy; and when said vessels are under convoy the verbal declaration of the commander of the convoy, on his word of honor that the vessels under his protection belong to the nation whose flag he carries, and, when they are bound to an enemy's port, that they have no contraband goods on board, shall be sufficient.

ARTICLE TWENTY-FIFTH. It is further agreed that in all cases the established courts for prize causes in the country to which the prizes may be conducted shall alone take cognizance of them. And whenever such tribunal of either party shall pronounce judgment against any vessel, or goods, or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded; and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, in conformity with the laws and usages of the country, and of all the proceedings of the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of said vessel without any delay, he paying the legal fees for the same.

ARTICLE TWENTY-SIXTH. For the greater security of the intercourse between the citizens of the United States of America and of the United Mexican States, it is agreed, now, for them, that if there should be, at any time hereafter, an interruption of the friendly relations which now exist, or a war unhappily break out between the two contracting parties, there shall be allowed the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coast, and one year to those residing in the interior of each other's States and territories, respectively, to arrange their business, dispose of their effects, or transport them wheresoever they may please, giving them a safe conduct to protect them to the port they may designate. Those citizens who may be established in the States and territories aforesaid, exercising any other occupation or trade, shall be permitted to remain in the uninterrupted enjoyment of their liberty and property so long as they conduct themselves peaceably, and do not commit any offence against the laws; and their goods and effects, of whatever class and condition they may be, shall not be subject to any embargo or sequestration whatever, nor to any charge nor tax other than may be established upon similar goods and effects belonging to the citizens of the States in which they reside, respectively; nor shall the debts between individuals, nor moneys in the public funds, or in public or private banks, nor shares in companies, be confiscated, embargoed, or detained.

ARTICLE TWENTY-SEVENTH. Both the contracting parties, being desirous of avoiding all inequality in relation to their public communications and official intercourse, have agreed, and do agree, to grant to the envoys, ministers, and other public agents, the same favors, immunities, and exemptions which those of the most favored nation do or may enjoy; it being understood that whatever favor, immunities, or privileges the United States of America or the United Mexican States may find it proper to give to the ministers and public agents of any other Power shall, by the same act, be extended to those of each of the contracting parties.

ARTICLE TWENTY-EIGHTH. In order that the consuls and vice consuls of the two contracting parties may enjoy the rights, prerogatives, and immunities which belong to them by their character, they shall, before entering upon the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent in due form to the Government to which they are accredited; and having obtained their exequatur, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants of the consular district in which they reside. It is agreed, likewise, to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in all the ports and places open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy therein all the rights, prerogatives, and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nation, leaving, however, each of the contracting parties at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls and vice consuls may not be expedient.

ARTICLE TWENTY-NINTH. It is likewise agreed that the consuls, their secretaries, officers, and persons attached to the service of consuls, they not being citizens of the country in which the consul resides, shall be exempt from all compulsory service, and also from all kinds of taxes, imposts, and contributions levied especially on them, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which the citizens and inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which they reside are subject, being, in everything besides, subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulates shall be respected inviolably, and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE THIRTIETH. The said consuls shall have power to require the assistance of the authorities of the country for the arrest, detention, and custody of deserters from the public and private vessels of their country, and, for that purpose, they shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel's or ship's roll, or other public documents, that those men were parts of said crews; and on this demand so proved, (saving always where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be placed at the disposal of the said consuls, and may be put in the public prisons, at the request and expense of those who reclaim them, to be sent to the vessels to which they belong, or to others of the same nation; but if they be not sent back within two months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE THIRTY-FIRST. For the purpose of more effectually protecting their commerce and navigation, the two contracting parties do hereby agree, as soon hereafter as circumstances will permit, to form a consular convention, which shall declare, specially, the powers and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the respective parties.

ARTICLE THIRTY-SECOND. It is likewise agreed that the two contracting parties shall, by all the means in their power, maintain peace and harmony among the several Indian nations who inhabit the country adjacent to the lines and rivers which form the boundaries of the two countries; and, the better to attain this object, both parties bind themselves expressly to restrain by force all hostilities and incursions on the part of the Indian nations living within their respective boundaries; so that the United States of America will not suffer their Indians to attack the citizens of the United Mexican States, nor the Indians inhabiting their territory; nor will the United Mexican States permit the last mentioned Indians to commit hostilities against the citizens of the United States of America, nor their Indians, in any manner whatever. And in the event of any person or persons captured by the Indians who inhabit the territory of either of the contracting parties being, or having been, carried into the territories of the other, both Governments engage and bind themselves in the most solemn manner to return them to their country as soon as they know of their being within their respective territories, or to deliver them up to the agent or representative of the Government that claims them, giving to each other, reciprocally, timely notice, and the claimant paying the expenses incurred in the transmission and maintenance of such person or persons, who, in the meantime, shall be treated with the utmost hospitality by the local authorities of the place where they may be. Nor shall it be lawful, under any pretext whatsoever, for the citizens of either of the contracting parties to purchase or hold captive prisoners made by the Indians inhabiting the territories of the other.

ARTICLE THIRTY-THIRD. It is likewise agreed that, in the event of any slaves escaping from their owners residing in the States or territories of one of the contracting parties and passing over into the States or territories of the other, it shall be lawful for the owner or owners of such slaves, or their lawful agents, to require the assistance of the authorities of the country where they may be found for their arrest, detention, and custody; and for that purpose the proprietors or their agents shall address themselves to the nearest magistrate or competent officer. On such demand being made it shall be the duty of the magistrate or competent officer to cause the said slaves to be arrested and detained; and if it shall appear that such slaves be actually the property of the claimant, the magistrate or competent officer shall surrender them to the proprietors or their agents, to be conveyed back to the country from whence they had escaped, the claimants paying the expenses incurred by the arrest, detention, and custody of such slaves, and none others.

And it is further agreed by the contracting parties, that on mutual requisitions by them, respectively, or by their respective ministers, or officers authorized to make the same, they will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the territories of the other; provided, that this shall be done only on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension or commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed. The expense of such apprehension or delivery shall be defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the fugitive.

ARTICLE THIRTY-FOURTH. Whereas, from the intimate relations which are established between the territories and citizens of the United States of America and of the United Mexican States, there must necessarily result new and important points which will require a special convention, it is agreed that such points shall be taken into consideration at the termination of six years, to be counted from the day on which the ratifications of this treaty are exchanged; and the articles which may be then concluded and agreed upon, with the constitutional sanction of both Governments, respectively, shall be considered as making a part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as those which are contained in it.

ARTICLE THIRTY-FIFTH. The United States of America and the United Mexican States, desiring to make as durable as circumstances will permit the relations which are to be established between the two parties, by virtue of this treaty or general convention of amity, commerce, and navigation, have declared solemnly, and do agree to the following points:

First. The present treaty shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of twelve years, to be counted from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, in all the parts relating to commerce and navigation; and in all those parts which relate to peace and friendship, it shall be perpetually and permanently binding on both Powers.

Second. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizens shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the two nations shall not be interrupted thereby; each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

Third. If (what, indeed, cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any other way whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaint of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proof, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed.

Fourth. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other Sovereigns or States.

The present treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the President of the United Mexican States, with the consent and approbation of the Congress of the same; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Washington within the term of six months, to be counted from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of the United Mexican States, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done in the city of Mexico, on the fourteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, in the fifty-second year of the Independence of the United States of America, and in the eighth of that of the United Mexican States.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLES.

FIRST. Whereas, in the present state of the Mexican shipping, it would not be possible for Mexico to receive the full advantage of the reciprocity established in the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty signed this day, it is agreed that, for the term of ten years, the stipulations contained in the said articles shall be suspended, and, in lieu thereof, it is hereby agreed that, until the expiration of the said term of ten years, American vessels entering into the ports of Mexico, and all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America imported in such vessels, shall pay no higher or other duties than are or may hereafter be payable in the said ports by the vessels, and the like articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, it is agreed that Mexican vessels entering into the ports of the United States of America, and all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United Mexican States imported in such vessels, shall pay no other or higher duties than are or may hereafter be payable in the said ports by the vessels, and the like articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the most favored nation; and that no higher duties shall be paid, or bounties or drawbacks be allowed, on the exportation of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country, in the vessels of the other, than upon the exportation of the like articles in the vessels of any other foreign country.

ARTICLE SECOND. Although, by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty signed this day, it is declared that all the parts thereof relating to commerce and navigation shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of twelve years, to be counted from the exchange of ratifications, it is hereby agreed that such parts shall be in force even after the expiration of that term, until one of the parties shall have declared its intention to renounce it, which declaration shall be made at least six months beforehand.

The present additional articles shall have the same force and value as if they had been inserted, word for word, in the treaty signed this day. They shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at the same time.

In witness whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed and sealed the same.

Done at Mexico, on the fourteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight.

Y no puyaràn otros ni mayores derechos, impuestos ó emolumentos cualquiera que los que las naciones mas faborecidas estan ó estubieren obligados à payar, y gozarán de todos los derechos, privilegios y ecsenciones que gozan ò gozaren los de la nacion mas faborecida, con respecto à navegacion y comercio; pero siempre con sugecion à las leyes, usos y reglamentos de ambos paises.

La libertad de entrar y de descargar los buques de ambas naciones en los puertos y rios de que hubla este articulo, no se entenderá à autorizar el comercio de escala y cabotage solo permetido à buques nacionales.

ARTICULO CUARTO. No se impondrán otros, ni mayores derechos à la introduccion en los Estados Unidos Mexicanos de articulo alguno de producto, fruto, ò manufactura de los Estados Unidos de America, que los que pagan, ò en adelante pagaren los mismos é iguales articulos de producto, fruto, ò manufactura de otro pais estrangero; los articulos de producto, fruto, ò manufactura de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, no estarán tampoco sugetos, en su introduccion, en los Estados Unidos de America, à otros ni mayores derechos que los que paguen, ò en adelante pagaren los mismos é iguales articulos de otro pais estrangero. No se impondrán mayores derechos, en los Estados respectivos, à la esportacion de articulo alguno, à los Estados de la otra parte contratante, que losque se pagan, ò en adelante se pagaren à la exportacion de iguales articulos de otro pais estrangero. Tampoco se establecerá prohibicion alguna à la estraccion ó introduccion de articulos algunos de producto, fruto, ò manufactura de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, ni de los Estados Unidos de America respectivamente, en unos y otros, que no se establesca igualmente con respecto à otras naciones estrangeras.

ARTICULO QUINTO. No se impondrán otros ni mas altos derechos ni cargos, por razon de toneladas, fanal, emolumentos de puerto, practico derecho de salvamento, en caso de perdida ò naufragio, ni algunas otras cargas locales, en ninguno de los puertos de Mexico à los buques Americanos, sino los que unicamente pagan, en los mismos, los Mexicanos; ni en los puertos de los Estados Unidos de America, se impondrán à los buques Mexicanos otras cargas que las que, en los mismos, pagan los Americanos.

ARTICULO SEXTO. Se pagaran los mismos derechos de importacion; en los territorios de Mexico, por los articulos de productos naturales, producciones y manufacturas de los Estados Unidos de America, bien sean importados en buques Mexicanos ò de los Estados Unidos de America; y los mismos derechos se pagarán, por la importacion en los territorios de los Estados Unidos de America, de las manufacturas, efectos y producciones de Mexico, aunque su importacion sea en buque Americano ò Mexicano—los mismos derechos pagarán, y gozarán las mismas franquicias y descuentos concedidos à la esportacion de cualquiera articulos de los productos naturales producciones ò manufacturas de los Estados Unidos de America, ya sea que la esportacion se haga en buques Mexicanos, ò en Americanos, y se pagarán las mismas derechos, y se concederán las mismos franquicias y descuentos à la esportacion de cualesquiera articulos, de los productos naturales, producciones ò manufacturas de Mexico en los Estados Unidos de America, sea que esta esportacion se haga en buques Americanos ò Mexicanos.

ARTICULO SEPTIMO. Todo comerciante, comandante de buque y otros, ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de America, tendrá plena libertad, en los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, para derigir, ò girar, por si, sus propios negocios, ò para encargar su direccion à quienes mejor les paresca, como corredor, factor, agente ò interprete, y no estarán obligados à emplear para dichos objetos otras personas, ni à pagarles mas salarios ó remuneraciones que las que, en iguales operaciones, emplean y pagan los Mexicanos, y en todos los casos, gozarán de absoluta libertad el comprador y el vendedor para tratar y fijar segun mejor les convenga el precio de cualquiera articulo, efecto ò mercancia introducida ò esportada en los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, observando las leyes, usos y costumbres del pais. Las mismas franquicias gozarán los ciudadanos Mexicanos en los Estados y territorios de los Estados Unidos de America, sujetandose à las mismas condiciones.

ARTICULO OCTAVO. Los ciudadanos de las partes contratantes no estarán sugetos à embargo, ni sus buques, cargamentos, mercancias ò efectos serán detenidos para espediciones militares, ni para ningun otro objeto publico ó privado cualquiera que sea, sin la indemnizacion correspondiente.

ARTICULO NOVENO. Los ciudadanos de ambos paises, respectivamente, estarán exêntos de ser compelidos à server en el ejercito ò armada; no se les podra imponer especialmente à ellos ningun imprestito forzoso ni estarán sugetos à otras contribuciones, cargas ni impuestos que aquellos que sean pagados por los ciudadanos de los Estados en que residan.

ARTICULO DECIMO. Siempre que los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes se vean precisados à buscar refugio ò asilo en los rios, bahias, puertos, ò dominios de la otra, con sus buques ya sean mercantes ò de guerra, ò armados en corso, por mal tiempo, persecucion de piratas ò enemigos, seran recibidos y tratados con humanidad, con las precauciones que se estimen convenientes por parte de los Gobiernos respectivos, para evitar el fraude, concediendoseles todo fabor y proteccion para reparar sus buques y procurar viveres, y provisiones y ponerse en estado de continuor su viage sin obstaculo ni impedimento alguno.

ARTICULO UNDECIMO. Todos los buques, mercancias y efectos, pertenecientes à ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que sean apresados por piratas, ya sea dentro de los limites de su jurisdiccion, ò en alta mar, y que fueren llevados ò hallados, en los rios, bahias, puertos ò dominios de la otra, serán entregados á sus dueños, probando estos en debida y propia forma, sus derechos ante los tribunales com-petentes; debiendo entenderse claramente que el reclamo deberá hacerse en el termino de un año contado desde el apresamiento del buque ò mercancia por las mismas partes, sus apoderados, ò agentes de sus Gobiernos respectivos.

ARTICULO DUODECIMO. Cuando algun buque perteneciente à ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, naufrague, vaga á pique, ó sufra alguna averia en las costas ò dominios de la otra, se dará toda asistencia y proteccion en los mismos terminos que se usa y acostumbra con los buques de la nacion en donde acaezca el daño; permitiendosele descargar las mercancias y efectos del referido buque si fuere necesario, con las precauciones que se estimen convenientes por parte de los Gobiernos respectivos para evitar el fraude, y sin que, por esto, se les imponga derecho alguno, imposicion ni contribucion de ningana clase, hasta que sean esportados.

ARTICULO DECIMO TERCIO. Por lo que toca á la succesion de las propiedades personales, por testamento, ò ad intestato, y al derecho de disponer de la propiedad personal de cualquiera clase ò denominacion, por venta, donacion, permuta ò testamento, ò de otro modo cualquiera, los ciudadanos de las dos partes contratantes gozarán en sus respectivos estados y territorios los mismos privilegios ecsenciones y libertades y derechos, que si fueran ciudadanos nativos; y no se les cargará, en ninguno de estos puntos ò casos, mayores impuestos ò derechos que los pagan ò en adelante pagaren, los ciudadanos nativos de la potencia en cuyo territorio residan.

ARTICULO DECIMO CUARTO. Ambas partes contratantes prometen, y formalmente se comprometen à conceder su especial proteccion à las personas, y propiedades de los ciudadanos de cada una de ellas de todas clases, que se hallaren transeuntes ò establecidos en los territorios sugetos à la jurisdiccion respectiva, dejandoles abiertos y libres los tribunales de justicia para sus recursos judiciales, en los mismos terminos que se usa y acostumbra con los naturales ò ciudadanos del pais en que residan, á cuyo efecto podran emplear en defensa de sus derechos los abogados, procuradores, escribanos, agentes y factores que juzquen convenientes, para que puedan representar por ellos en juicio, y dichos ciudadanos ò sus agentes, gozarán, en todo, los mismos derechos en la prosecucion ò defensa de sus personas ò propiedades que los ciudadanos del pais donde la causa se juzgue.

ARTICULO DECIMO QUINTO. Los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de America, residentes en los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, gozarán en sus casas, personas y propiedades, de la proteccion del Gobierno, y, continuando en la posesion en que están, no serán alterados, inquietados ni molestados, de ninguna manera, por motivo de su religion, con tal que respeten la de la nacion en que residan, y la constitucion, leyes, usos y costumbres de esta; asi mismo, continuarán en la facultad de que gozan, para enterrar en los luyares señalados, ò que, en adelante, se señalaren à este objeto, à los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de America que mueran en los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, y los funerales y sepulcros de los muertos no serán turbados de modo alguno, ni por ningun pretexto.

Los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos gozaràn en todos los Estados y territorios de los Estados Unidos de America la misma proteccion, y podrán ejercer libremente su religion en publico ó en privado dentro de sus casas, ò en los templos y lugares destinados al culto.

ARTICULO DECIMO SEXTO. Será permitido à todos y cada uno de los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, y de los Estados Unidos de America, poder navegar libre y seguramente con sus embarcaciones, sin que haya la menor escepcion por este respecto, aunque los proprietarios de las mercaderias cargadas en dichas embarcaciones procedan de cualquiera puerto, y sean destinadas à cualquira plaza de una potencia actualmente enemiga, ò que lo sea despuès, asi de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, como de los Estados Unidos de America. Sepermitirá igualmente à los ciudadanos respectivamente, navegar con sus buques y mercaderias, y frecuentar con igual libertad y seguridad, las plazas y puertos de las potenciàs enemigas de las partes contratantes, ò de una de ellas, sin oposicion à obstaculo, y de comerciar, no solo desde los puertos de dicho enemigo à un puerto neutro, directamente, sino tambien desde uno enemigo, à otro tal, bien se encuentre bajo su jurisdiccion, ò baso la de muchos; y se estipula tambien que los buques libres aseguran igualmente la libertad de las mercancias, y que se juzgarán libres todos los efectos que se hallasen à bordo de los buques que perteneciesen à ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, aun cuando el cargamento, por entero ò parte de èl fuese de los enemigos de una de las dos; bien entendido, sin embargo, que el contrabando se ecseptua siempre. Se ha convenido asi mismo que la propia libertad gozarán los sugetos que puedan encontrarse à bordo del buque libre, aun cuando fuese enemigos de una de las partes contratentes; y por lo tanto no se podrá hacerlos prisionieros, ni separarlos de dichos buques, à menos que sean militares, y esten à la sazon empleados en el servicio del enemigo. Por la estipulacion de que la bandera cubre la propiedad, han convenido las dos partes contratantes en que esto se entienda asi con respeto à aquellas potencias que reconozean este principio; pero que si una de las dos partes contratantes estubiere en guerra con una tercera, y la otra neutral, la bandera de esta neutral cubrirá la propiedad de los enemigos cuyo Gobierno reconozea este principio, y no de otros.

ARTICULO DECIMO SEPTIMO. Se conviene tambien que en caso de que el pavillon neutral de una de las partes contratantes proteja la propiedad de los enemigos de la otra, en virtud de la referida estipulacion, se entenderá siempre que la propiedad neutral encontrada à bordo de los referidos buques enemigos se tendrá y considerará como propiedad enemiga, y, como tal estará sugeta à detencion y confiscacion escepta aquella propiedad que haya sido embarcada en tal buque antès de declaracion de guerra, y aun despuès, si se ha hecho sin noticia de tal declaracion; pero las partes contratentes convienen en que dos meses despuès de la declaracion, sus ciudadanos no alegarán ignorancia, al contrario, si el pavellon del buque neutral no protege la propiedad enemiga, en este case, los efectos y mercancias del neutral, embarcados en tal buque enemigo serán libres.

ARTICULO DECIMO OCTAVO. Esta libertad de navegacion y comercio será estensiva à todos genero de mercancias, esceptuando solamente las que se distinguen con el nombre de contrabando, y bajo clasificacion, ò la de efectos prohibidos, se comprenderán, primero: cañones, morteros, obuses, pedreros, trabucos, fusiles, escopetas, carabines comunes y rayadas, pistolas, picas, espados, sables, lanzas, arpones, alabardas, y granadas, bombas, polvora, mechas, balas y otras cosas que pertenecen al uso de armas. Secundo, escudos, yelmos, petos, cotas de maya, cinturones de infanteria, y uniformes ò bestidos propios para la tropa. Tercero, cinturones de caballeria, y caballaos con sus arneses. Cuerto, y generalmente toda clase de armas è instrumentos de fierro, acero, bronce y cobre, ù otros materiales, manufacturados, preparados y formados à proposito para hacer la guerra por mar ò por tierra.

ARTICULO DECIMO NONO. Cualesquiera otras mercancias y cosas no comprendidas en los articulos de contrabando, enumerados y clasificados esplicitamente, como queda dicho, se tendrán y considerarán libres, y de libre y legal comercio, de modo que podrán llevarse y trasportarse de la manera mas libre por ambas partes contratantes, aun a parages pertenecientes à enemigos, esceptuando solo aquellos que, à la sazon, estubiesen sitiados ò bloqueados, y para evitar toda duda en este particular, se declara que solo se considerarán bloqueados ò sitiados, aquellos puntos que se hallen sitiados ò bloqueados por una fuerza beligerante, capaz de impedir la entrada à los neutrales.

Articulo vigesimo. Los articulos de contrabando enumerados y clasificados arriba, que se encuentren en un buque que navega para un puerto enemigo, estarán sugetos a detencion y confiscacion, dejando libre el vesto del cargamento y el buque, para que los dueños dispongan lo que les parezca. Ningun buque de ambas nacionés será detenido en alta mar, por conducir à bordo articulos de contrabando, siempre que el dueño, capitan ò sobrecargo del referido buque los entregne al apresador, à menos que la cantidad de estos articulos sea tan grande y abulte tanto que no pueda recibirlos el buque apresador sin grande inconveniente; pero en este y en todos los demas casos de justa detencion el buque detenido se enviará al puerte mas cercano, conveniente y seguro, para ser jusgado con arreglo á las leyes.

Articulo vigesimo-primero. Como sucede muy frecuentemente que los buques salen para un puerto ò plaza perteneciente al enemigo, sin saber que se halla sitiado, bloqueado ò atacado, se conviene en que à ningun buque que se halle en estas circunstancias, se le permitirá entrar en él; pero no será detenido, ni será confiscada parte alguna de sa cargamento, si no hubiese en èl alguno de los efectos de contrabanda; à menos que despuès de ser prevenido del sitio ó bloqueo por el oficial comandante de las fuerzas bloqueadoras, emprendiese de nuevo entrar en dicho puerto; pero se le permitirá ir a cualquiera otro puerto ò lugar que crea conveniente; ni à buque alguno de las partes contratantes que hubiere entrado en tat puerto, antès de ser bloqueado, sitiado ò atacado, por alguna de ellas, se le impedirá salir del puerto con su cargamento, y si se hallase en èl despuès de la rendicion, ni el buque, ni el cargamento serán confiscado, sino devueltos á sus dueños.

Articulo vigesimo-segundo. Para impedit toda clase de desorden en la visita y examen de los buques y cargamentos de ambas partes contratantes en alta mar, convienen mutuamente en que siempre que un buque de guerra nacional, ò armado en corso, se encontrase con un buque neutral de la otra parte contratante, el primero se mantendrá fuera del tiro de cañon, y enviará su bote con solo dos òtres hombres para verificar el referido exâmen de los papeles relativos al dueño y cargamento del buque, sin causar la menor violencia, vejacion, ò mal trato: para lo que los comandantes de los expresados buques armados serán responsables con sus personas y propiedades, à cuyo fin los comandantes de dichos buques armados en corso, por cuenta de particulares, durán, antès de recibir sus patentes, fianzas suficientes para responder de los daños que puedan causar, y se estipula expresamente que à buque neutral, en ningun caso, se le obligará ir à bordo del que registra á manifestar sus papeles, ni algun otro objeto, sea el que fuere.

Articulo vigesimo-tercero. Para evitar toda rejacion y abuso en el exâmen de los papeles relativamente à los dueños de los buques que pertenescan à ciudadanos de las dos partes contratante, han convenido y convienen que en caso de hallarse una de ellas en guerra, los buques y navios que pertenezcan à ciudadanos de la otra, deberán ser provistos con patentes de mar ò pasaportes que espresen el nombre, propiedad y dimensiones del buque asi como el nombre del lugar en que habita el capitan ò comandante del buque, para que aparesca real y verdaderamente que pertenece à ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes; y han convenido igualmente en que à los referidos buques, si condujesen cargamento, ademas de las patentes de mar ò pasaportes, serán provistos de certificaciones con expresion de cada uno de los articulos que comprenda el cargamento, y el lugar de su procedencia, para saber si à su bordo se hallan efectos de contrabando, cuya certificacion se dará por las autoridades del lugar de donde salió el buque, en la forma acostumbrada, sin cuyo requisito el referido buque podrá ser detenido para ser juzgado por tribunal competente, y podrá ser declarado buena presa, à menos que esta falta se satisfaya ò supla con testimonio equivalente, a satisfaccion del tribunal competente.

Articulo vigesimo-cuarto. Convienen ademas que las estipulaciones arriba expresadas, relativamente al examen y visita de buques, tendrán lugar solamente respecto de aquellos que naveyan sui convoy, y que cuando los dichos buques estubieren bajo de convoy, será bastante la declaracion verbal del comandante del convoy, bajo su palabra de honor, de que los buques que estan bajo su proteccion pertenecen à la nacion del pubellon que enarbola, y cuando van con destino à puerto enemigo, de que no llevan contrabando à bordo.

Articulo vigesimo-quinto. Le conviene ademas, que, en todos los casos, los tribunales establecidos para juzgar las presas en el pais adonde estas sean conducidas, tendran ellos solos el conveniento de estas causas, y cuando estos tribunales de alguna de las partes pronunciasen sentencia contra algun buque, efectos, ò propiedad que sea reclamada por ciudadanos de la otra, en la sentencia se hará mencion de las razones ò motivos en que la haya fundado, y se dará, si la pidese, una copia autentica de ella en conformidad con los usos y leyes del pais, y de todos los procederes del caso, al comandante ò agente del buque interesado, sin demora alguna, pagando este las costas establecidas por la ley.

Articulo vigesimo-sexto. Para mayor seguridad en la comunicacion entre los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de Mexico, y los de los de America, se conviene, desde ahora para entoncès, que si acaeciere en lo sucesivo alguna interrupcion en las relaciones amistosas que hoy existen, ò si, desgraciadamente hubiese ud rompimiento hostil entre ambas partes contratantes, se les concederá el termino de seis meses à los comerciantes que residan en las costas, y un año à los que esten en el interior de cada uno de los estados y territorios respectivos, para arreglar sus negocios, disponer de sus bienes, ò transportarlos donde gusten, dandoles un salvo conducto que los proteja hasta et puerto que ellos designen: à los ciudadanos que se hallaren establecidos en los referidos estados y territorios, ocupados en cualquier otro trafico si ejercicio, se les permitirá permanecer sin interrupcion en al goce de su libertad y propiedades, mientras se comporten pacificamente, y no cometan ofensa alguna contra las leyes, y sus bienes y efectos, de cualquiera clase y condicion que sean, no estarán sujetos à embargo ò secuestro alguno, ni a otro impuesto ni contribucion que à los establecidos sobre efectos y bienes semejantes pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de los Estados en que respectivamente residan; ni las deudas particulares, ni las cantidades en los fondos publicos, ò en los bancos, publicos or particulares, ni las acciones de las compañias, podrán ser confiscadas, embargadas ni detenidas.

Articulo vigesimo-septimo. Ambas partes contratantes deseando evitar toda designaldad relativa à las comunicaciones publicas y oficiales, se han convenido y convienen en conceder à los Enviados, Ministros, y otros Agentes publicos, los mismos privilegios, exênciones è inmunidades que hoy goza, y en lo sucesivo pueda gozar, la nacion mas faborecida: debiendo entenderse que cualquier fabor, inmunidad, ò privilegio que los Estados Unidos de Mexico, ò los de America tengan por conveniente conceder à los ministros ò agentes publicos de cualquiera otra potencia, será ipsofacto extensiva à los de cada una de las respectivas partes contratantes.

Articulo vigesimo-octavo. Para que los consules y vice consules de las dos partes contratantes puedan gozar de los derechos, prerogativas è inmunidades que, por su caracter les corresponden, presentarán al Gobierno cerca del cual esten destinados su patente ò despacho en debida forma, antès de entrar en el ejercicio de sus funciones; y habiendo obtenido su exêquatur, seran tenidos y considerados como tales, por todas las autoridades, magistrados y habitantes del distrito consular donde residan. Se convienen tambien en recibir y admitir consules y vice consules en todos los puertos y lugares abiertos al comercio estrangero, guienes gozarán en ellos todos los derechos, prerogativos é inmunidades de los consules y vice consules de la nacion mas favorecida, quedando, no obstante en libertad cada parte contratante para esceptuar aquellos puertos y lugares en que la admision y residencia de semejantes consules y vice consules no parezca conveniente.

ARTICULO VIGESIMO-NONO. Ingualmente se conviene que los cónsules, sus secretarios, los oficiales y personas agregados al servicio de los consules, no siendo estos ciudadanos del pais en que el consul resida, estarán exêntos del servicio publico compulsivo, y tambien de toda clase de impuestos y contribuciones señaladas especialmente à ellos; esceptuando las que respecto à su comercio ò propiedad, esturán obligados à satisfacer del mismo modo que los ciudadanos y habitantes naturales y estrangeros del pais en que residan pagaren, estando en todo lo demas sugetos à las leyes de los Estados respectivos: los archivos y papeles oficiales de los consulados seran respetados inviolablemente, y por ningun pretexto, sea cual fuere, podran los magistrados embargarlos, ni, de ningun modo, tomar conocimiento de ellos.

ARTICULO TRIGESIMO. Los referidos consules podrán pedir el auxilio de las autoridades del pais para arrestar, detener y custodiar los desertores de los buques nacionales y particulares del suyo; y à este efecto podrán ellos mismos pedir à los tribunales, jueces y autoridades competentes, reclamando, por escrito, à los tales desertores, probando, con el roll de los mismos buques, ù otros documentos publicos, que aquellos formaban parte de sus tripulaciones; mas no asi cuando se probare lo contrario, no se reusará su entrega; estos desertores, despuès de arrestados, se pondrán à disposicion de los consules, y podrán embiarse à las carceles à pedimento y costo de los que los reclamasen, y de allì conducirlos à los buques à que pertenecieren, ò à otros de la misma nacion—Pero, si en termino de dos meses contados desde el dia de su arresto, no se habiesen devuelto, seran puestos en libertad, y por este mismo motivo no podrán volver à ser arrestados.

ARTICULO TRIGESIMO-PRIMERO. Con objeto de protejer mas eficazmente su comercio y navegacion, las dos partes contratantes convienen: que tan luego como lo parmitan las circunstancias, formaran un convenio consular que declarará especialmente las facultades y prerogativas de los consules y vice consules de las partes contratantes.

ARTICULO TRIGESIMO-SEGUNDO. Se ha convenido igualmente que las dos partes contratantes procurarán, por todos los medios posibles, mantener la paz y buena armonia entre las diversas tribus de Indios que habitan los terreños adyacentes à las lineas y rios que forman los limites de los dos paises; y para conseguir mejor este fin, se obligan espresamente ambas partes à reprimir, con la fuerza, todo genero de hostilidades ò incursiones de parte de las tribus Indias que habitan dentro de sus respectivos limites: de modo que los Estados Unidos de America no permitierán que sus Indios ataquen à los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, ni à los Indios que habitan sus territorios; y los Estados Unidos Mexicanos no permitierán tampoco, que sus Indios hostilizen à los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de America ò à sus Indios, de manera alguna.

Y en el caso de que alguna ò algunas personas cogidas por los Indios que habitan los territorios de cada una de las partes contratantes fuere, ò hubiere sido llevada à los territorios de la otra, ambas Gobiernos se comprometen y obligan, del modo mas solemne, à devolverlas à su pais tan luego como sepan que se hallan en sus respectivos territorios, ò entregarlas al agente ò encargado del mismo Gobierno que las reclame, dandose aviso oportuno reciprocamente, y abonandose por èl que las reclame los gastos erogados en la conduccion y manutencion de la tal persona ò personas à quienes, entretanto, se dispensará, por las autoridades locales del punto en que se encuentren la mas generosa hospitalidad. Ni será legitimo, por ningun pretexto que los ciudadanos de cualquiera de las partes contratantes compre ò retenga prisioneros cautibos hechos por los Indios que habitan el territorio de la otra.

ARTICULO TRIGESIMO-TERCERO. Tambien se pacta que en caso de que algunos esclavos se huyan de sus señores residentes en los Estados ò territorios de una de las partes contratantes, y pasen à los Estados ò territorios de la otra, puedan el amo ò amos de tales esclavos ò sus agentes legitimos, requerir la ayuda de las autoridades del pais en que se encuentren, para su arresto, detencion y custodia; y para esto, los amos, ò sus agentes se dirigirán al magistrado ù oficial competente mas inmediato. Cuando se haga tal solicitud, será el deber del magistrado ù oficial competente hacer arrestar y detener à dichos esclavos, y si apareciére que los tales esclavos son actualmente una propiedad del reclamente, el magistrado ù oficial competente los entregará à los propietarios ò sus agentes para que vuelvan à llevarlos al pais de que se hugeron, payando los reclamantes los gastos del arresto, detencion, y custodia de los tales esclavos, y ningun otro.

Y estipulan ademas lus partes contratantes que por los requerimentos mutuos que hagan respectivamente ellas, ò sus respectivos ministros ù oficialos autorizados al efecto, entregarán à la justicia à todos las personas que acusadas de asesinato ò falsificacion cometida en la jurisdiccion de cualquiera de ellas, busquen un asilo en cualquier pais de la otra; con tal que esto solo se haga por tal evidencia de criminalidad que, segun las leyes del lugar donde se encuentre el fugitivo, ò la persona asì acusada, pueda justificar su aprension y juicio en caso de que el delito se hubiese cometido allì. El gasto de esta aprension y entrega será de cuenta de los que hagan el reclamo y reciban el fugitivo.

ARTICULO TRIGESIMO-CUARTO. Como naturalmente deben resultar de las relaciones intimas que se establecen entre los territorios y ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de Mexico y los Estados Unidos de America, muchos puntos nuevos é importantes que ecsijen un convenio especial, queda acordado que estos puntos se tomarán en consideracion à los seis años contados desde el dia en que se cambien las ratificaciones de este tratado, y que los articulos que puedan entoncès concluirse, previa la sancion constitucional de ambos Gobiernos, se considerarán como parte de este tratado, y tendrán la misma fuerza que los que en este se contienen.

ARTICULO TRIGESIMO-QUINTO. Los Estados Unidos Mexicanos y los Estados Unidos de America, deseosos de hacer tan permanentes como lo permitan circunstancias, las relaciones que van à establecerse entre las dos partes en virtad de este tratado ò convenio general de amistad, comerciò y navegacion, han declarado solemnemente, y convienen en los punto siguientes.

Primero: El presente tratado subsistirá en toda su fuerza y vigor por el termino de doce años que deberán contarse desde el dia del cange de sa ratificacion por lo que respecta à navegacion y comercio; y en todo lo demas que contiene, relativo à paz y amistad, será obligatorio perpetua y permanentemente à ambas potencias.

Segunda: Si uno, ò mas ciudadanos de alguna de las partes infringiere algun articulo de este tratado, será personalmente responsable de ello; pero no por esto se interrumpirá la armonia y buena correspondencia entre las dos naciones, à cuyo fin ambas partes respectivamente se comprometen à no protejer al agresor, ni menos sancionar semejante infraccion.

Tercero: Si (lo que no es de esperar) alguno de los articulos del presente tratado desgraciadamente fuese violado ò infrigido de cualquiero otro modo, se estipula que ninguna de las partes contratantes dispondrá, ò autorizará ninguna clase de represalia, ni declarará guerra à la otra, por queja de injuria ò daño, hasta que la misma parte que se considere agraviada no haya presentado á la otra, una relacion de las injurias y daños competentemente comprobada, y sobre ello hubiese perdido justiciá y satisfaccion, y esta hubiese sido negada ò sin razon demorada.

Cuarto: Nada de lo contenido en este tratado podrá, de manera alguna interpretarse, ni obrará en contra de los tratados publicos verificados anteriormente, y existentes con otros soberanos y Estados.

El presente tratado de amistad, comercio y navegacion será aprobado y ratificado por el Presidente de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, previo el consentimiento y aprobacion de su Congreso; y por el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de America con la anuencia y consentimiento de su Senado; y las ratificaciones serán cangeadas, en la ciudad de Washington, en el termino de seis meses, contados desde la fecha en que fueren firmados ò antès, si fuere posible.

En fé de lo cual, los plenipotenciarios respectivos lo hemos firmado y sellado con nuestros sellos.

Fecho en la capital de Mexico, à catorce dias Febrero, del año del Señor de mil ochocientos veinte y ocho, octavo de la independencia de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, y quincuagesimo segundo de la de los Estados Unidos de America.

ARTICULOS ADICIONALES.

PRIMERO. Por cuanto en el presente estado de la marina Mexicano, no serio posible que Mexico gozase las ventajas que deberia producir la reciprocidad establecida por los articulos 5° y 6° del tratado firmado en este dia, se estipula que durante el espacio de diez años se suspendrá lo convenido en dichos articulos; y, en su lugar, se estipula que hasta la conclusion del termino mencionado de diez años, los buques Americanos que entren en los puertos de Mexico, y todos los articulos de producto, fruto, ò manufactura de los Estados Unidos de America, importados en tates buques, no pagarán otros ni mayores derechos que los que se paguen, ò, en adelante, se pagaren en los referidos puertos, por los buques, é iguales articulos de fruto, producto, ò manufactura de la nacion mas favorecida; y reciprocamente, se estipula que los buques Mexicanos que entren en los puertos de los Estados Unidos de America, y todos los articulos de fruto, producto, ò manufactura de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, importados en tates buques, no pagaran otros ni mayores derechos, que los que se pagan, ò en adelante se pagaren, en los mencionados puertos, por los buques y semejantes articulos de producto, fruto ò manufactura de la nacion mas favorecida; y que no se pagarán mayores derechos, ni se concederán otras franquicias y des cuentos à la esportacion de cualquiera articulo de producto, fruto, ò manufactura de cada uno de los paises, en los buques del otro, mas que à la esportacion de dichos articulos en buques de cualquiera otro pais estrangero.

ARTICULO SEGUNDO. Aunque por el articulo 35° del tratado firmado en este dia, se declara que todo lo relativo à navegacion y comercio subsistirá en todo su fuerza y vigor por el termino de doce años contados desde el dia del cange de los ratificaciones, se estipula que estos puntos estarán en fuerza, aun despuès de haber espirado este termino, hasta que uno de las partes haya declarado su intencion de renunciarlos; cuya declaracion se hará con la anticipacion de seis meses (a) lo menos.

Los presentes articulos adicionales tendrán la misma fuerzo y valor que si se hubieran insertodo palabra por palabra en el tratado de este dia. Serán ratificados, y las ratificaciones serán cambiadas al mismo tiempo.

En fé de lo cual los respectivos plenipotenciarios lo hemos firmado y sellado con nuestros sellos respectivos.

DURATION OF THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS UNDER THE TREATY OF GHENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 25, 1828.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS UNDER THE TREATY OF GHENT, April 25, 1828.

SIR: The board having understood that many of the members of the House of Representatives desire a more explicit expression of the opinions of the board as to the proposed extension of its duration, have thought it may be proper to give that expression of their opinions through you, if it shall be thought respectful to the House; a question which they submit to your good judgment, and according to which you will be pleased to submit this letter to the House or suppress it at your pleasure.

Two members of the board (Messrs. Pleasants and Seawell) are of opinion that no extension of time for the purpose of obtaining testimony by those whose claims have been allowed should be granted.

The other member of the board (Mr. Cheves) is of a contrary opinion, but they are unanimously of the opinion that (partly from the suspension of the business of the board while the bill from the Senate has been under consideration) some extension of the duration of the board beyond the probable sitting of Congress will be necessary to enable it to close in a correct and deliberate manner the business of the commission, and they are of opinion that a period earlier than the middle of August will not enable them to do this.

We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

LANGDON CHEVES.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Gallatin.

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 13, 1826.

The undersigned, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, would willingly have abstained from offering any observations on the note addressed to him by Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, on the 22d of September, in reply to the answer which had been returned by the undersigned to Mr. Gallatin's note of the 26th of August; the facts of the question agitated between Mr. Gallatin and the undersigned admitting of no dispute, and their previous correspondence having exhausted all the arguments, on each side, of which the matter in discussion is susceptible.

But upon the reperusal of Mr. Gallatin's note, after an interval of a few weeks, there appear to the undersigned to be two or three points, much relied on by Mr. Gallatin, which it would be improper to leave unnoticed.

The first of these points, and that which affects more or less the whole of Mr. Gallatin's reasoning, is the question of right—the right of a mother country to monopolize the trade of its colonies.

Mr. Gallatin discusses this question much at length, and attaches himself, in that discussion, rather perhaps to the terms than to the substance of the proposition intended to be put forward by the undersigned.

The proposition of the undersigned is, simply, that there is a right in a mother country, universally admitted among nations, to interdict to foreign nations a trade with her colonies.

It may be true (as stated by Mr. Gallatin) that every country has the same "right" to interdict to foreign nations a trade with itself. But be the abstract "right" what it may, this, at least, cannot be denied, that the exercise of that "right" has been so usual in one case, and so unusual in the other, that the difference of usage (if it be no more) amounts almost to a difference of principle.

Foreign nations might justly complain of the one interdiction—that of trade with the mother country—as an innovation; but they have no just ground of complaint (and no other nation than the United States has ever complained) of the interdiction of trade to the colonies; because, in all ages, all nations having colonies have maintained such an interdiction.

Mr. Gallatin, after having objected, in the beginning of his note, to the use of the word "right," as applied by the undersigned to the colonial trade of Great Britain, applies the same word himself, (inadvertently perhaps,) in a subsequent part of his note, to the interdiction by the United States of a trade in British ships between the United States and the British West India colonies.

That trade Mr. Gallatin describes as a trade which had been carried on merely by "permission;" "a permission which (says Mr. Gallatin) the United States had a right to grant, or to withhold."

Now, as, according to Mr. Gallatin's doctrine, the United States have, in strictness, a right to exclude British trade altogether from their ports, the undersigned cannot presume to contend that they have not the same "right" to prohibit a trade between those ports and the British colonies. But the undersigned ventures to affirm that the right which they have exercised in the latter prohibition has no peculiar and separate character, growing out of long and general usage, to distinguish it in principle from a prohibition of all trade whatever with the United States.

Up to the year 1818, Mr. Gallatin admits that the trade since prohibited by the United States was enjoyed by British vessels in common with those of all other countries. The interdiction, therefore, is not of ancient usage; and so far is it from being generally applied by the United States to foreign vessels that it operates against Great Britain alone.

Is it not at least singular that Mr. Gallatin should reserve for a practice thus novel and thus partial the character of "right," which he denies to a usage as old as the establishment of colonies, and universal among all nations to which colonies have belonged? Is it not singular, also, that, while Mr. Gallatin denies any claim on the part of Great Britain to the continued enjoyment of a trade in the United States, which she is admitted by Mr. Gallatin to have enjoyed uninterruptedly up to the year 1818, Mr. Gallatin puts forward a claim, on the part of the United States, to trade with the West India colonies of Great Britain on the ground of usage and practice?

The United States, says Mr. Gallatin, found their "reclamation to participate in that commerce" (the trade with the British West India colonies) on this ground: "That trade has been allowed by Great Britain, it may be said, from the beginning and at all times; and has become thereby so far assimilated to that with the European dominions of Great Britain that the United States did think that they had the same claim to a participation in both." "As early as the year 1783, the Government of Great Britain, deviating from that principle of the colonial system according to which the colonies were prohibited from trading directly with any other country, allowed her West India colonies to trade directly with the United States of America in British vessels."

It may be observed, as to these facts, as stated by Mr. Gallatin himself, that no two things can be much more different than a permission (on the one hand) given by Great Britain to British vessels, to trade directly between a British colony and another country, (the vessels of that other country remaining by law, and in fact, excluded from the ports of the colony,) and that "participation" (on the other hand) which implies a trade between the United States and the West India colonies in vessels of the United States.

The relaxation to which Mr. Gallatin refers in fact did nothing more than permit British vessels to bring certain articles into colonial ports directly from the place of their production, instead of bringing the like articles circuitously through the United Kingdom. The question whether these articles should be imported circuitously through the United Kingdom, or directly from the place of their growth, was a mere municipal concern, which did not vary the exclusive character of the colonial system, so long as that importation was confined to British ships.

Undoubtedly the United States might then, if they thought proper, have interdicted the trade to British vessels between their ports and the British West India colonies, unless American vessels were allowed to participate in it. But they did not.

The history of the usage, therefore, is, that up to a certain period a trade between the ports of the United States and the British West India colonies, in British ships, went on unquestioned; while, as Mr. Gallatin is aware, no American vessel could enter the ports of the British West India colonies, except under occasional and temporary suspensions of the colonial law. And yet it is upon this usage that Mr. Gallatin founds—

1. A right in the United States to prohibit British vessels from clearing out from the ports of the United States to the British West India colonies.

2. A claim on the part of the United States to participate in the colonial trade of Great Britain.

The things may be right or wrong in themselves, but usage surely points exactly the contrary way to that in which Mr. Gallatin applies it.

Mr. Gallatin has yet another ground on which to rest this claim of the United States to a participation in the colonial trade of Great Britain.

"During the European war Great Britain found it convenient occasionally, but repeatedly, to open her West India ports to American vessels, at the same time that she was asserting the principle uniformly denied by the United States, that a neutral was not authorized by the law of nations to carry on, in time of war, a trade with a colony in which she was not permitted to participate in time of peace."

First. If the ports were occasionally opened, the very terms of the proposition show that they were generally shut. It would be difficult to imagine either a more complete proof of the acknowledged right to admit or exclude foreign trade from the colonies, as the governing authority might think fit, or a more perfect refutation of the plea of usage in favor of a permanently open trade.

Secondly. The rule of 1756 appears to have had little application to the point in dispute. It might, to be sure, be in all cases a question with the neutral whether he would be tempted by the open ports of one belligerent to run the risk of capture by the other. But the point in dispute is, whether, by occasionally opening her colonial ports, Great Britain virtually abandoned the right of closing them again when she thought proper; and on this point the merits of the rule of 1756 have not, so far as the undersigned can make out, the most distant bearing.

Thirdly. As it is intended to prove that the United States have a claim to participate in the colonial trade forever, because the ports of the colonies were occasionally opened during the war, Mr. Gallatin describes the ports as having been opened to American vessels: true, but not to American vessels only, or specifically. The ports were opened to the vessels of all friendly Powers. The argument, therefore, as to the special claim of the United States falls to the ground.

The truth, however, is, that under the words "right" and "claim," so frequently recurring in this discussion, lies the real and fundamental difference of opinion between Great Britain and the United States, which has frustrated all attempts to settle the disputed question of colonial intercourse upon common principles by conventional arrangement. When it is contended that the "right" by which Great Britain prohibits foreign nations from trading with her colonies is the same "right" with that by which she might (if she thought fit) prohibit them from trading with herself, this argument (which is employed by the United States alone) implies that the special prohibition is a grievance to the United States, if not of the same amount, of the same kind as the general prohibition would be.

This is a doctrine which Great Britain explicitly denies.

It seems to be admitted, indeed, that there was a time when the distinction between colonial trade and the trade of the mother country was tenable. But it has been assumed, in no obscure terms, on the part of the United States, that the colonial system is now virtually at an end.

Great Britain denies this assumption. Whatever relaxation Great Britain may think fit to introduce for her own sake, and for that of her colonies themselves, into her colonial system, she holds her "right" to maintain that system, as with respect to foreign nations, to be unaltered and entire.

Great Britain, therefore, cannot consent to any diplomatic arrangement by which such "right" may appear to be relinquished, or by which the assertion of it can be understood to be, in any degree, qualified or controlled.

Hence the impracticability (already so repeatedly proved) of any treaty upon this subject between Great Britain and the United States.

Hence the necessity for Great Britain of doing whatever she means to do, in the way of relaxation of her colonial monopoly, by acts of her own Legislature.

This deduction brings the undersigned to the last point in Mr. Gallatin's note, and that on which he is most anxious that there should be no misconception between them.

Mr. Gallatin speaks of a "permanent exclusion of the United States by Great Britain from a trade open to the rest of the world" as a measure different in character from a general exclusion of all foreign nations.

But is this a just description of the effect of the act of 1825?

Considerations (of which Great Britain alone is the judge) have induced her to open her colonial trade to other nations. She opened it to them, not as matter of special favor, or of special "claim," to every one, but on specified conditions, common to all nations who might think fit to subscribe to them, and to the United States among the rest.

If some of the nations of the world have taken advantage of the opening thus offered to them by accepting the conditions annexed to it, and others have omitted to do so, and if the United States are (by their own choice) in the latter class, surely it is not a correct description of the consequence of this, their own voluntary omission, to say that the United States are "excluded" by Great Britain from a trade which, on the contrary, Great Britain invited them to share.

Exclusion of foreigners from the colonial trade is the principle of colonial policy; admission to that trade is the exception—an exception which, in this instance, Great Britain was willing to grant to all those who were ready to purchase it, on terms tendered equally to all.

The United States cannot mean to put forward the pretension that what is granted to others on terms should be granted to them unconditionally.

If not, it seems difficult to imagine how they can feel it to be unjust or unkind (it certainly is not so felt, or intended, on the part of this country,) that the United States, having, upon a free and (as is known from the public proceedings of their Legislature) deliberate consideration, declined to subscribe to the terms on which exception from colonial prohibition was tendered impartially to all nations, should find themselves, in common with such of those nations as have decided like themselves, liable to that exclusion which is and always has been the general principle of colonial trade.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Gallatin the assurance of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Esq., &c., &c.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Canning.

UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, December 28, 1826.

The undersigned, minister of the United States, did not fail to transmit to his Government the note which Mr. Canning, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, did him the honor to address to him on the 13th of November, in reply to the answer which had been returned by the undersigned to Mr. Canning's note of the 11th of September. But unwilling to continue a discussion which did not seem likely to lead to any practical result, he abstained from making any further observations on the subject until he should have received special instructions from his Government in reference to a state of things which was altogether unexpected at Washington at the time of his departure.

Having now received a despatch from the Secretary of State of the United States, the substance of which he is instructed to communicate to Mr. Canning, the undersigned, in performing that duty, will, on those points to which he had already alluded in his former note, have but some explanatory remarks to add.

The right of Great Britain, which is that of every nation, to prohibit or allow foreign commerce with any part of her dominions, is unquestionable. That right, in reference to her colonies, has never been denied by the United States any more than with respect to any other part of her possessions. And it is also admitted that she may, within her own jurisdiction, prescribe the conditions on which such commerce shall be tolerated, and, at her will, again interdict altogether the intercourse thus permitted.

On the other hand, the United States, unless restricted by treaty, which in this case they are not, have precisely the same right to prohibit, to allow, and, within their own jurisdiction, to regulate foreign commerce with their own dominions, whether the commerce be with the foreign country itself or with its colonies or possessions abroad. It was not inadvertently that the undersigned used the word "right," as applied to the United States; he did not object to the use of the word as applied to Great Britain. What he attempted to show was, that this right, which was admitted, and although it might at any time be exercised, had no bearing on the questions which had been the subject of discussion between the two countries.

What has been contended for is, that, since to any commerce there must always be two parties, the mutual consent of both is always necessary in order that such commerce may at all exist; that whatever its nature may be, whether of ancient or modern date, whether with colonies or with possessions of a different description, from the moment it does exist, it becomes a fit subject for negotiation; and that there is no reason why an agreement should not on that as on any other species of trade, be founded on terms of just reciprocity, though relating to colonies, from an intercourse with which foreigners had formerly been and might again be excluded.

The various relaxations of the colonial system of Great Britain, as they never were or could have been intended for the benefit of the United States, and as they were always accompanied with restrictions exclusively favorable to her, could not be viewed as a boon to them, and never were accepted as such. The extent to which the commerce, when not laid under too severe restrictions, was carried on between the United States and the British colonies, is an irrefragible proof that it was equally advantageous to both parties. If equally advantageous, there had been no favor conferred on either side; there was no ground for a pretension by either party that the intercourse should be regulated by unequal conditions.

No such pretension had in fact been advanced. The proposals made by both parties during the negotiations of the year 1824 were avowedly founded in a fair reciprocity, and brought the parties very near together. Unable still to agree on some points, it was concluded to suspend the negotiation, with a distinct understanding that it should be again renewed at some convenient day.

Mr. King was, in 1825, empowered to treat on all the subjects of the previous negotiation. He was instructed, in the first instance, as being a subject of more pressing urgency, to call on the British Government to remove the impediments which prevented the execution of the St. Petersburg convention. If his instructions on other subjects were not forwarded to him, it was because he was engaged in discussions respecting that convention; and it was believed that the state of his health did not admit of his entering, at that time, upon the more arduous duty of resuming the suspended negotiation. Of this his Majesty's Government appears to have been fully aware. On the 22d of March, 1826, Mr. Vaughan addressed an official note to the Secretary of State of the United States, in which he says: "I have received instructions from his Majesty's Government to acquaint you that it is preparing to proceed in the important negotiations between that country and the United States, now placed in the hands of the American minister in London. Mr. Huskisson has been already introduced to Mr. R. King as his Majesty's plenipotentiary, and the Minister of State having the Department of Foreign Affairs has received his Majesty's commands to associate Mr. Addington, late his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in America, with Mr. Huskisson as joint plenipotentiary on the part of Great Britain. The negotiations will therefore be forthwith resumed; and it will be for the Government of the United States to judge whether, considering the state of health of Mr. Rufus King, which, Mr. Canning laments to say, has been, since his arrival in England, far from satisfactory, will join any other negotiator in the commission with him."

The President did deliberate on that friendly suggestion; and the nomination of a person to be associated with Mr. King was contemplated, when a letter from him, dated the 21st of March, desiring permission to return, was received; upon which the duty of renewing those important negotiations devolved, to his great regret, on the undersigned alone.

His instructions were of a character authorizing the hope that their result would be satisfactory; his departure was hastened. On his arrival in England, the order in Council of July last had already been enacted. Indeed, it appears that the determination not to renew the negotiations on the colonial intercourse, and to regulate it exclusively by acts of Parliament, had been taken before July, 1825, when the acts to that effect were passed. Had Mr. King been provided with the same instructions which the undersigned received, they would have been equally unavailing. Of that determination the Government of the United States had not the least notice. On the contrary, although Mr. Vaughan's communication offered the opportunity of making known the intentions of his Majesty's Government, positive assurance was given of its being prepared to proceed in the important negotiations, and that the negotiations would be forthwith resumed, without any suggestion that the colonial intercourse would form an exception. The acts of Parliament of the year 1825, in which that intention was to be discovered, never were officially communicated. That of the 27th of June passed only a few days before that of 5th July, and not specially repealed by it, was not calculated to elucidate the object in view; and several causes concurred to induce a belief that this last act was not intended to affect the trade between the British colonies and the United States, as carried on under the act of June, 1822. This belief, and the reasons for it, were distinctly expressed in a letter from the Department of State to a member of Congress of the 25th of December, 1825, copy of which is enclosed. That letter was published in the American newspapers; a copy was furnished to Mr. Vaughan, and he is understood to have transmitted it to his Government.

That opinion was corroborated by the construction ultimately put on the act by the British authorities. It was thereby provided that certain privileges granted to foreign ships should be limited to the ships of those countries which should comply with the conditions therein stated, unless his Majesty, by his order in Council, should in any case grant such privileges, although the conditions had not been performed; and the act was declared to come in full force and operation from the 5th of January, 1826.

It had, at first, been determined at Halifax that the port should accordingly be shut against American vessels after that day. This decision was afterwards revoked, although the condition had not been performed, and although no order in council had granted the privileges in question.

It now appears that the act of July 5, 1825, (6 Geo. IV, ch. 114,) which contains no repealing clause of former acts, refers, under the name of "The law of navigation," to another act of the same date, (6 Geo. IV, ch. 109;) that this, although it contains also no repealing clause, is understood and construed as having superseded all former acts on the same subject; and that the actual repeal of the act of 1822 is to be found in another act, also of the 5th July, 1825, (6 Geo. IV, ch. 105,) entitled "An act to repeal the several laws relating to the customs."

The intricacy of those several acts, and the difficulty of understanding their precise meaning, of ascertaining what parts of former acts were actually repealed, and what still in force—a difficulty which, in the case of the "Jubilee," seems to have led into error even one of the highest tribunals of Great Britain—may well account for the construction put upon those acts in the United States; affording, at the same time, a sufficient reason for having preferred a renewal of the negotiations to a pure acceptance of the conditions contemplated by the act of July 5, 1825, (6 Geo. IV, ch. 114,) had it been only for the purpose of ascertaining the true intent and meaning of the act.

Even so late as October last Mr. Vaughan, as appears by his correspondence with Mr. Clay, was not provided with instructions that enabled him to give a satisfactory answer to the inquiries, whether, according to the British interpretation, American vessels might trade between the British colonies and foreign countries, and whether discriminating duties of every species had been abolished.

The proposition made during the last session of Congress, and to which Mr. Canning has alluded, affords an additional proof of the imperfect understanding, owing to the complexness of the several acts of Parliament which at that time prevailed, respecting their true object and intention. That proposition was only for a repeal of the discriminating duties, and, if adopted, would have been unavailing, since, not embracing a repeal of the restrictions of the circuitous intercourse, it is now understood that it would not have been accepted by the British Government as a compliance with the condition required by the act of July 5, 1825.

It is not intended by these facts and observations to convey any reproaches against his Majesty's Government on account of the unexpected resolution which it has taken. But they satisfactorily show that the United States could have entertained no doubt of the continued disposition of Great Britain to settle the colonial intercourse by an amicable arrangement, and that there were peremptory reasons for preferring that mode rather than to legislate on the subject.

Supposing, even, that the determination of the British Government not to renew the negotiation on that point had been communicated or known, the specific condition on which American vessels might be allowed to participate in the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies was so expressed in the act of Parliament as to have required explanations before it could be complied with.

The condition required from countries having colonies was both distinct and reciprocal. Nothing more was asked than that they should grant to British ships the like privileges of trading with their colonial possessions which were granted to their ships of trading with the British possessions abroad. No regard was paid to the importance of such colonial possessions. Sweden, by permitting British vessels to trade with the island of St. Bartholomew, was allowed privileges which were offered to the United States on very different terms; and, with the exception of some of the German States, those terms applied to no other maritime Power than the United States. All this Great Britain had a right to do; no complaint is preferred on that account; it was the condition required from them which they had to consider.

That condition was, that the United States should place the commerce and navigation of this country, (Great Britain,) and of its possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation.

Had the condition been limited to the commerce and navigation of the British colonies; had it been so intended and expressed as that the United States might have satisfied it by placing the intercourse between their dominions and the British colonies on the same footing, in every respect, as the intercourse between the United States and the colonies of the most favored nation, the condition, though not altogether free of objection, would at least have been apparently reciprocal. To require, besides, that it should be extended to the commerce and navigation of Great Britain generally; that it should embrace that intercourse between her and the United States, which is regulated by a special convention; that they should grant any privilege in that intercourse to British vessels, not stipulated by that convention, as the price for the permission of trading with the British colonies, was a total departure from the principles of a just reciprocity.

But it appeared also extremely difficult, if at all possible, to understand what was meant by placing that commerce and navigation on the footing of the most favored nation.

If Great Britain only asked to be placed on that footing, on giving the same equivalent which any other foreign nation may have given to the United States, in order to have privileges which she does not enjoy, the navigation law of the United States has already made provision in that respect. There is no privilege enjoyed in the United States by the commerce and navigation of any foreign nation which Great Britain may not obtain, by allowing to them the same reciprocal advantages which they enjoy in the ports of such foreign nation, and on which such privilege depends. To comply with the condition thus understood, the United States would have had no new act to perform. This could hardly be presumed to have been the intention of the act of Parliament.

But if, by that act, it was intended to require, as the condition for allowing to American vessels the privilege of trading with the British colonies, that the commerce and navigation of Great Britain and of her possessions abroad should, without any other equivalent, be generally placed on the same footing with the commerce and navigation of any other foreign nation, which, by reason of reciprocal advantages allowed to American vessels, may now or hereafter be entitled to greater privileges than Great Britain now enjoys, the condition was inadmissible.

British vessels and those of several other nations may now by virtue of treaty stipulations, or of other reciprocal regulations, import into the United States articles of the produce or manufacture of the countries to which such vessels respectively belong, on the same terms, and on the payment of the same duties of tonnage and on the cargo, as if imported in American vessels. In every instance the privilege is reciprocal, and will cease with respect to any of those countries whenever vessels of the United States, laden with produce of the United States, may cease to be admitted into the ports of such country on the same terms as its own vessels.

In conformity with the navigation law of the United States, the prohibition to import in foreign vessels merchandise not the produce of the country to which such vessels respectively belong, extends only to the vessels of such nations as have adopted a similar regulation. Great Britain is, accordingly, one of the few nations to which the prohibition applies.

In pursuance of the treaty concluded in December, 1825, between the United States and Central America, whatever may be imported into or exported from either country in its own vessels, to or from any foreign place whatever, may in like manner, and on payment of the same duties, be imported or exported in the vessels of the other country.

If, therefore, it was meant by the condition required that the commerce and navigation of Great Britain and of her possessions abroad should be gratuitously and generally placed on the same footing with those of the most favored nation, the United States, in order to comply with it, and as the price for the permission to trade with the British colonies, would have been obliged—1st, to admit the importation of British merchandise in British vessels on the same terms, and on payment of the same duties as if imported in American vessels, although the convention of 1815 should have expired, and the corresponding privilege was no longer allowed to American vessels in British ports; 2d, to admit the importation in British vessels of the produce of every foreign country, although the importation into British ports of the like produce in American vessels should still be prohibited; 3d, if the condition was intended to apply to privileges granted subsequent to the date of the act of Parliament, to admit the importation of such foreign produce in British vessels, even without being charged with any discriminating duties, and generally to allow to British vessels without reciprocity all the reciprocal advantages to which the vessels of Central America are entitled.

If this was not the intention of the act of Parliament; if the words "commerce and navigation of this country" were meant only to include the circuitous intercourse, the expressions used to convey that meaning must be admitted to have been much too general. This last interpretation has been suggested only by the observations that have occurred in the course of Mr. Canning's correspondence with the undersigned If such or any other admissible construction was intended, the most obvious way of preventing both an erroneous interpretation of the condition, and any unfounded expectations in reference to a renewal of the negotiations, would have been an official communication of the act of Parliament, accompanied with a full and free explanation of the condition required, and of the intentions of his Majesty's Government on the whole subject.

The Government of the United States is animated by the most sincere desire to maintain with that of Great Britain, not merely the forms of courtesy and amity, but to cultivate a cordial and lasting friendship; to settle every controverted question between them upon principles of justice and reciprocity; and, by an enlarged liberality in their mutual intercourse, to advance the real prosperity of both.

Entertaining this desire, it has learnt with regret the resolution of his Majesty's Government to close the door against those friendly explanations, and that free and mutual exposition of the wishes and views of the parties, so essential between two nations whose interests and happiness are so interwoven as those of Great Britain and the United States, and which can be but partially and imperfectly interchanged, if mutual legislation is substituted to negotiation and to the ordinary mode of treating.

As the only alternative which this course has left, it was the President's intention to lay the whole correspondence which has passed between the two Governments on that subject, including the instructions given to the several American ministers near his Britannic Majesty, before Congress at their present session. It will remain with that body to decide whether the colonial intercourse shall be altogether closed, whether that portion of it left open by the order in Council shall continue so, or on what conditions, compatible with the interests of the United States, that trade may be placed.

The undersigned has been further instructed to give at the same time to his Majesty's Government the assurance that, notwithstanding its late decision, that of the United States will be ready, at Washington or London, to treat of the colonial intercourse whenever it may be the desire or inclination of Great Britain to negotiate on that subject.

The undersigned requests Mr. Canning to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Gallatin.

FOREIGN OFFICE, January 27, 1827.

The undersigned, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the note addressed to him on the 28th ultimo by Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States; in replying to which the undersigned will, as far as possible, conform to the example of Mr. Gallatin, in putting aside those points of the question in agitation between them which have been already exhausted in argument, and the further discussion of which would not tend to any practical advantage.

The parts of Mr. Gallatin's last note which appear to the undersigned to require any observation relate to matters rather of fact than of reasoning.

Mr. Gallatin complains that the act of Parliament of 1825 was not officially communicated to the United States.

It is perfectly true that it was not; nor has it been the habit of the two Governments to communicate reciprocally to each other acts of their respective Legislatures.

The act of Congress of 1823, an act the provisions of which especially affected Great Britain, was not officially communicated either to the King's minister at Washington, or to his Majesty's Government, by the American minister resident at this Court. So far from any such communication being made, or any voluntary explanation of the bearing of that act being offered, it was not till after repeated and pressing inquiries that his Majesty's minister at Washington succeeded in obtaining from the American Secretary of State the true construction of the most important clause of that act—the clause in which the United States claimed that their trade to the British West India colonies should be put on the same footing with the trade to the same colonies from "elsewhere"—and learnt, to his great astonishment, that under that word "elsewhere" was intended to be signified not only the other dependencies of Great Britain, but "the mother country itself."

The undersigned at the same time begs that it may not be supposed that the British Government withheld from the Government of the United States communication of the act of Parliament of 1825 from any notion of retaliation for the omission of the Government of the United States to communicate to that of his Majesty the act of Congress of 1823.

He refers to that instance of omission on the part of the American Government only in proof—

First. That the ordinary and natural course between States is not to make diplomatic communications of the acts of their respective Legislatures; and, secondly, that no inference could be drawn from such an omission on the one side any more than on the other, of (what the undersigned disclaims for his Government) an intentional want of courtesy or respect.

But the act of 1825 did not relate specially to the United States. It held out to all nations of the world certain benefits, (or what were believed by the British Government to be so,) on certain conditions.

If a communication of the act had been made to one nation, it must have been made alike to all. Such communication would have been liable to different misinterpretations. Some Governments might have considered it as a solicitation to which they were bound, in courtesy, to give some answer, explaining their reasons for declining (if they did decline) to avail themselves of the provisions of the act. Others might, perhaps, have taken umbrage at it as an authoritative pretension to impose the legislation of this country upon other nations.

The simplest course was to allow the provisions of the act to find their way to general knowledge through the usual channels of commercial information. The undersigned has no reason to apprehend that this course has proved less effectual on the present than on former occasions.

The conditions of the act of 1825 have been accepted and carried into effect by some Governments. That of the United States has not thought it expedient to take advantage of them. But the undersigned cannot but be still of opinion that the resolution proposed in the House of Representatives at Washington, at the beginning of the last session of Congress, for the express purpose of urging the Executive Government of the United States to come into the terms of the act of 1825; the debates which took place upon that proposition; and the final rejection of it by a majority of only two votes, show that it was not for want of a sufficient understanding of the intent of the act of Parliament that the conditions of it were not accepted by the United States.

To one piece of evidence, which proves the perfect understanding in America, not only of the purport and provisions of the act of Parliament of 1825, but of the conditions which it would be requisite for the American Legislature to perform in order to entitle the United States to the benefit of that act, the undersigned might have scrupled to refer (as not being of the nature of a diplomatic document) if Mr. Gallatin had not encouraged him to bring forward any document tending to throw light on the matter in dispute by citing, in support of his own view of that matter, a private letter from Mr. Clay to a member of Congress.

Early in the session of Congress of 1825–'26 a petition from Baltimore was presented to both Houses of the American Legislature, in which petition it was distinctly pointed out that the British act of Parliament of July, 1825, had not only manifested the readiness of this country to remove all discriminating duties, but also to permit American ships to clear out from British colonies, not, as heretofore, to the ports of the United States only, but to all parts of the world—the United Kingdom and its dependencies alone excepted.

The petition, with equal distinctness, invited the attention of the American Legislature to the conditions on which these advantages might be secured to the United States, and prayed for the removal of the several restrictions imposed by the American act of 1823, not of the "discriminating duties only," but of the prohibition of what is called by Mr. Gallatin "the circuitous intercourse in British ships," the petitioners expressly submitting to Congress the "propriety of admitting British vessels, from whatever ports, on the same terms as vessels of the most favored nations."

It appears from the reports of the proceedings of Congress that it was against the prayer of this petition (but without impeachment of any of its allegations) that the decision of the American Legislature, at the close of the session, was taken. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that the American Legislature had the whole purport and bearing of the act of 1825 full before their eyes.

The fact that some of the British authorities abroad took upon themselves to suspend the execution of the act of 1825 towards the United States is undenied.

But the only effect of this suspension was the continuance of the benefits of the then existing state of things to the United States for nearly a twelve month longer than they would otherwise have enjoyed it.

That continuance was permitted by the British Government mainly in consideration of the then pendency in the Legislature of the United States of the resolution, hereinbefore mentioned, for conforming to the conditions of the act of 1825.

Immediately upon the receipt of authentic intelligence of these proceedings at Washington, an instruction was sent out to Mr. Vaughan, grounded on the belief of the British Government that Congress would not separate without adopting the resolution then under their consideration. In that case, and upon receiving an assurance from the American Government that the restrictions and charges on British shipping and British colonial produce would be withdrawn by the United States, Mr. Vaughan was authorized to deliver a note to the American Secretary of State declaring that the discriminating duties imposed upon American ships and their cargoes in the West Indies should immediately cease. Mr. Vaughan was actually in possession of this instruction when the resolution, on the assumed adoption of which the instruction to Mr. Vaughan had been founded, was rejected. It was no part of Mr. Vaughan's duty to make any communication upon the subject to the American Government before the result of the discussion was ascertained. After that result (wholly unexpected in this country) any such communication would have been not only useless, but might, perhaps, have been considered as an improper appeal against the formal decision of the American Legislature.

That Mr. Vaughan should not afterwards have been authorized to enter into any discussion of the provisions of the act of 1825 "so late as October last," is not surprising when it is considered that Mr. Vaughan, immediately upon the close of the session of Congress, was instructed to announce the intention of his Majesty's Government to pass the order in Council of July, consequent upon the decision of the American Legislature, by which the terms of the act of 1825 were virtually declined.

Mr. Gallatin accounts for the loss of the resolution proposed to the American Legislature by the persuasion which, he says, the Government of the United States entertained that the negotiation on the subject of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British West India colonies would be renewed.

The undersigned is at a loss to understand on what ground it was assumed at Washington that there would be, at all times, an unabated disposition on the part of the British Government to make the trade of its West India colonies the subject of diplomatic arrangement.

The circumstances of the case were entirely changed.

Repeated negotiation had failed to produce any material approximation of opinions upon that subject.

The last attempt at an adjustment had been made with an evident conviction on both sides that there existed between them an unconquerable difference of principle, and that it was by that difference, rather than by any decided irreconcileableness of interests, that a satisfactory arrangement was rendered hopeless.

The nature of that difference has been sufficiently discussed. It lies in the determination of the United States to dispute, and in that of Great Britain to maintain, the established distinction between general and colonial trade.

Great Britain had, therefore, an obvious motive for doing, thenceforward, whatever she might think it right to do in relaxation of her colonial system, rather by the instrumentality of her own Legislature than by compact with a State with which she disagreed in opinion as to the principles of colonial trade so widely that it would have been impossible to construct a preamble to a treaty on that subject, in the enunciations of which the two contracting parties should have concurred.

But there was yet another reason for avoiding further negotiation upon the subject.

Hitherto, when the trade with the British West India colonies had been opened at all, it had been opened chiefly, though not exclusively, to the United States.

To no other country had it been opened by specific and positive convention.

But a time had now arrived when, from motives of general policy, Great Britain thought it advisable to allow access to her colonies to all foreign Powers, without exception, on conditions tendered alike to all.

Such indiscriminate opening could only be effected by some process common to all those who were permitted or invited to take advantage of it. Impartiality was thus maintained towards all parties, and the power of control over her own colonies was, at the same time, retained in the hands of the mother country.

The undersigned believes that he has now touched on every topic in the last note addressed to him by Mr. Gallatin to which he has not had occasion to advert in former stages of their correspondence.

He will not allow himself to be drawn again into a discussion of topics already more than sufficiently debated.

The undersigned trusts that it is unnecessary for him, in concluding this note, to return to Mr. Gallatin's assurances of the friendly disposition of the United States of America, assurances equally sincere, that there is the most cordial desire on the part of Great Britain to cultivate the friendship of the United States.

The ties of common origin, laws, and language must always form strong bonds of national alliance between them. Their respective interests, well understood, harmonize together as much as their feelings.

But it has never yet been held a duty of international amity (any more than of friendship in private life) to submit to unequal compacts. Nor has it ever been held an offence against such duty that a nation (any more than an individual) should decline to make uncompensated sacrifices.

Between two nations, as between two individuals most friendly to each other, there may sometimes happen unfortunately to exist some known subject of incurable difference of opinion. In any such case it is, perhaps, most advisable to keep that subject as much as possible out of sight, and to take care that it shall not interfere with the tenor of their general intercourse and of their habitual relations.

The refusal to regulate the trade of our colonies by a commercial treaty which the British Government may think (even if erroneously) disadvantageous to its interests cannot give just cause of offence to any Power whatever.

In the present instance, the undersigned is most happy to be able to qualify such refusal with the declaration that it is not, in any degree, dictated by sentiments either unfriendly or disrespectful to the United States, or by any indifference to the amicable settlement of all other questions at present pending between them and Great Britain.

Of these questions, one has been already happily arranged since Mr. Gallatin's arrival in this country.

The undersigned looks forward with confidence, no less than with anxiety, to such an arrangement of the remainder as, effacing all traces of past discussions, and satisfying all fair and reasonable pretensions on both sides, may secure, for a long period of years to come, reciprocal good understanding and good will between two kindred nations.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Gallatin the assurance of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Esq., &c., &c.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Gallatin.

No. 26.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 11, 1827.

SIR: In the letter which I addressed to you on the 20th ultimo I stated that it was my intention, in a few days, to prepare and transmit to you some instructions on the subject of the colonial trade. I shall now execute that intention, but, before I proceed to the specific directions required by the present state of it, some few observations appear to be called for on the two notes of Mr. Canning, under date the 13th November of the last and 27th January of the present year. In submitting these, it is not desired to subdue the repugnance which Mr. Canning expresses against being "drawn into a discussion of topics already more than sufficiently debated." But whilst the diplomatic relations between the two countries remain open and sentiments of amity are professed on both sides, it would seem more consistent with that profession, and more in that spirit of candor as well as courtesy which ought to animate the councils of friendly nations, to be willing both to give and to receive the correction of any misapprehension under which either may be laboring, than to permit such misapprehension to continue, perhaps to the prejudice of both. The United States, at least, whose whole course on this subject has ever been sincere, direct, and open, who have never sought to arrogate to themselves any right or claim to question the power of Great Britain to give the law to her own colonies, nor advanced any other claim on their part than the right to regulate their own commerce with foreign nations on fair and equal terms, owe it to themselves to disavow those peculiar and exorbitant pretensions which are intimated, in no very obscure terms, in the two notes of Mr. Canning, and to deny, in the most explicit manner, the rejection of any friendly overture from Great Britain, founded on equality with regard to this trade, which has ever been distinctly and intelligibly offered to their choice. To impute a contrary course of action to the Government of the United States, and to express, in the same paper, a determination not to be drawn again into the further discussion of these topics, would seem to be closing the door studiously against all explanation, and not to harmonize very happily, either with professions of friendship, or with that natural respect and forbearance which have usually characterized the intercourse of equal nations in modern times. The United States, however, disposed rather to heal than to inflict wounds, and taking more pleasure in removing than in creating causes of dissatisfaction and complaint, are desirous that the Court of Great Britain shall be set right as to certain matters of fact and certain principles of policy maintained on our part, with regard to which that Court is manifestly yet in error, and which seem to have had a material influence on their own decisions. Until those errors shall have been removed by a full and candid explanation we shall not be satisfied that we have done all we ought to do to extirpate this germ of misunderstanding, and to restore those commercial relations between the two countries which we are not less convinced than Mr. Canning that it is equally the interest of both to maintain.

The general proposition laid down by Mr. Canning, that there is a right in a mother country (universally admitted among nations) to interdict to foreign nations a trade with her colonies, never has been controverted by this Government. But that is a very different proposition from the question which has been under discussion between the two Governments; which is, whether, when the parent country, relaxing its colonial monopoly, chooses to open the trade of its colonies to foreign nations, these nations have not a right to examine for themselves the terms on which it is so opened, and to treat of such modifications of them as will secure reciprocity in the mutual intercourse? To contend that the parent country, in the case of such open trade, may exclusively prescribe the conditions on which it shall be carried on with foreign Powers, to which conditions, without regard for their interests, they must submit, would be, in effect, to assume a right of legislation not for the colonies only but for such foreign Powers. It is alleged by Mr. Canning that "no other nation than the United States has ever complained of the interdiction of the trade to the colonies; because, in all ages, all nations having colonies have maintained such an interdiction." If Great Britain had maintained the most rigorous prohibition of all intercourse between her colonies and this country, we should have had no right to complain, and we never should have complained. Our rights begin at that precise point when she chooses to allow a trade between her colonies and the United States. At that moment she departs from the principle of her colonial monopoly. At that moment a new party (the United States) is brought forward, and what before was under the exclusive control of one becomes now a matter of consideration and arrangement between two. It is not at all extraordinary that if, as is alleged by Mr. Canning prior to the passage of the act of Parliament of July, 1825, no other foreign nation than the United States had any trade with the British colonies, there should have been no complaints in regard to the terms of intercourse permitted by the British Government put forward by other foreign nations. Where there is no commerce, in fact, there can be no cause of objection as to the abstract conditions on which it is proposed. Besides, most of the commercial nations of Europe are at the same time colonial Powers; and it may be quite as convenient to them as to Great Britain to assume the right to prescribe exclusively the terms on which the intercourse between their colonies and foreign States shall be allowed. We have seen, too, in the act of 1825, more favorable conditions offered by Great Britain to the colonial Powers than to other nations. It would have been very remarkable if any of those Powers had refused to accept such conditions. But the fact of acceptance implies the right of deliberation and the consequent power of rejection.

So far as Mr. Canning places the right to trade between the United States and the British colonies, in British vessels alone, on the ground of usage, neither the principle nor the fact can be admitted to be with him. As to the first, a nation may find its interest in tolerating, even for a long time, a trade which is prosecuted on unequal or unjust terms. It may not be its policy to foster its navigation. It may find compensation in some branch of its foreign trade with other nations. But from whatever cause it may choose to submit to the injustice, no length of time can so far sanction it as to confer a right on the Power which puts forth unequal regulations to insist upon their uninterrupted continuance; and it indisputably belongs to the party suffering under such injustice to put an end to the unequal state of things whenever he thinks proper. As to the fact of this alleged usage, neither Power can fairly go back to any period beyond the 4th of July, 1776. The usage on which Mr. Canning rests the British monopoly of the colonial trade, as it existed anterior to that epoch, would tend as much to sustain our side of the argument as the British. But as Great Britain then gave law to the thirteen colonies, afterwards forming the United States, as well as to the British West India colonies, no argument can be rightfully drawn from the state of the usage prior to that period. During the war which succeeded all commerce between the United States and the West India colonies was interrupted. Peace was restored on the 30th day of November, 1782. Now, if the usage contended for had existed without disturbance from that day down to 1818, the duration of time would have hardly been sufficient, in the affairs of nations, to create any right by prescription.

But how stands the fact? From the date of the peace up to that of the formation, in 1789, of the present Constitution of the United States, the history of the two countries presents frequent struggles on the subject of this very colonial trade. Several of the States sought, by their own separate legislation, to secure for themselves a participation in it. The powers of the old Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, were incompetent to the adoption and enforcement of a system of regulations for the trade which should countervail those of Great Britain; and this incompetency was one of the most operative inducements which led to the establishment of our present Constitution. From that time down to the close of the European war the trade had been generally open to the navigation of the United States by repeated acts of British authority. Since the establishment of our present Constitution—further, since the peace of 1782, the trade has been open to us a longer period of time than it has been shut; and if the right were to be decided by the mere fact of the greater duration of the usage, one way or other, the right would be with us.

Mr. Canning states that these relaxations did nothing more than permit British vessels to bring certain articles into the colonial ports directly from the place of their production instead of circuitously through the United Kingdom; and that it was a mere municipal concern, which did not vary the exclusive character of the colonial system. But they did something more. Whilst the supplies from the colonies and their exports were drawn through the mother country, the commerce of that mother country being open to the United States, their navigation could fairly participate in the trade. But when British vessels were allowed a direct trade between the colonies and the United States, to the exclusion of American shipping, it put an end to the circuitous trade; and the navigation of the United States, if they submitted to the British monopoly of this direct trade, would be deprived of their fair proportion of the transportation of the subjects of colonial commerce which they would have enjoyed through the parent country.

Whatever may be the abstract rights of Great Britain and the United States in respect to the regulation of an intercourse between the British West India colonies and the United States, Great Britain did, in fact, consent to negotiate on that subject. She might have taken and adhered to the ground that she would not treat; but she did not. By consenting to treat, and by inviting the American Government to renew the negotiation as late as March, 1826, more than eight months after the date of the act of Parliament, in July, 1825, we were forbidden to anticipate that, without any sort of intimation, the door of negotiation was to be suddenly closed. If we had no right to assume "that there would be, at all times, an unabated disposition, on the part of the British Government, to make the trade of the West India colonies the subject of diplomatic arrangement," it must be admitted that our surprise was quite natural that you, who were sent to England, among other reasons, in consequence of that very intimation in March, should, upon your arrival there in the succeeding July, and before the presentation of your credentials, be unexpectedly met by the annunciation of a measure arresting, at the threshold, all negotiation on the colonial trade.

When two nations undertake to arrange a matter of common interest between them in a given mode, if one of them, not only without, but in opposition to, notice to the other, should itself proceed, exclusively, to regulate, by a different and less friendly mode, that interest, it cannot be denied that there is just ground of complaint. Undoubtedly, it is within the competence of a nation to refuse, after agreeing to negotiate, or to break a negotiation in any stage of its progress, without ascertaining the practicability of an amicable adjustment; but this is not according to prevailing usage among friendly States.

We must think that the frankness of friendly correspondence required of the British Government to communicate the change of its resolution as to the manner of regulating the colonial trade, and, at the same time, an official communication of the act of Parliament of July, 1825. Had such communications been made, the American Government would have been prepared to consider, during the succeeding session of Congress, the conditions offered in that act; and, upon receiving from the British Government those explanations which the ambiguity of the act rendered necessary, Congress could have passed an act which might have proved satisfactory to both parties. By the forbearance to make those communications, we remained in entire ignorance of the altered purposes of the British Government, and in full confidence that it was their desire, as it was our expectation, to arrange the intercourse by convention.

Although, as is alleged by Mr. Canning, it is not the habit of the two Governments reciprocally to communicate to each other all the acts of their respective Legislatures, when a particular act is passed which is intended to put aside a negotiation contemplated by both parties, there is an evident fitness, if not obligation, in point of frankness, to communicate it; and there is believed to be no example in which, under such circumstances, any Government has failed to communicate its act.

But, if it has not been the practice of the two Governments to interchange the whole body of their respective statutes, it has been usual, at least on the part of this Government, to communicate those which are the objects of negotiation. Repeated instances of such communications of acts of Congress, imposing commercial restrictions, occurred during the late European war; and the convention of 1815, with Great Britain, was made in pursuance of an act of Congress, which was officially communicated to the British Government.

So far from being accurate is the statement that the act of Congress of March, 1823, was not communicated to the British minister at Washington, that the bill during its progress in Congress and in the form in which it passed, was communicated to him by the Secretary of State, and it became the topic of official conference and correspondence while on its passage, and of official correspondence between them in less than a month after its enactment.

We do not mean, now, to allege that the omission to communicate the British act was an intentional discourtesy towards the American Government; but we do mean to aver that that omission, and the neglect to inform us that the act was to supersede all negotiation, combined with the explicit invitation of Mr. Vaughan to renew the negotiation, given as late as March, 1826, had the effect of misleading us in regard to the views of the British Government. It was to this end only that reference was made in your instructions of the 11th of November last to the letter which had been addressed from the Department of State to a member of Congress. That letter, which was never private, acquired, by being published in the gazettes of the day, and a copy of it having been, at the time, furnished to Mr. Vaughan, and transmitted by him to his Government, a public, if not diplomatic character, which fairly entitled it to be cited as evidencing the known views taken at Washington of the British act. The opinion expressed in that letter, that negotiation, and not legislation, was the instrument, in the contemplation of both Governments, by which they intended to regulate the colonial intercourse, was subsequently confirmed by the forbearance of the British Government to enforce the act of Parliament towards the United States. And yet that very forbearance, which had the effect of deceiving us, though certainly not so intended, is now brought forward as a reason for declining to treat and for closing the colonial ports. It is alleged by Mr. Canning to have been in consideration of the pendency of the proposition before Congress for conforming to the conditions of the act of 1825. If that had been stated at the time we should not have been deceived.

Although that act did not relate specially to the United States, but addressed itself to all the foreign Powers, the United States were the only Power with which Great Britain was negotiating on its subject-matter. And, as it now appears that it was intended to be a substitute for the negotiation, it is difficult to resist a conviction of the obvious propriety of its being communicated to the American Government, even admitting such a communication to have been unnecessary to other Powers.

Whilst the Government of the United States must ever insist that, so long as there is an intercourse between them and the British colonies, they have a clear right to participate in the regulation of that intercourse, their attachment to any specific mode of regulation has never been so strong as to exclude the accomplishment of that object in any other mode. They have preferred that it should be effected by convention, because, in that way, it would be more certain, binding, and durable; and, moreover, conformable to what they had just reason to suppose were the wishes of the British Government. Had they been apprised that it was the choice of that Government to regulate the trade by mutual acts of separate legislation, they could have had no difficulty in adapting their measures, in that respect, to those of the British Government.

Mr. Canning states "that the act of 1825 offered like terms to all nations who were willing to purchase the right to trade with the colonies. Some have acceded to the terms. The United States would not. They cannot feel it unkind or unjust that having, upon a free and (as is known from the public proceedings of their Legislature) deliberate consideration, declined to subscribe to the terms on which exception from colonial prohibition was impartially tendered to all nations, they should find themselves, in common with such of those nations as have decided like themselves, liable to that exclusion which is, and always has been, the general principle of colonial trade."

No exception need now be taken to the regularity of a foreign Government in referring to the proceedings of the Legislature of another nation which have terminated in no affirmative act; although the practice of a foreign Government, looking anywhere but to the established organ of international intercourse for the acts and resolutions of Government, might have a most mischievous tendency.

Independent of all other considerations, the danger is if a foreign Government undertakes to enter the halls of domestic legislation, in order to comprehend the votes and resolutions on measures which have not been matured into the form of any legislative act, that such foreign Government may misconceive the motives and bearing of those votes and resolutions. Native citizens often find it dfficult clearly to comprehend all the causes, in numerous assemblies, which may have occasioned the failure or passage of any given measure, or to assign, with certainty, the specific reason which may have led to either of those results.

We are quite sure that Mr. Canning had no wish to misconceive the proceedings which took place in Congress, in the sessions of 1825–'26, in relation to the colonial question; and yet he has greatly misconceived them. He is even mistaken as to the branch of Congress in which those proceedings were had. There was no resolution proposed in the House of Representatives, and, consequently, no debate and decision upon it, such as he describes. For the purpose of correcting the errors into which he has been unintentionally drawn I will now take some notice of those proceedings.

It is perfectly true, that, although the British Government made no official communication of the act of Parliament of July, 1825, the American Government, nevertheless, obtained possession of a copy of it.

It is also true that such a petition from Baltimore as Mr. Canning describes was presented to Congress.

But it should be remarked, that the petitioners were uninformed of the negotiations of 1824, or of the correspondence which subsequently passed between the two Governments on the colonial subject. And it is not, therefore, improbable that if they had been aware that the American Government expected and were desirous to arrange the intercourse by treaty they would have abstained from petitioning Congress.

The petition was referred, in both Houses, to the regular committees. That of the House of Representatives made no report. The Senate's committee reported (a copy of their report is now transmitted to you) that, "from this view of the subject, and a cursory reference to the numerous acts which have been passed in relation to it during the last ten years, both by the United States and by Great Britain, evidence will at once be furnished of the complexity of the interests connected with it, of the difficulty satisfactorily to arrange them, and especially of the inefficacy of isolated legislation for the attainment of this international object; and also affording, as the committee cannot but believe, a strong ground of preference for an arrangement being effected, if practicable, by a convention between the two Governments, on a just and liberal basis, which, when agreed to, would be permanent and unalterable for the term of its duration." Again, "from the committee having reason to believe that an adjustment of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonial possessions forms one of the special and prominent objects which have been committed to the minister of the United States at the Court of London; that a corresponding desire to arrange it on a satisfactory footing appears to exist on the part of the British Government; and that the negotiations respecting it are expected to come to a definitive issue before the next session of Congress, the committee, although fully agreeing with the memorialists in the wish to cultivate and extend the trade in question, which they trust may be done to the mutual advantage of the parties concerned in it, are still unanimously of opinion that it is not expedient at this time to legislate on the subject, and therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial."

This report, it should be borne in mind, was made to the Senate on the 31st day of March, 1826, only nine days after Mr. Vaughan had invited the American Government to renew the negotiation.

This report was recommitted with an understanding on the part of the Senate that the Committee on Finance should report a bill repealing the discriminating duties. A bill was accordingly reported on a subsequent day (a copy of which is herewith transmitted) containing a repeal, and nothing but a simple repeal of those duties.

This bill was reported near the close of the session, and, amidst the pressure of other business, was laid upon the table—a parliamentary disposal of it, which, far from implying its rejection, admitted of its being again taken into consideration during any hour of any remaining day of the session. There was, then, no decision on the merits of the bill, and there was no refusal in either branch of Congress to accede to the terms of the British act of 1825.

That there was no direct and final decision on it has been alleged by the member of the Senate who was most zealous in its support to have been owing to the want of time. It is probable that that consideration had some influence; but it is most likely that the chief cause which prevented its passage was the belief, generally entertained, that the colonial subject was in a course of negotiation, and would be satisfactorily arranged by treaty.

Had the bill passed, it would not have been in conformity with the expectations of the British Government as they have been since communicated.

The first official information to this Government of the instructions transmitted to Mr. Vaughan, by which he was authorized, in the contingency of the passage of an act of Congress, to deliver a note declaring that the discriminating duties imposed upon American ships and their cargoes in the West Indies should immediately cease, is contained in Mr. Canning's note of the 27th January, 1827. No such information was communicated by Mr. Vaughan during the session of Congress of 1825–'26. If the bill which was before the Senate had passed into a law, it would not have been such a measure as was contemplated by the British Government; because it did not contain a repeal of the restrictions on British shipping as to the circuitous voyage, which is now understood to be an indispensable requisite. We are altogether unable to comprehend why he was not instructed to communicate the offer of the British Government during the session of Congress; or for what purpose an allusion is now made to instructions which were not disclosed to the American Government, and which, having been locked up in the porte-feuille of the Minister, might, for all practical purposes, as well have never been given.

It cannot, therefore, be alleged, with any sort of propriety, that the American Government refused to accede to the terms of the act of Parliament of 1825, nor that, upon a free and deliberate consideration, they have declined to subscribe to terms on which exception to colonial prohibition was impartially tendered to all nations. The American Congress has never had fairly before it, and, therefore, has never freely and deliberately considered the conditions of the act of 1825; and, consequently, it could not have, and has not, pronounced any decision on those conditions. Up to this day we are far from being sure that we understand the terms on which that act tenders to foreign nations a participation in the colonial intercourse. Although Mr. Vaughan might not have been authorized to enter into any discussion of the provisions of the act after the termination of the session of Congress, it was not unreasonable to expect that he was, at all times, prepared by instructions to explain the purport of its provisions.

The preceding review has been taken, not for the purpose of conveying reproach, but with the hope of satisfying the Government of his Britannic Majesty that the Government of the United States, ever animated by an anxious desire to preserve, extend, and strengthen amicable relations between the two countries, and always frank and open in its correspondence and intercourse with foreign nations, has not, in regard to the colonial trade, deviated from its established character for good faith and fair dealing. From a careful and dispassionate consideration of all that has passed between the two Governments on that subject, supposing, which cannot be doubted, that each has been actuated by a sincere wish to effect a satisfactory arrangement of the terms of the intercourse, it is manifest that there has been a misconception of each other's views as to the mode of accomplishing that desirable object. Whether the American Government ought or ought not to have confided in their belief that it was the intention of the British Government, in the contemplated negotiation, to concur in the adjustment, by convention, of the conditions of the trade, the American Government did, in point of fact, so confide. Whether the British Government ought or ought not to have expected the passage of an act of Congress, acceding to the conditions of an act of Parliament of 1825, it did, in point of fact, so expect it. We have been disappointed in the negotiation which was anticipated: the British Government has been disappointed in the legislation which it anticipated. Both travelling to the same place, we have each failed to reach the point of destination by misconception of the course of the other. It is now useless and unavailing to dwell upon the past, which cannot be recalled. It will be more profitable and consistent with a friendly understanding between the two countries to survey our present mutual position, and to ascertain if it be now practicable, in any mode, to reconcile their respective interests in regard to the colonial trade. It would not be very creditable to the councils of two great and enlightened nations, if they are substantially agreed as to the terms of that intercourse, and willing that it should be opened on these terms, that they should, nevertheless, put an entire stop to it, because they had differed on the point whether those terms should be inserted in the form of a convention, or in that of reciprocal acts of legislation; or because they may not be able to agree on the abstract questions of right, claim, and usage, which Mr. Canning has discussed. To persist in closing the trade on those grounds, might create doubts whether they were ever sincere in their mutual professions that it should be open.

It has been already stated that we preferred, for reasons which appear to us to be solid, an arrangement by convention rather than one by law; but that, at the same time, we were not so wedded to that mode of effectuating the object as to prevent our surrender of it, in a spirit of compromise and conciliation, to the preference of Great Britain for a regulation of the intercourse by respective acts of legislative authority. We should have promptly yielded our preference, if we had been made acquainted with that of the British Government. There is one advantage in a legislative regulation which an arrangement by treaty does not possess, and that is, that if the amount of concession made in the law to a foreign nation is found, upon experiment, to be injurious to the domestic interests, the law can be at any time repealed; whereas the treaty must be allowed to have its operation, whatever that may be, during the whole term to which it is limited. From this difference in the effect of the two modes of regulation, a Government may be induced to grant commercial privileges by law which it would not consent to throw into the more permanent and obligatory shape of conventional stipulations. On the point, for example, of the circuitous trade between the United States and the United Kingdom, through the British colonies, the President would consent, with much reluctance, to a stipulation in a treaty by which British navigation should be allowed the enjoyment of that trade to the exclusion of the shipping of the United States, whilst he would be willing that the experiment should be made, under reciprocal acts of the two Governments, revocable at the pleasure of either.

Under the influences of these considerations, the Government of the United States acquiesces in the decision which has been taken by the British Government, that the colonial trade shall be regulated only by law.

You will avail yourself of some fit occasion to communicate to the British Government the substance of this despatch, and the President's acquiescence in that decision; and you will, at the same or some other more suitable time, ascertain the disposition of that Government to open the trade by separate acts of the two Governments.

The President is willing to recommend to Congress, at its next session—first, to suspend, as to the British Government, the alien duties on vessel and cargo, and to allow the entry into our ports of British vessels, laden with the same kinds of British produce, or British colonial produce, as American vessels can lawfully import, the British vessel paying no higher charges of any kind than American vessels are, under the same circumstances, bound to pay; and, secondly, to abolish the restriction contained in the act of the 1st March, 1823, confining the trade to a direct intercourse between the colonies and the United States; the effect of which will be to leave Great Britain in the exclusive possession of the circuitous trade between the United Kingdom and the United States through the British colonies. You will inquire whether, if Congress should pass a law to the above effect, the order in Council of July last will be revoked, the discriminating duties operating to the disadvantage of our vessels in the British colonial ports will be abolished, and our vessels suffered to enjoy the privileges of trade and intercourse according to the enactments of the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825?

Should the intercourse be opened on the above conditions, the American Government will have waived the demand heretofore made, that our produce should be received into the British colonial ports, paying no higher duties than similar produce pays in those ports when imported from other parts of the British possessions. We should have regarded the above inquiry altogether unnecessary, and that, as a matter of course, the privileges of the act of Parliament would be extended to our navigation upon the passage of such an act of Congress as the President now offers to recommend, but for the declaration contained in Mr. Canning's note of the 11th September last. According to that declaration, the British Government announced that, "after having been compelled to apply to any country the interdict prescribed by the act of 1825, it cannot hold itself bound to remove the interdict, as a matter of course, whenever it may happen to suit the convenience of the foreign Government to reconsider the measure by which the application of that interdict was occasioned."

If this Government had, upon full consideration, with a clear knowledge of the intention of Great Britain to regulate the colonial trade by law, and not by treaty, rejected the terms of the act of Parliament, after fully comprehending the import of those terms, and thereby compelled Great Britain to apply to the navigation of the United States the interdict of the act of Parliament, the determination of the British Government, communicated in that declaration, would not furnish any just occasion of complaint. But the Government of the United States has never decided to reject those terms; and, from a candid and impartial consideration of all that has passed on the subject between the two Governments, it is manifest that we have all along been looking to a different mode of arrangement from that which now appears to have been in the contemplation of the British Government. We think that we were authorized so to look by the official correspondence which passed between them; but whether that justified us or not, we did, in point of fact, depend exclusively upon an arrangement by convention.

We can hardly suppose, under these circumstances, that the British Government, after the passage of such an act of Congress as you are now authorized to state that the President is willing to recommend, would refuse to remove the interdict which has been applied only to the navigation of the United States. A denial to them alone of the privileges of the act of Parliament of 1825, offered to all nations, would not be easily reconcileable with those friendly relations which it is the interest of both nations, as it is the anxious endeavor of the Government of the United States, to cultivate and maintain.

The time and manner of executing the instructions contained in this despatch are confided to your judgment and discretion. You may have the advantage of local lights, which, at this distance, do not reach us. Judging with the aid of such as we possess, it would probably be best for you, in the first instance, to deliver an official note, limited to a presentation of such of the preceding observations as are intended to refute some of the arguments and facts brought forward by Mr. Canning in his two notes of November and January last, and there leave the subject, without making the inquiry as to the practicability of an arrangement by mutual acts of legislation. In the correspondence to which that note may possibly lead, the British Government may disclose their purposes and intentions without formally making that inquiry, which it would be better to avoid if those purposes can be otherwise ascertained. The powers of the President are incompetent to open the trade now without the concurrence of Congress. It will, therefore, be sufficient to obtain a knowledge of the disposition of the British Government, in the event of the passage of such an act of Congress as has been intimated, in season for the next session. If the British Government should not itself spontaneously manifest that disposition, you will then make the inquiry herein directed. Some time in the approaching autumn, when, if there shall have been any feeling of dissatisfaction produced in the British Government by the late proclamation, that feeling will have abated, may prove to be a suitable time to present the inquiry. But, I repeat, you will exercise on this matter your own judgment.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Esq., &c., &c.

Mr. Gallatin to Lord Dudley.

UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, June 4, 1827.

The undersigned, minister of the United States of America, has the honor, in compliance with instructions received from his Government, to present to the consideration of Lord Viscount Dudley, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, some further explanatory observations on the subject of the colonial intercourse, which have been suggested by the note of Lord Dudley's predecessor in office of the 27th of January last.

It is not intended thereby to renew the discussion of abstract questions already sufficiently debated, but to remove such misapprehensions as may still be entertained of the views and proceedings of the Government of the United States on that subject.

The undersigned is instructed explicitly to state, 1. That during the whole time which elapsed between the negotiations of the year 1824 and the order in Council of July, 1826, the Government of the United States had entertained no doubt of the disposition of his Majesty's Government to renew the negotiations on that point, and to settle it by a conventional arrangement; 2. That the conditions on which it was intended, by the act of Parliament of July, 1825, to open the trade to American vessels, have never been explained or distinctly understood; that they had not, therefore, been deliberately considered by the American Congress; and that that body had not pronounced any decision on those conditions prior to the order in Council of July, 1826.

The reasons which had induced the belief that his Majesty's Government was still disposed to negotiate on that subject have already been stated.

Whatever might be the abstract rights of Great Britain, and her opinion of those rights in respect to the regulations of an intercourse between her colonies and the United States, she had, in fact, consented to negotiate on that subject. She had, as late as March, 1826, eight months after the date of the act of Parliament of July, 1825, announced to the Government of the United States her disposition to renew the negotiations generally, and without making an exception as to that point which had been one of the subjects of the negotiations intended to be renewed. The act of Parliament had not been officially communicated, nor any intimation given that it was meant as a substitute to negotiations.

It has not been unusual, at least on the part of the United States, to communicate such acts as may affect, or are connected with, negotiations. The convention of 1815 was made in pursuance of an act of Congress, which was officially communicated to the Government of Great Britain.

With respect to that of March, 1823, the bill was, during its progress in Congress, communicated by the Secretary of State to his Majesty's minister at Washington, and it became a topic of official conference between them while on its passage, and of official correspondence in less than a month after its enactment.

But it was because the act of Parliament of July, 1825, was intended by the British Government to supersede all negotiation that the communication of such a change of its resolution, as to the manner of regulating the colonial trade, was necessary to the only Power with whom Great Britain was negotiating on that subject. It is not alleged that the omission was an intentional discourtesy towards the American Government. But it is, nevertheless, true that, combined with the invitation of Mr. Vaughan to renew the negotiations generally, it had the effect of misleading the United States in regard to the views of the British Government.

It was to this end only that reference was made to the letter addressed from the Department of State to a member of Congress. That letter, which was of a public nature, and had acquired, by a copy of it being furnished to Mr. Vaughan, an official character, might, with great propriety, be appealed to as a conclusive evidence of the views taken, at that time, by the Government of the United States of the act of Parliament.

The opinion expressed in that letter was corroborated by the subsequent forbearance of the Government of Great Britain to enforce that act towards the United States. This suspension, which has since been declared to have been in consideration of the pendency before Congress of propositions arising out of the act, had, for want of any explanation, the effect of confirming the United States in their belief that negotiation, and not legislation, was the instrument still in the contemplation of both Governments for regulating the colonial intercourse.

It is much to be regretted that the instructions transmitted to Mr. Vaughan, and referred to in the note of Lord Dudley's predecessor in office of the 27th January last, did not authorize him to make any communication on the subject during the session of Congress. Had any explanation been given, at that time, of the true meaning of the conditions offered by the act of Parliament and of the ultimate views of his Majesty's Government, Congress would have been enabled and induced to deliberate and decide on those conditions.

It has, however, been inferred, from the public proceedings of the Legislature of the United States, that they had, on a free and deliberate consideration, declined to subscribe to the terms on which exemption from colonial prohibition was impartially tendered to all nations.

It may often happen, when referring to the proceedings of the Legislature of another nation which have terminated in no affirmative act, that the votes and resolutions on measures which have not been thus matured may not be fully comprehended; that the motives and bearings of those votes and resolutions may be misconceived. Some notice will be taken of the proceedings alluded to, for the purpose of correcting the erroneous impression which they seem to have made.

A petition from Baltimore, such as has been described by his Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, was presented to Congress. The petitioners were uninformed of the negotiations of 1824, and of the subsequent correspondence between the two Governments. The petition was referred, in both Houses, to the regular committees. A separate motion for the repeal of the discriminating duties had been previously made in the House of Representatives, and had been referred in the same manner.

The committee of the House of Representatives, whether knowing that the subject had been taken up in the Senate, or from any other cause, made no report. There was no resolution discussed in that House, and, consequently, no deliberation or decision upon it.

The committee of the Senate understood a compliance with the request of the petitioners to be tantamount to an admission "of British vessels, indiscrimately, into the ports of the United States, with their cargoes, from whencesoever arriving, or of whatsoever composed, on the same terms as American vessels, or those of the most favored nations—which is the same thing;" and they reported, in substance, that there was a strong ground of preference for an arrangement being effected, if practicable, by a convention between the two Governments rather than to rely on independent acts of legislation, sometimes ambiguous, and at all times subject to revocation; that a corresponding desire to arrange that intercourse appeared to exist on the part of the British Government; that the negotiations respecting it were expected to come to a definitive issue before the next session of Congress, and that it was not, therefore, expedient, at that time, to legislate on the subject.

This report was made to the Senate on the 31st of March, 1826, nine days after Mr. Vaughan's communication on the renewal of the negotiations.

It was recommitted, with an understanding that a bill should be brought in repealing the discriminating duties. Such a bill was accordingly reported, a copy of which the undersigned has the honor to enclose, containing a repeal, and nothing but a simple repeal, of those duties.

The bill was, on motion, ordered to lie on the table by a majority of two votes. This vote, the only one taken upon it, had no other effect but to prevent the bill being acted upon on that day. It might have been called up on any other day; but it had been brought in near the close of the session, and, whether from want of time, or, what is more probable, from reliance on the successful issue of negotiations, it was not acted upon. Had it been taken up, and passed into a law, it would not have been such a compliance with the terms of the act of Parliament of July, 1825, as was contemplated by Great Britain, since it did not repeal the restrictions laid, by a former act of Congress, on the circuitous or indirect intercourse.

It appears, from the course of the proceedings and from the result, that the subject was not taken up in one of the Houses; and that, in the other, the precise purport of the terms offered by the act of Parliament was not, at that time, more distinctly understood than by the Executive, whilst the same reliance seems to have been placed in the result of the expected negotiations. It is certain that the conditions of the act of Parliament, such as they are therein expressed, were not taken into deliberate consideration by the American Congress, and that that body has never rejected nor pronounced any decisions on those conditions.

Up to this day it is still uncertain whether the real meaning of those terms is distinctly understood by the United States. The doubts entertained in that respect were stated at large in the note of the undersigned of the 28th of December last; and no explanation has since, any more than at any former time, been given by his Majesty's Government.

The preceding review has been taken, not for the purpose of complaining of the conduct of Great Britain, but with the hope of satisfying the Government of his Britannic Majesty, by this exposition of the acts of the Government of the United States, and of the impressions under which it acted, that it has not, in regard to the colonial trade, deviated from its uniform course, and relaxed its constant endeavors to preserve and strengthen the amicable relations between the two countries.

No doubt is entertained, on the other hand, of the dispositions of his Majesty's Government at the time when the act of Parliament was enacted; that, considering the intercourse between the United States and the British West Indies as beneficial, it was their intention that it should continue open on certain terms; and that, although these differed from those offered to most other commercial nations, and may also have been misunderstood, they would not have been found, when properly explained, to be altogether inadmissible. Had it been otherwise, the interdict laid on the American navigation by the order of Council of July, 1826, would at once have been embodied in the act of Parliament of July, 1825.

Both Governments, actuated by a sincere wish to effect a satisfactory arrangement, have failed to attain that object, from a misconception of each other's views as to the mode of accomplishing it. Whilst the British Government expected the passage of an act of Congress acceding to the conditions of the act of Parliament, the Government of the United States confided in the belief that it was still the intention of Great Britain to arrange the subject by a convention.

It is now unavailing to dwell upon the past, and to inquire whether either or both Governments had sufficient reasons for their expectations. The fact is, that they entertained such expectations, and have both been disappointed; and it will be more profitable and consistent with the friendly understanding between the two countries to attend only to the relative situation in which they are now placed.

The United States, though preferring a conventional arrangement as more permanent, and perhaps more easily effected than one founded on mutual legislation, are not exclusively attached to any particular mode.

There is, indeed, this advantage in legislative regulation over conventional arrangement, in respect to subjects not fully tested by experience, that what may be deemed concession by either party may, at any time, be modified, if found actually injurious.

Thus, for instance, the President of the United States would not, without reluctance, have consented to a treaty stipulation allowing that circuitous trade between the United Kingdom and the British colonies through the United States, which, if permitted, must be enjoyed exclusively by the British navigation; whilst he is willing that the experiment should be made by virtue of reciprocal laws, revocable at the pleasure of either Government.

The undersigned is accordingly authorized to say that, under the influence of these considerations, the Government of the United States acquiesces in the decision which has been taken by the Government of Great Britain, that the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies shall be regulated by the laws of the two countries; and the President is disposed to promote a restoration of that intercourse founded on such respective laws.

The undersigned prays Lord Dudley to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Right Hon. Lord Viscount DUDLEY, &c., &c.

Mr. Gallatin to Lord Dudley.

UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, August 17, 1827.

The undersigned, minister of the United States of America, had the honor to address, on the 4th of June last, a note on the subject of the colonial intercourse to Lord Viscount Dudley, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The principal object of that note was to remove such misapprehensions as might still be entertained of the views and proceedings of the Government of the United States on that subject, and at the same time to express the disposition of the President to promote a restoration of that intercourse founded on the respective laws of the two countries.

This overture has been founded on the belief that the present state of things has not arisen from any intentional act of either Government, but from misconceptions of each other's views, which must now be removed. It was the avowed intention of that of Great Britain, at the time when the act of Parliament of July, 1825, was enacted, that the intercourse should continue open on certain terms. For this there could be no motive but a conviction that the commerce which had, almost without interruption, been carried on from their first settlement, between the British West Indies and the United States, was mutually beneficial. It is, therefore, presumed to be the wish of both parties that an interdict, which has been the result of fortuitous circumstances, may, if practicable, be removed.

Under that impression, the President of the United States is willing to recommend to Congress at its next session—1st. To open again the ports of the United States to British vessels coming from the British colonies; allowing the entry, into the said ports, of British vessels laden with such British produce, or produce of the British colonies as American vessels can lawfully import, without paying any alien or discriminating duties, and on payment only of the same and no higher duties or charges of any kind, on either vessels or cargoes, than are, under the same circumstances, payable by American vessels or cargoes. 2d. To abolish the restriction contained in the act of Congress of March, 1823, which confines the trade to a direct intercourse between the British colonies and the United States.

The effect of this measure will be to leave Great Britain in the exclusive possession of the circuitous trade between the United Kingdom and the United States through the British colonies. All the provisions in former acts of the American Government which had been deemed objectionable by that of his Majesty will thereby be repealed. The condition contemplated by the act of Parliament, as it is now understood, will be fulfilled. Every obstacle which had heretofore prevented an arrangement would, if this were still a subject of negotiation, be removed.

The Government of the United States would have had no doubt that, upon the passage of an act of Congress of that tenor, the interdict laid on American shipping under the act of Parliament of 1825 would be removed as a matter of course, had it not been for the declaration contained in the note of his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the undersigned, dated September 11, 1826.

It was there announced that, "after having been compelled to apply to any country the interdict prescribed by the act of 1825, the British Government cannot hold itself bound to remove that interdict as a matter of course whenever it may happen to suit the convenience of the foreign Government to reconsider the measures by which the application of that interdict was occasioned."

A subsequent act of Parliament contains provisions of a general nature corresponding with that declaration, but continues in force the discretionary powers vested in his Majesty on the subject.

Under those circumstances the President cannot; it would, indeed, be useless for him to make the intended recommendation to Congress, and to agitate the question anew, without having previously ascertained the intentions of his Majesty's Government. Though not bound to remove the interdict as a matter of course, the question is, whether they are disposed, under certain contingencies, to do it at this time.

The undersigned has, therefore, been instructed to inquire whether, if Congress should, during its next session, pass a law to the effect above stated, the order in Council of July 27, 1826, will be revoked; the discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonies be abolished; and those vessels be allowed to enjoy the privileges of trade and intercourse with those colonies, according to the act of Parliament of July 5, 1825?

He prays Lord Dudley to favor him with an answer to that inquiry, the object of which is only to ascertain the intentions of his Majesty's Government in reference to an act of the tenor aforesaid that should be passed by Congress at its next session.

It would be distinctly understood that those mutual acts would not have the character of a compact, and that their only effect would be to open the trade for the time, without at all binding the parties, each remaining in the complete possession of its rights with respect to that intercourse, in conformity with the terms of the commercial convention between the two countries.

The undersigned prays Lord Dudley to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Right Hon. Viscount DUDLEY, &c.

62 UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, August 30, 1827.

Mr. Gallatin presents his compliments to Lord Dudley, and begs leave to remind him that the object of the interview he had the honor to ask is to give some additional explanations on the subject-matter of his official note of the 17th instant previous to its being taken into consideration by his Majesty's Government.

The Right Hon. Lord Viscount DUDLEY, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State.

No. 115.] LONDON, September 14, 1827.

SIR: We resumed our conferences on the 12th, made some progress, and are to meet again to-day.

I had yesterday an interview with Lord Dudley and Mr. Huskisson on the subject of the colonial intercourse. Mr. Huskisson said that it was the intention of the British Government to consider the intercourse of the British colonies as being exclusively under its control, and any relaxation from the colonial system as an indulgence, to be granted on such terms as might suit the policy of Great Britain at the time when it might be granted; that he was not prepared to say whether, or on what terms, it might be found expedient to open again the intercourse to American vessels, in case it was open on the part of the United States, and their laws laying restrictions or imposing extra duties on British vessels should be repealed; and that an answer to that effect would be given to my note of the 17th of August last, if his colleagues agreed with him in opinion.

I said that every question of right had, on this occasion, been waived on the part of the United States; the only object of the present inquiry being to ascertain whether, as a matter of mutual convenience, the intercourse might not be opened in a manner satisfactory to both countries. This being a pure question of policy, although Great Britain was the only judge of her own, it would be gratifying to be satisfied that she acted only from that motive, and that, in opening the trade to other countries that had not complied with her terms, and declining to open it to the United States even in the event of such compliance, it was not her object to inflict a wanton injury, or, at least, to evince an unfriendly disposition towards them. I then entered into various details, intended to show why I was unable to discover any reason, founded on her own interest, for persisting in foreclosing the intercourse.

Mr. Huskisson explicitly disclaimed any unfriendly feeling towards the United States, and, with respect to other nations, said that Russia was the only Power to whom the trade in question had been opened, though she had not, in every respect, complied with the terms of Great Britain; but that, on other points, the British trade had been particularly favored in that country. He did not give any explanation of the advantages derived to Great Britain from the present interdict, but dwelt strongly on the manner in which the advances made by the act of Parliament of the year 1822 had been met on the part of the Government of the United States. He said that it had appeared as if America had entertained the opinion that the British West Indies could not exist without her supplies, and that she might, therefore, compel Great Britain to open the intercourse on any terms she pleased.

I disclaimed any such belief or intention on the part of the United States. But it appeared to me, and I intimated it, indeed, to Mr. Huskisson, that he was acting rather under the influence of irritated feelings on account of past events than with a view to the mutual interests of the two countries. This was, of course, denied; but he remained immovable in the position he had assumed; and Lord Dudley, without taking a share in the conversation, which lasted near two hours, acquiesced in the opinion of his colleague.

I avoided, as far as possible, to renew the discussion on anything that had heretofore taken place, and adduced, without producing any effect, every argument derived from mutual advantage which the occasion suggested. These I omit as familiar to yourself, and it would be but repetition to state at large the complaints made of the conduct of the United States from the year 1822 to 1825. But I must not forget to say that Mr. Huskisson explicitly declared that neither of the two bills which were under the consideration of Congress during its last session would, if passed into laws, have induced this Government to remove the interdict on American vessels.

I may add some further observations on that subject when the answer which I presume is intended to be given to my note of the 17th August shall have been received.

I have the honor, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, Washington.

Lord Dudley to Mr. Gallatin.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 1, 1827.

The undersigned, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor of acknowledging the two official notes of the 4th of last June and the 17th of last August, addressed to him by Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, on the subject of the intercourse between the United States and the colonial possessions of Great Britain.

The note of the 4th June, although it closed with a profession of the acquiescence of the American Government in the decision of Great Britain that the intercourse in question should be regulated by mutual laws rather than by treaty, was yet directed chiefly to an explanation of certain circumstances in the conduct of the United States, and did not appear to the undersigned to call for any reply on his part.

In the succeeding note, however, of the 17th of August, the statements and reasonings of the former are followed out by Mr. Gallatin into a definite proposition, undoubtedly requiring from the British Government a direct answer. In this note it is stated that the President of the United States is willing to recommend to Congress the adoption of certain measures tending to relax the restrictions imposed by the American Legislature on the intercourse of the United States with the British colonies through the medium of British ships, which measures Mr. Gallatin shortly specifies; and it is asked whether, if Congress should, during its next session, pass a law to that effect, "the order in Council of the 27th of July, 1826, will be revoked, the discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonies be abolished, and these vessels be allowed to enjoy the privileges of trade and intercourse with those colonies, according to the act of Parliament of the 5th of July, 1825?"

It is, at the same time, observed by Mr. Gallatin that the Government of the United States would have had no doubt that, on the enactment of such a law by Congress, the interdict laid on American shipping under the act of Parliament of 1825, would be removed as a matter of course, had not Mr. Canning, in his letter to Mr. Gallatin of the 11th of September, 1826, declared that, after having been compelled to apply the interdict to any country, the British Government cannot hold itself bound to remove that interdict as a matter of course whenever it may happen to suit the convenience of the foreign Government to reconsider the measures by which the application of that interdict was occasioned.

Mr. Gallatin truly adds that an act of Parliament was afterwards passed containing provisions corresponding with the declaration so made by Mr. Canning.

The undersigned takes pleasure in recognizing in both these letters of Mr. Gallatin, and especially in the inquiry which closes the second of them, the same spirit of good will and conciliation which, in the midst of discussions involving no small difference of opinion, has characterized Mr. Gallatin's correspondence with the British Government. The undersigned hopes it is unnecessary to observe that his Majesty's Government is influenced by the same sentiments; and that, although he thinks himself bound to offer some observations on topics of debate and conflicting interest, he presents them with no feelings but such as ought to pervade discussions between two nations allied in origin, and, he trusts he may add, allied also in desire to improve and strengthen the relations of ancient kindred by mutual offices of kindness and amity.

Connecting the two notes of Mr. Gallatin, the topics which they suggest for present consideration seem to be three:

First. It may be expedient to observe on the declaration which Mr. Gallatin has quoted from Mr. Canning, and which appears to be regarded by the Government of the United States as a deviation from what might have been anticipated as the natural course of proceeding.

Second. Some comment may be offered on the explanation into which Mr. Gallatin has entered of the conduct of the Government and the Legislature of the United States in relation to the intercourse with the British colonies, under the operation of the act of Parliament of July, 1825.

And this course of observation will naturally introduce into view, in the Third place, the proposition which forms the more immediate subject of the note of the 17th of August.

1. With regard to the declaration of Mr. Canning, the undersigned thinks it not unimportant to remark that the sentiment which in that declaration Mr. Canning so pointedly expresses, is, in fact exactly consistent with the general principles always professed by the British Government on the subject of colonial intercourse; which principles are expounded in the argument of Mr. Canning.

The leading position contended for by Mr. Canning is this: that the exclusion of foreigners from a direct intercourse with the British colonies is altogether agreeable to the received and ordinary doctrines of the colonial policy of modern times. The established usage of nations possessing colonies interdicts that intercourse to all but their own subjects. If such interdicts be in any case relaxed, the case is one of exception; and if, having once been relaxed, it is reinforced, this is but a restoration of the received rule. The necessary consequence is, that, in any instance not governed by special regulation, it would be the continuance and not the suspension of the interdict that would alone be contemplated as a matter of course.

In reasserting these principles, and in immediately connecting them with the declaration cited from Mr. Canning, it is by no means the object of the undersigned to revive a discussion which is already exhausted. He is desirous only of showing that the reservation which Mr. Canning, for his Government, makes of a discretionary continuance of the interdict in question, in every case in which it has been once imposed, is in entire harmony with the general maxims of colonial policy, and, consequently, that the application of the rule, in any given instance, ought not to be regarded as a proceeding of a singular and, still less, of an unfriendly character.

By this connexion, however, the question may seem to arise whether the proceedings of the United States were such as fairly to incur the application of the interdict in the first instance. The question is, in fact, involved in the explanations into which Mr. Gallatin has, at some length, entered respecting the conduct of the United States during the time that elapsed between the passing of the act of Parliament of July, 1825, and the issuing of the order in Council of July, 1826. To those explanations the undersigned will next briefly advert.

The effect of Mr. Gallatin's argument may, perhaps, be thus exhibited. Admitting that, after the British statute of July, 1825, was passed, the United States ought to have done certain acts to bring themselves within the benefit of that statute, yet the omission by the United States to do those acts was not (as the British Government supposed when it issued the order in Council of 1826) an advised and deliberate proceeding, but was the result of an erroneous impression respecting the views and intentions of the British Government; and hence there may appear some ground for a revision of the British order in Council, that measure having, in truth, been resorted to under the influence of a reciprocal mistake.

In commenting on this argument, it is not necessary to inquire whether, on the supposition that the error or inadvertence of the United States had been occasioned by some default on the part of the British Government, that Government would have been under an equitable obligation to reconsider the steps it has taken in ignorance of such error or inadvertence. There is no room for any such supposition.

Deeply as Great Britain must regret the misapprehensions, whatever they might be, under which the United States acted, she cannot, in justice, charge herself with having occasioned them. She cannot but think that a fair opportunity was afforded to the American Government and people to avail themselves, if they thought fit, of the provisions of the act of July, 1825; and the term of that option having expired, she cannot conceive herself called upon to retract, as a matter of course, the measures which, under the actual circumstances in which she found herself placed, she was led to adopt on a matter so peculiarly within her exclusive control as the trade of her own colonies.

It may be proper, however, to examine this subject a little more particularly. From the statement of Mr. Gallatin, it appears that the omission of the United States to comply with the conditions prescribed by the act of July, 1825, is resolvable into two causes: first, neither the Government nor the Congress rightly understood those conditions, the interpretation of which, indeed, is represented to be a matter of much difficulty. Secondly, the Government, and probably the Congress also, entertained an opinion that Great Britain did not mean to affect the United States by the act of July, 1825; but intended to arrange the intercourse of that county with the British colonies by negotiation.

Mr. Gallatin is also at pains, on this part of the subject, to explain the proceedings in the American House of Representatives respecting the bill for the repeal of the discriminating duties on goods imported in British vessels from the British colonies. The bill, he observes, was not, as Mr. Canning had supposed, rejected; it was, by a majority of two votes, ordered to lie on the table, which would not have the effect of preventing the House from proceeding with it on any future day; though, either on account of the lateness of the session or (what is more probable) from reliance on the successful issue of negotiations, the consideration of it was not in fact resumed.

To begin with the point last mentioned, Mr. Gallatin, on the nature and effect of the proceedings in the House of Representatives, is, of course, an authority beyond exception. Even on that authority, however, it appears that the bill in question was dropped deliberately; for it was disposed of after a keen contest, and was never revived—a mode of treating it which, judging from analogous proceedings in the legislative assemblies of this country, can hardly be regarded otherwise than as an effectual, though an indirect rejection.

But whatever construction may be put on the fate of that abortive measure, this, at least, may be asserted, that the Congress having, during a whole session, had the subject under consideration, designedly omitted to legislate in reference to the British act of July, 1825. The reasons assigned for that omission are next to be considered.

Mr. Gallatin very clearly states that the conditions on which it was intended by the act of July, 1825, to open the colonial trade to American vessels, were not distinctly understood in the United States; but what was the precise nature of the difficulty experienced in construing those conditions the undersigned has not been able to collect; for, with regard to the specific doubts which Mr. Gallatin mentions as attaching to the meaning of the act, these he seems to state rather as suggesting themselves to his own mind, on a view of the provisions of the act, than as the recorded grounds of the perplexity felt by the American Government or Legislature.

A full exposition of those doubts was in fact given by Mr. Gallatin in his note to Mr. Canning of the 28th of December, 1826, and that exposition is, by reference, embodied in the note now under consideration, of the 4th of June; in which last note Mr. Gallatin observes that no explanation in respect of those doubts has ever been given by his Majesty's Government.

The portion of the act to which the remarks of Mr. Gallatin apply is the condition on which the intercourse with the British colonies is opened to other countries possessing no colonies of their own, namely, that they shall place the commerce and navigation of this country and of its possessions abroad upon the footing of the most favored nations.

Without meaning to admit or to deny the justice of Mr. Gallatin's criticism on that clause, the undersigned bears a willing tribute to its force and ability; but the question after all is, whether the clause referred to threw such a practical difficulty in the way of American legislation on the subject as to account for the total inaction of the Congress of the United States? And to this question the last note of Mr. Gallatin (that is, the note of the 17th of August) presents a conclusive answer. It there appears that, notwithstanding those unexplained doubts, the American Government has found no difficulty in tendering to the British Government the passing of certain specific enactments by Congress as the condition contemplated by the act of July, 1825; that is, as the very condition which appeared so inexplicable.

Not only so, but it is observed in that note, as has already been mentioned, that, had it not been for Mr. Canning's declaration to the contrary effect, "the Government of the United States would have had no doubt that, upon the passage of an act of Congress of that tenor, the interdict laid on American shipping, under the act of Parliament of 1825, would be removed as a matter of course." It is unnecessary to remark that the conditions on which, under that act of Parliament, the interdict on American shipping would be revocable are the very conditions on which the act makes foreign shipping admissible to the British colonies; the passage, consequently, just cited from Mr. Gallatin, shows that, whatever doubts might attach to those conditions, on the principles of severe construction, they seemed to the Government of the United States so perfectly clear for all practical purposes as to be susceptible only of one interpretation.

Even admitting, however, up to any required extent, the difficulty of construing the act, still it seems not easy to account for the inaction of the American Legislature, and still less for that of the American Government. The Legislature might be unable to determine what was precisely meant by the condition of placing the shipping of Great Britain and her possessions abroad on the footing of the most favored nation; but there could be no doubt that the condition, in any construction of it, could never be fulfilled, so long as the discriminating duties remained unrepealed; that the abolition of those duties was, therefore, an essential term in the condition; and that this term could be applied only by an act of Congress. If, however, the Legislature could not thus proceed, at least the Government, which must have felt with it, had an effectual remedy for every difficulty—that of reference to Great Britain for explanation; and the undersigned is really at a loss to conceive why the whole session of 1825–'26 was suffered to pass away without any resort to an expedient so obvious and decisive.

Besides, however, the alleged ambiguity of the British enactment, there was a concurrent cause which prevented the Government and Legislature of the United States from taking any steps relating to it. They were satisfied that the British Government either considered the United States as exempt, or meant to take special means of exempting them from the operation of the enactment; and that the commercial relations between the United States and the British colonies were, after all, to be arranged by treaty and not by reciprocal laws.

The grounds on which this persuasion was entertained are very fully set forth and discussed in the correspondence between Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Canning; and the subject appears so nearly exhausted that the undersigned sees no occasion for entering into it at large.

It is, indeed, self-evident that the Government of the United States set out with a very mistaken opinion of the views of Great Britain respecting her colonies, and more especially respecting the importance to those colonies of a direct intercourse with the ports of the United States. This, at least, seems the only principle which would account for what is otherwise so difficult of explanation, namely, that from the very few and, at best, doubtful indications alluded to in the correspondence, the Government of the United States should not only have inferred intentions on the part of the British ministry, which, prima facie at least, were in direct contrariety to an elaborate act of Parliament recently introduced by that very ministry, but should have deduced such inference so confidently as to act upon it for months together implicitly, although, during all that period, it received no support or confirmation of any kind from the British Government, and, although it was more than once in official communication with the American Government, strongly discountenanced by the British minister at Washington.

The supposition entertained by the United States consisted of two alternative members; the first of which was, that the British Government did not mean so to construe the act of July, 1825, as to comprehend the United States within it at all: that is, in an act professedly regulating the intercourse of the British colonies with all foreign countries, the description, "countries not having colonial possessions," did not include the United States; although it is admitted that no other expression in the act can possibly apply to the United States; although this very negotiation proves the pre-eminent interest of the United States in the subject of the enactment, and although Mr. Gallatin himself observes that, "with the exception of some of the German States, the terms of the enactment apply to no other maritime Power."

But, if the act could not be so construed, then it was believed that the British Government must be intending to exclude the United States from the sphere of it by a special order in Council. This supposition is, indeed, less violent than the former, the enactment being expressly subject to the exception, "unless his Majesty, by his order in Council, shall in any case deem it expedient to grant the whole, or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the conditions aforesaid shall not, in all respects, be fulfilled by such foreign country."

Yet, surely, it was a little premature to assume that the British Government would gratuitously step forward to nullify the important rule which she had just enacted, in the very case to which (on this supposition) it pre-eminently applied; still more, that she should, without reason shown or asked, deviate from those principles of reciprocity for which she had been so strenuously contending, and deviate from them in the case of that very nation to which she had, in regard to those very principles, been making frequent and unsuccessful remonstrances. And most of all does it seem remarkable that this persuasion, adopted by Mr. Clay in December, 1825, when he felt satisfied that the expected order in Council was already on its way to America, should have been left wholly unshaken by the lapse of six months, during which no such order arrived, nor the remotest intimation of its being passed or intended.

It will not for a moment be imagined that, by these observations, the undersigned intends to cast any doubt on the explanation which has been given of the proceedings of the United States on the occasion alluded to, or to question the motives which dictated those proceedings. But he deems it due to his own country, due, indeed, to both the countries involved in these discussions, that each party should state its opinions and impressions with perfect frankness—a frankness, indeed, of which Mr. Gallatin himself has very honorably furnished an example, and which the undersigned deems not only consistent with friendly feelings, but even essential to a mutual good understanding and confidence. It is, then, in the judgment of the undersigned, important to show, and, with all proper deference, he conceives himself to have, in fact, shown, that the misapprehensions with regard to the views and intentions of Great Britain, by which the Government and the Legislature of the United States appear, in the present instance, to have been misled, were not warranted by any part of the conduct or the language of the British Government, and that this country, therefore, is not responsible for those misapprehensions, nor obliged, as of course, to reconsider any measures on her own part, or to repair any ill consequences on the part of others, to which they may have given rise.

And hence, the undersigned is naturally led to the third and only remaining topic of the present note.

Mr. Gallatin asks, whether, in the event of such a law as he describes being passed by Congress, the British Government would revoke the order in Council of the 27th of July, 1826, and adopt the other measures which he concurrently mentions?

The undersigned does full justice to the frank and friendly tone in which this inquiry is made; and he feels that the answer of the British Government ought, in the same proportion, to be explicit.

Without commenting on the particular provisions of the law which, according to the supposition of Mr. Gallatin, is to be enacted by Congress, it is proper to say that the British Government cannot prospectively commit itself to the adoption of any specific line of conduct, in the event of such law being enacted.

With whatever conformity to the suggestion of Mr. Gallatin the proposed law may, as to its general principles, be framed, still those general principles are liable to be accompanied by details which no anticipation can embrace.

Much, also, may turn on the position and circumstances both of this country, of the United States, and of the commercial commonwealth in general, at the time when such law shall come into effect. This last consideration is indeed conclusive, for it has relation to the very essence of the principles which the British Government entertains on the present subject. Strictly asserting her right to prohibit or to regulate the intercourse of foreigners with her colonies according to her conception of her own interests, and without explanation or apology to other States, it would be impossible for Great Britain, without a compromise of her principles, to pledge herself by advance, and with reference to circumstances yet unknown or partially foreseen, to the establishment of any particular system of policy in relation to such intercourse.

On another and distinct ground the mode of proceeding suggested by Mr. Gallatin seems liable to exception. In adjusting her colonial relations with foreigners, this country has preferred the method of municipal legislation to that treaty; and the United States have at length acquiesced in that preference, though not themselves approving it. The process recommended by Mr. Gallatin (and which, if adopted, must become a precedent) would seem to combine the disadvantages of both methods without proportionally securing the benefits of either. If the terms of colonial intercourse are to be adjusted by mutual laws, but those laws themselves are to be founded on informal agreements, previously entered into between the Governments, it is manifest that a course of proceeding is pursued which fully ensures neither the certainty and notoriety of international convention, nor the facility and independence of domestic legislation.

On the whole, his Majesty's ministers feel themselves under the necessity of declining to give the pledge invited by Mr. Gallatin; and this with no special or exclusive reference to the peculiar measure in question. Their resolution is the result of considerations general in their nature, and conclusive against a prospective pledge of any description respecting the colonial policy of Great Britain, whether of relaxation or restriction.

In the formation of this decision the undersigned is persuaded that it is unnecessary to disclaim the influence of any unfriendly feelings towards the United States. He can only repeat that the British Government cherishes for the United States sentiments only of sincere amity.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Gallatin the assurance of his high consideration.

DUDLEY.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Esq., &c., &c.

Mr. Gallatin to Lord Dudley.

UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, October 3, 1827.

The undersigned, minister of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to him on the first of this month by Lord Dudley, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in answer to the notes of the undersigned of the 4th of June and 17th of August last, on the subject of the colonial intercourse.

It is believed that Lord Dudley would, on a close examination of the measures which the President of the United States was willing to recommend to Congress, have been satisfied that those measures would not only have tended to relax, but would have altogether abrogated, all the restrictions imposed by the American Legislature on the colonial intercourse through the medium of British vessels.

The objection drawn from an anticipation of the details which might have accompanied the general principles of the proposed law would have been easily removed. And those that are suggested against the process recommended by the American Government seem less conclusive against it than supporting the preference which the United States had given to an arrangement by treaty.

But since his Majesty's ministers are of opinion that much may turn on the position and circumstances of Great Britain, of the United States, and of the commercial world in general, when such laws should come into effect; and since, in declining to give the pledge invited by the overture of America, they have explicitly declared that their resolution was the result of considerations general in their nature and conclusive against a prospective pledge of any description respecting the colonial policy of Great Britain, the undersigned, whose efforts to obtain a more favorable answer to the inquiry he had been directed to make have been unavailing, has no other duty to perform in that respect than to transmit to his Government the determination of that of Great Britain.

It is with regret that the undersigned finds that Lord Dudley, who had at first considered the note of the 4th of June as not calling for any reply, has now deemed it necessary to offer some comment on the explanations contained in that note of the conduct of the Government of the United States, in relation to the colonial intercourse, subsequent to the act of Parliament of July, 1825. He had designedly separated the explanations from the inquiry, and suffered more than two months to elapse between his two notes, in order to afford sufficient time for any reply which that of the 4th of June might require, and in order that (the discussion on the topics embraced by it being finally concluded) the proposal he had to make might be taken into consideration without any retrospect of antecedent circumstances and solely as a question of policy and mutual convenience. It is with unfeigned reluctance that he finds himself compelled again to revert to points already so much debated, and to take some notice of Lord Dudley's observations on explanations which it had been hoped would have been deemed satisfactory.

It is correctly stated that the reasons alleged by the United States for not having complied with the condition prescribed by the act of Parliament of July, 1825, were, first, because the opinion was entertained that it was still the intention of Great Britain that the intercourse should be arranged by negotiation; secondly, because it was not known whether the condition was rightly understood.

On the last point, Lord Dudley seems to think that the doubts which the undersigned had mentioned as attaching to the meaning of the act were rather the suggestions of his own mind than the recorded grounds of the perplexity felt by the American Government or Legislature: and he infers, from the specific proposal contained in the note of the undersigned of the 17th of August, and from an allusion to a declaration of Mr. Canning, that the condition in question had seemed to the Government of the United States so perfectly clear for all practical purposes as to be susceptible only of one interpretation.

The note of the undersigned, in which he tried to explain in what consisted the difficulty of understanding what was meant by the condition of the act of Parliament, is that of December 28, 1826; and that note was explicitly stated to be founded on "a despatch from the Secretary of State of the United States, the substance of which he was instructed to communicate to Mr. Canning." The statement of the doubts attaching to the meaning of the act, though varied in the expression, was, in substance, taken from that despatch; which, although it has not attracted the notice of Lord Dudley, was communicated to Congress, and republished in December or January last in several of the London newspapers.

But as, notwithstanding this, doubts may still be entertained respecting the recorded grounds of the perplexity felt on that subject by the American Government and Legislature during the session of 1825, 1826, the undersigned has the honor to enclose a copy of the report of the committee of the Senate, of March 31, 1826, to which he had already alluded in his note of 4th of June.

This document will satisfy Lord Dudley that the committee had under consideration the Baltimore memorial, requesting that British vessels, from whatever ports, might be admitted (in the ports of the United States) on the same terms as the vessels of the most favored nations; and that the committee's report against the prayer of the petitioners was founded on two reasons: First, that to admit British vessels indiscriminately, with their cargoes, from whencesoever arriving, or of whatsoever composed, on the same terms as vessels of the most favored nations, or, in other words, to comply with the condition of the act of Parliament, as understood by the committee, would operate as a surrender of the principle of equality, &c. Secondly, that a (corresponding) desire to arrange the colonial intercourse on a satisfactory footing appeared to exist on the part of the British Government, and that the negotiations respecting it were expected to come to a definitive issue before the next session of Congress.

To this day the Government of the United States are not sure that they understand precisely what was intended by the condition. Desirous as they were that their proposal should be accepted, they wished to present it in the most unexceptionable form; and if, instead of offering to comply with the act of Parliament, which certainly was the most simple proposition, and the most likely to be favorably received, a specific proposal has been made, it is, in fact, because it was thought unsafe to agree to terms not sufficiently understood, and which have not been explained.

It has been justly observed by Lord Dudley that the abolition of the discriminating duties must, under any construction of the act, have been an essential term in the condition. The undersigned, in his note of December 28, 1826, when observing that the words "commerce and navigation of this country" might have been intended to include only the circuitous intercourse, expressly stated what was true, that "this last interpretation had been suggested only by the observations that had occurred in the course of Mr. Canning's correspondence with him." Mr. Canning had limited his animadversions on the acts of the United States to two enactments only—the discriminating duties, and the restrictions on British vessels employed in what has been called the circuitous or indirect intercourse. The specific proposal made by the United States embraces those two objects. Having no other light but what was derived from the correspondence, they presume, without being certain that they were not mistaken, that it might be accepted as a fulfilment of the condition. The intimation that they would have considered the removal of the interdict as a matter of course had it not been for Mr. Canning's declaration, is clearly to be understood as founded on the supposition that they were not mistaken in the interpretation which, for the reasons that have been stated, they had ventured to give to the act of Parliament. But it cannot certainly be inferred that because, in framing a proposal and reasoning upon it, they have been induced to adopt or rather to assume a certain construction, they no longer have, much less that they never had, well-founded doubts on the meaning of the act.

It is rather remarkable that, after those doubts had been so explicitly stated in the note of December 28, 1826, to Mr. Canning, he did not even advert to that branch of the discussion in his reply of January 27, 1827; and still more so, that Lord Dudley, whilst commenting upon it, should have carefully avoided giving any explanation; and, on the contrary, should have distinctly said that he neither admitted nor denied that construction which the undersigned had suggested as being the literal, and which Lord Dudley designates as the severer interpretation of the act. The undersigned is at a loss how to account for the reluctance which seems to have been evinced of saying at once what was truly intended by the condition so often alluded to.

The final disposition of the bill which had been introduced for the repeal of the discriminating duties, even if considered as an absolute rejection, proves only that either it appeared to be unnecessary, as not fulfilling all the conditions required by the act of Parliament, or that the American Legislature relied on the issue of the expected negotiations.

If the Government of the United States did not apply to that of Great Britain for an explanation of the condition, it was partly because the distance between the two countries would have rendered such explanation unavailable in relation to any proceedings of Congress during the pending session, principally because entire reliance was placed on the issue of the negotiations, since the Cabinet of Washington had concluded to withdraw all the propositions which had heretofore prevented an arrangement.

The reasons why not the slightest apprehension was entertained of the determination of the British Government to consider this as no longer a fit subject for negotiations have been repeatedly stated.

At the conclusion of the conferences of the year 1824 between the plenipotentiaries of the two countries, the negotiations were expressly stated to be suspended by the necessity of referring to Washington on some of the subjects which had been discussed; and the plenipotentiaries parted under circumstances which prevented, for the present, any further progress in the negotiations.

Indeed, those which have been carried on between his Majesty's plenipotentiaries and the undersigned have been so clearly considered as being generally the continuation of the negotiations of 1824, that, at their first conference, and in relation to the subject first taken up, the British plenipotentiaries observed, "that a proposal of settlement on that subject having been offered on the part of Great Britain during the course of the negotiations in 1824, which proposal had been taken by the American plenipotentiary for reference to his Government, they presumed that Mr. Gallatin was prepared to give an answer to that or to offer some new proposal." And the American plenipotentiary did accordingly substitute another proposal for that which had been made by Mr. Rush in 1824.

There was, therefore, a perfect understanding between the two Governments in that respect. His Majesty's minister at Washington, in conformity with it, announced, in March, 1826, to the Government of the United States that his own was preparing to proceed in the important negotiations between the two countries; that a new plenipotentiary had been appointed on the part of Great Britain, and that the negotiations would, therefore, be forthwith resumed.

No exception had been made—none was at that time suggested to be intended on the part of Great Britain, with respect to the colonial intercourse.

Lord Dudley has taken no notice of the circumstances which so naturally induced the American Government to rely on the ensuing negotiation as the means of regulating the intercourse in a manner satisfactory and beneficial to both countries. But, referring to a letter of December, 1825, from Mr. Clay to a member of Congress, he has expressed his astonishment that it could have been supposed that the British Government did not mean so to construe the act of July, 1825, as to comprehend the United States within it; and that, if it had been at first presumed that they would be excepted by a special order in Council, that expectation should have been unshaken, when, after six months, no such order had been issued, nor any intimation given to that effect.

It has not been believed by the Government of the United States that, in case an arrangement was not made by treaty, they would, nevertheless, by special favor, be permanently exempted from the general operation of the act. But it was presumed that Great Britain, under the expectation of a favorable issue of the negotiations that were to be forthwith resumed, would suspend the operation of the act in regard to the United States until the result of those negotiations was ascertained. In what manner that suspension would be effected was not known.

Mr. Clay's letter is written entirely in that spirit. He did not believe that it was intended by the British Government that the act of July, 1825, should disturb the trade between the British colonies and the United States, first, and principally, because it would be inconsistent with negotiations between the two Governments contemplated, if not yet resumed. Had it not been that it had been announced by the authorities at Halifax that it was intended to close that port against American vessels, he would have been strongly inclined to think that the intercourse was intended to continue to be regulated by the former acts of Parliament. If the Halifax construction should prove to be correct, he was persuaded that an exception in favor of the American trade would be made by a special order in Council.

It is true that no such order was issued, and equally true that, after the lapse of a few weeks, neither Mr. Clay nor any other person in America expected that it would be issued. For, the Halifax construction having been abandoned, and that, as well as all the other British colonial ports, remaining open to American vessels after the day when the act of Parliament was to take effect, it was concluded, without further investigation, that that act was not intended, at least for a time, to operate on the United States. It has since been made known that the suspension, which in fact took place, was intended by Great Britain, not in reference to negotiation, but in order to ascertain the result of the proceedings in Congress.

Lord Dudley intimates that the Government of the United States set out with a very mistaken opinion of the views of Great Britain respecting her colonies, and more especially respecting the importance to those colonies of a direct intercourse with the ports of the United States; and he seems to think that this is the only principle which would account for some of the proceedings of that Government.

Coinciding entirely in Lord Dudley's opinion, that perfect frankness is not only consistent with friendly feelings, but even essential to a mutual good understanding and confidence, the undersigned will be as explicit on this as on any other subject.

The United States do not suppose the direct intercourse between their ports and the British colonies to be necessary to those colonies. They know that the British West Indies have been supplied by other means, and have not materially suffered during those periods when that intercourse was interrupted by war, or has been interdicted by the laws of the two countries.

But, though not necessary to either party, that commerce is known to be beneficial to both. The proof is found in the fact that it has always been carried on to a considerable extent whenever it has been permitted; that absolute prohibitions can alone stop it. That Great Britain thinks so herself cannot be denied. It is believed that, except when the two nations have unfortunately been at war, there has not, to this day, been any time at which the intercourse has not, with certain limitations, been allowed by her in British vessels.

There are not, perhaps, two countries, within the same distance from one another, and with such easy and prompt communications, which have products so essentially different as the West Indies and the United States. There are, therefore, not any between which commerce is more natural, and the exchange of their respective commodities more mutually beneficial. The laws which interdict such a course are an obvious and practical departure from those principles of free trade which, in other respects, are so ably upheld and vindicated.

It is not at all asserted that the injury arising from a suspension of that commerce is more heavily felt by one party than by the other. The American Government neither overrates the importance to the West Indies of the direct intercourse, nor denies its great utility to the United States. In both countries the planter or farmer is, by the suspension, deprived of one of the markets for his produce, and compelled to pay dearer for his supplies; and a positive evil is inflicted on both parties, without any visible advantage to either.

The right of Great Britain to regulate the intercourse with her colonies is not questioned; and it is not usual for nations to make any great sacrifice for the sake of asserting abstract principles which are not contested. She is, undoubtedly, the only proper judge of what should be her commercial policy. The undersigned has not been fortunate enough to be able to discover what actual advantages she derives from the measures in which she perseveres in regard to the colonial intercourse. He has apprehended that considerations foreign to the question might continue to oppose obstacles to a proper understanding. Nothing has been omitted to remove those which might have arisen from misconceptions of the views and proceedings of the American Government. It is gratifying to have received assurances that the decision of Great Britain was not influenced by any unfriendly feelings towards the United States. Their sentiments for Great Britain are those of amity and good will; and their Government is animated by a sincere desire to improve and strengthen the friendly relations of the two countries.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Lord Dudley the assurance of his high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Right Hon. EARL OF DUDLEY, &c., &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 17, 1827.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to transmit herewith to Mr. Vaughan, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to be communicated to the British Government, a copy of a proclamation issued by the President of the United States on this day, in pursuance of an act of Congress, of the 1st of March, 1823, by the effect of which the acts of Congress of the 18th day of April, 1818, and of the 15th day of May, 1820, copies of which accompany the proclamation, are revived.

It would have been much more in accordance with the wishes of the President if he had felt himself authorized to have announced, through the undersigned, a measure of a directly opposite tendency; but he was required, by the enactments of an existing law, to perform the duty of issuing the proclamation, in the contingency which has happened, of the British interdict to the admission of American vessels in British colonial ports. The President will, nevertheless, seize, with pleasure, any fit occasion that may hereafter arise for his concurrence in measures to put an end to a state of things which is believed to be prejudicial to the interests both of the United Kingdom and the United States, by opening the trade and intercourse with the British colonies upon just and reciprocal terms.

The undersigned has the satisfaction to transmit herewith to Mr. Vaughan, also to be communicated to the British Government, a copy of orders which have been issued from the Department of the Treasury for the government of the custom-house officers in the application of the above mentioned acts of Congress of 1818 and 1820 to British vessels which have arrived or may arrive in the ports of the United States, from the British colonies, between the first day of December last and the first day of July next. According to these orders—1st. All such vessels as shall have arrived before the date of the above proclamation will be allowed freely to depart with their cargoes. 2dly. All such as shall arrive between the date of the proclamation and the day of its reception, at the respective American ports, will also be allowed freely to depart; and, 3dly. Such as may arrive at any American port, between the day of the reception of the proclamation at such port and the first of July next, will be warned off, and allowed freely to depart, without discharging any portion of their cargoes; and the penalties and forfeitures of the acts will not be enforced against them, unless, after such warning, they should attempt to elude or violate the provisions of the laws.

The Government of his Britannic Majesty cannot fail to recognize in these orders a strong evidence of the friendly disposition of that of the United States, even where it has been compelled, in the protection and preservation of its own rights, to resort to a measure of necessary counteraction, to mitigate the effects of that measure, as much as possible, in its operation upon individual cases.

The undersigned requests that Mr. Vaughan will accept assurances of his high consideration.

H. CLAY.

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1827.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the Secretary of State of the United States, transmitting to him, for the information of his Majesty's Government, a copy of the proclamation, dated the 17th instant, issued by the President of the United States, in pursuance of an act of Congress of the 1st March, 1823; after which, the acts of Congress of the 18th April, 1818, and of the 15th May, 1820, are revived and in operation.

The undersigned will take the earliest opportunity of communicating the note of the Secretary of State to his Majesty's Government, and he will have great satisfaction in drawing its attention to the circular enclosed in it, which has been addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to the Collectors of Customs in the ports of this country, directing them in what manner they are to carry into effect the provisions of the acts of 1818 and 1820, as it at once removes all apprehension which might be entertained, upon reading the President's proclamation, that the penalties of the acts of 1818 and 1820, would be exacted immediately, and without further notice.

The undersigned requests that the Secretary of State will accept the assurances of his highest consideration.

CHA'S R. VAUGHAN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, &c., &c.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 490. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIM OF INDEMNITY FOR SPOLIATIONS BY SPAIN IN CASE OF JAMES RAY AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 6, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of James Ray and others, owners of the brig James Lawrence and her cargo, made the following report:

That the facts of the case are stated at length in the papers submitted by the memorialist, and in an extract from a letter from the minister of the United States at the Court of Madrid, communicated to this committee from the Department of State. Assuming these statements of the facts to be correct, the Committee on Foreign Affairs deem it their duty to express the opinion that the circumstances of the capture, detention, and condemnation of the property in question, form a very strongly marked case of violation of neutral rights, and infraction of the law of nations, not less offensive to the honor of the country than injurious to the immediate sufferers. It is known to the House that this is one among several other cases of spoliation for which redress has long, urgently, and, hitherto, ineffectually, been demanded of the Government of Spain by that of the United States. The papers herewith submitted will recall to the recollection of the House the doings of the other branch of the Legislature, and a report of the Secretary of State, in the case of the James Lawrence, more than three years ago; and the extract from the letter of our minister at Madrid, already mentioned, will show the earnestness with which it continues to be pressed upon the Government of Spain. The fact alluded to in this letter, that a convention has long since been entered into between the Governments of Spain and Great Britain, for the purpose of securing an indemnity to the subjects of Great Britain for similar injuries, will no doubt present to the House, in a grave aspect, the continued neglect of Spain to render to the United States the same measure of consideration, and to their citizens the same measure of justice which she has accorded to the Government and subjects of another country. What measures the House may think it necessary to adopt, in view of the whole case, it can only judge by an examination of the correspondence between the two Governments on the subject. Not being prepared to recommend any specific measure in reference to the single case of the memorialist, the committee submit the following resolution for the adoption of the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of James Ray and others; and that the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House (if the public interest will permit) a copy of the correspondence between the minister of the United States at the Court of Madrid and the Government of Spain on the subject of the claims of citizens of the United States against the said Government.

IN SENATE, Thursday, February 3, 1825.

The President communicated to the Senate the following report from the Secretary of State, on the memorial of James Ray and others, which was read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 2, 1825.

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the Senate of the United States, the memorial of James Ray and others, owners of the brig James Lawrence and cargo, captured by a Spanish privateer and carried into St. John's, Porto Rico, praying the interposition of Government, with the documents accompanying the same, was referred, to consider and report thereon, has the honor of reporting, that the case of the James Lawrence is one of those flagrant outrages upon the property of the citizens of the United States upon which the Government of the United States have for the last three years constantly applied, near the Spanish authorities, exertions for reparation equally strenuous and unavailing. That the capture, in the first instance, was illegal, and that the proceedings of the Court of Appeals, condemning the property, were irregular, cannot be doubted. A last appeal to the justice of his Catholic Majesty at Madrid is all that remains practicable in this case short of a measure which, by authorizing reprisals, would assume upon the United States themselves the task of dispensing to their citizens that justice which has hitherto been sought from the Spanish authorities in vain.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Everett, Minister at Madrid, to David Lewis, Esq., President of the Phœnix Insurance Company at Philadelphia.

SIR: Your letter of 15th of September, enclosing the power of attorney requested in mine of 13th May, was duly received, and the document was found to be in proper form. Some circumstances have since occurred which have created a new delay in the progress of the case, and may, perhaps, make you think it expedient to abandon it entirely. The Council of War, which takes cognizance of appeals from the court at Havana, where the cause was last tried, decided that the copies of the proceedings which were transmitted in the first instance were not sufficient, and that the original record must be brought up. An order of court to this effect was accordingly despatched by the agent employed here to his correspondent at the Havana, Mr. William Murphy, about the time I wrote you last. An answer has just been received, under date 18th November, in which the writer states that the original record cannot be sent up until the cost of the last trial shall have been satisfied, which amounts, as he says, to $2,371. I did not feel myself at liberty to advance so large a sum as this without reference to you, and the proceedings are consequently now in suspense. If you think proper to go on, the shortest course would be to send directly to the Havana and order the necessary steps to be taken without delay. Mr. Murphy has the order of court, and, should he have occasion to be absent, will leave it in the hands of Don Diego Montalbo, of Castella. The agent here speaks pretty favorably of the probable success of the appeal, which, however, like all other proceedings in this country, will certainly occupy a good deal of time. You will, of course, decide for yourself how far it may be prudent to incur the new expense that now appears to be necessary. I would, however, take the liberty of suggesting whether it would not be expedient to ascertain, before you proceed any further, whether the adverse party is solvent; should not this be the case, the expense, which cannot fail to be considerable, will be a clear and gratuitous loss.

I am, sir, with much respect, your very faithful and obedient servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

MAY 10, 1827.

DEAR SIR: I hand you annexed a copy of a letter received yesterday through the Department of State from Alexander Everett, Esq., at Madrid. The contents of this letter were very unexpected to our company. They are at a loss what to decide on, and we wish much to know your opinion of the matter, and whether or not it would be advisable to pay so large a sum on an uncertainty, or to relinquish the claim altogether.

Your reply will oblige your obedient servant,

DAVID LEWIS, President.

JAMES RAY, Esq., near Newark, Delaware.

Copy of a letter from Thomas Randall, Esq., dated

WASHINGTON, July 10, 1827.

DEAR SIR: It was with great sensibility and regret that I read your letter of 29th ultimo (postmarked 4th instant) containing the afflicting intelligence of the loss of your son, and my friend Edmund. This was entirely sudden and unexpected to me, as I had just returned, after a long absence, having been three months in Florida. I most sincerely condole with you on this most distressing calamity, which has excited the liveliest grief on my part. May it not, however, be otherwise? It appears your information is only negative, from not having heard of the vessel. May not some accident short of a total loss have induced this long silence? Pardon me, sir, if, rather than make up my mind to so afflicting a bereavement, I resort to the devices of ingenuity for some possible escape. But, sir, without any further attempt at consolation at this moment, when I fear it would be vain and ill-timed, permit me to reply to the inquiries in your letter. Immediately on the receipt of your letter I began to tax my recollection, and to examine my minutes and journal for the particulars you inquire about. In this examination I found the copy of a letter written by me to Mr. Brent, of the Department of State, sometime in December, 1824, in answer to a query similar to yours, and which I would now send you but that I yesterday left it in the State Department. That letter, however, states, in substance, that, immediately on the reversal of the decree of restitution by the "Junta of Marine" of the Havana, your son applied for, and was allowed, an appeal to the King in council. This occurred sometime in September, but it was not till about 8th November, 1824, that the preliminary matters were adjusted by your son, and, as we supposed, everything arranged by him and every step taken which it was incumbent on the appellants to take. In the interval every impediment and difficulty was thrown in his way, and the most grievous exactions attempted, with the view, as I conceived, of depriving him of benefit of the appeal.

I have noted in my journal that your son obtained a copy of the proceedings duly certified, and for which he paid fully; as, also, that, by the order of court, a copy (or the original papers) was to be sent by a King's packet to Spain from Havana. With respect, however, to the fact of any pecuniary demand on the appellants still subsisting, my information originally was not so very ample, nor is my recollection very distinct. I know that the most extravagant demands were made on your son, some of which he paid, and that, finally, by advice of his counsel, and from the necessity of the case, he made a "suggestion of insolvency," conformably with the provision of the Spanish law, the effect of which, if proved, (as in this case I know it was,) was to relieve the appellants from further pecuniary demands, and to entitle them to the benefit of the appeal without further cost. Now, that it was the duty of the appellants to have the documents sent on to Spain, and at their cost, I do not believe; for the very design of the court seemed to be not to give the control of the papers to either side, and the very object of the "suggestion of insolvency" was to acquit the party of further costs.

Immediately on the receipt of your letter I submitted it to Mr. Brent, who (in the absence of Mr. Clay) promised to take the necessary orders on the subject, and to write at once to Mr. Everett. You were informed by Mr. Brent, some time ago, that, up to July, 1826, (I think,) nothing had been written by Mr. Everett respecting the James Lawrence. His subsequent correspondence was not in the office, so that I could not learn if he had since written on the subject. Mr. Brent will, however, inform you.

Though grieved and indignant at the treatment you have received from the Spanish authorities and courts, I must confess I am not at all surprised, having, in my letters to Government, anticipated this course. It is precisely the course pursued in the case of Mr. Hollins, of Baltimore, a transaction referred to me in Havana.

How far our Government will interfere it is not for me to say; that they have not spoken authoritatively to Spain on the matter I presume is owing to the fact that the matter is still of judicial cognizance, and that the rules of international law presuppose and require the utmost faith and confidence in the purity and justice of those tribunals. Unfortunately, Spanish courts are not worthy of this confidence; and a corresponding change should, in my opinion, be made in the character of our intercourse with them.

I beg you will excuse this hasty letter, which I thought better to write at once, on the eve of my departure from this place, than to delay until I had more time. Wishing you a speedy relief under your present afflictions, I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS RANDALL.

JAMES RAY, Esq.

The honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of James Ray, owner of the brig James Lawrence, and others, the shippers, with himself, of the cargo, most respectfully showeth:

That in the month of January, 1824, the said brig and cargo, having been captured by a Spanish privateer, were carried into St. John's, Porto Rico, where she was cleared; and the captors, on appealing to the court at Principe, in the island of Cuba, were put under surety in $60,000, to appear there and prosecute said appeal; that your memorialist was obliged to send a vessel thither, at a very heavy expense, with his son, who had also to be paid, to attend to the said appeal; but, while the appeal was depending, the King being restored to his former power, the case, at the instance of the captors, was transferred to the Marine Court at the Havana, without any notice being given to your memorialist, and without being allowed any costs, and whither, at a further enormous charge, your memorialist was under the necessity of again sending his son; and whither the President of the United States had likewise despatched Thomas Randall, Esq., as agent, to demand justice and redress for himself and other claimants from the Spanish authorities at the Havana. But, instead of receiving any restitution of his property, notwithstanding every exertion of your memorialist's counsel, and in spite and defiance of the remonstrances of the agent of the United States, the said court, in violation of the law of nations, and of all right and justice, condemned the cargo and vessel as good prize to the captors, although they had cleared and ordered restitution of the property of the other American claimants in precisely the same circumstances. And your memorialist says it was notorious at the Havana that a majority of the judges of the said court had been bribed by the agent of the captors to give the said decree.

Your memorialist says that his son prayed an appeal from the said judgment to Madrid; that at first the appeal was refused, but at length granted, after every delay, vexation, and extortion that could be devised had been thrown in the way And your memorialist craves leave to annex a copy of a letter from Thomas Randall, Esq., to him, under date the 10th July, 1827, to show the appeal had been duly granted, and to prove that not the shadow of dependence could be placed in the justice of the Spanish courts.

Your memorialist further states that, on his son's arrival in the United States, who came in company with Mr. Randall, so perfectly satisfied were both of them that the appeal had been duly taken out, that your memorialist and the shippers, in the month of January, 1825, feeling themselves to have been greatly aggrieved by this decision of the court at the Havana, to whom the only question left to them to decide by the captors and court at Porto Rico was as it respected the proof that the goods taken were American property, which the said court at the Havana admitted was fully proved; that they presented a memorial to the then Congress, detailing the circumstances of the capture, with the downright robbery of their property, and praying that the strong arm of Government might be extended to force the Spanish authorities to restore it; that, in each House, respectively, this memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and that the committee of the Senate, having called on the Secretary of State to report on the said memorial, the Secretary, on the 2d of February, 1825, made a report, whereby the injustice and illegality of the capture, and the irregularity of the proceedings of the Court of Appeals at Havana, were explicitly admitted; and that, as this was an atrocious case, nothing short of reprisal was left but a last appeal to the justice of his Catholic Majesty at Madrid.

To meet this recommendation of the Secretary of State, Judge Hemphill, then a member of the House from Pennsylvania, wrote to Mr. Lewis, the President of the Phœnix Insurance Company at Philadelphia, that the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations had acquainted him that we must first pursue the appeal. And this memorialist says the late N. Vandyke, Esq., told this memorialist the same thing; and that, in consequence, your memorialist applied to the Secretary of State to direct the minister at Madrid, from the then troubled state of Spain, to receive the appeal, and have it filed under his directions, and prosecuted to a decision without any expense to the United States. By a letter from Mr. Everett to Mr. Lewis, the President of the Phœnix Company, it appears the appeal was filed; but the Board of War, who took cognizance of the case, not having received the original papers from Havana, they were written for, and an answer was returned they would not be sent till the sum of $2,375 was first paid; and, as your memorialist's son had been lost at sea, he applied to Mr. Randall for information, from whose letter, before filed, it will plainly appear this demand has been set up after your memorialist's son had left the Havana, with certified copies of the papers for the appeal in his possession; and that it is a pretext set up purposely to prevent any appeal being had at all. For, if the terms for granting the appeal had not been complied with, the case must have been dismissed in favor of the captors; but, as it is kept on the docket of the court, it must evidently follow the appeal had been duly taken out; but, by this juggling in the court at the Havana, the Court at Madrid will never proceed at all, and thus will end the last appeal to his Catholic Majesty's justice.

Your memorialist conceives, from the tenor of Mr. Everett's letter, that, notwithstanding the report made by the Secretary of State, and notwithstanding the evident views of the Spanish authorities with the appeal, he had not made any remonstrance to the King at Madrid on the capture of your memorialist's property, or on the indignity and contempt with which their endeavors to obtain redress by this appeal had been treated; but they conceive it was his duty to have done so, and they believe such to have been the intention of the Legislature. And as it is now evident they can have no other resource but in the protection of their country, they pray that Congress will be pleased to authorize the Executive to adopt such steps as will force the Spanish Government to direct restitution of your memorialist's property, so long unjustly seized contrary to the law of nations; and which, in fact, was nothing less than direct piracy, equally derogatory to the rights as to the honor of the United States. And your memorialist will ever pray, &c.

JAMES RAY,
For himself and the rest of the Shippers.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 5, 1828.

SIR: In compliance with the wish of the committee, as signified in your letter to the Secretary, dated the 29th of last month, I have the honor, in his absence, to transmit to you the extract enclosed of the last note which appears to have been written by the minister of the United States at Madrid to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of his Catholic Majesty, upon the subject of the claim of James Ray and others on the Spanish Government, in the case of the brig James Lawrence and cargo, illegally taken, as is stated, and condemned under Spanish authority, which will serve to show to the committee the then state of that claim.

Neither at the date of Mr. Everett's despatch to this Department, February 21, 1828, communicating a copy of his note to Mr. Salmon, nor at that of his last communication, had he received an answer to his note from the Spanish Government.

I am, with perfect respect, sir, your obedient, humble servant,

DANIEL BRENT.

EDWARD EVERETT, Esq.,
Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, H. R.

Extract of a note from Mr. Alexander H. Everett, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in Madrid, to Don Miguel Gonzalez Salmon, Principal Secretary of State, dated Madrid, February 13, 1828.

"The brig James Lawrence, belonging to James Ray, a citizen of the United States, residing at Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, sailed from the port of Philadelphia on the 14th of December, 1822, for Laguayra, where she arrived early in the following month. She entered the port without interruption from any quarter; and, having taken on board a cargo consisting of coffee, cocoa, and other articles, consigned and belonging to citizens of the United States, sailed from Laguayra on the 16th of February, 1823, for Philadelphia. On the day succeeding she was captured by the Spanish privateer Esperanza, and ordered for St. John's, Puerto Rico, where she arrived on the 27th of the same month. She was here libelled before the Admiralty Court on the charge of having on board property belonging to the enemies of Spain. Upon this charge only the trial came on. On the 7th of March following a decree was made by which the cargo was condemned as enemies' property, and the ship acquitted. The master of the brig immediately applied for a new trial, which he obtained; and in the course of which he succeeded in proving to the satisfaction of the court that the cargo belonged wholly to citizens of the United States, and that the captors had taken from him and secreted his papers in order to prevent him from establishing this fact upon the former trial. The court, after this second hearing, and on the 7th of April following, reversed the former sentence, and condemned the captors to pay a fine of two hundred ducats for their fraudulent proceedings in regard to the papers.

The captors, however, not deterred by this check from pursuing their purpose, appealed from this sentence to the Supreme Audiencia, which sets at Principe, in the island of Cuba, and were ordered by the judge to give security in the sum of 62,010 dollars that they would obtain a reversal of the sentence within eight months from the 16th of August, the day on which the security was given. The captors, it appears, retained possession of the cargo; and the appeal, like the original libel, alleged no other cause of action against the brig or her cargo, excepting that the latter was enemies' property. Nothing was said of blockades or of interdicted trade; and it is evident that neither of these pretences had then been thought of, since on these grounds the ship would have been equally liable to confiscation with the cargo.

The master of the vessel arrived at Principe on the 2d of December, 1823, for the purpose of answering the appeal. The captors, however, did not appear; and, after waiting until the limited time of eight months had expired, the master obtained from the court a certificate of their default, and departed.

Here, according to all the ordinary principles of proceeding in such affairs, the case was closed forever, and in favor of the vessel. The captors, by failing to sustain their appeal, had forfeited the security which they had given at St. John's, and nothing remained but for the court to order the payment of it for the benefit of the owners. In the meantime, however, the court at St. John's had instituted a new series of proceedings in the same case, entirely at variance with their own previous acts, and in open violation of all the rules of law and justice. After granting to the captors, in the manner which I have described, an appeal to the Supreme Court at Principe, of which appeal the owners had received due notice, and to which they appeared, the Judge of Admiralty at St. John's, upon a subsequent application of the captors to have the place of hearing the appeal changed, granted their request, and ordered the case to be tried before the Marine Court or Junta sitting at the Havana. The owners received no notice, either of the application for a change in the Court of Appeals, or of the granting of that application; and learned the facts only in a private manner. This circumstance alone stamps the subsequent condemnation with the character of complete illegality; but this was not the only one of the same description. The appeal was to have been prosecuted within eight months, commencing on the 16th of August, 1823. The appellants did not appear until the 16th of May following, a month after the limited time had expired; but, although the owners who had received private information of the change in the court, and had an agent present, represented that the captors were not in time, the objection was overruled and the cause tried. Finally, by an act of injustice still more open and glaring, if possible, than either of the others, the court, on the 17th of September, 1824, reversed the former sentence, and condemned the ship and cargo, not as enemies' property, the charge upon which they had been tried, but, incredible as it may appear, for a wholly different one—that of trading with a blockaded port. Thus the property of the owners was taken from them under pretext of an offence, not only in itself entirely imaginary and groundless, but which had never been imputed to them up to the moment of the decision; against which they had had no opportunity to defend themselves; and of which the court had, of course, under the circumstances, no more right to declare them guilty than of treason, murder, or any other crime entirely foreign to the nature of the case and the previous course of the proceedings.

Such were the forms observed in the trial and condemnation of this vessel and her cargo; or rather such was the contempt which the court exhibited for all the forms usually observed on similar occasions in civilized countries. In order to found a just claim upon the Spanish Government for indemnity on account of the loss occasioned by these proceedings, it is wholly unnecessary, as your excellency must perceive, to inquire into the legality of the blockade, under pretext of violating which the vessel was finally condemned. Supposing her to have violated a regular blockade, it was the duty of the captors to prove the fact against her in a legal way; and, if this was not done, the condemnation was equally injurious, whether the offence charged were real or imaginary. In this case there had been four or five successive irregularities in the proceedings, any one of which was sufficient to invalidate the sentence, and entitle the owners to indemnity. It is believed by the Government of the United States that most, if not all, the other cases are in this respect similar to that of the James Lawrence; and it is very doubtful whether it would be necessary for the decision of any of them, even to raise the question how far the blockade of the coasts of the Spanish Main declared by General Morales was entitled to the respect of neutral Governments.

Should it, however, be necessary to examine this question, it is not apprehended by the Government of the United States that there could arise any material difference of opinion respecting it between the two Powers. The principles of national law which regulate the subject of blockades are perfectly well known and generally acknowledged; nor is it understood that it is the wish or intention of the Spanish Government to set up new ones. The most important of these were too openly violated in the case of the pretended blockade of General Morales to leave room even for an argument in favor of its legality. A blockade, in order to be legal, must be publicly declared by the Government of some belligerent Power, and formally notified under the authority of such Government to those of neutrals. The pretended blockade in question was never declared or notified to neutral Governments by that of Spain. This defect alone was sufficient to deprive it of all pretensions to a regular character. Secondly. A blockade having been regularly declared and notified, must, in the next place, in order to be entitled to respect, be duly enforced; that is, a sufficient naval armament, consisting of at least one or two ships of war, must be actually stationed at the entrance of the port which it is intended to close. But it is perfectly notorious that the Spanish authorities had not, at the time in question, above one or two armed ships in the whole extent of the Gulf of Mexico, and that these were not stationed at the entrance of any one particular harbor. The pretended blockade, therefore, as it was never either regularly declared or notified, was also never for a moment, or at any point regularly enforced, and was, of course, destitute of every appearance of a legal character. It seems to have been intended by General Morales as an imitation, in a small way, upon his own authority, of the extravagant pretensions advanced by some of the great maritime Powers during the late European wars, and, had it not been made a pretext for the wanton and cruel spoliation of many innocent individuals, would have been a fit subject for derision, rather than respect or observance.

The principles and facts which I have here stated in regard to the blockade by General Morales are of course familiar to the Spanish Government, which is too just and enlightened not to acquiesce in the conclusion which has been drawn from them by that of the United States. There is, indeed, the less reason for insisting at great length upon this point, that it may not only probably not come up in the course of the negotiation, but that the blockade was revoked by the King himself, under circumstances amounting to an admission of its illegality. By his decree of December 21, 1822, his Majesty raised the blockade, in compliance, as is expressly stated, with the representations of the neutral Powers who had suffered by its operation, and recognized the liberty of neutral trade with the independent provinces, under the usual exception of articles contraband of war. At about the same time a convention of mutual indemnities was concluded by his Majesty with the British Government, the principal object of which is understood to have been to provide for making compensation to British subjects whose property had been seized and condemned under pretext of the blockade in question. These proceedings amount to disavowal of it, and are considered by the Government of the United States as affording a precedent which entitles them (independently of the essential justice of their claims) to expect a similar arrangement in behalf of their fellow-citizens. In regard to this subject your excellency remarks, in the note before me, that the convention with Great Britain now alluded to was concluded by his Majesty's Government during the period of the constitution, and is therefore to be viewed as null and void, and as not furnishing a precedent for similar proceedings towards other Powers. I must be allowed to express my surprise that your excellency should consider such an explanation as likely to be satisfactory to the President and Congress of the United States, since you cannot suppose them to be uninformed that one of his Majesty's earliest acts, after the overthrow of the constitution, was the formal confirmation of the convention alluded to; that its preliminary provisions were immediately carried into effect, by the appointment of Commissioners on both sides to liquidate the respective claims of the contracting parties; and that negotiations for the adjustment of difficulties that occurred in the course of the proceedings have been repeatedly resumed, and are, at this moment, actually in progress at London. All these subsequent acts performed since his Majesty's recovery of his absolute power, and when he has been, as your excellency remarks, at the head of a legal and circumspect administration, are so many confirmations of the justice of the original convention, and so many new admissions of the illegality of the captures for which it was intended to afford compensation. It is impossible for the Government of the United States not to consider these proceedings towards another nation under circumstances precisely similar, as greatly strengthening their essentially rightful claim to the same measure of justice.

In the case of the James Lawrence, of which I have taken the liberty to give your excellency an account in detail, there was this additional irregularity and injustice in the proceedings of the court, that the pretended blockade, for a violation of which the vessel was condemned, had been formally revoked by the King and declared by the Spanish authorities in the West Indies to be no longer in force before the time of her capture. The decree of revocation was brought out to Puerto Rico by a British frigate; and it was declared by the authorities of that island, upon the reception of it, that it was to be considered as taking effect from the day of its date, which, as I stated above, was December 21, 1822. Two or three vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, which had been condemned for breaking the supposed blockade at periods subsequent to that date, were accordingly restored at once. The James Lawrence was then on trial before the Admiralty Court at St. John's, but not being charged, as I have already observed, with a breach of the blockade, she could not take advantage of the decree of revocation. When the case was brought by appeal before the Marine Junta at the Havana, in the way I have described, that tribunal, with the same open disregard for the forms and principles of justice which had marked every stage of their proceedings, declared the blockade to be in force, notwithstanding the King's decree by which it was revoked. The pretence alleged was, that the decree did not take effect until it had been published by General Morales, which was not until the 8th March, 1823; as if the court could be supposed to be ignorant that notifications of the commencement and termination of blockades are regularly made by Governments to each other, through the medium of their ministers of State, and in that way only; or as if the attestation of General Morales, a personage unknown to foreign Powers, could add any weight to that of the Secretary of State, whose official character they were authorized and bound to acknowledge. It was in vain that these considerations, however obvious, were urged upon the attention of the Marine Junta. It was in vain that their own official counsellor, the Oidor of Marine, advised them strongly to confirm the decree of the Judge of Admiralty at St. John's, Porto Rico, and acquit the vessel, assuring them that the port of Laguayra was not in a state of blockade when she entered it. In vain did two of the most respectable members of the junta express the same opinion. The majority were bent upon their purpose, and the James Lawrence was finally condemned.

It only remained for the court, in order to fill up the measure of their iniquities, to attempt to deprive the owners of the advantage of an appeal, which they did, and with success. The owners were entitled by law, to an appeal to the Supreme Courts sitting at this place, without giving security to the captors; but the junta refused to allow them this privilege, and compelled them to enter into bonds to indemnify the captors in the event of failure, for all the damages which they might suffer by the further prosecution of the cause. The Oidor again interposed and assured the court that their proceedings were illegal; and the court a second time set at defiance the advice of their own official counsellor. The owners, meanwhile, being unable, in the state of impoverishment to which they had been reduced by the loss of their ship and cargo, to pay the enormous costs and furnish the large security which was so unjustly required, were compelled to abandon their appeal and throw themselves upon the protection of their own Government.

Such, sir, are the circumstances in detail of one of the cases of spoliation in which the claims of the United States are founded. They will serve to give you an idea of the general complexion of the rest, and will enable his Majesty's Government to judge how far the reasons assigned in your excellency's note for refusing to accede to the propositions of the United States can be regarded as satisfactory. You will perceive that the general question of the King's right to interdict the trade with the colonies is not in any way involved in the merits of the case which rest upon the gross and repeated irregularities in the forms of the proceedings. You will perceive, in this case, that the ship was captured, in the first instance, in the most vexatious manner, and brought to trial upon a charge for which there was not a shadow of foundation, under circumstances of fraud and oppression on the part of the captors, which called forth the animadversion of the court itself; that having obtained an acquittal with costs and damages, the owners were again brought to trial, and, without notice, condemned for an offence with which they were not charged; condemned for breaking a blockade which had been revoked before they left the United States; and, finally, deprived of their right of appeal; while the captors, whose conduct had been from the beginning fraudulent and vexatious, and had been recognized and punished as such by the court itself, were treated at every subsequent stage of the process with illegal indulgence. In all these proceedings there is no question concerning general or disputed principles of public law. When the Spanish Government refuse to grant satisfaction in cases of this kind, on the ground that the King has a right to interdict trade with his colonies, it can only be because they have somewhat hastily prejudged, upon a mere proposal to negotiate, the merits of claims, concerning which they could have, and had, in fact, no correct information in detail. Without contesting the King's right to interdict trade with his colonies, it is equally certain that neutrals, when captured by Spanish privateers, have a right to a fair trial; and that if they be deprived of their property without it, they have a right to claim compensation of the Spanish Government. Such is the character of the greater part, and probably of the whole of the claims now presented by the United States.

Your excellency will not consider it unnatural that acts of injustice so glaring as those which I have now detailed, committed in time of profound peace by the agents of a professedly friendly Power, in the neighborhood and almost within view of the coast of the United States, upon their unoffending citizens, should have excited a strong sentiment of indignation and alarm throughout the country. As an evidence of the character and degree of this feeling, I take the liberty of informing your excellency of the proceedings that took place in regard to the same case of the James Lawrence, of which I have stated the details above. The parties interested in this vessel addressed a memorial to the Senate of the United States, representing the injuries they had suffered from the Spanish authorities, which was referred by the Senate to the Secretary of State, (now President of the United States,) who made thereupon the following report:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 2, 1825.

"The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the Senate of the United States, was referred the memorial of James Ray and others, owners of the brig James Lawrence and cargo, captured by a Spanish privateer and carried into St. John's, Puerto Rico, praying the interposition of the Government, with the documents accompanying the same, to consider and report thereon, has the honor of reporting:

"That the case of the James Lawrence is one of those of flagrant outrage upon the property of the citizens of the United States, upon which the Executive Government of the United States have, for the last three years, constantly applied, near the Spanish authorities, exertions for reparation equally strenuous and unavailing. That the capture, in the first instance, was illegal, and that the proceedings of the Court of Appeal, condemning the property, were irregular, cannot be doubted. A last appeal to the justice of his Catholic Majesty is all that remains practicable in this case short of measures which, by authorizing reprisals, would assume upon the United States themselves the task of dispensing to their citizens that justice which has hitherto been sought from the Spanish authorities in vain."

With this last appeal, having been nominated by the President of the United States their minister at this Court a few weeks after the above report was made, I had the honor to be entrusted, and have now been urging it with unremitted assiduity for nearly three years more.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of James Ray, in behalf of himself and the other shippers on the brig James Lawrence, bound from Laguayra to Philadelphia, captured by a Spanish privateer, and carried into St. John's, Porto Rico, respectfully represents: That your memorialist, owner of the said brig and part of the cargo, hath already memorialized your honorable House on the great and manifest injustice practiced towards them by the Spanish tribunal at the Havana, in altering and falsifying the records of the said court, after your memorialists had appealed from its decision, and after transcripts of the judgment had been taken out and granted them to prosecute the said appeal at Madrid; and, in support of the said memorial, had laid before your honorable House a letter from Judge Randall, of Florida, who had been agent of the United States at Havana at the time the appeal was sued forth; and having, within a day or two, received a certificate from John Mountain, Esq., late vice consul at the Havana, and Thomas Bradun, a respectable merchant at Wilmington, Delaware, detailing facts which fully prove the allegations contained in the said memorial, and show the statement made by Judge Randall to be entirely correct, your memorialists respectfully beg leave to lay them before your honorable body, and again reiterate their prayer to be protected against the piracy and robbery of their property by the Spanish authorities; and, as in duty bound, they will ever pray, &c., &c.

JAMES RAY, in behalf of himself and the rest of the shippers.

[Duplicate.]

I, John Mountain, late vice agent for American commerce and seamen at the city of Havana, in the island of Cuba, do hereby certify that Mr. Edmund Ray did visit the said city of Havana, in the summer of 1824, and appeared clothed with competent powers, as agent for the owners and underwriters, (in the absence of Captain Green,) to defend an appeal made by the captors of the brig James Lawrence, from the court or tribunal of Porto Rico, to which port the said brig was taken, when made a prize, and at which place, by the competent authorities, was given up to the owners, deeming the capture to be illegal; and that the captors were held to bail for amount, cargo, and damages awarded by said court at Porto Rico; from which decision the captors appealed to the higher court then held, in 1824, at the said city of Havana; that it did appear that through some management the court or tribunal at Havana did reverse the decree given in the case at Porto Rico, and at the same time demanded the expenses incurred in the case, amounting to a large sum of money, which demand Mr. Ray refused to pay, alleging that he was, in fact, a sub-agent, and acting by authority emanating from the owners and underwriters of said brig and cargo, in the absence of Captain Green, the legal and lawful agent of the said concern at the time of the capture, and as such was recognized by the court at Porto Rico; and, inasmuch as the said Captain Green was now insolvent and unable to pay anything, to which good and sufficient proof was made to the court, as it appeared was required; which plea, according to common usage in Spanish law, was admitted; and upon which Mr. Ray did direct that an appeal be made from the decision of court or tribunal at Havana to the Superior Court at Madrid; which request was granted Mr. Ray, with a decree that the original proceedings in the different courts held in the case should be forwarded to Madrid by the first King's courier; and at the same time did order and direct that the parties respectively should have twelve months to appear, either in person or by representatives, at the said court at Madrid, there to await the decision of his Majesty's court in the case.

JOHN MOUNTAIN.

WILMINGTON, December 31, 1827.

I, Thomas Bradun, of Wilmington, Delaware, merchant, do hereby certify and attest that I was in the city of Havana in the summer of 1824, where I met my friend, Mr. Edmund Ray, who appeared to be defending an appeal then making by the captors of the brig James Lawrence, which vessel and cargo, as it did appear, had been taken into the island of Porto Rico, where she, with her cargo, it had been decreed were illegally held; and, as I understood, the vessel was, by the legal authorities of Porto Rico, given up, and the captors held to bail for amount of cargo, with the damages allowed by the court; that the tribunal at Havana by some means reversed the decree made at Porto Rico; upon which a demand was made upon Mr. Ray for expenses incurred at Havana; but he making proof of the insolvency of Captain Green, the legal agent for the owners and underwriters of said brig and cargo, at the time of the capture, was, in accordance with Spanish law, liberated and excused from all charges in the case. Mr. Ray then demanded an appeal from the court at Havana to his Majesty's court at Madrid, which demand was granted, with an order that all the parties should appear in twelve months to prosecute their claims, and that the proceedings of the different courts should be forwarded to Madrid by the first King's courier. This decree was made and dated in the month of November, in the aforesaid year of 1824.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 491. [1ST SESSION.

TREATY OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION WITH PRUSSIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, MAY 9, 1828.

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate to the Senate, for their consideration and advice, a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and his Majesty the King of Prussia, signed on the first instant at this place by the Secretary of State and the Chargé d'Affaires of Prussia residing here. A copy of the treaty is also transmitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 5, 1828.

TREATY OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

[Original.]

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of Prussia, equally animated with the desire of maintaining the relations of good understanding which have hitherto so happily subsisted between their respective States, of extending also and consolidating the commercial intercourse between them, and convinced that this object cannot better be accomplished than by adopting the system of an entire freedom of navigation and a perfect reciprocity, based upon principles of equity equally beneficial to both countries, and applicable, in time of peace as well as in time of war, have, in consequence, agreed to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty of navigation and commerce; for which purpose the President of the United States has conferred full powers on Henry Clay, their Secretary of State, and his Majesty, the King of Prussia, has conferred like powers on the Sieur Ludwig Niederstetter, Chargé d'Affaires of his said Majesty near the United States; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their said full powers, found in good and due form, have concluded and signed the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be between the territories of the high contracting parties a reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation. The inhabitants of their respective States shall mutually have liberty to enter the ports, places, and rivers of the territories of each party wherever foreign commerce is permitted. They shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatsoever of said territories, in order to attend to their affairs, and they shall enjoy, to that effect, the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside, on condition of their submitting to the laws and ordinances there prevailing.

ARTICLE 2. Prussian vessels arriving, either laden or in ballast, in the ports of the United States of America, and, reciprocally, vessels of the United States arriving, either laden or in ballast, in the ports of the Kingdom of Prussia, shall be treated on their entrance, during their stay, and at their departure, upon the same footing as national vessels coming from the same place, with respect to the duties of tonnage, light-houses, pilotage, salvage, and port charges, as well as to the fees and perquisites of public officers, and all other duties or charges of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishment whatsoever.

ARTICLE 3. All kind of merchandise and articles of commerce, either the produce of the soil or the industry of the United States of America, or of any other country, which may be lawfully imported into the ports of the Kingdom of Prussia in Prussian vessels, may also be so imported in vessels of the United States of America without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or produce had been imported in Prussian vessels. And, reciprocally, all kinds of merchandise and articles of commerce, either the produce of the soil or of the industry of the Kingdom of Prussia, or of any other country, which may be lawfully imported into the ports of the United States in vessels of the said States, may also be so imported in Prussian vessels without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishment whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or produce had been imported in vessels of the United States of America.

ARTICLE 4. To prevent the possibility of any misunderstanding, it is hereby declared that the stipulations contained in the two preceding articles are, to their full extent, applicable to Prussian vessels and their cargoes arriving in the ports of the United States of America; and, reciprocally, to vessels of the said States and their cargoes arriving in the ports of the Kingdom of Prussia, whether the said vessels clear directly from the ports of the country to which they respectively belong, or from the ports of any other foreign country.

ARTICLE 5. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the produce or manufacture of Prussia, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the Kingdom of Prussia of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States, than are or shall be payable on the like article, being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the importation or exportation of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States or of Prussia to or from the ports of the United States, or to or from the ports of Prussia, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE 6. All kind of merchandise and articles of commerce, either the produce of the soil or of the industry of the United States of America, or of any other country, which may be lawfully exported from the ports of the said United States in national vessels, may also be exported therefrom in Prussian vessels without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or produce had been exported in vessels of the United States of America.

An exact reciprocity shall be observed in the ports of the Kingdom of Prussia, so that all kind of merchandise and articles of commerce, either the produce of the soil or the industry of the said Kingdom, or of any other country, which may be lawfully exported from Prussian ports in national vessels, may also be exported therefrom in vessels of the United States of America without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name or to the profit of the Government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or produce had been exported in Prussian vessels.

ARTICLE 7. The preceding articles are not applicable to the coastwise navigation of the two countries, which is respectively reserved by each of the high contracting parties exclusively to itself.

ARTICLE 8. No priority or preference shall be given, directly or indirectly, by either of the contracting parties, nor by any company, corporation, or agent, acting on their behalf or under their authority, in the purchase of any article of commerce lawfully imported, on account of, or in reference to, the character of the vessel, whether it be of the one party or of the other, in which such article was imported: it being the true intent and meaning of the contracting parties that no distinction or difference whatever shall be made in this respect.

ARTICLE 9. If either party shall hereafter grant to any other nation any particular favor in navigation or commerce, it shall immediately become common to the other party freely where it is freely granted to such other nation, or on yielding the same compensation when the grant is conditional.

ARTICLE 10. The two contracting parties have granted to each other the liberty of having, each, in the ports of the other, consuls, vice consuls, agents, and commissaries, of their own appointment, who shall enjoy the same privileges and powers as those of the most favored nations; but. if any such consuls shall exercise commerce, they shall be submitted to the same laws and usages to which the private individuals of their nation are submitted in the same place.

The consuls, vice consuls, and commercial agents shall have the right, as such, to sit as judges and arbitrators in such differences as may arise between the captains and crews of the vessels belonging to the nation whose interests are committed to their charge, without the interference of the local authorities, unless the conduct of the crew, or of the captain, should disturb the order or tranquillity of the country, or the said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents should require their assistance to cause their decisions to be carried into effect or supported. It is, however, understood that this species of judgment or arbitration shall not deprive the contending parties of the right they have to resort, on their return, to the judicial authority of their country.

ARTICLE 11. The said consuls, vice consuls, and commercial agents are authorized to require the assistance of the local authorities for the search, arrest, and imprisonment of the deserters from the ships-of-war and merchant vessels of their country. For this purpose they shall apply to the competent tribunals, judges, and officers, and shall, in writing, demand said deserters, proving, by the exhibition of the registers of the vessels, the rolls of the crews, or by other official documents, that such individuals formed part of the crews, and, on this reclamation being thus substantiated, the surrender shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be placed at the disposal of the said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents, and may be confined in the public prisons, at the request and cost of those who shall claim them, in order to be sent to the vessels to which they belonged, or to others of the same country. But if not sent back within three months from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause. However, if the deserter should be found to have committed any crime or offence, his surrender may be delayed until the tribunal before which his case shall be depending shall have pronounced its sentence, and such sentence shall have been carried into effect.

ARTICLE 12. The twelfth article of the treaty of amity and commerce concluded between the parties in 1785, and the articles from the thirteenth to the twenty-fourth, inclusive, of that which was concluded at Berlin in 1799, with the exception of the last paragraph in the nineteenth article relating to the treaties with Great Britain, are hereby revived with the same force and virtue as if they made part of the context of the present treaty; it being, however, understood that the stipulations contained in the articles then revived shall be always considered as in no manner affecting the treaties or conventions concluded by either party with other Powers during the interval between the expiration of the said treaty of 1799 and the commencement of the operation of the present treaty.

The parties being still desirous, in conformity with their intention declared in the twelfth article of the said treaty of 1799, to establish between themselves, or in concert with other maritime Powers, further provisions to insure just protection and freedom to neutral navigation and commerce, and which may, at the same time, advance the cause of civilization and humanity, engage again to treat on this subject at some future and convenient period.

ARTICLE 13. Considering the remoteness of the respective countries of the two high contracting parties, and the uncertainty resulting therefrom with respect to the various events which may take place, it is agreed that a merchant vessel belonging to either of them, which may be bound to a port supposed, at the time of its departure, to be blockaded, shall not, however, be captured or condemned for having attempted, a first time to enter said port, unless it can be proved that said vessel could and ought to have learned during its voyage, that the blockade of the place in question still continued. But all vessels which, after having been warned off once, shall, during the same voyage, attempt a second time to enter the same blockaded port during the continuance of said blockade, shall then subject themselves to be detained and condemned.

ARTICLE 14. The citizens or subjects of each party shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other by testament, donation, or otherwise, and their representatives, being citizens or subjects of the other party, shall succeed to their personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and may take possession thereof, either by themselves or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein the said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases; and, in case of the absence of the representative, such care shall be taken of the said goods as would be taken of the goods of a native in like case, until the lawful owner may take measures for receiving them; and if question should arise among several claimants to which of them said goods belong, the same shall be decided finally by the laws and judges of the land wherein the said goods are; and where, on the death of any person holding real estate within the territories of the one party, such real estate would, by the laws of the land, descend on a citizen or subject of the other, were he not disqualified by alienage, such citizen or subject shall be allowed a reasonable time to sell the same, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all duties of detraction on the part of the Government of the respective States. But this article shall not derogate, in any manner, from the force of the laws already published, or hereafter to be published, by his Majesty the King of Prussia to prevent the emigration of his subjects.

ARTICLE 15. The present treaty shall continue in force for twelve years, counting from the day of the exchange of the ratifications; and if, twelve months before the expiration of that period, neither of the high contracting parties shall have announced, by an official notification, to the other, its intention to arrest the operation of said treaty, it shall remain binding for one year beyond that time, and so on until the expiration of the twelve months which will follow a similar notification, whatever the time at which it may take place.

ARTICLE 16. This treaty shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by his Majesty the King of Prussia, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Washington, within nine months from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the above articles, both in the French and English languages, and they have thereto affixed their seals, declaring, nevertheless, that the signing in both languages shall not be brought into precedent, nor in any way operate to the prejudice of either party.

Done in triplicate, at the city of Washington, on the first day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, and the fifty-second of the Independence of the United States of America.

Traité de Commerce et de Navigation entre sa Majeste le Roi de Prusse et les Etats Unis d'Amérique.

Sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse et les Etats Unis d'Amérique, également animés du desir de maintenir les rapports de bonne intelligence qui ont si heureusement subsisté jusqu'ici entre leurs Etats respectifs, et d'en étendre et consolider les relations commerciales, et convainciés que cet objet ne sauroit être mieux rempli qu'en adoptant le systême d'une entière liberté de navigation, et d'une parfaite réciprocité, basé sur des principes d'equité egalement avantageux aux deux pays, et applicables en temps de paix comme en temps de guerre; sont, en conséquence convenus d'entrer en négociation pour conclure un traité de commerce et de navigation. A cet effet, sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse a muni de pleins pouvoirs le Sieur Ludwig Niédersetter, Chargé d'Affaires de sa dite Majesté près les Etats Unis d'Amérique, et le Président des Etats Unis d'Amérique, a muni des mêmes pouvoirs Henri Clay, leur Secrétaire d'Etat; lesquels plénipotentiaires, après avoir echangé leurs dits pleins pouvoirs, trouvés en bonne et due forme, on arrêté et signé les articles suivans:

ARTICLE 1. Il y aura, entre les territoires des hautes parties contractantes, liberté et réciprocité de commerce et de navigation. Les habitans de leurs Etats respectifs pourront réciproquement entrer dans les ports, places, et rivieres des territoires de chacune d'elles, partout ou le commerce étranger est permis. Ils seront libres de s'y arrêter et résider dans quelque partie que ce soit desdits territoires, pour y vaquer à leurs affaires; et ils souiront, à cet effet de la même sécurité et protection que les habitans du pays dans lequel ils résideront, à charge de se soumettre aux lois et ordonnances y établies.

ARTICLE 2. Les bâtimens Prussiens arrivant, sur lest ou chargés dans les ports des Etats Unis d'Amérique; et réciproquement, les bâtimens des Etats Unis arrivant, sur lest ou chargés dans les ports du Royaume de Prusse, seront traités, à leur entrée, pendant leur séjour, et à leur sortie, sur le même pied que les bâtimens nationaux venant du même lieu, par rapport aux droits de tonnage, de fanaux, de pilotage, de sauvetage, et de port, ainsi qu'aux vacations des officiérs publics, et à tout autre droit ou charge, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom ou au profit du Gouvernement, des autorités locales, ou d'établissemens particulièrs quelconques.

ARTICLE 3. Toute espèce de marchandises et objets de commerce, provenant du sol ou de l'industrie des Etats Unis d'Amérique, ou de tout autre pays, qui pourront légalement être importés dans les ports du royaume de Prusse, sur des bâtimens Prussiens, pourront également y être importés sur des bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amérique, sans payer d'autres, ou plus forts droits ou charges, de quelque espèce ou denomination que ce soit, perçus ou nom ou au profit du Gouvernement des autorités locales, ou d'établissemens particuliers quelconques, que s'ils étoient importés sur des bâtimens Prussiens. Et réciproquement, toute espèce de merchandises et objets de commerce, provenant du sol ou de l'industrie du royaume de Prusse, ou de tout autre pays, qui pourront légalement être importés dans les ports des Etats Unis d'Amérique, sur des bâtimens desdits Etats, pourront également y être importés sur des bâtimens Prussiens, sans payer d'autres ou plus forts droits ou charges, de quelque espéce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom ou au profit du Gouvernement, des autorités locales, ou d'établissemens particuliers, quelconques, que s'ils étoient importés sur des bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amérique.

ARTICLE 4. Afin de prévenir tout mésentendu et équivoque possibles, il est déclaré que les stipulations contenues dans les deux articles précédens, sont dans toute leur plénitude applicables aux bâtimens Prussiens et leur cargaisons, arrivant dans les portes des Etats Unis d'Amérique; et réciproquement, aux bâtimens des dit Etats et leurs cargaisons arrivant dans les ports du royaume de Prusse, soit que les dits bâtimens viennent des ports du pays auquels ils appartiennent, soit de ceux de tout autre pays étranger.

ARTICLE 5. Je ne sera imposé d'autres ni de plus forts droits sur l'importation dans les Etats Unis, des articles provenant du sol ou de l'industrie du royaume de Prusse; et il ne sera imposé d'autres ni de plus forts droits sur l'importation dans le royaume de Prusse, des articles provenant du sol ou de l'industrie des Etats Unis, que ceux qui sont, ou seront imposés sur les mêmes articles provenant du sol ou de l'industrie de tout autre pays étranger. De même il ne sera imposé sur l'importation ou sur l'exportation des articles provenant du sol ou de l'industrie des Etats Unis, ou d royaume de Prusse, à l'entrée ou à la sortie des ports des Etats Unis, ou de ceux du royaume de Prusse, aucune prohibition qui ne soit pas également applicable à toute autre nation.

ARTICLE 6. Toute espèce de marchandises et objets de commerce provenant du sol ou de l'industrie des Etats Unis, ou de tout autre pays, qui pourront être légalement exportés des ports des dits Etats, sur des bâtimens nationaux, pourront également en être exportés sur des bâtimens Prussiens, sans payer d'autres ni plus forts droits ou charges, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus au nom ou au profit du Gouvernement, des autorités locales, ou d'establissemens particuliers quelconques, que si ces mêmes marchandises ou deurées avaient été exportées par bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amerique.

Une parfaite réciprocité sera observée dans les ports du royaume de Prusse, de sorte que toute espèce de marchandises et objets de commerce, provenant du sol ou de l'industrie du royaume de Prusse, ou de tout autre pays, qui pourront être légalement exportées des ports du dit royaume, sur des bâtimens nationaux, pourront également en être exportes sur des bâtimens des Etats Unis d'Amerique, sans payer d'autres ou de plus forts droits ou charges, de quelque espèce ou dénomination que ce soit, perçus ou nom ou au profit du Gouvernement, des autorités locales, ou d'établissemens particuliers quelconques, que si ces marchandises ou deurées avaient été exportées sur des bâtimens Prussiens.

ARTICLE 7. Les articles précédens ne sont pas applicable á la navigation de côtes ou cabotage de chacun des deux pays, que l'une et l'autre des hautes parties contractantes se reservent exclusivement.

ARTICLE 8. Il ne sera accordé ni directement, ni indirectement, par l'une ou par l'autre des parties contractantes, ni par aucune compagnie, corporation, ou agent agissant en son nom, ou par un autorité, aucune priorité ou préférence quelconque, pour l'achat d'aucun objet du commerce, légalement importé à cause ou en consideration de la nationalité du navire, qui auroit importé les dits objets, soit qu'il appartienne à l'une des parties, soit à l'autre; l'intention bien positive des parties contractantes, étant qu' aucune différence ou distinction quelconque n'ait lieu à cet égard.

ARTICLE 9. Si l'une des parties contractantes accorde, par la suite, à d'autres nations quelque faveur particuliere, en fait de commerce ou de navigation, cette faveur deviendra aussitot commune à l'autre partie, qui en jouira gratuitement, si la concession est gratuite, ou en accordant la même compensation si la concession est conditionelle.

ARTICLE 10. Les deux parties contractantes se sont accordé mutuellement la faculté de tenir dans leurs ports respectifs, des consuls, vice consuls, agens et commissaires de leur choix, qui jouiront des mêmes privilèges et pouvoirs dont jouissent ceux des nations les plus favorisées; mais dans le cas ou les dits consuls veuillent faire le commerce, ils seront soumis aux mêmes lois et usages, auxquels sont soumis les particuliers de leur nation à l'endroit où ils résident.

Les consuls, vice consuls, et agens commerciaux, auront le droit, comme tels, de servir de juges et d'arbitres dans les différens qui pourroient s'elever entre les capitaines et les équipages des bâtimens de la nation dont ils soignent les intérèts, sans que les autorités locales puissent y intervenir, à mours que la conduite des équipages ou du capitaine ne troublât l'ordre ou la tranquilité du pays, ou que les dits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux, ne réquissent leur intervention pour faire exécuter ou maintenir leurs décisions; bien intendu que cette espèce de jugement ou d'arbitrage, ne sauroit, pourtant priver les parties contendantes du droit qu'elles ont, à leur retour de recourir aux autorités judiciaires de leur pays.

Article 11. Les dits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux, sont autorisés à requérir l'assistance des autorités locales, pour la recherche l'arrestation, la détention, et l'emprisonnement, des déserteurs des navires de guerre et marchands de leur pays; ils s'adresseront, pour cet objet, aux tribunaux, juges, et officiers compétens, et réclameront, par écrit, les déserteurs susmentionnés, en prouvant par la communication des régistres des navires, ou rôles de l'équipage ou par d'autres documens officiels, que de tels individus ont fait partie des dits équipages, et cette réclamation ainsi prouvée, l'extradition ne sera point refusée.

De tels deserteurs, lorsqu'ils auront été arrêtés, seront mis à la disposition des dits consuls, vice consuls, ou agens commerciaux, et pourront être enfermés dans les prisons publiques, à la réquisition et aux frais de ceux qui les réclament, pour être envoyés aux navires auxquels ils appartenoient, ou à d'autres de la même nation. Mais s'ils ne sont pas renvoyés dans l'espace de trois mois, à compter du jour de leur arrestation, ils seront mis en liberté, et ne seront plus arrétés pour la même cause.

Toutefois, si le déserteur se trouvoit avoir commis quelque crime ou délit, il pourra être sursis à son extradition, jusqu'à ce que le tribunal nanti de l'affaire, aura rendu sa sentence, et que celleci ait reçu son exécution.

Article 12. L'article douze du traité d'amitié et de commerce, conclu entre les parties en 1785; et les articles treize et suivans, jusqu'à l'article vingtquatre, inclusivement, du traité conclu à Berlin, en 1799, en exceptant le dernier paragraphe de l'article dix-neuf, touchant les traités avec la Grand Bretagne, sont remis en vigueur, et auront la même force et valeur que s'ils faisoient partie du présent traité; il est entendu, cependant que les stipulations contenues dans les articles ainsi remis en vigueur, seront toujours censeés ne rien changer aux traités et conventions conclus de part et d'autre, avec d'autres puissances, dans l'intervalle écoulé entre l'expiration dudit traité de 1799, et le commencement de la mise en vigueur du présent traité.

Les parties contractantes, desirant toujours, conformément à l'intention déclarée dans l'article douze du dit traité de 1799, pourvoir, entre elles, ou conjointement avec d'autres puissances maritimes, à des stipulations ultérieures, qui puissent servir à garantir une juste protection et liberté au commerce et à la navigation des neutres, et à aider la cause de la civilisatic n et de l'humanité, s'engagent ici comme alors, à concerter ensemble sur ce sujet, à quelque époque future et convenable.

Article 13. Fû l'eloignement de pays respectifs des deux hautes parties contractantes, et l'incertitude qui en résulte sur les divers événemens qui peuvent avoir lieu, il est convenue qu'un bâtiment marchand appartenant à l'une d'elles, qui se trouveroit destiné pour un port supposé bloqué, au moment du départ de ce bâtiment, ne sera cependant pas capturé ou condamné pour avoir essayé une premiere fois d'entrer dans le dit port, à moins qu'il ne puisse être prouvé qui ledit bâtiment avoit pû et dû apprendre en route que l'état de blocas de la place en question duroit encore; mais les bâtimens qui, après avoir été renvoyés une fois, essayeroient, pendant le même voyage d'entrer une seconde fois dans le même port bloqué, durant la continuation de ce blocus, se trouveront alors sujets à être détenus et condamnés.

Article 14. Les citoyens et sujets de chacune des hautes parties contractantes, auront, dans les Etats de l'autre la liberté de disposer de leurs biens personnels, soit par testament, donation, ou autrement, et leurs héritiers étant sujets ou citoyens de l'autre partie contractante, succéderont à leurs biens, soit en vertu d'un testament, soit ab intestato, et ils pourront en prendre possession, soit en personne, soit par d'autres agissant en leur place, et en disposeront à leur volonté, en ne payant d'autres droits que ceux auxquels les habitans du pays où se trouvent les dits biens, sont assujettis en pareille occasion. En cas d'absence des héritiers, on prenda provisoirement des dits biens les mêmes soins qu'on auroit pris en pareille occasion des biens das natifs du pays, jusqu'à ce que le propriétaire légitime ait agréé des arrangemens pour recueillir l'héritage. S'il s'elève des contestations entre les différens prétendans ayant droit à la succession, elles seront décidées en dernier ressort, selon les lois, etpar les juges du pays où la succession est vacante. Et si, par la mort de quelque personne possidant desbiens-fonds sur le territoire de l'une des parties contractantes, ces biens-fonds venoient à passer, selon les lois du pays, à un citoyen ou sujet de l'autre partie, celui-ci, si, par sa qualité d'étranger, il est inhabile à, les posséder, obtiendra un délai convenable pour les vendre, et pour en retirer le produit sans obstacle, et exempte de tout droit de retenue, de la part du Gouvernement des Etats respectifs. Mais cet article e dérogeran en aucune maniere à la force des lois qui ont déja été publiées, ou qui le seront par la suite par sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, pour prévenir l'émigration de ses sujets.

Article 15. Le présent traité sera en vigeur pendant douze années, à comprte du jour de l'échange des ratifications, et si douze mois avant l'expiration de ce terme, ni l'une ni l'autre de hautes parties contractantes, n'annonce à l'autre par une declaration officielle, son intention d'en faire cesser l'effet, ledit traité restera obligatoire pendant un an audela de ce terme, et ainsi de suite, jusqu'à l'expiration des douze mois qui suivront une telle déclaration, à quelque époque qu'elle ait lieu.

Article 16. Le présent traité sera apprové et ratifié par sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, et par le Président des Etats Unis d'Amérique, par et avec l'avis et le consentement du Sénat des dit Etats, et les ratifications en seront échangées en le ville de Washington, dans l'espace de neuf mois, à dater de ce jour, ou plutôt, si faire se peut.

En foi de quoi les plenipotentiaires respectifs ont signé les articles ci-dessus, tant en Français qu'en Anglais, et y ont apposé leurs sceaux, déclarant, toutefois, que la signature dans ces deux langues, ne doit pas, har la suite, être citée comme example, ni, en aucune maniere, porter prejudice aux parties contractantes.

Fait par triplicata en la cité de Washington, le premier Mai, l'an de Grâce mil huit cent vingt huit, et le cinquante deuxième de l'Independance des Etats Unis d'Amérique.

APPENDIX.

ARTICLE 12. If one of the contracting parties should be engaged in war with any other Power the free intercourse and commerce of the subjects or citizens of the party remaining neuter with the belligerent Powers shall not be interrupted. On the contrary, in that case, as in full peace, the vessels of the neutral party may navigate freely to and from the ports and on the coasts of belligerent parties, free vessels making free goods, insomuch that all things shall be adjudged free which shall be on board any vessel belonging to the neutral party, although such things belong to an enemy of the other, and the same freedom shall be extended to persons who shall be on board a free vessel, although they should be enemies to the other party, unless they be soldiers in actual service of such enemy.

ARTICLE 13. And in the same case of one of the contracting parties being engaged in war with any other Power, to prevent all the difficulties and misunderstanding that usually arise respecting the merchandise of contraband, such as arms, ammunition, and military stores of every kind, no such articles carried in the vessels, or by the subjects or citizens of either party, to the enemies of the other, shall be deemed contraband, so as to induce confiscation or condemnation and a loss of property to individuals. Nevertheless, it shall be lawful to stop such vessels and articles, and to detain them for such length of time as the captors may think necessary, to prevent the inconvenience or damage that might ensue from their proceeding; paying, however, a reasonable compensation for the loss such arrest shall occasion to the proprietors; and it shall further be allowed to use in the service of the captors the whole or any part of the military stores so detained, paying the owners the full value of the same, to be ascertained by the current price at the place of its destination. But in the case supposed, of a vessel stopped for articles of contraband, if the master of the vessel stopped will deliver out the goods supposed to be of contraband nature, he shall be admitted to do it, and the vessel shall not in that case be carried into any port, nor further detained, but shall be allowed to proceed on her voyage.

All cannons, mortars, fire-arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, balls, muskets, flints, matches, powder, saltpetre, sulphur, cuirasses, pikes, swords, belts, cartouch boxes, saddles, and bridles, beyond the quantity necessary for the use of the ship, or beyond that which every man serving on board the vessel or passenger ought to have, and, in general, whatever is comprised under the denominations of arms and military stores, of what description soever, shall be deemed objects of contraband.

ARTICLE 14. To insure to the vessels of the two contracting parties the advantage of being readily and certainly known in time of war, it is agreed that they shall be provided with the sea-letters and documents hereafter specified:

1. A passport, expressing the name, the property, and the burden of the vessel, as also the name and dwelling of the master; which passport shall be made out in good and due form, shall be renewed as often as the vessel shall return into port, and shall be exhibited whensoever required, as well in the open sea as in port. But if the vessel be under convoy of one or more vessels of war belonging to the neutral party, the simple declaration of the officer commanding the convoy that the said vessel belongs to the party of which she is, shall be considered as establishing the fact, and shall relieve both parties from the trouble of further examination.

2. A charter party; that is to say, the contract passed for the freight of the whole vessel, or the bills of lading given for the cargo in detail.

3. The list of the ship's company, containing an indication by name and in detail of the persons composing the crew of the vessel. These documents shall always be authenticated according to the forms established at the place from which the vessel shall have sailed.

As their production ought to be exacted only when one of the contracting parties shall be at war, and as their exhibition ought to have no other object than to prove the neutrality of the vessel, its cargo, and company, they shall not be deemed absolutely necessary on board such vessels belonging to the neutral party as shall have sailed from its ports before, or within three months after, the Government shall have been informed of the state of war in which the belligerent party shall be engaged. In the interval, in default of these specified documents, the neutrality of the vessel may be established by such other evidence as the tribunals authorized to judge of the case may deem sufficient.

ARTICLE 15. And to prevent entirely all disorder and violence in such cases, it is stipulated that when the vessels of the neutral party sailing without convoy shall be met by any vessel of war, public or private, of the other party, such vessel of war shall not send more than two or three men in their boat on board the said neutral vessel to examine her passports and documents. And all persons belonging to any vessel of war, public or private, who shall molest or insult, in any manner whatever, the people, vessels, or effects of the other party, shall be responsible, in their persons and property, for damages and interest, sufficient security for which shall be given by all commanders of private armed vessels before they are commissioned.

ARTICLE 16. In times of war, or in cases of urgent necessity, when either of the contracting parties shall be obliged to lay a general embargo, either in all its ports or in certain particular places, the vessels of the other party shall be subject to this measure upon the same footing as those of the most favored nations, but without having the right to claim the exemption in their favor stipulated in the sixteenth article of the former treaty of 1785. But, on the other hand, the proprietors of the vessels which shall have been detained, whether for some military expedition or for what other use soever, shall obtain from the Government that shall have employed them an equitable indemnity, as well for the freight as for the loss occasioned by the delay. And furthermore, in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest for debts contracted, or offences committed by any citizen or subject of the one party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases.

ARTICLE 17. If any vessels or effects of the neutral Power be taken by an enemy of the other, or by a pirate, and retaken by the Power at war, they shall be restored to the first proprietor, upon the conditions hereafter stipulated in the twenty-first article for cases of recapture.

ARTICLE 18. If the citizens or subjects of either party, in danger from tempests, pirates, enemies, or other accident, shall take refuge with their vessels or effects within the harbors or jurisdiction of the other, they shall be received, protected, and treated with humanity and kindness, and shall be permitted to furnish themselves, at reasonable prices, with all refreshments, provisions, and other things necessary for their sustenance, health, and accommodation, and for the repair of their vessels.

ARTICLE 19. The vessels of war, public and private, of both parties shall carry freely wheresoever they please the vessels and effects taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any duties, charges, or fees to officers of admiralty, of the customs, or any others; nor shall such prizes be arrested, searched, or put under legal process, when they come to and enter the ports of the other party, but may freely be carried out again at any time by their captors to the places expressed in their commissions, which the commanding officer of such vessel shall be obliged to show.

ARTICLE 20. No citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties shall take from any Power with which the other may be at war any commission or letter of marque for arming any vessel to act as a privateer against the other, on pain of being punished as a pirate; nor shall either party hire, lend, or give any part of its naval or military force to the enemy of the other to aid them, offensively or defensively, against the other.

ARTICLE 21. If the two contracting parties should be engaged in a war against a common enemy, the following points shall be observed between them:

1. If a vessel of one of the parties taken by the enemy shall, before being carried into a neutral or enemy's port, be retaken by a ship of war or privateer of the other, it shall, with the cargo, be restored to the first owners for a compensation of one-eighth part of the value of the said vessel and cargo, if the recapture be made by a public ship of war; and one sixth part if made by a privateer.

2. The restitution in such cases shall be after due proof of property and surety given for the part to which the recaptors are entitled.

3. The vessels of war, public and private, of the two parties shall reciprocally be admitted, with their prizes, into the respective ports of each; but the said prizes shall not be discharged or sold there until their legality shall have been decided, according to the laws and regulations of the State to which the captor belongs, but by the judicatories of the place into which the prize shall have been conducted.

4. It shall be free to each party to make such regulations as they shall judge necessary for the conduct of their respective vessels of war, public and private, relative to the vessels which they shall take and carry into the ports of the two parties.

ARTICLE 22. Where the contracting parties shall have a common enemy, or shall both be neutral, the vessels of war of each shall, upon all occasions, take under their protection the vessels of the other going the same course, and shall defend such vessels, as long as they hold the same course, against all force and violence, in the same manner as they ought to protect and defend vessels belonging to the party of which they are.

[The following article to be valid in time of war. See article 24, below.]

ARTICLE 23. If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages or places, and, in general, all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments, and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power, by the events of war, they may happen to fall, but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

[The following article to be valid in time of war. See the end of it.]

ARTICLE 24. And to prevent the destruction of prisoners of war, by sending them into distant and inclement countries, or by crowding them into close and noxious places, the two contracting parties solemnly pledge themselves to the world and to each other that they will not adopt any such practice; that neither will send the prisoners whom they may take from the other into the East Indies, or any other parts of Asia or Africa; but they shall be placed in some part of their dominions, in Europe or America, in wholesome situations; that they shall not be confined in dungeons, prison-ships, nor prisons, nor be put into irons, nor bound, nor otherwise restrained in the use of their limbs; that the officers shall be enlarged on their paroles within convenient districts, and have comfortable quarters, and the common men be disposed in cantonments open and extensive enough for air and exercise, and lodged in barracks as roomy and good as are provided by the party in whose power they are for their own troops; that the officers shall also be daily furnished by the party in whose power they are with as many rations, and of the same articles and quality, as are allowed by them, either in kind or by commutation, to officers of equal rank in their own army; and all others shall be daily furnished by them with such rations as they allow to a common soldier in their own service; the value whereof shall be paid by the other party on a mutual adjustment of accounts for the subsistence of prisons at the close of the war; and the said accounts shall not be mingled with or set off against any others, nor the balances due on them be withheld as a satisfaction or reprisal for any other article, or for any other cause, real or pretended, whatever; that each party shall be allowed to keep a commissary of prisoners, of their own appointment, with every separate cantonment of prisoners in possession of the other, which commissary shall see the prisoners as often as he pleases, shall be allowed to receive and distribute whatever comforts may be sent to them by their friends, and shall be free to make his reports in open letters to those who employ him; but if any officer shall break his parole, or any other prisoner shall escape from the limits of his cantonment, after they shall have been designated to him, such individual, officer, or other prisoner, shall forfeit so much of the benefit of this article as provides for his enlargement on parole or cantonment. And it is declared that neither the pretence that war dissolves all treaties, nor any other whatever, shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article; but, on the contrary, that the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided, and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged articles in the law of nature or nations.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 492. [1ST SESSION.

CONVENTIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN—1. CONTINUING IN FORCE THE COMMERCIAL CONVENTION OF JULY 3, 1815; 2. CONTINUING IN FORCE THE CONVENTION FOR THE JOINT OCCUPATION OF THE TERRITORY WEST OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS OF OCTOBER 20, 1818; AND 3. CONVENTION FOR CARRYING INTO EFFECT THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE TREATY OF GHENT RELATIVE TO THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS MAY 19, 1828.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of three conventions concluded between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the ratifications of which were exchanged at London on the second of last month.

1st. A convention, concluded August 6, 1827, for continuing in force the provisions of the convention of July 3, 1815.

2d. A convention, concluded August 6, 1827, for continuing in force the provisions of the third article of the convention of October 20, 1818.

3d. A convention, concluded September 29, 1827, for carrying into effect the provisions of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, in relation to the northeastern boundary of the United States.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 19, 1828.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was concluded and signed by their plenipotentiaries, at London, on the sixth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, which convention is, word for word, as follows: The United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, being desirous of continuing in force the existing commercial regulations between the two countries which are contained in the convention concluded between them on the 3d of July, 1815, and further renewed by the fourth article of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, have, for that purpose, named their respective plenipotentiaries, that is to say: The President of the United States of America, Albert Gallatin, their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Britannic Majesty; and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Honorable Charles Grant, a member of his said Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, a member of Parliament, and Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Affairs of Trade and Foreign Plantations, and Henry Unwin Addington, Esquire: who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. All the provisions of the convention concluded between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland on the 3d of July, 1815, and further continued for the term of ten yeas by the fourth article of the convention of the 20th October, 1818, with the exception therein contained as to St. Helena, are hereby further indefinitely, and without the said exception, extended and continued in force, from the date of the expiration of the said ten years, in the same manner as if all the provisions of the said convention of the 3d of July, 1815, were herein specifically recited.

ARTICLE 2. It shall be competent, however, to either of the contracting parties, in case either should think fit, at any time after the expiration of the said ten years—that is, after the 20th of October, 1828—on giving due notice of twelve months to the other contracting party, to annul and abrogate this Convention; and it shall, in such case, be accordingly entirely annulled and abrogated after the expiration of the said term of notice.

ARTICLE 3. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in nine months, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

Done at London, the sixth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was concluded and signed by their plenipotentiaries, at London, on the sixth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, which convention is, word for word, as follows:

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, being equally desirous to prevent, as far as possible, all hazard of misunderstanding between the two nations with respect to the territory on the Northwest Coast of America, west of the Stony or Rocky mountains, after the expiration of the third article of the convention concluded between them on the 20th of October, 1818; and also with a view to give further time for maturing measures which shall have for their object a more definite settlement of the claims of each party to the said territory, have respectively named their plenipotentiaries to treat and agree concerning a temporary renewal of the said article, that is to say:

The President of the United States of America, Albert Gallatin, their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Britannic Majesty; and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Honorable Charles Grant, a member of his said Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, a member of Parliament, and Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Affairs of Trade and Foreign Plantations, and Henry Unwin Addington, Esquire: who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. All the provisions of the third article of the convention concluded between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland on the 20th of October, 1818, shall be, and they are hereby, further indefinitely extended and continued in force in the same manner as if all the provisions of the said article were herein specifically recited.

ARTICLE 2. It shall be competent, however, to either of the contracting parties, in case either should think fit, at any time after the 20th of October, 1828, on giving due notice of twelve months to the other contracting party, to annul and abrogate this convention; and it shall, in such case, be accordingly entirely annulled and abrogated after the expiration of the said term of notice.

ARTICLE 3. Nothing contained in this convention, or in the third article of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, hereby continued in force, shall be construed to impair, or in any manner affect, the claims which either of the contracting parties may have to any part of the country westward of the Stony or Rocky mountains.

ARTICLE 4. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in nine months, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

Done at London, the sixth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was concluded and signed by their plenipotentiaries, at London, on the 29th day of September, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, which convention is, word for word, as follows:

Whereas it is provided by the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent that, in case the Commissioners appointed under that article for the settlement of the boundary line therein described should not be able to agree upon such boundary line, the report or reports of those Commissioners, stating the points on which they had differed, should be submitted to some friendly Sovereign or State, and that the decision given by such Sovereign or State on such points of difference should be considered by the contracting parties as final and conclusive: that case having now arisen, and it having, therefore, become expedient to proceed to and regulate the reference, as above described, the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland have, for that purpose, named their plenipotentiaries, that is to say: the President of the United States has appointed Albert Gallatin, their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of his Britannic Majesty; and his said Majesty, on his part, has appointed the Right Honorable Charles Grant, a member of Parliament, a member of his said Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, and President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Affairs of Trade and Foreign Plantations, and Henry Unwin Addington, Esquire: who, after having exchanged their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. It is agreed that the points of difference which have arisen in the settlement of the boundary between the American and British dominions, as described in the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, shall be referred, as therein provided, to some friendly Sovereign or State, who shall be invited to investigate and make a decision upon such points of difference.

The two contracting Powers engage to proceed in concert to the choice of such friendly Sovereign or State as soon as the ratifications of this convention shall have been exchanged, and to use their best endeavors to obtain a decision, if practicable, within two years after the arbiter shall have signified his consent to act as such.

ARTICLE 2. The reports and documents, thereunto annexed, of the Commissioners appointed to carry into execution the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent being so voluminous and complicated as to render it improbable that any Sovereign or State should be willing or able to undertake the office of investigating and arbitrating upon them, it is hereby agreed to substitute for those reports new and separate statements of the respective cases, severally drawn up by each of the contracting parties in such form and terms as each may think fit.

The said statements, when prepared, shall be mutually communicated to each other by the contracting parties, that is to say: by the United States to his Britannic Majesty's Minister or Chargé d'Affaires at Washington, and by Great Britain to the Minister or Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at London, within fifteen months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention.

After such communication shall have taken place, each party shall have the power of drawing up a second and definitive statement, if it think fit so to do, in reply to the statement of the other party so communicated; which definitive statements shall also be mutually communicated, in the same manner as aforesaid, to each other by the contracting parties within twenty-one months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention.

ARTICLE 3. Each of the contracting parties shall, within nine months after the exchange of ratifications of this convention, communicate to the other, in the same manner as aforesaid, all the evidence intended to be brought in support of its claim beyond that which is contained in the reports of the Commissioners, or papers thereunto annexed, and other written documents laid before the commission under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent.

Each of the contracting parties shall be bound, on the application of the other party, made within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, to give authentic copies of such individually specified acts of a public nature, relating to the territory in question, intended to be laid as evidence before the arbiter, as have been issued under the authority or are in the exclusive possession of each party.

No maps, surveys, or topographical evidence of any description shall be adduced by either party beyond that which is hereinafter stipulated; nor shall any fresh evidence of any description be adduced or adverted to by either party, other than that mutually communicated or applied for, as aforesaid.

Each party shall have full power to incorporate in or annex to either its first or second statement any portion of the reports of the Commissioners, or papers thereunto annexed, and other written documents laid before the commission under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, or of the other evidence mutually communicated or applied for, as above provided, which it may think fit.

ARTICLE 4. The map called Mitchell's map, by which the framers of the treaty of 1783 are acknowledged to have regulated their joint and official proceedings, and the map A, which has been agreed on by the contracting parties as a delineation of the water-courses, and of the boundary lines in reference to the said water-courses, as contended for by each party respectively, and which has accordingly been signed by the above named plenipotentiaries at the same time with this convention, shall be annexed to the statements of the contracting parties, and be the only maps that shall be considered as evidence, mutually acknowledged by the contracting parties, of the topography of the country.

It shall, however, be lawful for either party to annex to his respective first statement, for the purposes of general illustration, any of the maps, surveys, or topographical delineations which were filed with the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, any engraved map heretofore published, and also a transcript of the above mentioned map A, or of a section thereof, in which transcript each party may lay down the highlands or other features of the country, as it shall think fit; the water-courses and the boundary lines, as claimed by each party, remaining as laid down in the said map A.

But this transcript, as well as all the other maps, surveys, or topographical delineations, other than the map A and Mitchell's map, intended to be thus annexed by either party to the respective statements, shall be communicated to the other party, in the same manner as aforesaid, within nine months after the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, and shall be subject to such objections and observations as the other contracting party may deem it expedient to make thereto, and shall annex to his first statement, either in the margin of such transcript, map, or maps, or otherwise.

ARTICLE 5. All the statements, papers, maps, and documents above mentioned, and which shall have been mutually communicated as aforesaid, shall, without any addition, subtraction, or alteration, whatsoever, be jointly and simultaneously delivered in to the arbitrating Sovereign or State within two years after the enchange of ratifications of this convention, unless the arbiter should not, within that time, have consented to act as such; in which case, all the said statements, papers, maps, and documents shall be laid before him within six months after the time when he shall have consented so to act. No other statements, papers, maps, or documents shall ever be laid before the arbiter except as hereinafter provided.

ARTICLE 6. In order to facilitate the attainment of a just and sound decision on the part of the arbiter, it is agreed that, in case the said arbiter should desire further elucidation or evidence in regard to any specific point contained in any of the said statements submitted to him, the requisition for such elucidation or evidence shall be simultaneously made to both parties, who shall thereupon be permitted to bring further evidence, if required, and to make each a written reply to the specific questions submitted by the said arbiter, but no further; and such evidence and replies shall be immediately communicated by each party to the other.

And in case the arbiter should find the topographical evidence, laid as aforesaid before him, insufficient for the purposes of a sound and just decision, he shall have the power of ordering additional surveys to be made of any portions of the disputed boundary line or territory as he may think fit; which surveys shall be made at the joint expense of the contracting parties, and be considered as conclusive by them.

ARTICLE 7. The decision of the arbiter, when given, shall be taken as final and conclusive; and it shall be carried, without reserve, into immediate effect by Commissioners appointed for that purpose by the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 8. This convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in nine months from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of our arms.

Done at London, the twenty-ninth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at London on the second day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, by William Beach Lawrence, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of his Britannic Majesty, and the Right Honorable Charles Grant and Henry Unwin Addington, Esq., on the part of their respective Governments:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, John Quincy Adams, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled, with good faith, by the United States and the citizens thereof.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 493. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIM OF INDEMNITY FROM SPAIN TO JAMES D. BARRY AND BAILEY AND TORREY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 21, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom were referred the memorial of James D. Barry, of Washington, executor of James Barry, deceased, and a resolution of the House of Representatives of December 18, 1828, directing them to inquire into the expediency of allowing to Bailey and Torrey the amount of their claim, presented to the Commissioners under the 11th article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, ratified February 22, 1819, made the following report:

The above named cases are among the number presented to the Board of Commissioners under the Florida treaty, and by them disallowed, either wholly or in part, from the imperfection or inadequacy of the testimony adduced in their support. The committee submit with this report a letter from the chief clerk in the Department of State, accompanied by another from Mr. Joseph Forrest, containing extracts from the records of the board under the Florida treaty touching these cases.

Numerous applications have been made to Congress by claimants under the Florida treaty, whose claims were allowed only in part, or wholly rejected, by the Board of Commissioners appointed under the 11th article of that treaty. These applications to Congress have, in no single case, been successful, nor has anything been done by the Legislature to encourage the expectation that it would consent to open the award of that board. Should the example of disturbing that award be set, the whole body of unsuccessful claimants might resort to Congress, and even the successful prefer a claim for a further measure of relief. Believing that the Government of the United States has done all in its power for the relief of this class of our citizens, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, while they deeply regret the hardship of many cases of unsuccessful applicants under the provisions of the treaty, feel themselves, nevertheless, unable to propose any measure of relief for the memorialists.

They accordingly ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 8, 1828.

SIR: Agreeably to your note of the 5th instant to me, and in compliance with the request in the one which you wrote to the Secretary on the same day, I have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, the copy of a letter from Mr. Joseph Forrest to myself, together with two bundles of papers, touching the claims of James D. Barry, executor of James Barry, deceased, and of Bailey and Torrey; both of the said claims, as you will perceive from the letter of Mr. Forrest referred to, who was clerk to the commission under the Florida treaty, having been taken from the papers on file in this office, arising under the eleventh article of that treaty.

It is important that these papers should be returned to this office when the committee has no longer any use for them, and I am directed by the Secretary to request you to cause this to be done.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

DANIEL BRENT.

EDWARD EVERETT, Esq., Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1828.

SIR: According to your request, I have examined the papers deposited in the Department of State by the Commissioners under the Florida treaty, in order to select those on file in the cases of claims preferred by Mr. James D. Barry, Ann Torrey, and David Bailey. The papers on file accompany this note.

In the case of Mr. Barry, the board allowed to the claimant $833; but the amount of claims allowed exceeding the five millions stipulated in the treaty, an abatement from each allowance was made of 8¼ per cent., so that Mr. Barry's allowance was reduced to $763 58.

In the cases of Mrs. Torrey and Mr. Bailey, claiming on the same vessel, no allowance was made. The proofs offered to substantiate the claims were returned to General John Mason, who acted as their agent, by the Secretary to the board, during the sitting of the commission, a receipt for which will be found among the papers now handed you, the board having decided on the 26th December, 1823, that the proofs offered were not offered to establish their claims.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOSEPH FORREST.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 494. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIM OF INDEMNITY FROM FRANCE TO JAMES RILEY AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 21, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom were referred the memorials of James Riley, and of Lewis Groning and Michael Kelly, made the following report:

That the case of James Riley, whose memorial, when presented, was printed by order of the House, is a strongly marked case of spoliation under the Milan decree of December 17, 1807. The case of Groning & Kelly is one of spoliation by a French privateer in 1805, prior to the commencement of the continental system, so called, and when great ravages were committed on the commerce of the United States in the West Indies by the armed vessels of France, both public and private.

It is known to the House that memorials of like nature have, at many former sessions, been presented to the consideration of Congress, and that their subject-matter has engaged the especial attention of the Executive, and been pursued for years of urgent, but hitherto unavailing, negotiation.

A resolution of the House of Representatives, passed at the first session of the 19th Congress, directed the preparation by the Secretary of State of a schedule of the claims of our citizens on foreign Powers for spoliations committed on their lawful commerce. This schedule was accordingly prepared. The magnitude of the claims comprehended in that schedule, exceeding $15,000,000, and not probably embracing the entire amount, will have contributed to impress the House with the great interest of this subject to the American people. Considered, apart from all questions of national honor, as an abstraction of so much of the actual capital of the country, it is unquestionably a subject deserving the gravest consideration.

At the commencement of the present session of Congress, the following statement was made by the President in his message to the two Houses: "A fresh effort has recently been made by the minister of the United States residing at Paris to obtain a consideration of the just claims of citizens of the United States to the reparation of wrongs long since committed, many of them frankly acknowledged, and all of them entitled, on every principle of justice, to a candid examination. The proposal last made to the French Government has been to refer the subject, which has formed an obstacle to this consideration, to the determination of a Sovereign, the common friend of both. To this offer no definitive answer has yet been received; but the gallant and honorable spirit which has at all times been the pride and glory of France will not ultimately permit the demands of innocent sufferers to be extinguished in the mere consciousness of power to reject them."

The Committee on Foreign Affairs are not aware that any definitive answer has yet been received from the French Government to this proposal. This delay may partly be ascribed to the change of councils, which, it is matter of notoriety, has recently taken place in that Government.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs are of opinion that this important and painful subject must still remain a matter of negotiation with the two Governments, long as the negotiation has already been pursued, and disastrous as is the delay to many of the claimants.

Many circumstances concur to induce the committee to think that this negotiation will (perhaps before a very long period) begin to open some prospect of procuring the long sought indemnity. The controversy between the two Governments touching the right of entry in the ports of Louisiana (the point pleaded by the French Government as an obstacle to the examination of the claims for spoliations) has, practically, lost much of its importance. In the operation of the commercial convention between the two countries, the discriminating duties have been abrogated. French vessels enter the ports of Louisiana on the same terms as our own, and this by the same tenure as the vessels of Great Britain, or any other foreign Powers with whom we have conventions for a mutual freedom from discriminating duties. The committee cannot permit themselves to think that, after an alleged grievance has been practically removed, in the general operation of a liberal commercial system between the two countries, the enlightened Government of France will allow the former existence of that grievance to operate as a bar to the settlement of the just claims of the citizens of a friendly State. The proposal to refer this controverted point to some impartial Power, the mutual friend of both parties, is so manifestly liberal and reasonable that it cannot well be refused.

Other considerations unite to persuade the committee that the Government of France will eventually see its honor concerned in the payment of these claims. Their admission carries no reproach to the dynasty which the issue of thirty years of revolutions has reinstated in the Government of France. The acts by which our citizens suffered were those of the intermediate Government. In recognizing the right to indemnity of our citizens who suffered under them, his Majesty the King of France, instead of taking a step inconsistent with the character of his own Government, will but add a new sanction to his protest against that which preceded it. At the same time, it deserves to be considered that, however illegal the acts by which our innocent citizens were deprived of their property, France had all the benefit of them. The vessels and their cargoes of our merchants were so much added to the stock of public and private wealth of that country. Supposing their whole value to have gone into the coffers of the Government which seized them, and to have been expended in wars of aggrandizement and ambition, still it must be regarded as so much deducted from that burden of exaction which would otherwise have fallen, without alleviation, on the citizens of France.

In fine, the committee are acquainted with no principles of public law on which the payment of these claims can be withheld. If those exercising the Government of a country at one period be not bound to fulfil the obligations of their immediate predecessors, and if friendly and neutral nations are to be compelled, in self-defence, to take part in the internal contentions of other States, and to sit in judgment on the titles of their rulers, it is plain that the whole political system of the modern world must be broken up, and faith between nations destroyed.

So obvious are these considerations, that the committee will not doubt that they will be felt in their force by the French Government, and that the time will not be much longer delayed when it will order the restoration to our citizens of that property to which France had no title, and of which she has so long had the use.

As there is nothing in the individual cases of the memorialists distinguishing them from other cases of the same general nature, and putting it in the power of the American Government to attempt anything for their especial relief, the Committee on Foreign Affairs are not prepared to recommend any act of legislation in the premises. But, with a view of presenting the general subject in all its points more effectually before the House, they submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House (if the public interest will permit) the instructions given to our minister at the Court of France on the subject of the claims of American citizens against the Government of France, as far as the same have not heretofore been communicated.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 495. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIM OF INDEMNITY FROM FRANCE TO GEORGE BLENKINSHIP.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 21, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George Blenkinship, of the town of Rochester, in the State of Massachusetts, made the following report:

That the memorialist was the owner of a vessel, and part owner of her cargo, fitted out and shipped for Barbadoes in the year 1799; that the vessel was captured by a French sloop-of-war, carried into Guadaloupe, and condemned. He prays that Congress will grant him such relief as, in their wisdom, they may think him entitled to.

The case of the petitioner appears to be one of a very numerous class of French spoliations committed prior to the convention of 1800 between the United States and France. The subject of the claims growing out of these spoliations has repeatedly been before Congress from the year 1802 down to the present time. The committees to whom they have been referred have taken different views of the subject, but have generally reported against the claim of the sufferers upon the Government of the United States. This claim is alleged by those concerned to arise from the renunciation by the United States of these claims against the Government of France when the convention between France and the United States was negotiated in 1800.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs are inclined to think that the strength of the claim against the United States was impaired by a want of information as to the extent and positiveness of this alleged renunciation. The journal and correspondence of our ministers who negotiated the convention, from which alone the nature and extent of the renunciations could be collected, were never made known till at the close of the 19th Congress, when, in obedience to a call of the Senate of the United States, they were communicated in extenso to that body. They establish, incontestably, that the renunciation on the part of the United States was a sine qua non with the Government of France in consenting to abandon the privileges which that Government claimed under the treaty of 1778 and the consular convention of 1788. So long as the American envoys persisted in claiming any kind of indemnity, the French Commissioners insisted on the benefits of those treaties, one of which was a mutual guarantee of the territory of the two parties—a condition which the American Government could not have fulfilled without departing from its neutrality in the war between Great Britain and France. The French Government refused to ratify the treaty without the addition of a clause expressly stating that the two parties respectively renounced their claims. Accordingly, Mr. Madison, in writing to Mr. Pinkney in Spain, in 1804, says, in allusion to this subject, that "the claims from which France was released were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration in a corresponding release of the United States from certain claims on them."

After the communication of the documents in question, by which much new light is thrown on the subject, it was referred, at the last session of Congress, to a select committee of the Senate, by whom a report favorable to the claimants was made but not finally acted upon. At the present session of Congress the subject has, in like manner, been referred to a select committe of the Senate.

Inasmuch as the claim, if it have a valid foundation, accrues from an act of the treaty-making power in this Government, the Committee on Foreign Affairs perceive a convenience in a forbearance, on the part of the House of Representatives, to act upon the present case alone, while the general subject remains pending before the other branch of the Legislature, particularly as the present case is not known to the committee to differ from the large number of others similarly circumstanced.

The committee therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 496. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIM OF INDEMNITY FROM NAPLES TO HENRY HUTTLESTON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 21, 1828.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry Huttleston, of the town of Fairhaven, in the State of Massachusetts, made the following report:

That the memorialist represents himself to have sustained a heavy loss by the seizure and confiscation of his property at Naples, in the year 1808. No statement of facts accompanies the memorial; but the committee presume, from the time at which the loss is stated to have been suffered, that the petitioner is one of a large number of American citizens whose property was first sequestered and then confiscated, in the port of Naples, in the year 1808 and the following years. In the year 1818 a special mission was sent by the Government of the United States to Naples, to urge the just claims, on the part of our citizens who had been deprived of their property, to indemnification. The correspondence between the special minister, Mr. Pinkney, and the Neapolitan Government on this subject was communicated to Congress shortly after the termination of the mission, and gave little hope that the Neapolitan Government, under the state of circumstances then existing, and which has not since materially changed, would make our citizens that indemnity to which, on every principle of natural justice and public law, they are entitled. In order, however, to prevent the continued silence of the American Government from growing into a prescription against these claims, a special agent was despatched to Naples in 1825. The results of this agency have not yet been called for by either House of Congress. Presuming that the House is not, as yet, prepared for any legislation on this subject, or that, at all events, it would decline proceeding to such legislation without previous knowledge of the results of the last application to the Neapolitan Government, the following resolutions are submitted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House (if the public interest will permit) a copy of the correspondences between the Governments of the United States and Naples, touching the claims of American citizens on the Government of Naples, as far as the same has not heretofore been communicated.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the memorialist.

CONCILIATORY INTERVENTION WITH SPAIN TO MAKE PEACE WITH MEXICO AND THE CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 21, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State, with a copy of the note of the minister of the United States to Spain, dated January 20, 1826, requested by a resolution of the House of the 19th instant.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 21, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 20, 1828.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th instant, requesting the President to communicate to that House, if the public interest permit, a copy of the note of the minister of the United States to Spain, bearing date the 20th January, 1826, has the honor respectfully to submit to the President a copy of the said note.

H. CLAY.

[Confidential.]

Mr. Alexander H. Everett, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Spain, to the Duke del Infantado, Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

MADRID, January 20, 1826.

SIR: The Government of the United States of America have looked with deep interest at the war now existing between Spain and her ancient colonies ever since its commencement. Situated in the immediate neighborhood of the regions where it has been carried on, they could not feel the same indifference upon the subject which has been shown by some other nations inhabiting a distant quarter of the globe. Their position, and the relations naturally resulting from it, were circumstances over which they had no control; and it was not in their power, had they wished it, to shrink from the responsibility that devolved upon them. It only remained, to meet the delicacy of the situation by a corresponding circumspection in their conduct, to proceed upon acknowledged principles, and in conformity with the best information they could procure. Such has been in fact the course of their policy. They have spared no pains in endeavoring to obtain the most accurate accounts of the state of the war at its several periods; and they have adopted no important measure without great consideration, and a careful inquiry into the laws and usages of civilized countries. In pursuance of this system, they have considered it their duty to observe a fair and just neutrality between the two parties, and to entertain pacific and friendly relations with both alike; and they have, with good faith, and to the best of their ability, acted accordingly. They have lent no military or naval assistance to either, but have freely granted to both the hospitality of their ports and territory, and have allowed the agents of both to procure within their jurisdiction, in the way of lawful trade, any supplies which suited their convenience. When the independence of the colonies appeared to them to be well established, it became a duty to regard and treat them as sovereign Powers; and their increasing intercourse with the United States made it convenient and suitable to organize the relations between the countries in the usual form, by exchanging diplomatic and commercial agents invested with the usual powers and characters. But, while the Government of the United States felt themselves not only justified in these measures, but bound in duty to adopt them, they have continued to observe, in word and in deed, their former course of strict and honest neutrality. They have never taken upon themselves to express an opinion upon the merits of the quarrel, or upon the validity of the arguments advanced by either party in support of its pretensions, still less to interfere actively in favor of one or the other. The people of the United States, including, as private persons, the individuals composing the Government, have generally felt and manifested a strong sympathy with the inhabitants of the colonies, in consequence of the similarity of their position with that of the United States half a century ago; but this natural feeling has not been allowed to influence the public measures. The President and Congress, in acting upon this subject, have uniformly proceeded upon strict principles and known facts. Their decisions on important points were adopted with almost unexampled unanimity, and have been, it is believed, very generally approved throughout the civilized world. They have since been closely followed by the two enlightened and powerful Governments whose position naturally called upon them to take the lead, in this respect, among the nations of Europe.

While pursuing this line of conduct, the Government of the United States have also considered it their duty and their policy to employ their good offices, from time to time, with both parties, for the purpose of reconciling them to each other, and bringing the war to a close. This tedious contest, carried on in their immediate neighborhood, has been, and still is, a source of no little actual inconvenience to them in various ways. It has been, in particular, the ultimate cause of the prevalence of piracy, to a fearful extent, upon the waters that surround their coasts—an evil which compels them to keep a strong naval force in active service, at a very unhealthy and dangerous post, and which nothing but the establishment of peace will ever completely eradicate. They have, therefore, the most powerful motives for wishing, in their own interest, to effect this great object. But, independently of any such considerations, the common sentiments of humanity, and the sympathy which all civilized and Christian nations naturally feel in each other's welfare, lead them to desire the close of this long and cruel struggle. Entertaining, and wishing to entertain, the most friendly relations with both parties, they cannot but feel the deepest interest in the restoration of harmony and good understanding between them, and in the consequent general pacification of the American continent. They have accordingly given to both, on many occasions, such counsels as appeared most likely to promote this object. As the independence of the colonies has appeared to them, for some years past, to be well established, they can imagine no other means of effecting the great purpose in question, except by the consent of his Majesty to treat with his ancient provinces on the footing of sovereign and independent States; and they have, from time to time, with all the delicacy required by the importance and peculiar character of the subject, and with all the respect which they sincerely cherish for the Spanish Government and nation, advised this measure. These counsels, although his Majesty has not yet thought proper to act upon them, have been received and listened to in the friendly spirit in which they were given; and the Government of the United States have been induced, in consequence, and by the generally friendly character of their relations with Spain, to continue the same course, as occasion may appear to render it expedient. I was accordingly instructed, upon leaving my country, to express to his Catholic Majesty, and his ministers, the firm conviction and earnest wishes of the Government which I have the honor to represent, in regard to this question. I have already communicated them in conversation to your excellency's predecessor, and to yourself. In order to state them with more distinctness, and to enable your excellency to lay them before his Majesty in the precise form in which they are conveyed to you, I now take the liberty of troubling you with a few suggestions in writing upon this great and interesting subject.

The present moment seems to be a favorable one for reviewing the decisions that were taken at an earlier period of the war, and for considering whether events have not since occurred which make it expedient to change them. A course of proceeding which was apparently wise and politic ten or fifteen years ago, may have been rendered, by the subsequent progress of affairs, impolitic and ruinous. It may have been natural for the King to make war upon his colonies at the time when they first declared their independence; when there was a probability of reducing them again to their allegiance, and when it was yet uncertain whether the efforts they were making were the work of a few factious spirits or of the whole community; and it may, nevertheless, be in the highest degree inexpedient to continue the attempt to subjugate these colonies now that they have grown up into six or eight populous and powerful nations, situated in a distant quarter of the globe, in the full exercise of all the prerogatives of sovereignty, and respected and acknowledged as sovereign by several of the greatest Powers of the world. It is the usage of prudent Governments not to adhere with too much constancy to any system merely because it has once been adopted, but to mark the course of affairs, and to regulate their conduct by the present situation of things rather than the past. A statesman who attempts to counteract the force of circumstances, or, in more religious and juster language, to defy the will of God, will find his efforts ineffectual and generally injurious to himself. The epochs of a critical and important character that present themselves from time to time in the progress of political affairs, appear more especially to invite the Governments interested in them to reconsider the principles upon which they are acting, in order either to assure themselves that they are in the right, or to shift their course if they find themselves in error. One of these great epochs is just now occurring in the history of the Spanish American colonies. After declaring their independence of the mother country, surmounting the obstacles that first presented themselves, consolidating to a great degree their political institutions, and maintaining their national existence for seventeen years without any organized concert among themselves, they are at this moment meeting, for the first time, by their plenipotentiaries, in a general Congress, for the purpose of regulating their mutual interests, and entering into an alliance, offensive and defensive, against their common enemies. This change in their position is evidently one of vast consequence. It calls imperiously upon the Spanish Government to consider well the system upon which it is now proceeding, and to examine anew the whole subject of its relations with these States. It has also been thought, by the Government of the United States, that the occurrence of this remarkable event furnishes an occasion upon which neutral and friendly Powers might, with propriety, renew their good offices in attempts to bring about a reconciliation between the parties to the war. They have been induced by this motive to communicate their opinions and their wishes to his Majesty's ministers in a more formal manner at this time than they have hitherto employed, and to invite the leading Powers of Europe to concur with them, as far as they might think it expedient, in the same great and benevolent purpose. France and Portugal have lately led the way in a course of proceeding similar to that which is now recommended to his Catholic Majesty. It only remains for the King to give one signal proof of magnanimity and wisdom in order to complete the pacification of the whole American continent. The President is well assured that the suggestions now presented by his order will be received as evidences of the friendly disposition of the Government of the United States; and he ventures to hope that they will be listened to with attention, and will not be without effect.

It has been thought a proper mark of respect to the Government of his Catholic Majesty to accompany the communication of the opinion entertained upon this subject by that of the United States with a statement of the reasons upon which they have been founded, that they might not appear to have been taken up capriciously and hastily, or to have been affected, in any degree, by a natural sympathy with the fortunes of the colonies. They have been adopted in general upon a deliberate view of all the information that could be procured; and a full recapitulation of the particulars from which they have been deduced would embrace a mass of details much too large to be brought within the compass of an official note. There might also be a difference, as respects some of these details, between the information that has been conveyed to the Government of the United States and to that of his Catholic Majesty. There are, however, certain great and leading facts in the history and present state of the war, notorious to the world at large, and, of course, familiarly known to his Majesty's Government, which are considered by that of the United States as sufficient of themselves to demonstrate the impossibility of recovering the colonies. In the following remarks I shall confine myself as much as possible to these points, and shall endeavor to avoid any allusion to doubtful matters, either of fact or of right.

It is now about seventeen years since the occurrence of the first movements in the colonies. They were not occasioned by a rebellious or discontented spirit, but were the effect of the invasion of the mother country, and of the usurpation of his Majesty's throne by a foreigner. They were equally legitimate with the movements which were made at the same time in Spain for the purpose of shaking off the French yoke, and were, indeed, precisely similar to them in character. Five or six years elapsed before this great object was obtained, and before the King returned from his captivity in a foreign country.

During this time the peninsula was the theatre of constant war; occupied and wasted by contending armies, foreign and domestic; distracted by political divisions; and, upon the whole, in a state approaching very nearly to entire anarchy. It is not singular that the colonies, having been compelled for a time to govern themselves, should have so continued to do until the King's return, without regard to the authority which the successive ephemeral Governments at home might pretend to exercise over them. The King's return introduced another order of events; but the colonies were now, and had been for several years past, in possession of the privileges of self-government, and a new state of things had in consequence grown up among them. They had formed new relations with each other, and with foreign Powers. Their whole political situation was completely altered. Were they bound, under these circumstances, to return at once to their ancient allegiance, or had the new position into which they had been thrown by events beyond their control, brought with it new rights and new duties incompatible with their former relations to the Spanish Crown? On this, which is the great question of right between the parties, the Government of the United States have never ventured to express an opinion. It is only on points of fact and expediency that they have felt themselves at liberty to offer their counsels.

Whatever may be thought of the merits of the case, a war, under all the circumstances, was, in a manner, unavoidable. It was accordingly undertaken by his Majesty's Government, and carried on with all the vigor and perseverance which the situation of the Kingdom would admit. Soon after the King's return a powerful expedition was fitted out for America, under the command of one of the first generals of the age, and directed against a very well chosen point in the territory of the colonies. Had it been possible to subjugate them with the means at the disposal of Spain, this expedition must have been attended with complete success. But the effort of General Morillo and his army to subdue the Americans produced no other effect than that of teaching them the military arts, which they wanted, and of forming among them, in the school of experience, a great commander, whose name alone is now a tower of strength to his countrymen. General Morillo, after seeing almost the whole of his army perish by his side, after performing miracles of courage, skill, and perseverance, after meriting all praise, excepting that of humanity, finally returned to Spain. The few troops that remained of his army were soon compelled to shut themselves up in a fortress, and not long after to surrender. The attempts made at home to fit out another considerable expedition terminated in a revolution. The troops which had been stationed in Peru and Chili, after carrying on the war for several years with various success, were finally reduced to capitulate by the decisive victory of Ayacucho, which exhibited a second great commander in a young man of only eight and twenty years of age. For some time before that event there had been no royal forces in Buenos Ayres, and none in Mexico, excepting the garrison of a single fortress. This battle terminated the active military operations of Spain upon the American continent; and the war has been, in fact, for nearly two years past, at an end.

Will it be said that it is the intention of the Spanish Government to renew it, and that other expeditions may be more successful than the former ones? Is it possible to suppose for a moment that Spain, in her present situation—her own territory partly occupied by foreign troops, enfeebled and convulsed by the effects of seventeen years of almost uninterrupted revolution, invasion, and war, without funds, and without credit—can fit out armies equal to the conquest of six or eight powerful nations a thousand leagues off? Were it even possible, as it evidently is not, that another expedition should be despatched immediately, as strong and as well appointed as that of General Morillo, would such a one be more likely to succeed now than his did, in fact, several years ago? Would it be less difficult to contend with accomplished and veteran commanders at the head of disciplined armies than it was with the fresh recruits and unexperienced officers out of which these armies and their generals have been formed? Or would the organized and acknowledged Governments that now exist offer a less formidable resistance than was made by the same communities when almost in a state of anarchy? These are evidently suppositions of things not merely improbable, or, in the common course of nature, impossible, but chimerical. They involve impossibility upon impossibility. It is impossible that new expeditions should be equipped; if they could be equipped, it is impossible that they should succeed. Since, then, the war is at an end, and cannot be renewed, it would seem that a peace, concluded on the best terms possible under such circumstances, would immediately follow.

It is understood, however, that his Majesty's Government, without intending to make any further attempts to subjugate the colonies by actual force, nevertheless entertain the expectation that they may, perhaps, be brought back to their allegiance by the effect of internal dissensions; and that it is principally upon that account that they consider it impolitic to treat with them as sovereign Powers. This expectation is no better founded, according to the views of the Government of the United States, than would be that of conquering them by actual war. It is believed that there is no greater probability of the occurrence of intestine troubles in these States than in other established and organized bodies politic; and that, should they occur, they could not, by any possibility, be turned in future to the profit of Spain.

Every community which changes its form of government violently and suddenly, is visited almost of necessity by a period of anarchy and civil war. This was an evil which the Spanish colonies, in separating from the mother country, had reason to expect that they should be obliged to encounter, and from which they have, in fact, suffered, in a greater or less degree. Serious divisions occurred in most, if not all, of them, soon after the declaration of their independence, and for a time threatened their existence as sovereign Powers. In Mexico an adventurer usurped the Government by military force, and assumed the title of Emperor. In Colombia the state of affairs was long unsettled, and there seems to have been at one moment considerable danger of insubordination among the blacks. In Peru and Chili the leading public characters were frequently at variance; and Buenos Ayres was for awhile the theatre of actual civil war. It was necessary that these troubles should terminate in one of two ways—either by bringing back the colonies to their allegiance, or by subsiding and disappearing under the influence of the new independent Governments. The latter part of the alternative has in fact been realized. The difficulties to which I have alluded, and which accompanied so naturally the first attempts of the colonies to establish their national existence, are now at an end, and the fate of those persons who were engaged in them has not been such as to hold out much encouragement to future imitators. The disturbers of the established order have met, in almost every remarkable instance, with signal defeat and exemplary punishment. Iturbide, in Mexico, General Piar, in Colombia, the Carreras, in Chili, were publicly executed as common traitors. Saint Martin, who deserted his post at the head of the Government of Peru at a critical period, lost his influence, sunk into insignificance, and is said to be now living unknown at Brussels. Pueyrredon, who appears to have been gained by the agents of his Majesty while occupying the post of Supreme Director of the Republic of the United Provinces of La Plata, could not carry with him a single man, was obliged to quit his post and his country, and has since, it is understood, died somewhere, in obscurity, of a broken heart. Such have been the fortunes of the principal authors of internal dissensions in America, and they are evidently not of a kind to encourage new attempts. In fact, since the disappearance of these first troubles, the reign of good order and of consolidated political institutions seems to have taken place everywhere, and is apparently established. Five of the six principal States that have been formed out of his Majesty's colonial dominions, not including Paraguay, of which the internal condition is but little known to foreigners, present as tranquil an appearance as any part of Europe or the world. Peru is in some degree unsettled, but the tranquillity of that country is secured by the battle of Ayacucho, and the final arrangement of its political institutions will not probably be long delayed. Having thus organized their respective Governments at home, these States are already beginning to extend their views abroad, and are at this moment assembled by their ministers in a Congress at Panama for the purpose of forming among themselves some concerted schemes of action. This great event may be considered as indicating distinctly the consolidation of their several political institutions, and the disappearance of all pre-existing internal dissensions.

The troubles which naturally accompanied the first establishment of these new States having thus subsided, they cannot, in the natural course of events, be expected to return. They were incident to a particular period in the history of the colonies, and this period having passed away, the dangers incident to it have naturally passed away with it. The various epochs in the progress of communities, like the different ages in the life of man, are subject to particular disorders; but, in both cases, those that belong to one period can never be encountered at another. Troubles may doubtless occur in the nations that have been formed out of the Spanish colonies, as in all others; but they will not be hereafter of the same kind with those which were occasioned by the separation from the mother country and the attempt to establish an independent national existence. Let it be supposed, however, for argument's sake, that internal dissensions should again arise, equally serious with those which have already arisen and subsided; let it be supposed that a second Iturbide shall appear in Mexico, another General Piar in Colombia, that Buenos Ayres or Chili shall again be the theatre of civil war; that a new Pueyrredon should be gained by his Majesty's agents; or finally, in order to exhaust every supposition, however improbable, let it be imagined that Bolivar and Sucre shall belie their noble characters, disappoint the hopes of the world, and turn out Bonapartes and Cromwells instead of Washingtons; of what advantage would the occurrence of these or similar events be to the royalist cause? Or what additional probability would they furnish of a return of the colonies to their allegiance? If his Majesty's Government found it impossible to turn to any account the troubles that actually broke out at at a time when the state of the colonies was yet unsettled and they had a large military force in the country, would they be able to do it now, when they have not a soldier not under close siege from California to Cape Horn, and when the new Governments have acquired consistency and vigor? If Iturbide, when he overthrew the Mexican Government, while the royalist party was still imposing, and the prospect of success in the establishment of independence uncertain, did not think of proclaiming the King, would another Iturbide do it now? If the insubordination of Piar, under the eyes of General Morillo, could not be made the means of reducing Venezuela, would another black insurgent be likely to prove a better instrument, with nobody present to direct and employ him? If Bolivar or Sucre should attempt to establish a military despotism, would it be in the name of the legitimate King, and under the royal Spanish flag? These suppositions, like that of an actual military conquest of the country, are obviously not merely improbable, but chimerical, and full of inherent contradictions. The time to take advantage of internal dissensions, if ever, was the time when they might have been expected to occur—when they did in fact occur, and when the King had his armies in the country ready to back a discontented leader. If nothing could be done under all these favorable circumstances, it is vain to expect a better result at present, when every circumstance is of an adverse character.

Finally, such is the strength of public opinion prevailing throughout the colonies in favor of independence, that nothing would be really effected, even by successful attempts to create internal divisions and to gain over the popular leaders. This is evidently shown by the fate of Pueyrredon, to which I have already alluded. Here was a person holding the supreme executive power in one of the new States, enjoying a high reputation, and apparently possessing great influence, who consented to employ it in endeavoring to bring about a union of the colony under his government with the mother country in the most plausible way in which it could be done. This colony was precisely the one in which political dissension had prevailed to the greatest extent, having assumed for a long period the shape of actual civil war. The negotiation presented an additional probability of success, from being carried on under the auspices of one of the most powerful monarchs of Europe in alliance with his Catholic Majesty. The King had at that time one or two considerable armies in America ready to lend their aid in promoting the intended object. Here was a case, if ever there was or will be one, in which something might be expected from the effect of internal divisions and from the adhesion of leading characters. What happened? Did Pueyrredon, under all these favorable circumstances, succeed in bringing back to its allegiance the colony under his government? I have already stated that he did not carry with him a single man. He could not stay in his country. He was crushed at once to the earth by the execration and contempt of the whole American continent; and, in order to escape an ignominious death, was compelled to hide himself in some obscure corner, where he has since died of chagrin and shame. Such is the history of the only considerable apostate that has yet been gained from the cause of independence in America. It proves that whatever may be the merits of the contest, there is a force of public sentiment arrayed in support of this cause too strong to be resisted by any individual, however eminent; that nothing can be hoped by Spain from the effect of internal dissensions in the colonies; and that no means, excepting that of actual physical force, will ever bring them, or any part of them, again under the dominion of his Catholic Majesty. The impossibility of employing this means with success has already been shown, and is understood to be felt by his Majesty's Government.

It has sometimes been said, however, that Spain might reasonably be encouraged in the hope of recovering her ancient colonies by the great and sudden revolutions that have occurred in Europe in our own time. The late King of France, after being deprived of his hereditary rights and dominions for twenty-five years, finally succeeded in obtaining possession of them. Why may not the King of Spain in like manner recover his American possessions, although he should have lost them for an equal length of time? It is understood that this argument, from analogy, is considered by some persons of great respectability as the principal one that can be urged in favor of the continuance of the war, and it may therefore be proper to give it some attention.

The conquest of the colonies must be effected, if at all, by the aid of means; and the example of the King of France is applicable, in the present instance, only as far as the same means which were employed to place him on the throne are now at the disposal of the King of Spain for the purpose of recovering his lost possessions in America. What were these means, and how far can they probably be employed at present by the Spanish Government?

The revolution in the Government of France, of which the return of Louis XVIII was the natural consequence, was accomplished by the military force of other European Powers at a time when the King had not a soldier in the field in his own immediate service. Is it probable that there will be now or ever a similar alliance of these Powers for the purpose of restoring to the King his ancient dominions in America? What was the motive which induced all the Sovereigns of Europe to unite in a joint attack upon the Government of Bonaparte? It was no other than the direct interest they had in overthrowing that Government, on account of the inconveniences, more or less oppressive, which they all suffered from its continuance. Have they all, or any of them, any such motive for opposing at present the independence of the Spanish colonies? It is evident that their direct interest, as far as they have any in the affair, is on the other side; and that the independence of America, instead of being an inconvenience to them, is rather advantageous than otherwise, as it affords them a greater freedom of intercourse with these vast and wealthy regions than they would enjoy under any colonial system, however liberal. Their interest, therefore, would naturally lead them, considered merely as neutral Powers, to take part with the Americans, rather than with the Spanish Government. Such of them as possessed extensive and valuable colonies might be supposed, perhaps, to sympathize with Spain in this contest, either because these colonies had actually thrown off their allegiance, or might be expected to do so; and these, if any, are the Powers which would have an interest in assisting his Catholic Majesty, or in wishing at least for his success. What, then, has been the policy of the Power thus situated? France and Portugal have just acknowledged the independence of their ancient transatlantic dominions. England and Holland, the only nations now possessing colonies of consequence, have acknowledged the independence of South America. It so happens, therefore, that the four Powers which have or had colonies are precisely those which have given the most unequivocal proof that it is not their intention to deviate from the line of neutrality, by engaging in the war on the side of Spain. If such be the policy of these nations, which alone had some little indirect interest in common with that of his Catholic Majesty, what can be expected from the rest, which have all a pretty strong interest on the other side? There is evidently no probability that they will enter into a great European alliance for the reduction of America, like that which was employed for the overthrow of Bonaparte; nor is it believed that his Majesty's Government expect any such co-operation or assistance. It is, therefore, not in their power to take advantage of the same means which were used by the King of France to obtain possession of his hereditary dominions; and his example has, of course, no application to the present circumstances of his Catholic Majesty.

I fear that I may have taxed somewhat too severely the attention of your excellency by the length to which these considerations have been already drawn out; but it is difficult to touch, however concisely, upon the several leading points of so great a question without entering into a pretty extensive course of remarks. If the above statement of the grounds upon which the Government of the United States have formed their opinion in regard to this question be at all correct, it follows conclusively that there is no chance of recovering the colonies either by actual military force, by the effect of internal dissensions, or by the aid of foreign Powers. The object of the war is therefore unattainable. What remains, then, but to escape as soon as possible from its inconveniences, and to conclude peace at once? Peace is, of itself, and in all cases, the greatest of blessings, and an almost indispensable condition of all public and private prosperity. The advantages, direct and indirect, that would accrue to Spain from making peace at present with the colonies are, in the opinion of the Government which I have the honor to represent, of even more than ordinary value. I fear that I shall exhaust your excellency's patience, but being charged by my Government with the expression of their convictions and wishes upon a subject of such vast magnitude, I should have reason to reproach myself if the effect of their intercession were diminished, and the war protracted, by the omission of any topic that would be likely to have weight with his Catholic Majesty. Allow me, then, my Lord Duke, to request your attention a little longer, and to state to you, very concisely, as they appear to the Government of the United States, the important benefits which would result to Spain from the restoration of peace and the establishment of friendly relations with her ancient colonies.

The immediate inconveniences suffered by Spain from the continuance of the war are far from being inconsiderable, and the cessation of them would constitute, of itself, a very serious advantage. These inconveniences are principally the heavy expense necessary to keep up military and naval establishments adequate to the defence of the West India islands, and the almost entire destruction of the commerce of Spain by the armed vessels and privateers of the new American States. It is understood that the whole revenue which would accrue from the islands is, at present, absorbed by the charges of securing them against the danger of an attack. When to this great expense is added that of fitting out occasionally at home expeditions intended for their defence, it is clear that the burden must be considerable, especially in the present embarrassed state of the finances. The restoration of peace would remove this evil at once, and would, also, give new life to the Spanish commerce, which is now almost destroyed by the American privateers. These enterprising navigators not only cover the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and of the passage thence to Spain, but have lately ventured across the Atlantic, and almost blockade, at the present moment, the ports of the Peninsula and the entrance of the Mediterranean. The coasting trade is nearly at an end, and, as far as it is continued, must be carried on under convoy. It is true that the commerce of Spain, under the national flag, has not been for some years past very considerable; but the loss of the whole, or the greater part of it, such as it is, is still a serious inconvenience. The desolation of the seaports, and the falling off in the amount of the customs, show but too clearly the extent of the evil. The duties paid at Cadiz, which, as your excellency did me the honor to inform me the other day, were a hundred millions of reals before the commencement of the present troubles, are now, I understand, something less than four. When the inconveniences of this war are thus brought home to the resources of the Government and to the daily life of his Majesty's subjects, is it not time to consider whether it affords any advantages or hopes to constitute an adequate compensation for sacrifices of such vast importance?

In addition to these great mischiefs, which are actually suffered, and which would be removed by the termination of the war, there is another perhaps still more serious impending in immediate prospect which, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, nothing but a speedy restoration of peace can avert—I mean the loss of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. These possessions are, for all purposes of revenue, already in a great measure lost; the whole amount of receipts drawn from them being, as is understood, exhausted by the charges of their defence. The continuance of the war for two or three years longer, perhaps for one, must, in all human probability, occasion their complete alienation in one form or another. Hostilities being now at an end on the continent, and the new States being compelled, by the refusal of Spain to make peace, to keep up their military and naval establishments they must, of course, employ them upon some active service. The Spanish islands present the most natural and advantageous point for attack, and will, of course, be attempted. Without intending to disparage the valor of his Majesty's armies on this station, still less the talent and efficiency of the Governor General—an officer of whom the Government of the United States have reason to speak in the highest terms of respect and estimation—I may add that it can hardly be doubted, considering the nature of the population of the islands, and their vicinity to the continent, that an attack would result either in their immediate conquest by the new States, or in a protracted civil war, which would put an end at once to their present prosperous condition, and would occasion, in like manner, their ultimate loss. It is believed, on the other hand, by the Government of the United States, that by making peace now his Majesty might insure the possession of these valuable colonies for a long and indefinite period of time to come. Under the system of free trade, upon which they are now fortunately governed, they have flourished almost beyond precedent. The inhabitants are prosperous and wealthy, and must, of course, be satisfied with their condition. Relieved from the burden incident to the defence of the islands, they would find their situation still further improved. There is no reason to suppose that under these circumstances any foreign Power would attempt to molest them, or to infringe upon the rights of his Majesty to their government; and, without pretending to prophecy what may happen in the course of centuries, it is every way probable that, for as long a period at least as any political combinations formed at the present day can be expected to produce effects, these islands would continue to acknowledge, quietly and cheerfully, the supremacy of Spain, and to constitute at once a rich appendage to the Peninsula and a convenient entrepôt for the immense trade which, in time of peace, must necessarily grow up between the mother country and the colonies.

Such would be the consequences resulting from the mere termination of the war; the removal of the immediate evils occasioned by it—such as the decline of commerce, and the burden of defending the islands—would be a real benefit. The assurance of preserving Porto Rico and Cuba would be another; but these negative advantages, however considerable, are of small importance when compared with those of a positive kind, which this Kingdom would derive from the conclusion of peace and the establishment of friendly relations with the colonies. Permit me, then, sir, to enlarge a little upon this topic, and, after touching very briefly upon the present unfortunate position of Spain, to present to you the more agreeable picture of her situation, as, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, it might and would be under a system of free intercourse with the ancient colonies, on a footing of equality and mutual independence.

The present distressed condition of Spain is a fact too notorious to require proof, and too painful to be dwelt upon without necessity. In alluding to it I shall quote the language of a report made last year by the Treasurer General to the Minister of Finance.

"Spain," says this officer, "has been the victim of political convulsions. It is extremely unpleasant to me to be obliged to relate disagreeable things, and to present unfavorable pictures; but, in the alternative of perhaps putting public tranquillity to hazard, I should consider myself criminal if any fears or private views made me conceal evils which require an immediate remedy, especially when, with all my efforts, I am unable to stifle the evils which are bursting forth in every quarter. The resources have diminished, and are daily diminishing. The great sums which used to be received from America, and which, in tranquil times, amounted annually to more than a hundred and sixty millions of reals, have fallen off. The customs, the tobacco duties, the salt duties, and other branches of the revenue, have sustained a defalcation amounting, by estimate, to another hundred millions, so that the revenue is scarcely sufficient to cover half the expenditure. Public credit is ruined by the enormous weight of the debt; and the measures that have been resorted to in this Department have failed to produce the expected results. So great a deficit, and so general a want of confidence, create uneasiness in all classes of society. Men neglect their private contracts, and the country is constantly exposed to the terrible effects of the general discontent, which is the necessary consequence of such a state of things."

Such is the alarming picture of the present state of Spain, presented in a public report by one of his Majesty's distinguished servants. The case, as the Treasurer observes, is one that demands an immediate remedy. Fortunately the great measure of making peace with the colonies, so desirable and necessary on other accounts, holds out, in addition, to the Kingdom the prospect of speedy and complete relief from its present distresses. The American States would doubtless consent to furnish, in return for the acknowledgment of their independence, such pecuniary supplies as would be sufficient to remove all financial embarrassments, and to re-establish the public credit on a solid basis. This great object being accomplished, the commercial relations that would naturally grow up between the mother country and the ancient colonies would open new, copious, and permanent sources of wealth, amply sufficient to complete the work of restoration, and even, in all probability, to elevate this Kingdom from its present state of depression to a height of greatness and glory which it never reached before. Thus the King would not only, in consequence of taking this measure, be crowned with the gratitude and love of sixteen millions of Americans, but would merit and obtain, by a single act, through all succeeding ages, the glorious title of the restorer of the Spanish monarchy.

In regard to the first of these points, viz: the supplies that would probably be furnished by the colonies in return for the acknowledgment of their independence, I wish to be understood as speaking entirely without authority from them, and without having the intention or the right to commit them in the smallest degree. I presume, however, that there can be no question upon this subject. The late example of Hayti shows to what an extent a community, in the situation of the Spanish settlements in America, is willing to make immediate sacrifices, in order to obtain complete and permanent security. It may be added, nevertheless, that the sooner the recognition is decided on the greater will be the probability of obtaining from it considerable advantages of this description.

The manner in which the establishment of commercial relations with the colonies would operate in restoring the prosperity and promoting the wealth and greatness of Spain is sufficiently obvious; but, as this is the most agreeable part of the subject, I shall make no apology for dwelling upon it a little longer.

The decline of industry occasioned by long and frequent political convulsions has been the immediate cause of the decay of the wealth and greatness of Spain, and the revival of industry is the only possible means by which this decay can be checked, and a contrary course of recovery commenced. The return of peace, especially after long intestine wars, has a natural tendency to produce such a revival, as well by restoring to productive labor the hands that were employed in the armies as by affording to the whole community that security for their persons and property which they cannot enjoy in the midst of convulsions, and without which nobody can labor with spirit or effect. But in order to bring about so complete and extensive a revival of industry as is wanted in this country, something more than this would be requisite; and it would also be necessary that some important change in the political or economical situation of the Kingdom should create a considerable increase of the ordinary demand for the products of labor. This would produce, immediately, an increased demand for laborers, a rise of wages, an augmentation of profits in all the branches of industry, and of the rents and value of land, and, in its more remote consequences, the extension of industry in all its branches, attended with an increase of population and of the comforts and well-being of all classes of society. Now, such an increase in the demand for the products of Spanish labor would be the direct consequence of the renewal of friendly relations with the colonies. New settlements possessing the tastes imparted by civilization and situated, at the same time, like the European colonies in America, in the midst of an extensive country not yet brought under cultivation, naturally turn their attention, in the first instance, to agriculture, as the most agreeable and profitable of all occupations, and depend for manufactures on the labor of older nations. Among these the mother country, in consequence of the community of language, tastes, and manners, must, of course, enjoy the preference. In this case, therefore, sixteen millions of Americans would immediately resort to Spain for all the supplies which they wanted from abroad, and which Spain could furnish. It is true that, in the present state of industry in this country, Spain would probably not be able to satisfy entirely this immense demand, and that the Americans would be obliged to seek, in other countries, many articles which they could not find in this. But the encouragement to labor afforded by this or by any other cause must, of course, operate at first only upon such branches of industry as are already established. If the new demand from America for the products of Spanish labor did not produce a revival of industry, the fact would prove that such a revival is impossible under the most favorable circumstances. But there is no reason to suppose that this is the case. Skill and labor enough still remain in this country to afford an ample basis for improvement and future progress. The demand from the colonies would operate, in the first instance, upon such products as now present themselves, and which, though chiefly agricultural, are not of the growth of America. The wines and fruits of the southern provinces of the Kingdom, and the manufactures of the eastern, would be sought with avidity by communities whose tastes have been formed to them by long and hereditary usage. The transportation of these and other articles would employ the navigation of Biscay and Galicia, diffuse life through the seaports, and give at once a wholesome spring to the circulation of the body politic. Such would be the first effects of this new situation; but its benefits would not end here. The profits resulting from the fresh impulse thus given to labor would augment the capital in the hands of the enterprising classes of the community, and would lead to the extension of all the existing branches of industry, to the establishment of new ones, and, in general, to the full development of the resources of this naturally rich and favored Kingdom. Foreign capital, if wanted, would take this direction. For every branch of industry thus established or extended, besides the large and increasing home demand, would be opened the vast market of the colonies, where the population, already so extensive, will probably increase with great rapidity, and require fresh and still augmented supplies faster even than the augmented labor and enterprise of the mother country would be able to furnish them. Under these circumstances, every thing at home must necessarily flourish. The agricultural products, which now constitute the chief wealth of Spain, would be obtained in larger quantities and in higher degrees of perfection. Manufactories would be founded, or enlarged and improved. The cotton fabrics would no longer be driven out of the home market by contraband foreign articles, but, after supplying the demand of Spain, would enter into competition, through all the American States, with those of other countries, and probably be preferred. The excellent wool of Castile and the silk of Valencia would no longer be exported and wrought up abroad, but would give employment and profit to millions of industrious hands at home. The mines, that have been so long neglected, would be explored to furnish materials for constructing the machinery necessary for these productive labors. New branches of industry, now entirely unknown in the country, would spring up under the operation of this prodigious stimulus. Population would increase with rapidity, and all classes would, nevertheless, enjoy a full share of the comforts of life. New communications, by roads and canals, would be opened. Navigation and commerce would wear an entirely different appearance. The value of land and labor would rise in proportion. The ancient cities that are now deserted and decaying would again swarm with crowds of busy inhabitants. The waste lands would be brought into cultivation, and a new life would animate the whole body politic.

Such would be the economical effect upon the mother country of the establishment of friendly relations with the colonies. It is hardly necessary to add that corresponding advantages would result as respects the facility of administering the Government and the general political situation of the Kingdom. The secret causes of the power and influence of States must be looked for in the industry and happiness of the individuals that compose them, as these, in turn, are the effects of wise laws and a just administration. When the people are idle, and of course poor and wretched, the Government, by a necessary consequence, is unprovided with resources, and its state politically weak. When the people are industrious, wealthy, and contented, the Government is also rich and powerful, and the state politically strong. Under the change of circumstances which I have supposed, Spain, instead of finding it difficult to collect a revenue large enough to cover half the annual expenses, reduced to the lowest possible scale, would be one of the wealthiest Governments in Europe. It is intimated by the Treasurer General, in the above extract from his report, that the supplies anciently received from the colonies amounted annually to more than a hundred and sixty million of reals. If this sum was then the measure of their value to the Crown, computed in money, it is certain that they would be worth much more in a state of independence. The immense revenue that might be derived from a free trade with the colonies may be conjectured by observing what has actually occurred in England. The duties collected at the custom-house in Liverpool in the year 1780, amounted to about £80,000. In the year 1823 they had risen to £1,801,402, and had thus increased more than twenty-fold. It is well known that the augmentation in the trade of Liverpool has been occasioned almost entirely by the separation of the United States from England. If the receipts at the custom-house at Cadiz, before the present troubles, were a hundred million reals, and we suppose them to increase only as fast as those of Liverpool, under the influence of a much more powerful stimulating cause, (since the population of the Spanish colonies is now about five times as large as was that of the United States at the close of the Revolutionary war,) even on this moderate supposition they would amount, forty years hence, to about two milliards of reals, and would present a proportionate increase during the intervening years. A single port would thus furnish a sum equal to four times the amount of the whole annual receipts of the Kingdom, and twice the amount of the whole annual expenses, according to the present estimates. Such would be the effect upon one branch of the revenue, of this powerful cause, which would operate, at the same time, with corresponding vigor upon all the others. Nor would the failure of the supplies formerly received in money from the colonies be felt as a loss, since the islands, which would still remain to the Crown, under a system of free trade, and, liberated from the charge of defence, would furnish of themselves probably a larger sum. The duties collected at the port of the Havana alone are said to amount at present to a hundred million reals, and would be greatly augmented by the opening of commerce with the Main.

The effect of such vast additional resources as these would soon be perceived in every branch of the Government. It would show itself in the augmented majesty and splendor of the throne, in a more vigorous and steady administration of justice, in larger and more efficient military and naval establishments, and in an undoubted public credit. The internal dissensions by which the country has been long distracted, and which have their final origin in its unfortunate economical situation, would soon disappear. Spain, under these new circumstances, would be quiet at home and respected abroad. Instead of being attacked by foreigners every ten or twenty years, she would be in a situation to exhibit her own flag, when occasion should require, on the territory of neighboring and of distant nations. She would become, in short, what she was destined to be by her geographical position and great natural advantages—the leading Power in the south of Europe.

Such, according to the surest principles strictly applied, would be the effects resulting to Spain in the natural progress of events from a single wise and generous measure. The probability of their occurrence is confirmed in every point by the splendid example of England and the United States to which I have already alluded, and which, being parallel in every important circumstance, must be regarded as decisive, and deserves, of course, to be considered with great attention. It is now just half a century since the declaration of the independence of the United States, and about forty-three years since the conclusion of the peace with England. Previously to that event the respective positions of the two parties were the same with those of Spain and her ancient colonies at present. There was the same feeling of bitterness between them, occasioned by a long period of exasperation which preceded the war, and by the accidents of the war itself. England felt the same reluctance to treat with her colonies as sovereign States that is now felt by Spain. Their loss was generally viewed as a national misfortune, and many statesmen of the day predicted as its consequence the immediate decline and fall of the mother country. Fifty years have since elapsed, and where is England now? Instead of being ruined by the loss of her colonies, she has exhibited since that event a development of power and wealth wholly unparalleled in the history of any other country in Europe, and which seems at first view almost miraculous. Nay, this very loss of the colonies, from which so much mischief was anticipated, has proved to be a great blessing, and has been, in fact, as is now generally admitted, the principal cause of this prodigious prosperity. The rapid progress of the United States, which would never have flourished as they have done while dependent, has exercised a favorable reaction on the mother country, and has brought with it the wonders of improvements in England which the world has seen. This, as I have observed, is a thing generally acknowledged, and is also susceptible of proof. If we look in detail at the recent augmentation of the resources of England, we shall find that it has taken place chiefly in branches of industry unknown before the separation of the colonies, and growing directly out of that event. The principal of them is the manufacture of cotton. The exports of England in the year 1787 were valued at about fifteen millions sterling, and included no cotton fabrics whatever. In 1822 they were valued at about forty-five millions sterling, including cotton fabrics to the value of more than twenty-two. The exports of a country may be considered as an approximative, though not direct, indication of its economical state; and considering the increase of the exports of England during the interval between these two periods, amounting to thirty millions, as a measure of her increase of wealth, it will appear that three-fourths of it have proceeded from the establishment of this single branch of industry. Thus far the improvement has been owing entirely to the independence of the United States. Before the Revolution, no cotton was produced in the colonies, and very little was manufactured in England. In the year 1784, the one following the peace, the first exportation of this article took place from the United States, and consisted of eight bales, which were seized on their arrival at Liverpool on suspicion that they were not of the growth of the country, as it was not known previously that cotton was cultivated there. The necessity of finding some agricultural product with which to furnish the parent Kingdom in exchange for her manufactures soon extended the cultivation of this plant, and in the year 1823 the number of bales of cotton imported at Liverpool from the United States amounted to 406,670. The cheapness and abundance with which this valuable article was supplied naturally extended the manufacture of it in England; until, after satisfying an immense demand for home consumption, it furnished, in 1823, the prodigious quantity for exportation specified above. Upon every bale of cotton thus produced in the United States and wrought up in England, it is calculated that the profits of the labor of England are to those of the labor of the United States in the proportion of twenty to one. Such are the respective advantages resulting to the two parties from the intercourse that naturally grows up between a parent State and its colonies, and yet the latter have no reason to complain. The cotton planters of the United States are among the most prosperous and wealthy classes of the community, and this branch of industry is regarded by all as of the highest national importance.

Such has been to England the value of the increased market for her products, produced by the independence of her colonies, in this single department of labor. In others, such as the woolen and iron manufactures, the encouragement afforded, if not so extensive, has been still of great consequence; and, as it is generally acknowledged, so it appears to be true, on a close inspection, that the vast accession of wealth she has exhibited since the American Revolution, is immediately attributable to that cause, and could not have taken place without it. With the increase of wealth, the population has been doubled, and the comforts of life have been diffused throughout all classes; cultivation has been extended, roads and canals constructed or improved, and the face of the country in a manner entirely changed. The Government has found its resources augmented in the same proportion; has risen from the rank of a secondary to that of a leading European Power; has sustained a war of thirty years against a most formidable combination of the continental States, attended with expenses before unheard of, to the amount, in one year, of thirteen milliards of reals; and, notwithstanding this astonishing destruction of productive capital, has still maintained its credit, and remains one of the wealthiest, most powerful, and most prosperous nations on the globe.

Such, or similar to these, would be the advantages derived by Spain from the independence of her colonies. The two cases are parallel; nor can any good reason be given why the results should not be the same. It may be said, indeed, that, because Spain is at present inferior in the perfection of her fabrics to some other countries, the new demand from the colonies would direct itself towards the latter, especially as commercial relations are already established with England, France, and the United States. But those who draw this conclusion have not sufficiently considered the influence of a community of origin, language, religion, and manners, in determining the intercourse among men. Similar predictions were made at the time in regard to the direction which would be taken by the commerce of the United States after their separation from England. They had received from France the most important aid in the Revolutionary war; and France was at that time a nation much richer than England, not only in natural products, as she is now, but even in those of art. A close commercial relation had been established by the political alliance that existed during the war; and it was anticipated that after the peace the trade of the United States with France would be much more considerable than that with England. No sooner, however, were the restrictions on the intercourse with the mother country removed by the conclusion of peace than the commerce of the United States returned into the old channels from which it had been diverted for several years, and has continued ever since to take this direction. The trade with France, notwithstanding the superior advantages of it in an economical point of view, never flourished to any great extent, and the exports to that country have never been more than a fourth or fifth of those to England. In like manner, the trade of the Spanish colonies would immediately take the direction of Spain, as far as the agricultural and manufacturing industry of the Kingdom is now capable of supplying their wants; and, in proportion as the resources of the Peninsula were developed under the operation of this beneficial intercourse, the trade would continue more and more to increase, bringing with it the favorable effects that I have already described.

Such, my Lord Duke, are the grounds upon which the Government of the United States have formed their opinion upon this subject, and the reasons by which they have been induced to recommend to his Majesty's Government the policy of a general pacification. If the facts I have stated are in any way correct, it results, from the whole, that the recovery of the colonies is impossible, either by actual force, by the effect of internal dissensions, or by the aid of foreign Powers; that the continuance of the war is attended with great inconveniences, among which must be reckoned, at no distant period, the loss of the islands; and that peace, besides the ordinary blessings which it always carries with it, would, in this case, administer immediate relief to the financial embarrassments of the Government, and, by its ultimate consequences, restore the prosperity and greatness of the Kingdom. Deeply impressed with this view of the subject, the Government of the United States have considered it an act of real friendship and duty to communicate their sentiments to his Catholic Majesty; and they cannot but hope that the communication will not be without effect. I have only to add that the efficacy of the measure recommended, both in removing evil and in producing positive good, depends very much upon its being adopted immediately. Should the peace be delayed a single year, it will, in all probability, be too late to save the islands. Should the acknowledgment of the independence of the colonies be deferred until it becomes a mere matter of form, it can hardly be presumed that they will be willing to purchase it by any great sacrifices, and it will not, in that case, bring relief to the finances. Finally, if the trade of America is permitted to flow for too long a time in foreign channels, it is at least uncertain whether it will ever return to the mother country. What is to be done should, on every account, be done quickly. If it should be thought by his Majesty's Government that the good offices of that of the United States would be of use in bringing about an accommodation on the basis indicated in the present note, they will be employed with great readiness and pleasure; and I should be truly happy to contribute, in any way, by my personal services, in effecting so great and benevolent an object.

Of the glorious actions achieved under the patronage of the Sovereigns of Spain, predecessors of his Majesty, the greatest, beyond a doubt, was the enterprise of Christopher Columbus. The discovery and settlement of an unknown world, the foundation of a brotherhood of new nations, the diffusion of the noble Castilian language, and with it, of the lights of civilization and Christianity, over a whole quarter of the globe; these were the results of the enlightened policy of Ferdinand the Catholic and his celebrated Queen. It has been reserved for his present Majesty to put the last finish to this great work, by a measure that shall at once confirm the prosperity of Spanish America, and restore the splendor and greatness of Spain. Seldom has it been in the power of any monarch or any Government to effect, by a single act, so much good as would result from this. May God, in his providence, incline the King's heart to perform it.

I pray your excellency to submit this communication to the consideration of his Majasty, and avail myself of this occasion to offer your excellency the renewed assurance of my sincere respect and esteem.

A. H. EVERETT.

His Excellency the DUKE DEL INFANTADO, Principal Secretary of State.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 498. [1ST SESSION.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO THE ARREST AND IMPRISONMENT OF JOHN BAKER BY THE BRITISH AUTHORITIES OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 23, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The enclosed report from the Secretary of State is accompanied by copies of the correspondence between this Government and the minister of his Britannic Majesty residing here, relating to the arrest and imprisonment of John Baker, requested by a recent resolution of the House.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 22, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 21, 1828.

The Secretary of State, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the — instant, requesting the President to communicate to that House, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence which may have taken place between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain relative to the arrest and imprisonment of John Baker, a citizen of the United States, by the authorities of the province of New Brunswick, has the honor to submit to the President a copy of the correspondence upon that subject not already communicated to one or other of the Houses of Congress, and published under its authority, which has passed between this Department and the British minister residing here.

Respectfully submitted. H. CLAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 20, 1828.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to inform Mr. Vaughan, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, that about the date of his note of the 21st of November last, in answer to one from the undersigned of the 17th of the same month, it was deemed expedient to depute an agent to that portion of the State of Maine which is claimed by the British Government as being part of the province of New Brunswick, to inquire into the origin of settlements made thereon, the causes of recent disturbances among the settlers, and especially into the grounds of the arrest, deportation, and detention in confinement at Fredericton of John Baker, a citizen of the United States. Accordingly, Mr. S. B. Barrell was selected for the purpose, and sent on that service. About the same period the Government of Maine also appointed an agent to proceed to the disputed territory and to Fredericton for the purpose of making the same investigations. The undersigned postponed transmitting to Mr. Vaughan a reply to his above mentioned note until the report of Mr. Barrell should be received. He has now the honor of laying before Mr. Vaughan a copy of that report, and also a copy of the report made by the agent of the Government of Maine; and he avails himself of this occasion to submit a few observations.*

The undersigned, in the actual state of the negotiation between the two Governments, having for their object the settlement of the question of disputed boundary, heartily concurs with Mr. Vaughan in the sentiment expressed in the conclusion of his note, that too much vigilance cannot be exerted by the authorities on both sides to remove misapprehension, and to control all misconduct arising out of it. The undersigned also participates with Mr. Vaughan in the regret which he feels on account of the collisions of authority, to which both countries are so repeatedly exposed by the long delay which has taken place in the final adjustment of the boundary on the northeast frontier of the United States. Without meaning to allege that the British Government is justly chargeable with having intentionally contributed to that delay, the undersigned is fully persuaded that Mr. Vaughan must agree that that of the United States has not unnecessarily prolonged it. Considering the course which the business is now likely to take, it ought to be the earnest endeavor of both Governments, and it will certainly be that of the Government of the United States, to avoid giving any just occasion of inquietude, until the experiment of the arbitration shall have been crowned with success, or been attended with failure. Although the reports of the two agents before referred to establish that there was some misrepresentation in the accounts of the disturbances which had reached the Government of the United States prior to Mr. Barrell's departure on his agency, and which had been communicated to Mr. Vaughan, they disclose some transactions which the President has seen with regret.

* These reports having been already published, copies of them are not sent to the President with the report of this Department of May 21, 1828.

The undersigned cannot agree with Mr. Vaughan in the conclusion to which he has brought himself, that the sovereignty and jurisdiction over the territory in dispute have remained with Great Britain, because the two Governments have been unable to reconcile the difference between them respecting the boundary. Nor can he assent to the proposition stated by him, that the occupation and possession of that territory was in the Crown of Great Britain prior to the conclusion of the treaty of 1783, if it were his intention to describe any other than a constructive possession. Prior to that epoch the whole country now in contest was an uninhabited waste. Being, then, an undisputed part of the territory of the King of Great Britain, he had the constructive, and the right to the actual possession. If, as the Government of the United States contends, the disputed territory is included within their limits, as defined in the provisional articles of peace between the United States and Great Britain of November, 1782, and the definitive treaty which was concluded in September of the following year, the prior right of Great Britain became thereby transferred to the Government of the United States, and it drew after it the constructive possession of the disputed territory. The settlement on the Madawaska, the earliest that has been made within its limits, was an unauthorized intrusion on the property of the State of Massachusetts, to which the territory then belonged, by individuals, posterior to the treaty of 1783. That settlement of those individuals could not affect or impair, in any manner whatever, the right of the State of Massachusetts, or give any strength to the pretensions of the British Government. The settlers, in consequence, probably, of their remoteness and their quiet and peaceable conduct, do not appear, for a long time, to have attracted the attention of either the State of Massachusetts or that of the adjoining British province. It was not until the year 1790 that the Government of New Brunswick took upon itself to grant lands to the intruders. No knowledge of these grants is believed to have been obtained, until recently, by either the Government of Massachusetts or Maine, or that of the United States. The Provincial Government had no color of authority to issue those grants for lands then lying within the State of Massachusetts. It cannot be admitted that they affected the rights of the United States as acquired by the treaty of peace. If, in consequence of the Madawaska settlement, a possession de facto was obtained by the Government of New Brunswick, it must be regarded as a possession limited by the actual occupancy of the settlers, and not extending to the uninhabited portions of the adjoining waste. Although, subsequent to the year 1790, the Provincial Government appears to have exercised, occasionally, a jurisdiction over the settlement, it has not been exclusive. As late as 1820 the inhabitants of the settlement were enumerated as a part of the population of the United States by their officers charged with the duty of taking the periodical census for which their Constitution and laws provide.

The settlement of John Baker appears to have been outside of the Madawaska settlement, upon contiguous waste lands. Other American citizens established themselves in his neighborhood. Whatever jurisdiction the Government of New Brunswick might claim, in virtue of the Madawaska settlement being confined to it, could not be rightfully extended to Baker and his American neighbors. Even if he had been guilty of any irregularity of conduct, he was not amenable to the Provincial Government, but to his own. His arrest, therefore, on the disputed ground, and transportation from it to Frederickton, at a considerable distance from his family, and his confinement there in a loathsome jail, cannot be justified. It is a proceeding which seems to have been adopted without regard to the rights of the United States in the territory in question, and which assumes an exclusive jurisdiction on the part of the Provincial Government. Nor is it compatible with that moderation and forbearance which it has been understood between the two Governments should be mutually practiced until the question of right between them was finally settled. I am charged, therefore, by the President to demand the immediate liberation of John Baker, and a full indemnity for the injuries which he has suffered in the arrest and detention of his person.

Nor can the President view with satisfaction the exercise of jurisdiction, on the part of the Provincial Government, over the settlement on the Aroostook. That settlement was made only about six years ago, partly by American citizens and partly by British subjects. The settlers supposed they were establishing themselves on American ground, and beyond the British jurisdiction. It has been only within these three or four years past that the Provincial Government has undertaken to issue civil process against the settlers; and as late as last summer process for trespass and intrusion on the Crown lands was for the first time issued. These proceedings cannot be reconciled with the resolution which you state to have been adopted by his Britannic Majesty's Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, to maintain the disputed territory in the same state in which his excellency received it after the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent. Nor can they be reconciled with that mutual forbearance to perform any new act of sovereignty within the disputed territory, having a tendency to strengthen the claim of the party exercising it, which it has been expected would be observed by the two Governments during the progress of their endeavors amicably to adjust the question of boundary. The undersigned must protest, in behalf of his Government, against any exercise of acts of exclusive jurisdiction by the British authority on the Madawaska, the Aroostook, or within any other part of the disputed territory, before the final settlement of that question; and he is directed to express the President's expectation that Mr. Vaughan will make such representations as will prevent, in future, any such jurisdiction from being exerted.

The undersigned requests Mr. Vaughan, on this occasion, to accept assurances of his high consideration.

H. CLAY.

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, February, 1828.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a note from the Secretary of State of the United States, enclosing a copy of the report made by the agent of the General Government, and a copy of the report made by the agent of the Government of the State of Maine, sent to inquire into the proceedings which took place, not long since, in the disputed territory within the province of New Brunswick.

The undersigned has not any remarks to make upon the reports which have been submitted to him; but he is glad to learn, from Mr. Clay's note, that it appears from those reports that some misrepresentation took place in the accounts which had reached the Government of the United States respecting the recent disturbances which took place amongst the settlers in the disputed territory.

The Secretary of State expresses his dissent to the principle laid down by the undersigned in his note of the 21st of November last, that the sovereignty and jurisdiction over the territory in dispute continue to be vested in Great Britain until the two Governments shall have reconciled their differences respecting the line of boundary. Mr. Clay observes, that the United States contend that possession was transferred to them by the treaty of 1783, which places the disputed territory within their limits. Whatever may be the conviction of the Government of the United States with regard to the extent of the limits assigned to it by that treaty, those limits are still undefined, and remain unadjusted; and, notwithstanding the reports of the Commissioners of Boundary, and after repeated negotiations remained to be settled by a reference to a friendly Sovereign, it is the opinion of the undersigned that the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the disputed territory rests with Great Britain until that portion of it designated in the treaty of 1783 shall have been finally set apart from the British possessions as belonging to the United States.

The British settlement upon the Madawaska river is considered by Mr. Clay as an unauthorized intrusion on the property of the State of Massachusetts. When the treaty of 1783 was concluded, New Brunswick had not been erected into a separate province, but it was included in the province of Nova Scotia. The St. Croix river was then considered to be the boundary, on the northeast, of Massachusetts, and on the west, of Nova Scotia. Some difficulty might have arisen about the exact boundary between that province and Massachusetts, on account of the uncertainty of the limits of Acadie, (which now forms the province of New Brunswick,) as ceded by France to Great Britain in 1713. The undersigned, however, cannot acquiesce in the pretensions of Massachusetts to the territory upon the Madawaska, which lies to the north of the St. John's, and falls into that river at a distance from its source. It remains to be seen, when the position of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia shall have been determined, whether the line of boundary between Great Britain and the United States will intersect any portion of the Madawaska territory. In the meantime the undersigned begs leave to express his conviction that neither the establishment of settlements upon that river nor the grants of land made to the settlers by the Government of New Brunswick in 1790 can, in any shape, affect the final settlement of the boundary, or tend, as Mr. Clay seems to imagine, to strengthen the claims of Great Britain, or in any manner to invalidate the rights acquired by the United States under the treaty of 1783.

The Secretary of State observes, in his last note, that the jurisdiction exercised by the Government of New Brunswick in the Madawaska settlement has not been exclusive, inasmuch as an agent sent by the Governor of the State of Maine took a census of the population in 1820 as belonging to that State. The undersigned begs leave to remind Mr. Clay that that attempt of the State of Maine to interpose its jurisdiction was considered by the British Government as an encroachment, and it was the subject of a remonstrance to the Government of the United States.

With regard to the arrest of John Baker, surely his outrageous conduct in stopping the mail from Canada, in hoisting the American flag, and forming a combination to transfer the territory in which he resided to the United States, made him amenable to the laws. Although his residence, as it is observed by Mr. Clay, was not actually in the Madawaska settlement, it was within the jurisdiction of New Brunswick, and he knew it, as he had applied for and received, in 1822, the bounty upon corn grown in newly cultivated ground, given by the Government of that province. A moderate bail was demanded of Baker for his appearance to take his trial. He did not profit by this offer of the magistrates, and thereby obtain his release from confinement, because he understood that a writ had been taken out against him by some one of his creditors. It does not appear that the proceedings have been carried on against him with any unusual severity; and after the investigation which has taken place into all the circumstances attending his arrest, the undersigned did not expect that the President of the United States would have demanded his immediate liberation, and full indemnity for the injuries he has suffered by the arrest and detention of his person. A copy of the note which the undersigned has had the honor to receive from the Secretary of State shall be immediately transmitted to his Majesty's Government and to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick.

It appears that the President of the United States does not view with satisfaction the exercise of jurisdiction by the Government of New Brunswick in a settlement upon the Aroostook river, which had its origin in the unauthorized residence of stragglers from other districts. They remained for some time unnoticed; but, within the last three or four years, civil process has been issued against the settlers by the Provincial Government, which Mr. Clay is at a loss to reconcile with the resolution which the undersigned has stated to have been adopted by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, to maintain the disputed territory in the state in which it was after the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent. The undersigned is convinced that Mr. Clay will admit that no part of the disputed territory can be left without the control of any civil authority. All persons, of whatever description, who take up their residence in the disputed territory, are within the British jurisdiction until the boundary line is adjusted, and are amenable to the Government of New Brunswick, and owe a temporary allegiance to his Majesty so long as they remain under his protection. It is not for the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to surrender up the exercise of an ancient jurisdiction, but in strict conformity with his resolution above alluded to. His excellency has exercised it with great moderation, by refusing to make grants of land, and by suspending the issuing of licenses for the cutting of timber, and by strictly enjoining all magistrates under his control to prevent trespasses and intrusions of every description. The Secretary of State may rely upon the moderation with which the jurisdiction will be exercised by his excellency over the disputed territory.

The undersigned has observed that a misconception pervades all the papers which have fallen under his notice from the State of Maine. The disputed territory is invariably represented as a part of that State, unjustly withheld from it; overlooking, always, the difficulties which Great Britain and the United States have encountered in appropriating and setting apart that portion which belongs to the United States under the treaty of 1783, and which have so unfortunately kept, as it were, in abeyance the title of the United States.

The undersigned cannot conclude this note without expressing his anxious wishes that the measure now resorted to by both Governments, of arbitration, may put at rest forever the question of boundary which has lately so repeatedly occupied the attention of the Secretary of State and of the undersigned.

The undersigned requests Mr. Clay to accept the assurances of his highest consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Vaughan.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 17, 1828.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, in acknowledging the receipt on the 20th ultimo of the note of Mr. Vaughan of the —— day of that month, in answer to that which the undersigned had the honor to address to him, transmitting the reports made by the agents of the United States and the State of Maine, would have restricted himself to a simple expression of his satisfaction with the engagement of Mr. Vaughan to lay the demand of the Government of the United States for the immediate liberation of John Baker, and a full indemnity for the injuries he had suffered by his arrest and detention, before the Governments of Great Britain and the province of New Brunswick, but for certain opinions and principles advanced by Mr. Vaughan to which the undersigned cannot assent. And he feels it to be necessary, to guard against any misinterpretation from his silence, expressly to state his dissent from them. In doing this he will avoid, as much as possible, any discussion of the respective claims of the two countries to the disputed territory. If it were necessary to enter into that argument, it would not be difficult to maintain as clear a right on the part of the United States to that territory as they have to any other portion of the territory which was acknowledged by Great Britain to belong to them by the treaty of 1783. But as, by the arrangements between the two Governments, the question of right has received a different disposition, it is unnecessary to give it a particular consideration here. The correspondence which the undersigned has had the honor of holding with Mr. Vaughan has related to the intermediate possession, and to acts of jurisdiction within the disputed territory until the right is finally settled. It would furnish a just occasion for serious regret if, whilst the settlement of that question is in amicable progress, any misunderstanding should arise between the two Governments in consequence of what must be regarded by the Government of the United States as the unwarranted exercise of a right of jurisdiction by the Government of the province of New Brunswick within the disputed territory.

The undersigned cannot concur in the opinion that, the limits of the treaty of 1783 being undefined and unadjusted, the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the disputed territory rests with Great Britain until that portion of it designated in the treaty of 1783 shall have been finally set apart from the British possessions as belonging to the United States. Mr. Vaughan's argument assumes that some other act of setting apart the territories of the United States from those of Great Britain than the treaty of peace of 1783 was necessary, and that until that other act should be performed the United States could not be considered in possession. This argument would prove that the United States are not now lawfully in possession of any portion of the territory which they acquired by the war of their Independence; the treaty of 1783 being the only act of separation in virtue of which they are in possession of their territory. If, at the conclusion of the treaty of 1783, Great Britain had had the actual, and not merely constructive possession, and that actual possession had all along remained with her, Mr. Vaughan might have contended that the Government of Great Britain had a right to exercise a jurisdiction de facto over the disputed territory. But at that epoch neither party had the actual possession of the disputed territory, which was then an uninhabited waste. Which of the parties had the right to the possession depended upon the limits of the treaty of 1783. If, as the United States contend, those limits embrace it, they had the right both of sovereignty and to the possession, and Great Britain could not lawfully exercise either. It is true that Great Britain asserts that those limits do not comprehend the disputed territory. On that point the parties are at issue, and cannot agree. They have, however, amicably agreed to refer the decision of it to a common friend. Whilst the experiment is making for this peaceful settlement of the question, ought either of the parties to assume the exercise of sovereignty or jurisdiction within the contested territory? If he does, can he expect the other party to acquiesce in it, or to look on with indifference? It was a mutual conviction of the irritating consequence which would ensue from the exercise of a separate jurisdiction by either of the parties that led to the understanding which has so long prevailed between them, to abstain from all acts of exclusive jurisdiction which might have a tendency to produce inquietude. In conformity with that understanding licenses to cut timber from the disputed territory, granted by the provincial authority, had been revoked, and the practice of cutting and removing the timber has been understood by the Government of the United States to have been discontinued.

It follows, from the view now presented, that the undersigned cannot subscribe to the opinion that the jurisdiction of the British Government, through its provincial authority, over the disputed territory has continued with Great Britain, notwithstanding the treaty of 1783. To maintain that opinion, Mr. Vaughan must make out either, first, that the terms of the treaty do exclude altogether the disputed territory, or that, if they include it, actual possession of the disputed territory was with Great Britain in 1783. Neither proposition can be established.

Mr. Vaughan seems to think that some civil government is absolutely necessary within the disputed territory. If its utility be conceded in reference to the inhabitants, it would not be a necessary consequence that the Government of New Brunswick, and not the State of Maine, ought to exert the requisite civil authority.

The alleged irregularity of the conduct of John Baker is relied upon by Mr. Vaughan as forming a justification for his arrest and the subsequent proceedings against him in the courts of New Brunswick. The President is far from being disposed to sanction any acts of Mr. Baker by which, on his private authority, he would undertake the settlement of a national dispute. He derived no power for any such acts either from the Government of the United States or, as is believed, from the Government of Maine. National disputes ought always to be adjusted by national and not individual authority. The acts of Baker complained of were, however, performed by him under a belief that he was within the rightful limits of the State of Maine, and with no view of violating the territory or offending against the laws of Great Britain. This case, therefore, is very different from what it would have been if the irregularities attributed to him had been committed on the uncontested territory of Great Britain.

The undersigned finds himself as unable to agree that the misconduct of Mr. Baker, whatever it may have been, warranted the Government of New Brunswick in taking cognizance of his case for the purpose of trying and punishing him by British laws, as he was unprepared to admit that the want of civil government on the part of the inhabitants of the disputed territory created a right in the Government of New Brunswick to supply, in that respect, their necessities. In assuming that Baker rendered himself amenable to the laws of New Brunswick, Mr. Vaughan decides the very question in controversy. He decides that the part of Maine in contest appertains to the province of New Brunswick, and that the laws of New Brunswick can run into the State of Maine, as the limits of that State are understood to exist by the Government of the United States. The Provincial Government of New Brunswick, in the arrest and trial of Baker for acts of his done on the disputed territory, commits the very error which is ascribed to Baker—that of undertaking, in effect, to determine a national question, the decision of which should be left to the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, which are, in fact, endeavoring peaceably to settle it.

It would have been more conformable with good neighborhood and the respective claims of the two Governments, as well as the mutual forbearance which they stand pledged to each other to practice, if a friendly representation had been made to the Government of the United States of any misconduct charged against John Baker, or any other citizen of the United States inhabiting the disputed territory, accompanied by a request for the redress called for by the nature of the case. Such was the course pursued by Sir Charles Bagot as far back as the year 1818. In December of that year he had an interview with the then Secretary of State, in which he preferred a complaint of irregular settlements attempted by citizens of the United States on the lands in controversy. The Secretary of State, on receiving the complaint, stated that he supposed the settlers were of that class of intruders denominated squatters, meaning persons who commence settlements upon the public lands without title; that as, by Mr. Bagot's representation, it appeared that they were entering on the disputed borders in families, peaceable means would doubtless be sufficient to remove them; and that if he, Mr. Bagot, would procure and communicate their names to the Secretary of State, he would invite the Government of Massachusetts to take the necessary measures for restraining them. But their names were never, in fact, disclosed to this Government. Among the papers recently communicated by the Government of New Brunswick to Mr. Barrell, the agent of the Unithd States, the President has observed, with regret and surprise, a letter from Mr. Bagot to the Lieutenant Governor of the province, bearing date the 8th of December, 1818, in which, after referring to the above interview, Mr. Bagot gives it as his opinion that the Government of New Brunswick might remove the settlers by force. This conclusion is not only unwarranted by anything which passed at that interview, but, I am directed to say, is contrary to that which the Government of the United States had reason to expect would have resulted from it. So far from conceding a right in the Government of New Brunswick forcibly to remove those persons, their names were requested, to enable their own Government to operate upon them, if necessary. In the letter from Mr. Bagot to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick he did, agreeably to the request of the Secretary of State, ask for their names, whilst the advice that the Government of New Brunswick should forcibly remove them as intruders obviously superseded the only practical purpose for which their names had been denied, that the Governor of Massachusetts might be called upon, by peaceable means and by his lawful authority, to restrain them.

The enumeration of the settlers on the Madawaska as a part of the population of the United States, which took place in 1820, was not under the authority of the State of Maine; it was made in virtue of the laws of the United States, and by officers duly commissioned by them. Mr. Vaughan says there was a remonstrance against it at the time; no trace of any such remonstrance is discernible in the records of this Department.

In the note which Mr. Vaughan addressed to the undersigned on the 21st day of November last it was stated that the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick had resolved to maintain the disputed territory in the state in which it was at the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent: that treaty was signed on the 24th of December, 1814, and the exchange of its ratifications was made on the 17th day of February, of the ensuing year. More than seven years thereafter, and four years after the interview between Sir Charles Bagot and the Secretary of State, certain persons, without authority, settled themselves on the waste and uninhabited lands of the Aroostook, within the disputed territory, supposing that they were occupying American ground. Within only three or four years past the Provincial Government has undertaken to issue civil process against the settlers, for the purpose of enforcing the collection of debts, and the performance of other social duties. The undersigned, in his note of the 20th ultimo, has stated that he could not reconcile this exercise of jurisdiction with the above resolution of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, and he is still unable to perceive their compatibility. If the Lieutenant Governor had applied to the Government of the United States to remove the settlers, he would have manifested a disposition to preserve the disputed territory in the state in which it was at the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent. But, by treating the settlers as British subjects, and enforcing on them British laws, there is, at the same time, a manifest departure from the resolution formed by the Lieutenant Governor, and a disregard of the lawful rights of the United States. If a succession of illegal settlements can be made within the territory, and if these unauthorized intrusions lay a just ground for the exercise of British authority and the enforcement of British laws, it is obvious that, so far from maintaining the country in the uninhabited state in which it was at the date of the treaty of Ghent, the whole of it may become peopled, and be brought, with its inhabitants, under British subjection.

Mr. Vaughan supposes that the acts of British authority, to which the undersigned, in the course of this correspondence, has had occasion to object, can in no shape affect the final settlement of the boundary, nor tend to strengthen the claims of Great Britain, nor in any manner to invalidate the rights of the United States. If there were an absolute certainty of a speedy settlement of the boundary within a definite time, Mr. Vaughan might be correct in supposing that the rights of the respective parties would not be ultimately affected by those acts of jurisdiction. But it is now near half a century since the conclusion of the treaty of peace out of which the controversy grows, and it is more than thirteen years since the final ratification of that of Ghent, providing a mode of amicably settling the dispute. It remains unadjusted. Mr. Vaughan himself has repeatedly expressed regret, in which the undersigned has fully participated, on account of the delay. Judging from past experience, as well as the uncertainty of human affairs in general, we are far from being sure when a decision will take place. If, in the meantime, Great Britain were to be allowed quietly to possess herself of the disputed territory, and to extend her sway over it, she would have no motive for co-operating in quickening the termination of the settlement of the question. Without imputing to her a disposition to procrastination, she would, in such a state of things, be in the substantial enjoyment of all the advantages of a decison of the controversy in her favor. The President of the United States cannot consent to this unequal condition of the parties; and the undersigned, in conclusion, is charged again to protest against the exercise of all and every act of exclusive jurisdiction, on the part of the Government of the province of New Brunswick, and to announce to Mr. Vaughan that that Government will be responsible for all the consequences, whatever they may be, to which any of those acts of jurisdiction may lead.

The undersigned requests Mr. Vaughan to accept the renewed assurances of his high consideration.

H. CLAY.

Right Hon. CHARLES R. VAUGHAN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1828.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the Secretary of State of the United States, dated the 17th instant, in which, in order to guard against any misrepresentation of his silence, he has taken occasion to express his decided dissent from the principles and opinions advanced by the undersigned in justification of certain acts of jurisdiction which have been exercised in the disputed territory by the provincial authorities of New Brunswick.

As it is the intention of the undersigned to submit to the consideration of his Majesty's Government the correspondence which has taken place between the Secretary of State of the United States and himself, he is not disposed to prolong the discussion respecting the exercise of jurisdiction in the disputed territory.

When he received the complaints against the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, he thought it his duty to suggest the grounds upon which that conduct might be justified and the irritation might be mitigated which was likely to arise out of it.

The undersigned is at a loss to understand the distinction, made by Mr. Clay, between the actual and constructive possession of the disputed territory previously to the conclusion of the treaty of 1783. Though a part of that territory was uninhabited, and in a state of waste, so far from neither party having the actual possession, the sovereignty and possession of the entire province of Nova Scotia was vested, indisputably, in his Britannic Majesty; and it is the received opinion that the plenipotentiaries engaged in concluding the treaty of 1783 did intend and did agree to leave untouched the rights of his Majesty over the province of Nova Scotia.

The boundary, from the mouth of the river St. Croix to its sources, is clearly defined; the right continuation of the line entirely depends upon the position of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, which the British Commissioners of Boundary, under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, have placed at Mars Hill, and the American Commissioners have placed at a great distance to the northward, and not far from the right bank of the river St. Lawrence.

The undersigned agrees with Mr. Clay in wishing to avoid any discussion of the claims of the respective Governments; but he has ventured to point out the very great difference between the Commissioners of Boundary, as he conceives that, until that difference shall be reconciled, jurisdiction must continue to be exercised within the disputed limits by the original possessors. A joint jurisdiction appears to the undersigned inadmissible, as it must prove impracticable.

The undersigned cannot acquiesce in the opinion given by Mr. Clay, that the issuing of legal process, within the last few years, in a settlement upon the river Aroostook, formed originally in an unauthorized manner by stragglers from other districts, is to be considered as an infringement of the engagement of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to preserve the disputed territory in the state in which it was at the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent. These settlements were established previously to the Government of New Brunswick being confided to Sir Howard Douglas; and the undersigned conceives that it was not optional in his excellency to exercise, or not, jurisdiction within the limits of his province.

Proceedings in a tract of land upon the river Madawaska, in which a settlement was established soon after the treaty of 1783 by French Acadians, have furnished repeatedly cause of remonstrance to both Governments. From the date of 1786 the laws by which those settlements have been governed, and the magistrates by whom those laws have been executed, have been derived from New Brunswick. Whether any, and what, part of that settlement belongs to the United States depends upon the provisions of the treaty of 1783. Until the two Governments can agree upon the true intent of that treaty, possession and actual jurisdiction remains with Great Britain.

It is true that, in 1820, there was an attempt to invalidate that jurisdiction, when the marshal of the State of Maine sent an agent to enumerate the population of that settlement under a law enacted by the General Government of the United States. The undersigned learns, with regret, that there is no record in the Department of State of a remonstrance against that proceeding by the British Government, as he had asserted. Such was the conviction upon his mind, justified by the frequent remonstrances which he had been called upon to make, since the summer of 1825, against proceedings of agents from the State of Maine authorized to sell lands and to lay out roads and townships in the same district.

With regard to the arrest of Baker, the Secretary of State, in his last note, seems to think that, as he committed the outrage for which he was taken up under a conviction that he was upon territory belonging to the United States, a representation should have been made of his offence to the Government of the latter.

The undersigned has only to refer the Secretary of State to his note dated the 27th of February, where it is shown that Baker was perfectly aware of his residing within the jurisdiction of New Brunswick, as he had received the provincial bounty for corn raised upon land newly brought into cultivation.

The undersigned regrets that he should have found himself under the necessity of making the foregoing observations; and he cannot conclude without expressing his earnest wish that the reference to arbitration may relieve the Secretary of State and the undersigned from any further discussion relative to the boundary on the northeastern frontier of the United States.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Clay the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, &c., &c., &c.

20TH CONGRESS.] No 499. [1ST SESSION.

AFFAIRS WITH BRAZIL.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 23, 1828.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th ultimo, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of the correspondence with the Brazilian Government, and showing the measures taken by the Government of the United States in relation to the several topics noticed in the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 23, 1828.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 23, 1828.

The Secretary of State, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th ultimo, requesting the President to communicate to that House the correspondence between the late Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of Brazil and the Governments of the United States and the Brazils, in relation to the alleged blockade by the naval force of the Brazilian Government, in relation to the imprisonment of American citizens by the said Government, and in relation to the demand made upon it by the said Chargé d'Affaires of his passports, and the cause thereof, has the honor now to report to the President copies of the correspondence requested.

The resolution of the House also requests any information that may have been recently received by the Government concerning a paper blockade of the whole coast of the Buenos Ayrean Republic by the Government of Brazil, and the consequent embarrassment to American commerce. All the information in the possession of the Department of State on that subject is to be found in the correspondence, copies of which are now communicated, embracing the correspondence of Mr. Wright, the American consul at Rio Janeiro, and that between the commanders of our squadrons on that service and the Department of the Navy, and officers in the service of the Emperor of Brazil.

The resolution of the House further requests a communication of the measures which have been taken by this Government since the late Chargé d'Affaires left the Court of Brazil to countervail the illegal system of blockade attempted to be enforced, and to redress the suffering and losses of American citizens who are navigating the ocean under the protection of the law of nations and the guardian care of this Government.

Shortly after the return of Mr. Raguet to the United States, Mr. William Tudor, our consul at Lima, was designated as his successor, and a commission was transmitted to him. This gentleman was selected in consequence of his known qualifications, his long residence in South America, and his intimate and thorough knowledge of the habits and usages of that portion of this hemisphere, and the commercial connexions existing between it and the United States. The personal knowledge which the President had of him, and his extensive and interesting correspondence with the Department of State during his residence in South America, pointed him out as eminently fitted for this station. It was expected that he would reach Rio Janeiro towards the end of the last or early in the present year. His arrival there has been delayed by unforeseen casualties. He probably got there some time in the last month. Instructions adapted to the existing state of our relations with the Government of Brazil were forwarded to Rio Janeiro in the month of November last, where they awaited his arrival. These instructions have for their object the execution of the arrangement made between the Brazilian Chargé d'Affaires and this Department, as evidenced by the correspondence communicated to the House of Representatives in a report from this Department made on the twenty-fifth day of January last, and also all other interests which appeared at that time to call for instructions. In the present probable state of the negotiation, it would be premature to communicate them to the House of Representatives. A copy of the last instruction transmitted from this Department to Mr. Tudor on the subject of the blockade accompanies the documents communicated.

Some part of the voluminous correspondence now submitted may, perhaps, be considered as not called for by the resolution of the House. It is, however, presented under the persuasion that it will exhibit a more comprehensive and satisfactory view of the several subjects referred to in the resolution, and of the belligerent operations of the Government of Brazil affecting the interests of the United States.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

Mr. Wright to Minister of Foreign Affairs, January 25, 1828.
Mr. Clay to Mr. Tudor, Chargé d'Affaires to Brazil, April 1, 1828.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States in Brazil, to Mr. Clay, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Rio de Janeiro, December 23, 1825.

"It is very manifest that each Government was desirous of placing upon the other the responsibility of the first open declaration of hostilities, and each probably resolved to enter upon positive measures of war without a formal notification. Accordingly, this Government, on the 6th, 8th, and 7th of the month, gave notice that 'all the ports belonging to the Government of the United Provinces of the River of Plate' were to be placed in a state of blockade.

"The consequences of the blockade above adverted to, I fear, will be exceedingly injurious to our commerce. The Brazilian naval forces which are already in the south, added to those which are on the way, and which comprise, large and small, perhaps thirty vessels, are probably adequate to place the ports of the river Plate in a state of effective blockade; but the mischief we shall have to apprehend will arise chiefly from the seizure of our vessels, under false and frivolous pretexts, by officers who, knowing that prize money cannot proceed from a war with a nation which possesses neither mercantile capital nor ships, will endeavor to reap a harvest out of neutrals under the fraudulent plea of their attempting to violate the blockade.

"In order, however, that nothing on my part should be left undone to avert the evils which I anticipate, I thought it advisable to address to this Government a communication upon the doctrine of blockades, as maintained by the United States, as far as my humble abilities could enable me to explain it. This I did on the 13th instant, and I shall feel happy if I have been so fortunate as to have expressed myself in accordance with the views in relation to that important subject entertained by the President and yourself. A copy will be found herewith enclosed, accompanied by copies of the two communications which announced the blockade. I have as yet received no reply to this representation.

"P. S.—This moment I have received an answer to my communication of the 13th instant, a copy of which is enclosed herewith."

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil.

RIO DE JANEIRO, December 13, 1825.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his compliments to the Viscount of St. Amaro, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and acknowledges the receipt (on the days of their respective dates) of his excellency's communications of the 6th and 7th instant: the first announcing that "his Majesty the Emperor had ordered to be fitted out a naval force with the object of placing in effective blockade all the ports belonging to the Government of the United Provinces of the River of Plate;" and the second giving notice that the said ports "were to be immediately blockaded, by order of his Majesty the Emperor, by the forces already there stationed, reinforced by those which have just departed."

As this measure of war cannot fail deeply to affect the interests of neutral nations, the merchants of which, with their own ships and capitals, carry on, almost exclusively, the foreign trade of Buenos Ayres, and the other ports intended to be blockaded, and as the general terms of the notification, "all the ports" of a coast several hundred miles in extent, involves a question of infinite importance to the interests of the United States, and all the other Powers of America, as well as the secondary States of Europe, the undersigned, as representing one of the nations most interested, conceives it to be his duty to bring into the view of his Majesty's Government some observations upon the principles of blockade as maintained by the United States in their construction of the national law, in the hope that they may be found to be in accordance with those professed by his Majesty's Government, and that thus all liability to any misunderstanding which might possibly arise from the misapplication of those principles may be removed at the onset. The necessity of making this representation is rendered the more imperious upon the undersigned by the occurrence of a case wherein a valuable American ship, seized by one of the commanders in his Majesty's naval service for an alleged breach of the blockade of Pernambuco, in September, 1824, remains, to this day, after a lapse of near fifteen months, not only without a decision, in the first instance, but even without an early prospect of one. As this matter, however, will form the subject of a separate communication, no further remarks in relation to it will here be made.

It cannot but be known to his excellency that the doctrine of blockades, as maintained in the practice of modern times by some of the European Powers, has been entirely subversive of the principles respected by the majority of nations, and which have been uniformly held to be settled by the most distinguished writers on public law, and even by those very Powers themselves in theory. The right of a belligerent to distress his enemy by the institution of sieges and blockades cannot be questioned; but the extent to which he may lawfully prejudice the interests of neutrals is a matter which it is not competent for the belligerent alone to decide. Neutrals as well as belligerents have their rights; and if the former have acceded to the rule that trade in articles contraband of war may not be carried on with the country of a belligerent, this acquiescence is to be viewed as the result of that respect for the laws of humanity which desires to see a speedy termination to the disasters of war wherever they have unhappily been displayed. To this same respect for the laws of humanity is to be ascribed that further concession in favor of belligerents by which neutral nations agree not to convey provisions, or other supplies, to ports or places actually besieged or blockaded; and upon no other principle can the abandonment by neutral nations of their innocent commerce with States with which they are in amity be contended for.

Neutral nations, however, in thus giving up for the common good a portion of their neutral rights, by no means intended that an assailing belligerent should be invested with an artificial power to distress his antagonist, or with any advantages not due to the positive force of his arms. It was for this reason that the maxim was settled, that no port could be considered as in a state of blockade unless so guarded as that "no vessel could enter without evident danger, on account of vessels of war so stationed there as to form an effectual blockade." From this principle it followed that, if any withdrawal of the blockading force should, at any time, take place, owing to the power of the besieged or his allies; or to the necessity of refitting or procuring supplies; or for the purpose of cruising or blockading other places; or from any other cause, (except storms, which drive it temporarily from its position, but which it immediately resumes,) the blockade was considered at an end, and any repetition of it could only be considered as a new blockade, and not as an uninterrupted continuation of the original one, which could affect the interests of neutrals who had entered the port in the meanwhile when no blockading force was present to warn them off or obstruct their entry. In accordance with this equitable construction of the laws of blockade, as defined above, by the armed neutrality of 1780, the Government of Great Britain, the most powerful maritime nation of the world, in a convention with the Empire of Russia, formed in the year 1801, stipulated that, "in order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is given only to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power that attacks it, with ships stationary, or sufficiently near, an evident danger of entering." It is needless to say that the other Powers of Europe, as well as the United States, at that time the only independent American Power, never having disputed the principle, it could not be otherwise regarded than as the established law of nations at the commencement of the present century; and it is equally clear that it must be so considered at this day, notwithstanding the numerous violations that have been practiced by States which acknowledged its correctness. The principle being then indisputable, that the existence on the spot of the means adequate to the end was necessary for the institution of a blockade, the next question which presented itself was, how were neutrals to be notified of the fact? That all aggressions upon an innocent and friendly stranger were contrary to the laws of humanity and justice was too palpable to be denied; and the very proper practice was soon introduced of warning neutrals about to enter a blockaded port of the existence of a blockade; and, without this warning by the blockading force, they could not be liable to capture and confiscation. This just and equitable rule, not at all shaken by the refinements of modern sophistry, or the outrages of modern injustice, was founded upon a fair demarcation of the limits between the rights of neutrals and the rights of belligerents, and is supported by the following reasoning:

The right to prevent the entry of neutrals into the blockaded ports of a Power with which they are in amity is, as above declared, the result of a concession in favor of the belligerent, but a concession only made for such length of time as the blockading party actually maintains the blockade. To prevent the entry of a neutral, even for a moment, after the raising the blockade would be a manifest infringement of his rights; and if the doctrine were admitted, that a notice published in a distant country of a blockade which might by possibility be raised long before any vessel could reach the designated port was the only one requisite, the consequences would be highly injurious to the interests of a distant nation, whose merchants would be deprived of the advantages enjoyed by those near at hand, of furnishing supplies to the party which had been, by the recurrence of peace, or other causes, relieved from the distresses of a siege. In countries which are proximate to each other, as Great Britain, France, Holland, and where the intercourse requires but the lapse of a few hours or days, the institution or the withdrawal of a blockade may be known in so short a period of time as to render the importance of the principle here advocated less manifest than it is to nations which are relatively more distant, such as those that are separated by the Atlantic Ocean, and especially those which are located in different hemispheres. To meet this argument by contending that a vessel is bound to call for information at a neighboring port would be substituting one measure of injustice for another. Leaving out of the question the impracticability, in many cases, especially those wherein whole coasts are blockaded, of complying with such a demand, no belligerent has a right to compel a neutral vessel to perform a circuitous route to the port of her destination; nor has he the right to impose upon her the necessity of incurring the expense of port and other charges in his own ports, or those of any other nation. So satisfied of the correctness of this principle was the Government of Great Britain that, in the year 1804, in consequence of a remonstrance made by the American Government against a declaration of a general blockade of "the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe" proclaimed by a British naval commander, orders were issued to him "not to consider any blockade of those islands as existing, unless in respect of particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter them."

The United States, maintaining the same principles, have always denied the doctrine of general and diplomatic notifications of blockades as binding upon their citizens. Whenever they are made, however, they regard them as friendly offices on the part of the Government from which they proceed; because it gives their merchants an opportunity of taking into the calculation of their voyages the contingency of a continued effective blockade of the ports designated, and affords them an occasion for advancing their own particular views upon that branch of the public code which has been so flagrantly violated by some of the principal Powers of Europe. In the year 1816 the Government of the United States, having been notified by the Spanish minister at Washington of a declaration of the blockade of "the ports of the Viceroyalty of Santa Fe," lost no time in protesting against the general terms of the same; and its representative at Madrid was instructed to advise the Government of Spain that "a blockade, to be acknowledged as valid by the United States, must be confined to particular ports, each having a force stationed before it sufficient to intercept the entry of vessels; and no vessel shall be seized, even in attempting to enter a port so blockaded, till she has been previously warned away from that port." It was also notified that indemnity would be claimed for all captures of American vessels not made in accordance with this rule.

It is manifestly not the interest of the new independent American States to adopt, in their practice, the broadest possible construction of the laws of blockade; for the time may come when, being at war with the powerful maritime nations of Europe, they may find it all important to be able to show that, like the United States, they have always adhered to those maxims which have been received and acknowledged as settled principles of national law, and have always been ready to observe those rules which, consistently with self-protection, have operated least injuriously to neutral and friendly nations. It is for this reason that the undersigned begs leave to invite the attention of his excellency to the following considerations connected with the important question referred to:

The submission of neutrals to the laws of blockade, as above established, is a concession granted to the besieger, and can only be construed to extend so far as shall promote his benefit. Any act, therefore, which can be shown to inflict a positive injury upon a neutral, without conferring a benefit on the besieger in the furtherance of his plans, must be inadmissible, upon the common principles of natural justice. Thus, if a neutral's vessel and property are within a port at the time of the institution of a blockade, it would be manifestly unjust to prohibit their departure, inasmuch, as by so doing, extensive evils would be brought upon the citizens of friendly nations in their pursuit of a lawful commerce. It is, indeed, difficult to imagine what justifiable motive could induce a besieger to prevent a neutral from withdrawing from the besieged place his ships and property; for, by such act, the means of escape and defence, as well as the means of prolonging the contest, would, at the same time, be withdrawn from the enemy. With respect to the right of neutral ships to depart, there seems to be no difference of opinion amongst nations; but the same does not happen in regard to their cargoes. In the year 1813, whilst Great Britain was at war with the United States, some of the European Powers remonstrated against the unjustifiable pretensions of her system of blockade, which embraced the chief part of the coast of the United States; and, in an answer given to the minister of Sweden, it was contended that, although neutral vessels which had entered the American ports without a knowledge of the blockade might, in conformity with the established rule, be allowed to depart, yet that this permission could not be extended to their cargoes. Special motives, in this particular case, on the part of Great Britain might amply account for a measure which she might not, perhaps, willingly have approved if adopted by any other Power; and it is not to be wondered at that a nation which already monopolized so great a share of the commerce of the world should have pursued a system calculated to exclude from competition the capitals of other States.

If, therefore, it can be made to appear, to the satisfaction of his Majesty's Government, that the citizens of nations with which his Majesty is in amity are the proprietors of a large amount of property already in the ports of the United Provinces of the River Plate, or which may enter them before the institution of the blockades, the undersigned would respectfully submit to the consideration of his Majesty's Government, whether it would not be advisable to furnish the officers who are to direct the same (in case the measure has not already been adopted) with explicit instructions on the subject, in order that by no misconception of powers may neutrals be exposed to the privation of their property, either by detention in port or by seizure after leaving it. The undersigned trusts that in this communication his excellency will perceive an additional evidence of the desire by which he is actuated, of endeavoring to perpetuate the harmony and good understanding which so happily subsist between their respective nations; and which will be more and more strengthened, in proportion, as they mutually embrace the same principles of justice and of respect for each other's rights. The undersigned, on this occasion, renews to his excellency the Viscount of St. Amaro the assurance of his great respect and esteem, and of the high consideration with which he has the honor to subscribe himself his excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

The Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, December 6, 1825.

His Majesty the Emperor having ordered a naval force to be got ready to render effectual the blockade of all the ports belonging to the Government of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, I have thus to communicate it to you for your due information, and that it may be made known to all the citizens of your nation to whom this imperial resolution may be interesting.

God preserve you.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, December 7, 1825.

I hasten to inform you, by the declaration of my communication of yesterday, that the ports belonging to the Government of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata have been already blockaded, by order of his Majesty the Emperor, by forces which are there, reinforced with those which have just sailed.

On this occasion I repeat to you, sir, the assurances of my esteem and respect.

VICONDE DE S. AMARO.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, December 23, 1825.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, acknowledges the receipt of the note which, on the 13th current, Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, addressed to him, and to communicate to him that the Government of his Imperial Majesty, penetrated with the sentiments of justice and impartiality expressed in his note, and which agree with those manifested by the same Government, in the frank policy which they always adopt, of not desiring the subjects of other nations to suffer inconveniences which they do not wish their own to experience in like cases, the undersigned is ordered to assure him, in reply to said note, that, in the orders forwarded to the commander of the blockade of the ports of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, the ships of neutral and friendly Powers that may be there before the blockade have been expressly considered; it being resolved that, by a manifesto, the said commander should declare that all the ships before mentioned may freely sail, with their cargoes, within the space of fourteen days, and that, during that time, they should not be prevented from sailing or carrying a cargo.

By these orders the Government of his Imperial Majesty has endeavored to avoid any just causes of dispute which might possibly occur between it and those of neutral nations by reason of the present war and that blockade; and the undersigned flatters himself that Mr. Condy Raguet will recognize in this answer the justice and frankness of proceeding of this Government.

The undersigned, therefore, has another occasion to express to Mr. Condy Raguet the sentiments of his friendship and esteem.

VICONDE DE S. AMARO.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, dated Rio de Janeiro, December 19, 1825.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the 3d day of March last, in my capacity of consul of the United States, I had the honor to address to the respectable gentleman who preceded your excellency in the Department of Foreign Affairs a communication relative to the case of the American ship Spermo, of New York, which had been unjustly seized at Pernambuco, in the month of October preceding, for an alleged breach of blockade. I had also, upon the same occasion, the honor to urge the early attention of his Majesty's Government towards the case of this ship, as one of unauthorized aggression on the part of the officer who made the seizure, and solicited, in behalf of the owners, her restoration, with adequate damages, or an immediate trial before some competent tribunal. To this representation, calculated, as I had flattered myself, with the documents which accompanied it, to prove to the satisfaction of his Majesty's Government that the proceedings against the said ship were without the least foundation in law or justice, I received a reply, under date of the 22d of March, declaring that the case of the Spermo "must be decided in the competent tribunals by the means marked out in the laws." In consequence of this determination of his Majesty's Government, the American claimants, fully persuaded of the justice of their cause, omitted no exertions that were calculated to bring the case to a speedy conclusion. Thus far, however, their endeavors have been fruitless; and, as I have received the commands of my Government upon this subject, which involves a principle upon the doctrine of blockades highly important to the interests of its citizens, and which, at this particular moment, especially calls for investigation, it becomes my duty to invite the serious attention of your excellency to the same, in the conviction that it will be found to be such a case as demands the interposition of his Majesty's Government. The representation above referred to, of 3d of March, contains a statement of the facts, and of the early proceedings in the case; and I therefore beg leave to refer your excellency to the same, with the assurance that the legal documents (autos) of the suit not only substantiate all the material points therein asserted, but even confirm, by the very evidence of the captors themselves, the fact that the Spermo entered the harbor of Pernambuco on the 11th day of August, 1824, the day before the date of Captain Carvalho's declaration of blockade.

But the injustice originally practiced in the case of the seizure of this ship does not at present constitute the whole ground of complaint. The Government of the United States, when it sees its citizens interrupted in the pursuit of a lawful commerce, and deprived of their property by officers for whose conduct their Government is responsible, and is told that, for the redress of their wrongs, the aggrieved parties must be turned over to the ordinary process of law—that Government, I say, has a right to expect that tribunals of known and undoubted competency do really exist, and that justice will be administered by the proper authorities without oppressive and unnecessary delay. How far this reasonable expectation has failed, and how far the party injured, in the case referred to, has a right to complain, your excellency will be enabled to judge from the following statement:

On the 5th of March, the judge at Pernambuco, who had assumed to himself the jurisdiction in the case of the Spermo, after having for five months permitted the suit to be prosecuted before him, came to the decision that he was not competent to try such a case, and that it was one of that peculiar class which belonged to the sole cognizance of the Conselho Supremo Militar, at Rio de Janeiro. This decision was objected to by Captain Carvalho, who had always opposed the wishes of the master of the Spermo to have the case tried at the seat of the Imperial Government, but was confirmed by the judge on the 21st of same month, and the autos were, in consequence, all transmitted, after the lapse of two or three additional months, to the Supreme Military Council, which received them in the latter end of June.

But the delays which have just been adverted to are not the only ones which have taken place in prejudice of the owners of the ship in question. That respectable tribunal, the Supreme Council, perhaps not aware that a valuable ship, exposed to total destruction by the scorching rays of a tropical sun, was awaiting the result of its deliberations, did not decide until the 26th October upon the validity of the irregular sentence pronounced by the judge at Pernambuco. On that day it was determined that the case of the Spermo could only be brought before their body by appeal; that the judge at Pernambuco had defaulted in his duty, and that, to comply with the law, it was requisite that the case should be remanded to him for a decision in the first instance. Reflecting, however, upon "the prejudices, expenses, and other injuries" which would devolve upon the parties by such a course, that considerate tribunal, consisting of eleven members present, unanimously resolved to represent the affair to his Majesty the Emperor, and to solicit of him the same permission to try the cause here which had been granted in the case of another vessel. To this solicitation his Majesty, on the 26th of November, was pleased, in his wisdom, to direct that "the law should be observed," (observe se a loi,) by which decision the case is to be sent back to Pernambuco; and thus, after a lapse of fifteen months, the aggrieved party will find that his resort to the means marked out in the laws has involved him in a mass of damages and expenses, many of which can never be reimbursed by the decision, which must ultimately be given in his favor, and without having advanced him one step towards the redress so manifestly his due. But this is not all. The judge at Pernambuco may still adhere to the original ground of his refusal to pass sentence, and thus a decision may never be obtained until the ship shall have become a prey to the climate and the worms. Justice too long delayed ceases to be justice, and it is for this reason that I urge anew upon his Majesty's Government the solemn consideration to which this case is entitled, and again repeat the very just demand for the restoration of the said ship, with adequate damages, or an immediate trial before some competent tribunal. This communication I should have had the honor to make out at an earlier day, but was prevented by the impossibility of procuring, prior to the 15th instant, from the proper Department, a certified copy of the consulta and imperial determination above referred to.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, January 17, 1826.

[Extract.]

"My last communication of 31st December, with the documents therein referred to, will accompany this.

"I now have the honor to enclose to you the answer of this Government to my late representation in regard to the ship Spermo, by which it will appear that the case is to be sent back to Pernambuco. Mr. Kirkpatrick, the agent of the owners, will proceed to that place, but I have no idea that his presence will hasten the decision of the cause; for, as Captain Carvalho, the captor, is at the river Plate, time will be afforded him for those measures which he may deem indispensable. You will have observed, in my first representation of 3d March last, in relation to this ship, that I supposed her to have entered the harbor of Pernambuco on the 12th of August, 1824, the very day upon which the declaration of blockade was dated; whereas it was admitted by the captors that she entered on the 11th. This difference of date, I presume, arose from the oversight of Captain Clark in his protest, in adhering to the sea time and not adopting the civil time after he came to anchor; for, by this omission, he appeared to have arrived off the harbor on the 11th, when, in fact, it was on the afternoon of the 10th. In the minister's note to me you will also have observed an expression which would seem to imply that the case of the vessel which had been tried by the Conselho Supremo was cited by me, whereas it was cited by that tribunal in its representation to the Emperor."

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, January 4, 1826.

In acknowledging the receipt of the note you addressed me under date the 19th December last, I have to reply that the Government of his Imperial Majesty feels and acknowledges the necessity of providing an efficient remedy against dilatory proceedings, but that the necessary measures to accomplish this object are not within the scope of its powers; it is for this reason that, in the case of the proceedings against the ship Spermo, which has given rise to your representation, the measures you suggest cannot be adopted, as it exceeds the powers of the Government to order judgment to be given, in the case of said vessel, by the Supreme Military Council. The instance cited by you cannot be applicable to the present case, as being an act occurring while all powers were united in the person who at that time governed Brazil.

But the Imperial Government, desirous of showing its good wishes and its sentiments of equity, I will direct that orders be transmitted to the Governor of the province of Pernambuco, earnestly to recommend, in the name of the Government of his Imperial Majesty, tó the respective judges, to take into their consideration, as heretofore, the case in question, and to decide in conformity to law.

On this occasion, I renew to you the expression of my esteem, friendship, and respect.

God preserve you many years.

VISCOUNT DE S. AMARO.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, March 20, 1826.

[Extracts.]

"The Spermo, at Pernambuco, is fast falling to decay; and I have yet heard nothing from the agent of the owners at that port, or of the progress of the suit. Captain Jenkins, of the brig Exchange, of Boston, is still here prosecuting his claim for damages; but I am, as before, of opinion that justice in neither case will be done until I am instructed to demand it in a tone different from that which I have heretofore considered myself authorized to employ. With respect to the case of the Morning Star, of Philadelphia, in relation to which I received your instructions under date of April last, no redress can be expected. The very documents admit a violation of the navigation laws of this country, which prohibit foreign vessels from carrying, coastwise, Brazilian productions, under penalty of confiscation."

"The schooner Grace Ann, of whose detention at Santos I made mention in my letter of January, was stopped in December, in the river Plate, by the blockading squadron, and sent to Montevideo, after having had part of her crew taken out. After a few days' detention, she was liberated from this unlawful seizure, and, having cleared out for the Pacific, shaped her course for Buenos Ayres, where she safely arrived. Mr. James Bond, acting as our vice consul at Montevideo, in a correspondence with Admiral Lobo and the Captain General, relating to the detention of this vessel, displayed much intelligence and spirit; but the consequence of this evasion of the blockade was the issuing, on the 19th January, by the Viscount of Laguna, an order declaring that no foreign or national vessel should be permitted to depart with cargoes of foreign production, without giving security, to the value thereof, that she would not enter 'the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres.' This singular mode of substituting a blockade ought to be resisted; but I am afraid that if I were to make a representation against it now, the consequence would be an immediate order to enforce the same regulation in all the other ports, which would make the matter worse, by multiplying the cases."

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, April 12, 1826.

[Extracts.]

"The frigate Nitherwhy and schooner-of-war Itaparica, sailed for the river Plate on 22d March. Admiral Lobo has thus far been so unsuccessful in his blockade and warfare that report says he is to be superseded by an Admiral Pinto, who is to sail at an early day with a reinforcement of ships. This latter gentleman is a native of Portugal, somewhat advanced in life, and has not been at sea for many years. This measure has probably been resorted to in consequence of some representation made by the naval commanders in the river Plate, through the Chief of Division, José de Brito, who was wounded in the action of 9th February, and arrived here on the 30th ultimo. Lobo, it would seem, has displayed too much prudence in his operations, and, it is said, has avoided combat with Brown whenever he had a chance. It is even supposed that he might have been present at the second attack on Colonia; and so loosely has he maintained his blockade that it has been at times difficult to find him. Mr. Bond writes me that Mr. Slacum, who reached Montevideo on the 19th February, had cruised three days for Admiral Lobo, in order to deliver him Mr. Forbes' protest, without meeting with him; and Captain Martin, of the British sloop-of-war Jasseur, for Buenos Ayres, on the 25th of that month, has informed me that he was three days beating down to Montevideo, during which time he did not see a single vessel of the Brazilian squadron. It is supposed that not a single foreign vessel which attempted to reach Buenos Ayres, with a knowledge of the blockade, has failed to succeed, and that those which have been turned off, and ordered to Montevideo, (for it is said that Lobo actually designates the port of destination, in order, no doubt, to trammel the vessel with the bonds of which I made mention in my last,) were only such as were ignorant of its existence."

"At the date of my last letter I was not sure, as I now am, that the French brig-of-war Fawn had entered Buenos Ayres during the existence of the blockade. The principle has therefore been settled for the English and French; and I daily expect to hear that Captain Elliott has settled it for us; after which, I presume, the doctrine of the right to exclude neutral ships of war from a blockaded port will be abandoned in this hemisphere."

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, May 25, 1826.

[Extract.]

"By the movements of Brown and the arrival at Buenos Ayres of a number of merchant vessels, amongst which were several Brazilian prizes, estimated to be worth upwards of $100,000, it is discernible that an effectual blockade of the river Plate cannot be said to exist. An attempt was made by Lobo's squadron to stop the Cyane, on the 3d of April, off the Otiz banks, on her way up, but was abandoned on its being ascertained that Captain Elliott was prepared to resist by force. The particulars of this occurrence, as well as a correspondence which he held with the admiral on the subject of the blockade, he will, no doubt, communicate to the Government through the proper channel."

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, June 27, 1826.

[Extract.]

"P. S.—JUNE 28. There has been published here, in the Spectator of the 22d and 23d instant, a correspondence which took place at Montevideo, on the 28th of May, between the British consul at that port, Mr. Hood, and Admiral Pinto, of which I send you a copy, relative to the capture of two British vessels. The latter assumes the British doctrine of blockades, maintaining that a ship is liable to capture if bound to a port known to be declared in a state of blockade at the time she sailed or at any time during her voyage; and that an effective force on the spot is not essential to render a capture valid, inasmuch as the declaration and the notification to neutral nations is binding upon them. These pretensions will, no doubt, be enforced against our vessels, unless resisted by physical means."

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, July 17, 1826.

[Extract]

"On the 10th instant there arrived at this port the brig Leonidas, of Boston, captured by the blockading squadron in the river Plate, somewhere about the 18th of June, and sent into Montevideo, where the captain, (Bartlett,) by accident or design, was left behind. Two mates and two men have arrived in the vessel; the rest of the crew, consisting of four seamen, having been taken out by the captors, and a prize crew of thirteen having been put in their place. The chief mate (Mr. Pulsifer) states that the Leonidas was chartered last year, at Buenos Ayres, to the house of Stewart, McCall & Co., for a voyage to Canton and back, and that her cargo cost, in China, above ninety thousand dollars, and belongs to a number of individuals, some of whom are English merchants, and the rest are citizens of Buenos Ayres. They had heard nothing of the blockade of the river Plate, and the presumption is that the vessel is sent in on account of having on board enemy's property. On the 14th instant the Auditor General of Marine went on board, and, in the presence of Mr. Samuel Clapp, an American merchant, in whose hands Mr. Pulsifer had placed the business of the vessel, opened the sealed bag transmitted by the captors, in which were contained the ship's papers, the original manifest, bills of lading, and correspondence, by which it would appear (as Mr. Clapp has informed me) that the principal part of the cargo, which, if sold here, would probably bring two hundred thousand dollars, is in the name of a house believed to be natives of Buenos Ayres, and that no part of it belonged to citizens of the United States. Thus far I have taken no steps in the case further than addressing a note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, requesting him to inform me of the cause of the capture; and, at the same time, requested him to cause to be suspended any definite proceedings until a reasonable time be afforded for the arrival of the master. Whether any pretensions will be set up against the vessel for an attempt to violate the blockade I cannot say; but, as far as the question may relate to enemy's property, the case looks gloomy enough. I shall, however, watch the progress of the adjudication, and act in the affair as well as my limited knowledge of law will enable me.

"Excepting the case just referred to, nothing material in relation to our commerce with the river Plate has yet occurred. The American brig Homer, of Baltimore, which cleared hence for Valparaiso, and the ship Corsair, which sailed from Bahia, both with a knowledge of the blockade, safely arrived at Buenos Ayres in June; and when these facts shall become known to this Government they will probably resort to bonds in relation to all vessels of doubtful destination. Mr. Joshua Bond, who returned to Montevideo from Buenos Ayres in April, states to me, under date of 13th June, as follows: 'There have been, I believe, no instances in which the conduct of the commanders of the armed vessels or others could be complained of, with the exception of those of which you have already been informed. Two seamen, impressed at Bahia, have been released, after some little importunity.' The cases alluded to by Mr. Bond have been noticed by me in former letters. The same gentleman, under date of the 16th of June, says that 'the ship Macedonian, of Portland, laden with salt, from the Cape de Verds, had arrived on the day before, having been turned off by the squadron.'"

Mr. Raguet to Minister of Foreign Affairs.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Rio de Janeiro, June 20, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his respectful compliments to the Viscount of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honor to communicate to his excellency that he has been advised by the consul of the United States at Bahia, under date of 7th instant, that two American seamen, named William Forbes and John B. Staat, representing themselves to have been forcibly impressed on board the frigate of his Imperial Majesty, Donna Paulla, had sailed from that port on board that ship, bound, as it was supposed, to the river of Plate. As the undersigned has had repeated assurances from the Government of his Imperial Majesty that it is not its intention to employ in its service foreign seamen who have not voluntarily entered, he has only, on this occasion, to request that his excellency will cause the matter to be inquired into, and, if the facts be as represented, that orders will be issued to the commander of the frigate in question to deliver up the said seamen to any consul of the United States, or to the commander of any American ship of war which he may meet at Montevideo or elsewhere.

The undersigned renews, upon this occasion, to his excellency the assurance of his high consideration and respect, &c.

M.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, June 28, 1826.

In addition to my note of the 22d instant, as it relates to the two American citizens, William Forbes and John B. Staat, whom you represent as having been enlisted at Bahia as sailors for the frigate Paulla, I have to inform you that the Minister and Secretary of State for Affairs of Marine has issued the necessary orders to the commander of the squadron in the river Plate, should it appear, on examination, that violence was really used towards these individuals, that they be delivered up in the manner required by the Chargé d'Affaires.

I take this opportunity to renew the expression of my respect and esteem. God preserve you many years.

VISCOUNT DE INHAMBUPE.

Mr. CONDY RAGUET.

Mr. Raguet to Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, July 15, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his compliments to the Viscount of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and having learned that the American brig Leonidas, which entered this port on the 10th, has been sent here by one of the commanders of his Imperial Majesty's ships in the river Plate, would thank his excellency to inform him of the cause of her capture. The undersigned would further request of his excellency that, as the master of the said vessel is not on board of her, no definitive proceedings may take place until a reasonable time be afforded for his arrival from Montevideo, into which port the vessel was first sent.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to assure his excellency of his distinguished consideration.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, July 19, 1826.

In answer to the note which you addressed me, under date the 15th instant, asking explanations as to the capture of the American brig Leonidas and the circumstances which occurred in that transaction,

I have to inform you that I have transmitted a copy of your note to the Department of Marine, in order to obtain the information called for by you on this subject.

I avail myself of the present occasion to express to you my sentiments of respect and esteem.

God preserve you many years.

VISCOUNT DE INHAMBUPE.

J. J.

Mr. Raguet to Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, July 24, 1826.

Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his compliments to the Viscount of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and hastens to communicate to his excellency that he has this day been made acquainted with the arrival at this port of the master of the American brig Leonidas, and, of course, withdraws his request, made on the 15th instant, that definitive proceedings against that vessel should be delayed on account of his absence.

Mr. Raguet renews to the Viscount the assurance of his respect and consideration.

K.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, August 14, 1826.

In addition to my note of the 19th ultimo, I have to inform you that I have received the explanations which I had asked of the Minister and Secretary of State for Affairs of Marine. The motives for the capture of the brig Leonidas, of your nation, reduce themselves to the fact of her having been found and detained by the blockading squadron of the river Plate in sight of the blockaded port, for which she was bound directly, and particularly for having on board goods belonging to enemy's subjects. I refer you to the papers and correspondence of the commander of the squadron, which form the principal ground of accusation, and which are annexed to the proceedings in the case of said brig, from which you may cause extracts to be made of the certificates, and of such other documents as you may desire.

I renew to you, on this occasion, the assurances of my esteem and consideration.

God preserve you.

VISCOUNT DE INHAMBUPE.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, September 1, 1826.

[Extract.]

"On the 29th ultimo there arrived at this port, under convoy of the imperial brig-of-war Independencia on Morté, the Ruth, of Philadelphia, Captain Jefferson, which was captured by the former on the 5th of August, on her passage from Gibraltar to the river of Plate, off soundings, and I think about one hundred and fifty miles from the land. The crew were taken out with the exception of the mate, the cook, and one man, who, with the master and supercargo, Mr. George K. Budd, were left on board, and their place was supplied by a prize crew of one officer and eleven men. On the 11th of the same month a disturbance of some kind (in the course of which Mr. Budd was in danger of losing his life) took place on board the Ruth, which was made use of by the prize-master as a pretext for confining that gentleman and his companions, upon the ground of an attempt to recapture the vessel. This transaction took place within sight of the brig-of-war, which had also under her convoy a Danish, one English, and two French prizes; a circumstance which, of itself, in connexion with the superior numbers of the prize crew would be sufficient to invalidate the charge, which is declared by Mr. Budd and Captain Jefferson to be wholly without foundation.

"After a close confinement of three nights and two days, the prisoners, all except the cook, were sent on board the Independencia on Morté, under circumstances of the most atrocious character. The commander of that vessel himself came on board and insulted, with the most vulgar and opprobrious epithets, Mr. Budd and Captain Jefferson for conduct which, had the facts been really as alleged, would have merited the applause and respect ever due to gallantry. Mr. Budd was pushed off the quarter-deck of his vessel by the said commander, forced into a boat without any clothes upon him, (except his shirt and pantaloons,) although it was raining at the time; and, under the charge of four armed men, was conveyed to the brig, where he was joined by the mate, the seamen, and Captain Jefferson, to whom a change of clothes was allowed. On board this vessel they were all thrown promiscuously among the crew, consisting of whites, mulattoes, and negroes, and compelled to sleep on the deck, covered with filth and vermin, and to endure insults, indignities, and privations not easily to be imagined, even had they been enemies. An attempt was even made, one night, to assassinate Mr. Budd while in his bed. In this wretched condition they continued until their arrival in this harbor; and it was not until the day after that Mr. Budd was able to communicate to me his unpleasant situation. At five o'clock in the afternoon of that day I received a very short note from him, written in the morning, begging me to come on board the Independencia on Morté as soon as possible, for that delay might be fatal to him. Captain Biddle, who had not even known that one of the prize vessels which had arrived the day before was an American, (no colors having been shown,) was dining at my house at the time, and immediately went off into the harbor to ascertain particulars, of which we were altogether ignorant. At 6 o'clock Mr. Wright, our consul, came to inform me that the prisoners had been conveyed to the prison ship, called the Prézéganga, from which he had just returned, having only heard of their situation two or three hours before.

"Having a full knowledge of the awful condition of that ship, which I once visited to extricate an impressed American seaman, (crowded as she is with prisoners and criminals of all colors and nations intermingled en masse,) I was convinced that a prompt movement and a determined conduct on my part was necessary and demanded by the occasion. I accordingly went, without a moment's unnecessary delay, to the house of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, whom, not finding at home, I traced to a tea party of noble gentlemen and ladies at the Baron of Valenca's, where, in a private room to which we retired, I stated to him the object of my visit in language so earnest that he promised to lay the case, in the morning, before the Emperor, and gave me his word of honor that I should have satisfaction. In this conversation, which was in French, under the excitement of strong feelings, I took upon myself to say to his excellency that the case was an urgent one, calling for immediate attention; that the question of liberty was the one which touched most deeply the sensibility of the Government and people of the United States; that the liberty of a single citizen was valued by them at a greater price than all property; and that if Brazil was desirous of avoiding a war with the United States she must respect that liberty. On the following morning, before 9 o'clock, I went on board the Macedonian, where I learned from Captain Biddle that Lieutenant Calhoun had visited the prisoners on the preceding night, on board the Prézéganga, to which vessel I immediately (as was my intention) proceeded. Here I learned, at some length, from the parties the particulars above briefly sketched, and at the same time had ocular proof of the horrible condition of this ship, where, upon the same deck with Mr. Budd, Captain Jefferson, and his mate, were stretched a mass of wretched objects, prisoners, convicts, and impressed seamen, of all colors, some resting under the weight of their chains, some picking oakum, some gambling, and others, indifferent to their degraded condition, wallowing in filth and indulging in obscene and beastly gestures. Mr. Budd had just received a change of clothes from the shore, which enabled him to put off the suit he had worn for 17 days in the den of filth and vice which he had just left, and to which he assured me this Prézéganga was a palace. The crew of the Ruth had not yet been able to change their clothes, and they had had nothing to eat since they arrived on board, twenty-one hours before, except what little they could obtain from their companions in misery. One of them told midshipman Deas, who accompanied me, that he would rather go on shore and be executed than to remain ten days longer where he was.

"At 12 o'clock, after returning to the shore, I called at the Foreign Office, but found that the Minister had not yet been there. I took advantage, however, of the occasion to express to Mr. Lisboa, the chief clerk, in a conversation of half an hour, the abhorrence which I felt at the barbarous and inhuman conduct of the commander of the brig Independencia on Morté. I pronounced it to be the greatest outrage upon civilization that had ever been practiced in modern days, with the single exception of the crime lately committed by his Imperial Majesty's brig Amprehendedor, who captured a Spanish vessel (the Escuderra) on the coast of Africa, and cut off the left ear of the supercargo close by the head, after threatening to hang him, from which he was restrained by his own crew. I told him that I had only two hours before saw this victim of piratical barbarity a prisoner on board the Prézéganga, and expressed my astonishment that the Government, instead of making an example of such a monster, and giving him the reward due to his crime against the laws of nations, should actually have sent him to sea again, to cut off other people's ears, on the 26th of August, as commander of the very Spanish vessel which he had captured, and which had never yet been condemned. I told him, moreover, that, if my countrymen were not released from their imprisonment without delay, I should make such a representation to his Government on the subject as they would not like to see; that I would give them a picture of the inside of the Prézéganga which would make them shudder, and that I would leave no stone unturned; that I would go to the end of the world to prove them not to be a civilized people. This conversation, which, as nearly as I can recollect, was in the foregoing words, and certainly in terms not less strong, took place in English, which Mr. Lisboa understands very well. He expressed a proper abhorrence of the conduct of the commander of the Amprehendedor, but thought, as he was a Frenchman,* that the disgrace of the transaction would not attach to Brazil—an argument which I admitted would have been sound enough had the barbarian been hanged for his crime, and not received the approval of the Government by a continuance of employment, seeing that the Foreign Department had already been placed in possession of depositions on the subject, which had been shown to me by the Consul General of Spain, placing the matter beyond all doubt. He also expressed a becoming indignation at the conduct of the captain of the Independencia on Morté, and promised to see the Minister at his house, and communicate to me forthwith the result of his deliberations.

"At a quarter past three I received a communication from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in Mr. Lisboa's handwriting, informing me that the case had been laid before the Emperor, who, out of his consideration for the United States, had resolved that the persons in question should be liberated upon my becoming officially responsible for their appearance in case, upon trial, they should be found guilty of the offence alleged against them, which was an attempt to retake the vessel. I was also informed that, to consummate the affair, I was to refer to the Minister of Marine, to whom I immediately repaired. I afterwards went to the office of the Auditor General of Marine to enter my responsibility, a process which, under a Government possessed of a little more delicacy and highminded views, I might well have been spared. I, however, after a good deal of vexatious delay, during which several attempts were made to procrastinate, accomplished my object, and obtained the order, addressed to the Inspector of the Arsenal, who has charge of the Prézéganga, for the release of all the prisoners. This order I placed, as soon as it was received, which was a little after night, in the hands of Mr. Thomas Bedwell, an American merchant, who volunteered to go off immediately in the harbor to the Prézéganga, bring on shore Mr. Budd, Captain Jefferson, and his mate, and inform the seamen, nine in number, that early in the morning a boat would be sent from the Macedonian to convey them on board that ship, all which was accomplished.

"Thus has terminated the first part of this atrocious transaction. As soon as a detailed protest can be made out, I have it in contemplation to make a formal demand for the punishment of the commander of the Independencia on Morté, as the only means of preventing a repetition by others of such brutality as has been herein detailed. I have brought in the case of the unfortunate Spaniard, a very decent man, with whom I conversed, and whose mutilation I can attest to from ocular inspection, which caused my blood to run cold, and produced a sensation so horrible that I cannot describe it, in order that you may see what cruelties and barbarities, known only to pirates and outlaws, have been sanctioned by this Government, which professes to be within the pales of Christianity and civilization. I see no reason why the ears of American citizens are safer from the knife than those of the citizens of other nations; and I am free to say that, if this Government is to be allowed lawlessly to capture our vessels, and to degrade, oppress, and perhaps mutilate our countrymen, when such atrocities can be prevented by a single word pronounced by me, with the special command of the President, supported by such instructions as will not render the presence of our naval force here a positive nullity and burlesque upon maritime power, it is useless either to maintain a mission at this Court or a squadron on the coast.

* Lewis Clemente Poitiers is the name of this monster.

"A copy of the Minister's despatch to me, above referred to, will be found enclosed herewith.

"September 2. The brig Leonidas has been given up upon bonds, but her case has not yet been adjudicated.

"The case of the Spermo is now before the Supreme Military Council by appeal of the captors, and Mr. Kirkpatrick, agent of the owners, is now here attending to its progress. The decision of the judge at Pernambuco was a restoration of the vessel and cargo, with damages, upon the ground that she entered the port before any official notice of a blockade was given by Captain Carvalho, and was, therefore, not liable to condemnation. The counsel of the appellants, in their pleadings, have now assumed the ground that a blockade, when once officially proclaimed, continues until officially revoked, and they contend that the blockade first instituted by Commodore Taylor, in April, 1824, was in force in August of that year. The facts really are, that not only was the blockade de facto raised, but the measure was acknowledged, in June or July, in a proclamation of the Emperor to the people of Pernambuco, which I cannot immediately lay my hands on. It is not improbable that this case will be left for final decision until those of the numerous vessels captured in the river Plate shall be adjudicated, so as to avoid a precedent, which may go to clear some of the English, French, Dutch, Danish, or American property now under process of law.

"The schooners Lafayette and Camilla, I understand, were detained in the river Plate for a short time and given up; but I have not received from Mr. Bond any statement of their cases."

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, August 31, 1826.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, having laid before his Majesty the Emperor the verbal request made to him by Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, to cause to be set at liberty the supercargo and other persons belonging to the American brig captured by the Brazilian squadron forming the blockade of the river Plate, and who are at present on board the Prézéganga, I have to inform you, that although these persons have been delivered up to the judicial authority upon an accusation of attempting to recapture said brig, yet his Imperial Majesty, wishing to testify all his regard for the United States of America, will direct orders to be given to release the individuals in question as soon as you shall have given official security that they will be surrendered as soon as found guilty; and for this purpose the requisite communications have been made to the Minister and Secretary of State for Affairs of Marine, with whom you may correspond to that effect.

The undersigned renews to you the expression of his esteem and respect.

VISCOUNT DE INHAMBUPE.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, September 23, 1826.

[Extracts.]

"The extraordinary conduct pursued by this Government, not only in relation to the United States but all other neutral Powers, is not to be reconciled with any of the considerations of justice, policy, or prudence, which are usually supposed to influence statesmen in their intercourse with foreign nations. Reasoning upon general principles founded in common sense, one would suppose that a monarchy so young as Brazil and surrounded by Republics so feeble in physical as well as in moral power, in danger of being weighed down by a heavy public debt and a large annual deficit in her revenue, and waging an expensive war with a sister American State, in which, as the price of much blood and treasure, she has received nothing but dishonor to her arms—one would suppose, I say, that such a nation, and one so circumstanced, would have exerted all its endeavors to attract towards her the favorable opinion and the good feelings of all the States with which she was in amity. This, however, has not been the case. In support of illegal pretensions connected with the right of blockade, which she has embraced without possessing the means to sustain, she has committed acts of the most irregular and unjustifiable character, not only against the commerce and citizens of minor States, who have not the means of redress, but also against the great maritime Powers, and amongst these our Republic, which, from its political position on this continent, is entitled to the respect if not the affection of the Imperial Government. Our vessels have been captured under pretexts which this Government knows to be wholly inadmissible by ours. Our seamen, sailing under the protection of their country's flag, have been forcibly taken out of American vessels, insulted, and degraded; they have been treated as prisoners of war, or have been obliged to perform duty on board the capturing vessels under penalty of corporal punishment in case of refusal; and have even been compelled to stand at quarters prepared to fight against a nation with which their own is in amity. They have been detained on board the imperial squadron, and their surrender has been positively refused by the commanding admiral, or have been compelled to navigate the captured vessels of another nation. But this is not all. American seamen, thus captured in a time of peace, have, under the very eye of the Government, been deposited in a floating prison, crowded with convicts, murderers, and pirates, of all colors and languages, and compelled to be witnesses of the most revolting scenes of vice, profligacy, and misery, which the human mind can imagine, and to be partakers with them of the most filthy and disgusting accommodations; and not only have such atrocities been committed against our common seamen, but even against the master, supercargo, and mate of an American vessel, who have received, at the brutal hands of Brazilian officers, the treatment which could only have been looked for from the buccaneers of the Barbary Powers.

"If you add to all this the recent conduct of the commander-in-chief of the imperial naval forces in the river Plate, who has advanced the monstrous pledge that he will assist the seamen of the United States in the commission of the crime of desertion, and then afford them protection under the imperial flag, you will then, perhaps, be able to judge what we may further expect from the policy and feelings of this Government and its subordinate agents.

"My residence in this country of four years, commencing on the 8th September, 1822, has, as is well known to the President and yourself, presented for the files of the Department of State nothing but a continued record of wrongs inflicted by this Government and its officers upon our commerce, our citizens, and our national honor, in return for numerous acts of kindness and forbearance. My correspondence with this Government exhibits a regular series of complaints and of evasive or unsatisfactory answers; for, in the cases where redress was obtained, it was always so tardily and so ungraciously afforded as to have lost the character of ample reparation; and even, in some instances, the delay was so great as to magnify the offence, as happened in the case of Mr. Rodney's treatment. In support of the rights which I was placed here to advocate, I have exercised the little zeal which belongs to my temperament, and the whole extent of the limited talents which Heaven has been pleased to intrust to my care. My position has been one of much vexation, solicitude, mortification, and pain; but all this I have endured with cheerfulness, because I hoped that my Government would sustain and uphold me, and that it would, sooner or later, give me such positive and determinate instructions as would enable me to speak to this Government in the only language which can cause respect for our rights—I mean language addressed to its fears. In this expectation I have been thus far disappointed. I have not received from your Department a single line of later date than the 16th of April, 1825; and having thus far been obliged to act upon my own judgment, without a single individual to advise with, I almost despair of success in any of the efforts I may hereafter be called upon to make.

"Having, in former communications, recommended a resort to decisive measures with these people, who cannot be reached by the power of reason or an appeal to justice, and being apprehensive that the three ships-of-war now on this station, under existing instructions, cannot prevent the evils which are likely to be most heavily felt, I will take the liberty of suggesting, for the consideration of the President, the advisableness of bringing our relations with Brazil before the public in his message to Congress. A manifestation of displeasure through that channel would be equal to volumes written by me, and the moral effect, I am of opinion, could not fail to be most powerful in restraining future abuses. I would further recommend that I be specially instructed to make a formal demand upon this Government for the immediate surrender, with damages, of all vessels which have been or may be captured in opposition to the laws respecting blockade maintained by us, including the cases of the Spermo and Exchange; that I be instructed to require a total suspension of the practice of taking American seamen out of American vessels, and a formal public notification thereof; and to demand the satisfaction which is manifestly due for the aggressions which have already been committed. Such instructions, however, should be accompanied by an order for my recall in case the demands should be rejected, which, I feel assured, would not be the case, owing to the fears of this Government that the prospect of a breach between the United States and Brazil would given a moral strength to the Republic of Buenos Ayres, which might, perhaps, be fatal to the pretensions of the Emperor. Now is the moment to make our nation respected by this. Now is the moment to make this Government feel the influence which we are destined to maintain in this hemisphere of liberty; and if it be desirable to negotiate a treaty of commerce, perhaps now is the moment when the footing of the most favored nation might be obtained as the price of a reconciliation, particularly in case I should be obliged to proceed to the extremity of giving notice of my recall. Should the President approve of these suggestions, or resolve upon any other measures of a decided character, I would respectfully remark that despatches sent by a fast-sailing public vessel would produce an effect of the most important character. The manner in which a thing is done is more regarded by these people than the thing itself; and hence the English and French, in all their dealings with them, find their account in studying the imposing attitude and action; and a negotiation here for redress should always be well supported with ships. Besides, such mode of communicating the President's sentiments would show that he was in earnest, and it would give a notoriety to the dissatisfaction of our Government which would operate favorably here, inasmuch as the nobility and others, whose prospects depend upon the stability of the monarchy, would unite their efforts to avert a common ruin; for such, I conceive, they would anticipate to be the result of an open rupture between this Empire and our Republic.

"In the meantime I shall relax no efforts which belong to my functions; I shall continue to hold the same sort of language as that which I have usually employed; and, although I think it likely that offence may be taken at the harshness of some expressions which I have used, or may use in relation to officers in the service of the Government, yet, as I consider that an affected delicacy is not due to them, I shall not be easily driven off the ground, and shall be prepared to meet all consequences, whatever they may be. Public duty should outweigh all calculations of private interest, and I shall, therefore, not be deterred from uttering any appropriate sentiments, in the strong language of truth, through fear that communications with me may be suspended.

"I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a copy of a representation made by me on the 9th instant to this Government, upon the subject of the treatment of the supercargo, master, and crew of the Ruth, together with the only reply which I have yet received, dated on the 12th. The seven seamen released from the Prézéganga were transferred from the Macedonian to the Boston, which ship has been detained a few days on their account. My knowledge of the character of those with whom I have to deal renders it necessary that I should incur no risk as to the fulfilment of my contract respecting the individuals for whom I entered into bonds; for, although only two of the seven can possibly be implicated in the transaction alleged, yet the release or the escape of the others might be brought against me, in case a similar occurrence at a future time should require a similar remedy. I have no doubt that the delay in cancelling my bond is intentional; and, should it be continued for several days longer, I shall request Captain Hoffman to sail on his cruise, which will not be a long one, with the men on board This, to be sure, will be a hardship for them, but there is no other recourse. I also transmit, herewith, a copy of the protest of Mr. Budd, supercargo of the Ruth, by which you will discover that, in the statement made in my letter of the 1st instant, there were a few mistakes; not, however, in important particulars, and that the coloring which I gave to the transaction was by no means heightened."

"By an order issued on 17th July, foreign vessels clearing out for the south are required to give bonds, of double the amount of vessel and cargo, that they will not proceed to blockaded ports."

Protest of George K. Budd, Supercaryo of Brig Ruth.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Brazil, Rio de Janeiro.

Before me, W. H. D. C. Wright, Esquire, consul of the United States of America for the port of Rio de Janeiro, personally appeared George Knight Budd, of Philadelphia, supercargo of the American brig Ruth, of the same port Jacob Jefferson, master, who, having been duly sworn, did declare and say as follows, viz: That he sailed from the said port of Philadelphia with said vessel on the 16th day of April last past, for Gibraltar, and from the latter port on the 12th day of June following, with a cargo of wine, cocoa, paper, beef, pork, and other articles, not contraband of war, bound to Buenos Ayres; in case that port should be found to be in a state of blockade on arrival in the river Plate, to Montevideo, a port in possession of the Government of Brazil. That on the 24th of July they spoke an English brig, bound from Rio de Janeiro to Bahia, which informed them that Buenos Ayres was still in a state of blockade; in consequence of which information he ordered that the vessel should proceed direct for Montevideo, and the log-book was accordingly headed for that port. That on the 5th of August, at 2 p. m., in latitude 34° 21′ south, and longitude 52° 28′ west, by account, at the distance of about ninety miles from the land, and off soundings, discovered four sail to windward, distant about six miles, which immediately tacked ship, fired a gun, and stood for the Ruth, which hoisted the American flag, and was hove to, to await the approach of a vessel of war under Brazilian colors. That at 5 p. m. the Ruth was boarded by an officer from the national and imperial brig-of-war Independencia on Morté, commanded by Joaquim Leal Ferreira, a Brazilian, who asked Captain Jefferson where he was bound, and received for answer to Montevideo. That the said officer then demanded the brig's papers, and, upon receiving only the register, asked for a pass. That to this request Captain Jefferson replied, that, as there was no custom-house at Gibraltar, he had not been furnished with any clearance. That upon the officer's insisting upon other papers, the bill of health was handed to him, being the only public document in possession of the master showing the destination of his vessel. That Captain Jefferson was ordered into the boat of the man-of-war, and directed to take his papers on board of her; which demands he complied with. That, after an absence of about half an hour, Captain Jefferson returned on board the brig, accompanied by a prize crew, consisting of one officer and eleven men—negroes, mulattoes, and whites—armed with swords, pistols, and muskets, who took possession of the Ruth. That five of the seamen, viz: W. Spooner, J. Rives, J. Barclay, J. Wilson, and W. Bennet, all Americans, and the steward, J. Baptista, an Italian, were forthwith ordered to proceed on board of the man-of-war as prisoners. That the prize-master immediately took command of the vessel, leaving on board of her deponent; Captain Jefferson; John Wiske, mate; Martin Binder, seaman; and Richard Speed, cook; and, under convoy of the Independencia on Morté, directed his course for Rio de Janeiro. That the said prize-master lived in the cabin of the brig Ruth, and dined at the same table with Captain Jefferson and deponent, and got intoxicated the first evening he was on board. That on the second day after the capture the prize crew asked for liquor, which Captain Jefferson refused to give them, upon the ground that he was not in the practice of giving any to his own crew. That on the 7th of August the mate, Mr. Wiske, was taken from the Ruth on board the man-of-war, and William Bennet was brought back to remain in his place. That from the 7th to the 11th of the month the prize-master and the prize crew were every day more or less intoxicated with liquor served out by order of the prize-master. That at six o'clock in the evening of the latter day the said crew came aft and made a demand for more liquor, when Captain Jefferson told the prize-master that they should not have any more, as they had already had enough; that they insisted on having their demand complied with, when the prize-master ordered the liquor to be given them. That, upon a quart measure full being served out, Captain Jefferson said to the prize-master that the appearance of the weather indicated a gale, and that, in a state of intoxication, the Ruth, in all probability, would run away with the prize crew, or that all her sails would be lost. That at about dusk of the same evening, whilst deponent, Captain Jefferson, Martin Binder, and the prize-master were at supper in the cabin, a great noise was heard on deck, which induced the prize-master, who was at the time so much intoxicated that he could stand with difficulty, to go up. That he was followed by deponent, who found the prize crew all aft on the main deck in high words apparently with the prize-master. That immediately after, while deponent was sitting on a hencoop, a sabre was presented to his breast by one of the prize crew, who at this time were armed with muskets and swords. That during this disturbance Captain Jefferson and Martin Binder remained below, when deponent called the latter to load a pistol for him, as the prize crew were in a state of mutiny and his life was in danger. That a small pocket pistol was immediately brought to him, which he put into his coat pocket. That soon after, whilst standing on the quarter-deck, one of the prize crew charged him with having a pistol about him; and the deponent, judging from the appearance of things, that his life would be more secure than if he should use the pistol, threw it overboard. That hereupon one of the prize crew raised his sword and prepared to aim a blow at the head of deponent, which would infallibly have killed him had it not been stayed by one of his companions, who told deponent he had better go below. That at this moment two muskets were fired on the forecastle, and soon after the man-of-war, which, at the commencement of the mutiny was to windward, distant about a quarter of a mile, ran foul of the Ruth and carried away part of her foretopsail. That at this time the commotion on deck was very great; the prize-master and his crew hailing the Independencia on Morté. That Captain Jefferson, when he heard the firing of the muskets, came to the door of the companion, and seeing the riotous state of the crew amongst themselves went below, where he was followed soon after by deponent and Martin Binder; the cook, during the whole of the affray, having been in the forecastle and Bennet on deck. That deponent, on going below, found Captain Jefferson in his berth, and said to him I am afraid we shall be murdered; to which Captain Jefferson replied, that if so he would be murdered in his berth. That soon after going below the companion door was closed, and in about half an hour afterwards the prize-master came into the cabin, followed by one of the crew, who, brandishing his sword, inquired what hour? After his retiring the companion door was again closed and secured down. That the prize-master took more liquor and went to bed, notwithstanding the urgent entreaties of deponent that he would sit up all night and protect him and his companions from his lawless crew. That deponent, fearing every moment that the prize crew would rush into the cabin and murder him in cold blood, asked Captain Jefferson if he had pistols; to which he replied in the affirmative, as he said he always at sea carried a loaded pair under his berth. That deponent, with Captain Jefferson and Martin Binder, who had loaded a musket that was in the cabin, did not go to sleep during the night. That at about two o'clock in the morning, the prize-master attempted to go on deck, but the crew would not let him up. That at daylight, after repeated solicitations, he was suffered to go on deck, from which he afterwards returned into the cabin to get his breakfast; after which he retired above, and was not again seen by deponent for two days and three nights, during which time deponent, Captain Jefferson, and Martin Binder were closely confined to the cabin, not being allowed to go on deck, the cook bringing them their provisions; and during the whole of the time the prize crew were continually sending down for liquor. That at six o'clock on the morning the 14th of August, three days after the life of deponent had been first placed in jeopardy, the commander of the Independencia on Morté came on board the Ruth, when the companion door was opened and deponent called up, and drawn sabres presented to him; was questioned, through an interpreter, by the said commander as to the cause of the disturbance. That deponent replied that the prize crew were in a state of intoxication, and wished to murder him, (deponent.) That hereupon the said commander said it was a lie; and then calling him (deponent) "English beast," "filho da puta," and using several other scurrilous epithets, pushed him, whilst on the quarter-deck of his own vessel, ordered him into the man-of-war's boat, and threatened to hang him after his arrival at Rio de Janeiro. That at this time deponent was a good deal indisposed from a previous sickness, and having no clothes on but a shirt and pantaloons, having just got up out of bed, he requested that he might be allowed to protect his body from the weather, as it was raining at the time, by getting his hat and coat, the man-of-war being half a mile distant. That this civil request was not regarded, and deponent was obliged to obey the demand, and accordingly left the Ruth in a boat, accompanied by Martin Binder and William Bennet, neither of whom were permitted to take any clothing, except what they had on. That after getting on board the Independencia on Morté, deponent was obliged to stand on the deck with his head uncovered, and in his shirt sleeves, for some time, until one of the American sailors lent him his hat and jacket to protect him from the rain. That Captain Jefferson soon after came on board, bringing with him two or three shirts for deponent and some clothing for himself, which he had been allowed to take, in consequence, as he declared, of refusing to leave his vessel without a change of clothing. That, soon after this, deponent and Captain Jefferson were called aft on the quarter-deck, and questioned relative to the affray on board the Ruth, by the commander, who told them that what they said were lies, and ordered them forward amongst the sailors. That deponent, Captain Jefferson, the mate and crew of the Ruth, (except the cook, who was left on board,) were placed to sleep during the night down the fore-hole, amongst the crew and soldiers of the vessel, composed of negroes, mulattoes, and whites, principally Portuguese and Brazilians, without beds to lie on, and in the midst of filth and vermin. That they were compelled to eat down the said hole, out of a kid, like the crew which surrounded them. That they were each allowed for dinner about a pint of beans, half a pound of beef badly cured, and farina, and for breakfast and supper, bread and tea. That they were obliged to drink water through a pipe placed in a hogshead, which was common to all the crew. That the seamen of the Ruth were compelled to work and stand watch, and, when the men were called to quarters on the appearance of a sail, were obliged to assist in working the guns, and had there been an engagement, would no doubt have been obliged to take part in it. That deponent, Captain Jefferson, and mate were not allowed to go aft of the mainmast, and were treated by the officers and crew of the man-of-war with the utmost indignity and contempt. That after the first two or three days, deponent, being still indisposed, procured a state-room to sleep in, which, although on the same deck with the crew, ameliorated his condition. That some days after the capture, the commander of the Independencia on Morté sent an officer on board the brig Ruth, who returned in about four hours with sundry papers, supposed to be the deposition of the prize crew relative to the affray, which the said commander immediately tore into pieces, and sent the officer again on board. That after his return said commander called Bennet aft, and, as Bennet has assured deponent, read to him the declarations of the prize crew; told him that if he would swear to them he would get him into the Brazilian Navy, which overtures were rejected by Bennet, who pronounced the statements to be false. That on the 29th of August, the Independencia on Morté, with the Ruth and other vessels under her convoy, entered this port of Rio de Janeiro, and came to anchor at about 1 p. m. That during that day no opportunity of communicating with the shore presented, and consequently deponent was unable to make known his situation to any of his countrymen. That during the night of this day, when all hands were asleep on the birth-deck, deponent discovered one of the crew of the Independencia on Morté, whom he had for several days observed to watch and follow him as if with some evil design, approach his bed with a drawn knife, evidently for the purpose of murdering him in his sleep, from which act he was diverted upon observing deponent rise up in his birth. That two approaches were subsequently made by the said individual to the state-room of deponent, the door of which had been left open to admit air, who, in both cases, retired upon observing deponent (who did not sleep during the night) to be awake. That on the 30th the deponent asked permission of the commander of the man-of-war to send a letter to Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, which was granted; but the said commander refused to send it on shore in his boat, which obliged deponent to wait for a chance opportunity that was afterwards afforded by a person who came on board to see the pilot. That at 1 p. m. of the same day, deponent, Captain Jefferson, Mr. Wiske, and all the crew of the Ruth, except the cook, who had never been taken out, were ordered into a boat, along with a number of the crew of the man-of-war, for the purpose of being transported like criminals to the prison ship called the Prézéganga. That deponent went aft and remonstrated with the commander against being placed in the same boat with the crew of the man-of-war, who it seems were going to the prison ship to prevent their desertion, or to be punished for crimes. That to this remonstrance he received for answer that he must go, he, the commander, having no longer any control. That deponent had no remedy but to submit to this degrading mandate, and was thus conveyed, like a convict, with his American companions, to the Prézéganga, where he found himself in a filthy prison, in the midst of hundreds of wretched objects of all nations and colors—whites, mulattoes, and blacks—wallowing in filth and vermin—some loaded with irons, others chained together—some picking oakum—and others, indifferent to their degraded state, playing at cards and other games, or indulging in the most obscene gestures. That the apartment which was allotted to deponent, Captain Jefferson, and the mate, being the after-cabin, was on the same deck with that occupied by a part of the prisoners above described. That amongst the individuals who shared this cabin with them were several persons confined upon several charges, such as desertion, murder, and piracy; and, notwithstanding the degrading and atrocious treatment which deponent and his companions had received from the commander of the Independencia on Morté, they had abundant reason to felicitate themselves that they had fared so much better than one of the unfortunate prisoners who dined in the same mess with them, the surpercargo of the Spanish schooner Escuderra, captured not long since by the Brazilian Government vessel-of-war Emprehendedor, commanded by Luiz Clementi Poitiers, who, without even the form of a trial, cut off his left ear close by the head, presenting the most horrible spectacle which a civilized mind can imagine. That at 4 p. m. Mr. Wright, consul of the United States, who, having been alongside the Ruth to inquire the cause of their detention, learned of their imprisonment, and came on board the Prézéganga and immediately returned to the shore to communicate the particulars to Mr. Raguet. That at 8 p. m. Lieutenant Calhoun, of the United States frigate Macedonian, came on board by order of Commodore Biddle to offer any assistance which might be in his power, and informed that Mr. Raguet had received deponent's note at 5 p. m., and would take immediate steps for his release. That on the morning of the 31st, at 10 o'clock, Mr. Raguet came on board the Prézéganga with information that he had seen the Minister of Foreign Affairs on the preceding night, and that he had promised an immediate attention to the case. That deponent received this morning, from a friend on shore, a change of clothing, which enabled him to put off the suit he had constantly worn for seventeen days, and which was in so foul a condition as that the sight of it alone was sickening. That from the time of their arrival on board the Prézéganga until noon of this day, a space of about twenty-three hours, the crew of the Ruth received no provisions, except some bread given to them by Captain Jefferson, and a little meat procured from some of the prisoners. That at 8 p. m. an order for the release of the deponent and his companions was brought on board the Prézéganga by Mr. Bidwell, having been procured upon Mr. Raguet's giving his official security for their appearance in case of a trial upon a charge of an attempt to retake the vessel they should be found guilty. That accordingly deponent, Captain Jefferson, and Mr. Wiske, went on shore, leaving the crew to be conveyed on board the Macedonian, which was done early on the following morning; thus being rescued from a scene of the most horrible filthiness, vice, and misery that can be conceived of.

Further this deponent saith not.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Brazil, Rio de Janeiro.

I, W. H. D. C. Wright, consul of the United States of America for the port of Rio de Janeiro, do hereby certify that the foregoing deposition is a true copy from the records of this consulate.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal of office this 18th day of September, 1826.

W. H. D. C. WRIGHT, Consul U. S. of America.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

LEGATION OF THE U. S. OF AMERICA, Rio de Janeiro, September 9, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, had the honor to receive, on the day of its date, the note addressed to him by the Viscount of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the 31st ultimo, in which his excellency, with a promptness corroborative of the friendly sentiments therein advanced, was pleased to announce that the supercargo, master, and crew of the American brig Ruth would be liberated from their confinement on board the Prézéganga as soon as the undersigned should give his official guarantee that the said individuals should be produced in case they were found guilty of the offence alleged against them, which was that of an attempt to retake their vessel. The undersigned now informs the Viscount that, agreeably to the tenor of the said note, and without delaying a moment after its receipt, he waited upon his excellency the Minister of Marine for the purpose of tendering the security thus required, and was informed by the chief clerk of his Department that he must go in person to the office of the Auditor General of Marine to sign the bond before the order could be issued for the release of his countrymen. Conceiving, upon an occasion where the liberty of ten American citizens was concerned, that it was no time to stand upon questions of delicacy and etiquette, the undersigned complied with the demand of the minister and obtained the order for the release of the parties in the course of the evening.

The haste with which this formality was performed precluded the possibility of explanations by the way, and it so happened that the responsibility of the undersigned was given for the appearance of the ten prisoners confined on board the Prézéganga, whereas only four of them (viz: the supercargo, George K. Budd, the master, Jacob Jefferson, and two seamen, named Martin Binder and William Bennet,) were on board the brig Ruth at the time of the alleged attempt to recapture her, and could possibly be implicated in the act. The remaining six individuals, viz: John Wiske, mate, William Spooner, John Rives, John Barclay, and John Wilson, seamen, and John Baptista, steward, had been transferred to the Independencia on Morté soon after the capture, and the cook, the only remaining one of the crew, was never removed from the Ruth to the Prézéganga. The undersigned presumes that his excellency could not have intended that the security given by him should extend beyond the number of persons charged with the offence alleged, and as the detention of individuals manifestly innocent is not only oppressive, but expensive, the undersigned hopes that orders will be given to cancel the bond as relates to them.

Indeed, the undersigned is not without hopes that, upon a calm and dispassionate view of the case, the Government of his Imperial Majesty will order the whole proceeding to be dismissed upon the simple ground of the entire impossibility of the fact that five unarmed Americans should have attempted to recapture a vessel from twelve armed Brazilians under the very guns of a man-of-war bearing the imperial flag. The world will not credit the existence of so much heroic bravery as would have been evinced by such an attempt. But should the fears of the prize-officer and his crew have permitted such suspicions to have entered their fancies, it would then, perhaps, be worthy of the attention of his Majesty's Government, before it permits a prosecution, which may require months to terminate, to ascertain whether, in case the fact of an attempt to recapture be established, any offence against the laws of nations has been really committed by the parties accused, and especially as it is well known that the right to recapture has been officially admitted by his Imperial Majesty's Government in the case of a Brazilian smack retaken from the privateer Lavaleja by her crew, consisting of slaves, whom, as a reward for the meritorious act, his Majesty, with a generosity which did him immortal honor, ordered to be emancipated from slavery.

The undersigned, however, wishes to be understood that he is not asking favors. He represents a Government which requires from other States justice, and nothing more; and, as he conceives the capture of the brig Ruth to have been wholly unlawful, the treatment of her supercargo, master, and crew altogether unjustifiable and atrocious, and their subsequent imprisonment on board the Prézéganga, the common receptacle of convicts, murderers, and pirates, a positive outrage upon the rights of a civilized nation, he gives notice that his Government will expect, in this case, the exemplary punishment of the persons implicated therein, and a guarantee that such outrageous conduct as has been displayed throughout the whole of this transaction shall not again be repeated upon the persons of American citizens.

The undersigned absolutely denies the right of a Brazilian vessel of war to make prisoners of, and to take forcibly from an American vessel, upon any pretext whatever, any person sailing under the protection of her flag. If such vessel be detained upon legitimate grounds, recognized by the laws of nations, she may be sent into port for adjudication by placing on board a prize crew; and if an equal number of armed men is not deemed sufficient for the purpose, the number may be increased. If it were allowable for a captor to take out of a neutral vessel her master, supercargo, and crew, the act might deprive the ship of all the evidence upon which her non-liability to condemnation was founded. It cannot be unknown to his excellency that the Government of the United States has once waged war in support of the principal that her flag shall protect all who sail under it; and it cannot be supposed that she will tamely submit to have her citizens forcibly dragged from their vessels upon the high seas, under pretences founded upon certain doctrines respecting the right of blockade, which she has never admitted, and never will admit, and compelled, as in a state of impressment, not only to submit to insult, degradation, and hardship, but to perform duty on board the capturing vessel, even so far as standing at quarters to be prepared to fight against a nation with which their own is at peace, as happened in the case of the crew of the brig Ruth. These practices, the undersigned conceives, call for immediate redress; and as he cannot doubt the wish of his Imperial Majesty's Government to cultivate the good feelings of the Government of the United States, he is persuaded that the plain and frank manner in which he has spoken of the transactions herein complained of will be ascribed to the desire by which he is actuated of being instrumental in removing the causes which may be fatal to those feelings.

The undersigned, at the same time, conceives it his duty to say, that the degrading, insulting, and oppressive treatment received by the supercargo, master, and crew of the Ruth, who are citizens of a nation in amity with Brazil, will produce in the United States an excitement with the Government and people of no ordinary character, and, connected, as it will unquestionably be, with the barbarous and revolting cruelty inflicted upon the supercargo of the Spanish schooner Escuderra, belonging also to a friendly nation, by the commander of another of his Imperial Majesty's ships of war, cannot fail to produce impressions unfavorable to a continuance of that friendship which so happily subsists between the Brazilian and American nations, but which can only be perpetuated by a mutual respect for the rights and the liberties of the citizens of each other.

The undersigned knows too well the good sense and liberal sentiments of his excellency to suppose for a moment that the apparent harshness of these remarks will be construed into a reflection upon the Government, the foreign affairs of which he so ably administers. Governments only become liable to imputations when they refuse to redress wrongs committed by their subordinate agents; and when it is recollected how much the peace and harmony of nations may be disturbed by the arbitrary and improper conduct of the latter, it becomes their duty to cause a strict watch over their conduct, and a rigid accountability to be maintained.

The undersigned renews, upon this occasion to his excellency the assurance of his great respect and high consideration.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS, September 12, 1826.

The Viscount de Inhambupe presents his compliments to Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, and, in acknowledging the receipt of his note of the 9th instant, enclosing explanations as to the security to be given respecting the release of the persons mentioned therein, has to inform him that he has transmitted his said note to the Minister and Secretary of State for Affairs of Marine, to whom it belongs to decide in this case, of which Mr. Raguet will be apprised in due time.

The Viscount de Inhambupe renews to Mr. Raguet the assurance of his esteem and consideration.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, October 2, 1826.

[Extracts.]

"The impression which I entertained that this Government would probably take offence at the language employed by me in some of my late communications has been realized; not only is this manifest from a positive withholding of replies to my two notes of 9th and 15th ultimo, calling upon the minister for the cancelling of my bond as relates to the individuals of the crew of the Ruth, against whom no offence could possibly be alleged, and for the surrender of the deserters from an American vessel protected by Admiral Pinto, but from the style of two communications lately addressed to me upon other subjects."

"The second communication above referred to was one addressed to me on the 25th ultimo, calling for the surrender of two American seamen who had been, as was asserted, taken out of a French prize vessel in this harbor, by force, on the night of 30th of August, by order of Commodore Biddle. To this note, of which document C is a copy, I returned the answer marked D, in which I signified that, until the subjects to which my notes of 9th and 15th September related were disposed of, no explanation could be expected from me.

"That this note was drawn up as a set-off against the unceremonious manner in which I thought it incumbent on me to speak of certain commanders in the imperial service is evident not only from its language, but from the following facts: The occurrence to which it relates was known on the day after it occurred to the Inspector of the Arsenal of Marine, as well as to the captain of the port; and from the avidity with which such transactions are seized upon, and from the blustering indignation displayed by the former, who declaimed that he would communicate the matter to the Government, there is not the least question but that the Minister of Marine knew all about the affair on the 31st of August. Persuaded, however, that the matter could not be made out to be one of positive force, but a mere demand to which the prize-officer, through fear or other considerations, yielded, it was thought best to say nothing about it, whilst Commodore Biddle was in port and could rebut the charge by evidence. That officer, as you have been advised, remained here until the 15th of September, and deeming it probable that after his departure the matter might be brought into discussion by this Government, addressed a letter to me detailing the facts of the case, a copy of which you will find enclosed as document I. Commodore Biddle, as you will observe, admits the demand of the seamen, but denies that any force was used; and he further stated to me, in conversation, that had the demand not been complied with he would not have resorted to force.

"It is now proper for me to mention that on the day before the date of the minister's note of the 25th, Mr. Lisboa, chief clerk of the Foreign Department, call upon me, at the request of the minister, as he said, to have some conversation respecting the matter referred to. He informed me that the Minister of Marine had addressed to the Foreign Office a strong representation against the conduct of Commodore Biddle, and, as the Viscount of Inhambupe was desirous to avoid giving much 'eclat' to the affair, he thought it best to make a verbal request to me to give up the men, upon the promise that they should be immediately discharged in the regular way. In answer to this, I replied that Commodore Biddle denied the use of force, and, in confirmation of it, read him the whole of the letter from that gentleman to me. Mr. Lisboa's manner was, upon the whole interview, so conciliating that I had no hesitation in expressing my regret at the occurrence, happening, as it did, after night; and told him that I would give the subject all due attention upon the minister's addressing me a note in relation to it. I did not make any promise to give up the men, although I thought the matter might be accommodated; but I strenuously urged upon the consideration of Mr. Lisboa that I had received no satisfaction upon the cases represented by me on the 9th and 15th September, and declared to him, very emphatically, (which I felt perfectly assured his Government already knew,) that the Boston was detained in port solely for the purpose of enabling me to comply with my bond given for the crew of the Ruth.

"The representation made on the 25th was not in conformity with the spirit of this conversation, nor was it accompanied by any order for the cancelling of my bond, or promise of reparation for injuries seriously sustained, and, accordingly, in my opinion, merited no other answer than the one which I gave. From my present impressions, I do not conceive that in any event should I have surrendered the men; first, because they were not taken by force, according to Commodore Biddle's statement; and, secondly, because, as they came on board the prize vessel by a wrong, requiring a previous redress, viz: that of being replaced on board the Leonidas, from which they had been illegally taken, they could not be removed a second time without leaving the original offence unatoned for. One of these men has sailed, or is now upon the point of sailing, to the United States in the Leonidas, which vessel has been delivered up upon bonds, not having yet been adjudicated, and the other has met with a calamity of a distressing nature. On the 25th or 26th ultimo he was discharged from the Leonidas, and the earnings of his China voyage, amounting to about $100, were paid to him, together with about $190 belonging to one of his shipmates. The money was paid to him in bank notes, which, by the advice of the mate, he got changed into Spanish dollars; and whilst upon the point of embarking in a boat to go on board the Leonidas to execute his trust, and, I suppose, to procure his clothes, he was seized by a custom-house officer as a smuggler; and after having been despoiled of the hard-earned capitals belonging to himself and his comrade, he was dragged to jail, because he could not give security for the additional payment of an equal amount, the forfeit by law if he should be convicted. Mr. Wright is endeavoring to secure his release by appealing to the humanity of the harpies who, like rapacious vultures, have fastened upon this unfortunate sailor; and perhaps he may succeed by a compromise, which will leave them in possession of the whole of the plunder. I say them, because it is supposed that the seizing officer goes halves with some wretch who, upon witnessing the changing of the money, hastened to give the information. In a suit at law here it is impossible that a foreigner, unsupported by this Government, ever can succeed, unless he has the means of striking the corruptibility of the judges deeper than his adversary; and that you may form an opinion of the awful doom of this victim of voracity, I can assure you, from ocular inspection, that a prison on shore differs from the Prézéganga in its horrors. That you may have, however, higher authority than my assertion for this fact, I will give you the words of a deputy of the Assembly, pronounced in a speech on the 29th of August last, as translated from the Government paper of the 1st of September: 'The greater part of the prisons, (of Brazils,) or perhaps all, serve rather as horrible and frightful sepulchres of the living than for the correction and chastisement of crimes.'

"I have also the honor to send you (document F) a copy of the official despatch of the commander of the Independencia on Morté to the Minister of Marine, giving an account of the capture of the brig Ruth, and of the alleged attempt to retake her; from which it appears, sure enough, that the twelve armed Brazilians placed on board that vessel were afraid that the five unarmed Americans, of whom two were little more than boys, would overpower them. The leading facts correspond with those related in Mr. Budd's protest, omitting, of course, all that concerns the treatment of that gentlemen and his comrades.

"I also transmit (document G) a copy of the official communication made by the Minister of Marine to the Auditor General of Marine, on the 29th of August, the day upon which the Ruth arrived, in which his excellency acknowledges that it was by his order that the supercargo, master, and crew of the Ruth were sent on board the Prézéganga. The words 'that to the Inspector of the Arsenal had been expedited the necessary orders to hold in security the crew of the said American brig,' can have had no other meaning.

The inspector receives his orders from that minister. The Prézéganga is the prison under his immediate charge, in which impressed seamen, criminals, and prisoners are indiscriminately deposited; and if the minister, who had before him such a plain statement of the case as was given to him by the commander of the brig-of-war, did not, in deciding upon the liberty of ten American citizens, take the trouble to discriminate between the supercargo, master, and seamen, nor between those who might be implicated in the offence alleged and those who could not possibly be, he made himself responsible for all the consequences. It was only on the 28th that I became possessed, through Mr. Budd's lawyer, of these documents, and they soon furnished a key to the delay which has taken place in the cancelling of my bond. The minister, having himself been guilty of the offence which I described as a 'positive outrage upon the rights of a civilized nation,' is disposed to wreak his vengeance upon us in the only mode which is in his power—that of detaining a ship-of-war. Of this intentional and spiteful delay, however unworthy of the mind of a Minister of State, you may rest assured. It is within my positive knowledge, but it reaches me in such a way that I cannot render my information available, that, so long ago as the 18th ultimo, the Auditor General of Marine, in answer to an official call made upon him, declared that only those who were on board the Ruth at the time of the alleged attempt to recapture were implicated in the transaction, and that the bond could not embrace the rest. How long the Boston may yet be detained it is impossible to tell. On the 29th ultimo I wrote Captain Hoffman a note, requesting him to proceed to sea, with the men on board, after the 1st instant. It seems, however, he did not wish to take such a responsibility upon himself unless the men would consent; and these, upon being applied to, positively refused, saying that rather than go upon a cruise of forty or fifty days they would return to the Prézéganga, where they thought they could not be detained but a very few days. This want of honorable feeling on the part of these men, who, had it not been for my responsibility and exertions, would have been immured on board that loathsome ship for months, has placed me in a perplexing and mortifying situation. To send them back to that ship would be giving up the whole case. To detain the Boston is keeping her from useful service at the river Plate; and to allow them to come on shore, where they might escape of their own accord, or be impressed to suit the purposes of others, would render me liable to a failure in my contract, which would be a complete triumph to these people, who, I am sure, would not, in such a case, hesitate to call upon me even for the innocent individuals.

"After the capture of the Leonidas, five of her crew were taken out, in the harbor of Montevideo, and conveyed on board a ship-of-war, where, after being fruitlessly demanded by Mr. Bond, they were detained for a month; and, in consequence of their refusing to do duty, they were threatened to be flogged, and were treated as prisoners of war. They were afterwards placed on board three different prize vessels, which they assisted in navigating to this port, where they are at liberty. We now just learn that the brig Pioneer, Potter, of Salem, on a voyage from Havana to Montevideo, has been captured off Cape St. Mary's by Admiral Pinto, and sent as a prize to the port of her destination, after having the chief part of her crew taken out. We may look for many more such detentions as soon as the new crop of wheat, the approach of a northern winter, and the false rumors which have appeared in the American papers of the absence of the Brazilian ships from the river Plate, shall have had time to operate.

"From the contents of this letter and accompanying documents, in connexion with those which I have heretofore transmitted, it will be manifest to the President that our relations with Brazil cannot long stand upon their present footing. An explosion, or a complete reconciliation, must soon take place by some decided act of ours. It is very clear that, with some of the persons in power, there exists a real hostility against our Government; and it is equally clear to me that others in office, who have no such hostility, but who desire to see overthrown the imperial system, avail themselves of this ministerial enmity to foment a misunderstanding between the United States and Brazil, which they are persuaded, and I think with reason, would, if it came to open hostilities, consummate their wishes. It is for this reason, amongst others, that I anticipate a regular and accumulating course of vexations. Our ships of war will be inhospitably received, and all the little annoyances which can be invented will be adopted towards them. Our seamen will be harshly dealt with; the patience of our citizens will be tried by the most endless delays and the most vexatious proceedings in the adjudication of vessels. Our ships will be captured on the most unjustifiable pretexts; and lastly, no pains will be spared to render my residence here as uncomfortable as it can be made. All this will even take place during the continuance of the present war, when there would seem to be a motive for conciliating our Republic. After that war shall have terminated, and especially if it be crowned with success, no such motive will be allowed to exist; and I can see no limits to the arrogancy and insolent deportment which will then be displayed towards us."

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, September 25, 1826.

The French brig Juno, captured by the squadron of the river Plate, having entered this port on the 29th of last month, and the Brazilian officer who was on board having refused to surrender, without orders from the proper authority, two American seamen to the captain of the brig Leonidas, who claimed them as belonging to him, the latter, instead of applying where he ought so to have done, went to require assistance from the Commodore of the United States frigate Macedonian, who granted it, by sending twice a boat, with officers and men, to take by force the above mentioned seamen, and this was effected on the 30th of said month, at eight o'clock at night, as being the time most convenient for the perpetration of such an act.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in communicating to you this scandalous proceeding, which, not having been duly and immediately made known by the commander of the prize or his officer, for which they have been arrested, only came to the knowledge of his Majesty the Emperor through the lively sensation it produced in the public mind. Unable to repress his feeling of regret at this occurrence, expects from the prudent and honorable character of Mr. Raguet, that, after making an unqualified acknowledgment of the irregular and indecorous conduct of the Commodore, whom Mr. Raguet retains at this Court for the purpose of aiding him in his reclamations, will cause him not only to give due satisfaction to the Imperial Government, but also to restore the two seamen belonging to the brig Leonidas, and brought into this port by the prize above referred to, when they will be surrendered in a suitable manner. Mr. Raguet will thereby contribute to preserve that respect and consideration which Governments reciprocally owe one another.

The undersigned renews to Mr. Raguet the expression of his respect and esteem.

VISCOUNT DE INHAMBUPE.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, September 26, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his compliments to the Viscount de Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his excellency's note of 25th instant, respecting two American seamen belonging to the American brig Leonidas.

The undersigned, conceiving that the matters which form the subject of complaint should be treated in the order in which they have been represented, takes the liberty of reminding his excellency that no answers have yet been received to the two notes addressed to him by the undersigned, under date of the 9th and 15th instant, excepting a mere acknowledgment of their receipt, and of their having been communicated to the Minister of Marine, although they related to transactions highly worthy of the attention of his Imperial Majesty's Government, and of deep concern to the Government of the United States.

The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his great respect and consideration.

ON BOARD THE BRIG INDEPENDENCIA ON MORTÉ, August 23, 1826.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that, on the fifth instant, being in latitude 34° 10′ south, and longitude 52° 40′ west of Greenwich, I descried a vessel, gave her chase, and, having neared her, commanded Second Lieutenant Martin Hannibal Both to examine her, who returned, bringing with him the captain of said vessel, which proved to be an American brig called Ruth, bound from Gibraltar, with a clearance for Buenos Ayres. Observing that she was destined for a blockaded port of the enemy, I told the captain that he would have to proceed, in company with me, to Rio de Janeiro, and ordered the above named lieutenant to return on board said brig and take charge of her, carrying with him a prize crew consisting of four sailors, two boys, and four soldiers, and to withdraw from her own crew five sailors and the mate, leaving on board the captain, supercargo, and three sailors to seal the hatches and sail in company with this brig. On the eleventh of the same month, at eight o'clock at night, perceiving that the vessel in question was falling back, and hearing, soon after that, the reports of two muskets, I concluded that something had happened, and, proceeding towards her, as soon as I found myself at a suitable distance, I inquired the cause of those reports, and was answered, by all at once, that the Americans had risen in arms against them and attempted to escape with the brig. As the sea was high I did not think it convenient to order them on board, but determined that they should be sent below with all due precautions, and a sentinel be placed over them till the following day, when I would take the necessary measures, should the weather permit it, and I ordered a protest of the whole to be entered. On the fourteenth, the weather having moderated, I ordered the captain, supercargo, and two sailors to be brought on board of my vessel, leaving the cook only on board the prize, and commanded Lieutenant Bernadino de Serra é Aranso, together with my clerk, to proceed on board the prize and minutely to investigate the transaction of the preceding night, and to take the depositions of the crew then on board; and, enclosed, I transmit their proceedings.

God preserve your excellency.

JOAQUIM LEAL FERREIRA.

PALACE, August 29, 1826.

The English brig Atlantic, and the French brig Juno, and schooner Le Courier having arrived at this port, as prizes of the blockading squadron of the river Plate, you will, after perusing the acts and other documents enclosed, annexed to the three letters from the commander of said squadron, which are also herewith transmitted, proceed immediately to take the measures usual in such prize cases.

By this opportunity I transmit, likewise, to you the enclosed copy of a letter received from the commander of the brig Independencia on Morté, having said prizes under convoy, and the documents respecting the capture of the American brig Ruth, (which has also arrived at this port,) and the occurrence on board said brig, in order that, possessed of these documents, you may, as heretofore, proceed according to law. It is understood that the necessary orders will be transmitted to the Inspector of the Arsenal of Marine to secure the crew of said brig.

God preserve you.

VISCOUNT DE PARANAGOA.

Commodore Biddle to Mr. Raguet.

U. S. FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, Rio Janeiro, September 6, 1826.

DEAR SIR: As some excitement was produced on shore, owing to misapprehension of the circumstances which I am about to relate, I deem it advisable, previous to going to sea, to make you acquainted with these circumstances as they did actually occur; you will thus be furnished with a satisfactory answer, should the subject, during my absence, be brought into any discussion with you by this Government.

On the evening of the 30th ultimo the captain of the American brig Leonidas came on board this ship and acquainted me that two of his seamen were detained on board a French prize vessel in this harbor; that he had endeavored to procure their release, but without success; that the seamen themselves were apprehensive they would be impressed, during the night, into the Brazilian brig-of-war Independencia on Morté; and he claimed my interference in their behalf. Whatever affects the liberty of an American citizen claims and receives immediate attention from me. I therefore sent Lieutenant Bigelow on board the prize vessel to inform the commanding officer that the American brig Leonidas, which had been unjustly seized in the river, was since restored to her captain; that the captain required the services of his men on board his own vessel; that, as peace existed between the United States and Brazil, there could be no excuse for his detaining American citizens; and that, therefore, I demanded these two seamen of the Leonidas to be forthwith released and delivered to me; they were accordingly released and brought on board this ship. No force was used, nor was any force threatened to be used.

From my knowledge of the character of Joaquim Leal Ferreira, who commands the Brazilian brig-of-war Independencia on Morté, I certainly felt extremely solicitous to save my countrymen from the misfortune of falling into his power. This Joaquim Leal Ferreira it was who committed at sea the brutal outrage upon the supercargo of the American brig Ruth. This Joaquim Leal Ferreira it was (at least so I thought then, though I learn since that it was Luis Clemente Poitier, who commands another vessel of war in the Brazil Navy) who committed at sea the still more brutal outrage upon a Spanish gentleman, by beating him into a state of insensibility, and, while in that state, cutting off, with his own hand, the Spanish gentleman's ear. Under these circumstances of indignant provocation, and when so much was hazarded by delay, it cannot but be regarded as great moderation on my part that I sent an officer to demand these American seamen, and without sending the force necessary to take them, or the orders to do so, in case my demand was refused.

I purposely waive the inquiry why these American seamen were put on board the French prize vessel; although, as you well know, such inquiry would result in showing additional wrong done to them by the officers of the Brazil Navy.

I remain yours very truly,

JAMES BIDDLE.

CONDY RAGUET, &c., &c., Rio.

K.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, September 30, 1826.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in replying to the note addressed to him by Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, under date the 12th [9th] instant, by which he requested me to cancel the bond given by him to procure the release of the persons who formed part of the crew of the American brig Ruth, captured by the brig "Independencia on Morté," and who were accused of having attempted to retake the said brig, has the pleasure to inform him that, having seen the opinion given by the Auditor General of Marine, he does not hesitate to release him of that bond, since, according to the reasons deduced from that opinion, all the motives of such a measure of security and precaution have ceased to exist.

In replying further to your note, the undersigned, however, thinks it his duty not to admit the assertions it contains in reference to this subject. The first is, that the accusation brought against the five Americans, of attempting to retake the brig from twelve armed Brazilians, they being without arms, is predicated upon a fact whose existence is impossible.

Surely you cannot be ignorant of the case which has recently occurred, of the English brig "Monarch," which was retaken by three Englishmen, joined by two infamous Brazilians, from a crew of seventeen men, commanded by an American, a lieutenant of the Navy, in the service of the Empire, whom they secured with ropes, and, placing them in a small boat, abandoned them to the dangers of the sea and winds, where they must have perished had not Divine Providence sent to their relief, a few days after, a vessel, by which they were saved. You will perceive that it is not improbable that a similar occurrence might have taken place on board the brig Ruth.

The second assertion you make, that the right of recapture has been recognized by his Imperial Majesty, when he rewarded with liberality the slaves who took the Brazilian sumaca, captured by the privateer "Lavallega," is not entitled to more weight. It is only necessary to reflect that this privateer had been armed by subjects of his Majesty the Emperor, who had rebelled, and that, for this reason, she was to be considered as a pirate or freebooter, against which all have a right to rise as against a public enemy; while, on the other hand, neutral vessels, detained by the Brazilian squadron, are sent in to be judged by the competent tribunal, where they are allowed to defend themselves, and where they continue to be protected by their flag—a privilege which ceases only when they have been sentenced as lawful prizes. Besides these weighty reasons, there is another deserving still greater consideration; that is, the consequences which would result from the admission of the right of recapture on the part of the neutrals, since it would give to the captors that of using all such precautions as they might think necessary to avoid such occurrences.

Finally, as respects the ill treatment to which you state that the persons belonging to the brig Ruth have been subjected, the undersigned transmits to you, enclosed, an extract from a letter of the commander of the Brazilian naval forces, by which you will see the manner in which he proceeds in the detention of neutral vessels attempting to enter Buenos Ayres, and from which it does not appear that their crews are ill treated. You may rest assured that the Imperial Government has issued the most positive orders to prevent abuses in this respect, which, it is hoped, will be fulfilled as scrupulously as possible.

The undersigned renews to you the expression of his respect and esteem.

VISCOUNT DE INHAMBUPE.

[Documents referred to in the letter marked K.]

Extract from a letter dated September 2, 1826, from Admiral Rodrigo Pinto Guedes, commanding the Brazilian naval forces in the river Plate.

[Translation.]

"Upon the arrival of a vessel detained in consequence of the blockade the crew was withdrawn, with the exception of the captain, mate, and cook; prize crew sent on board, consisting of a prize-master, sailors, boys, and soldiers; and the former crew taken to some vessel in the squadron until the sailing of the prize, in order to prevent their return on board said prize, and to avoid unpleasant occurrences, and until they could be sent, in some vessel of war, wherever their ships might be, for the purpose of giving their testimony and claiming their wages. But, in consequence of continual applications from the consuls and commanders of ships-of-war, I determined, and have practiced it ever since, to set on shore, at liberty, all the seamen belonging to prizes, leaving only the three above mentioned persons—the captain, mate, and cook, or, in lieu of the two first, the supercargo, where neither of them was acting in that capacity.

"None of those seamen, while detained, were ever compelled to work, unless paid for it, in the absence of the superior officer."

BENTO DA SILVA LISBOA.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, October 31, 1826.

"To my communication marked C, of October 23, I have received no reply, but Farris was released on the following day. I have no idea that the money will be given up; and, as neither he nor his comrade can possibly find the means to support themselves for the many months or years which it is in the power of the prosecutors to prolong the suit, they will be obliged to abandon their property to the Judge of Contrabands and the unprincipled wretches who partake with him in the division of the spoil. I confess that my patience has been most fully put to the test by the treatment displayed towards this injured man, which has afforded an example, in addition to the hundreds I could relate, confirmatory of the fact admitted almost universally by the foreigners here that this is not a civilized people. I have reason to believe that this Government is highly incensed at my late correspondence; and it would not at all surprise me if I should be notified that no further intercourse would be held with me. Should such an event take place, I would leave the country immediately; and, as I could not venture upon our coast in the winter season, I should probably go to Buenos Ayres, and there await your orders. I mention this as a possibility.

"In relation to the minister's two notes of September 30, in answer to mine of the 9th and 15th of that month, I have not replied to them. All discussions upon abstract questions with a Brazilian ministry are nothing but a waste of time and labor. The argument to prove that it was not impossible that five unarmed Americans should attempt to retake a vessel from twelve armed Brazilians, which was that three Englishmen, aided by two disloyal subjects of his Majesty, had retaken one from seventeen of them, I must admit to be unanswerable. As to the right of recapture by a neutral vessel detained by a belligerent, I am aware of the opinions pronounced by our Secretaries at Washington, in 1800, in a case somewhat similar, (State Papers, Volume IX, pp. 5 to 23,) and am disposed not to touch the subject until a case occurs. In regard to the taking out of seamen from our vessels, I shall press that point when it becomes convenient to make a fresh representation against such improper conduct, which can hardly be long first. I confess, however, that I have not the most distant expectation that any change of system will result from any appeal that I can make."

"Since the date of my last I have received letters from Mr. Bond, our consul at Montevideo, down to October 7, from which I collect the following particulars:

"'Another American vessel, the brig Sarah George, of Portland, Captain Gordon, bound from Lima to Montevideo, has been captured and sent into the latter port, where her crew has been turned ashore. This vessel, as well as the Pioneer, of Salem, has been dismantled of her sails and topmasts. The crew of the Pioneer, all of whom, except the master, supercargo, and a boy, were taken out on the 3d of September, the day of the capture, still remained on board the Piranga. It was said that the prize agent had orders to appeal to the Superior Court at Rio de Janeiro, in every case where a vessel was cleared. No decision had yet been made in either of these cases.'

"Mr. Bond relates three instances of recent impressment of American seamen, and says: 'I am well convinced that there are others on board the fleet who have been impressed, but they are prevented from coming ashore.' 'I have understood that those who have been impressed, and who refuse to enter the service, are compelled to do heavier duty than the rest, are sometimes put on short allowance, and are paid less than the others, in order to induce them to accept of the bounty, in consequence of which some have entered after refusing to do so for a long time.' He states one case of an American being severely beaten by a press gang and carried off, after having been released from a former impressment a few days before. Matters are certainly getting worse and worse; and, unless some chastisement is applied to these people, their insolence and arrogance will become unbounded.

"The brig Homer, of Baltimore, sold here to Samuel Clapp, an American citizen, sailed hence for Buenos Ayres about three or four months ago, where, I lately learn, her register was, by contract, to have been surrendered. This was not done; and she was sent back to Santos, a small port to the southward of this, where she arrived, and has been seized by the authorities for a breach of blockade.

"The property on board the Leonidas, in the name of certain Buenos Ayrean merchants, has been condemned by the inferior court, amounting, probably, to the value of $30,000 cost. I understand that nobody has ever appeared on the part of the owners. No decision has yet been made on the case of the vessel and her freight. Her cargo has been very much overrated.

"The case of the Ruth, which has now been here for two months, remains without a decision. It is probable that she will be given up on bonds.

"The ship Spermo was given up on bonds in July, and, I perceive by the papers, has arrived at New York. Her case remains here without a decision, as does also that of the brig Exchange, as relates to damages. These suits have now stood for upwards of two years."

Mr. Raguet to Minister of Foreign Affairs, dated Rio de Janeiro, October 5, 1826.

[Extract.]

"As the brig Leonidas left this port for Boston on the 1st instant, as appears by the gazettes, the affair, as relates to the seamen belonging to her—one having sailed, and the other being here in prison, where he was lodged on or before the 26th ultimo, (after being deprived of two hundred and ninety Spanish dollars, the hard-earned wages of himself and a shipmate during a voyage to China,) because he could not find security for the payment of an equal amount in case he should be convicted, after a trial of perhaps many months, of an intention to defraud the revenue of Brazil of two per cent. by taking this foreign coin on board the vessel which constituted his only home—the affair, it is repeated, can now be no other than a mere discussion upon abstract points, depending upon questions of fact. The undersigned will, however, in a future communication, present his particular views upon this subject, unless he should be previously advised that the Government of his Imperial Majesty considers the matter to be of sufficient importance to be specially represented, through the Brazilian minister at Washington, to the Government of the United States."

Mr. Raguet to Minister of Foreign Affairs, dated Rio de Janeiro, October 13, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, in a note addressed to the Viscount of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the 5th instant, had the honor incidentally to mention to his excellency the case of a seaman lately belonging to the American brig Leonidas, who was then in confinement in the common jail of this city. The undersigned had flattered himself that the bare mention of a transaction so disgraceful to the prosecuting party, and so calculated to reflect discredit upon the reputation of Brazil, seeing that it is from the acts of individuals (of individuals) that an estimate of a nation's character is formed, would have attracted the attention of his Imperial Majesty's Government, and have led, ere this, to the discharge of the prisoner. Being, however, disappointed in this expectation, the undersigned now deems it his duty to make a formal representation on the subject, reserving for a future occasion a detail of circumstances connected with the most unjustifiable treatment displayed towards this same individual, on board the French prize vessel which conveyed him to this port, by the Brazilian prize-master.

Watson Farris, the seaman referred to, being entitled to the sum of upwards of 100 milreas, the balance due him for services on board the brig Leonidas, during a voyage to China and back, that amount, together with about 200 milreas due to Peter Nardle, one of his shipmates, was paid to him, on shore, in the bank paper of this city, on 26th ultimo. Having converted the amount into 292 Spanish dollars, the money with which he was best acquainted—having never heard in his own country that it was unlawful to export foreign coin—and never having imagined that it was a crime for a sailor, in a strange land, where he was destitute of friends or acquaintances, to convey what belonged to him to the vessel, which constituted his only home, he very naturally resolved to return thither with the hard-earned fruits of the toil of himself and comrade. On his way to embark, whilst on the wharf, and before he had put his foot into a boat, or even had engaged one to convey him, he was seized by a custom-house officer, who, probably, had been set upon the watch by some person who had seen the unsuspecting seaman exchange his money, and conveyed to the common jail, after being deprived of the whole sum which he had in his possession in coin. On the following day he was taken before the Judge of Contrabands, who demanded of him security for the payment of another equal amount in case he should be convicted of the offence alleged against him, which was that of smuggling. The unfortunate seaman not being able to meet this requisition, was sent back to prison, where he now lies. The consul of the United States has in vain endeavored to secure his release. The Judge of Contrabands, who is entitled to a share of all property thus seized and condemned in his court, has expressed his willingness to discharge him, provided that the prosecutor and the two informers, who are interested in the result, would also give their consent. These individuals, whose anxiety to get possession of this unprotected stranger's money was so great that they had not patience to wait until his intention had assumed the form of a positive act of embarkation, which would have given a pretext for their proceedings, of which they are now destitute, have refused to accede. Having the power to hold their victim, and being still resolved to secure the ill-gotten spoil, they have prescribed us the sole condition of his discharge, that he shall execute a written instrument abandoning to the prosecutors all claim to the two hundred and ninety-two dollars found in his possession.

It is needless for the undersigned to say that no citizen of the United States shall, with his approbation or advice, consent to the purchase of his liberty by an act so base and ignominious as that of confessing himself to be guilty of a crime of which he is wholly innocent, and of giving up his just claim to a sum of money belonging to another individual, which he has not the means of replacing, and which, from the very nature of a sailor's life, he may never be able to repay. If such bargain and sale of justice is at this day tolerated in the Empire of Brazil, it shall never be said that the representative of the American Republic has given it his sanction. Let the principle be once admitted, that an individual found with foreign coin in his possession in the neighborhood of water is liable to arrest as a smuggler, and to imprisonment for an indefinite term, unless he can give security for the payment of an equal value in case he should be found guilty, it will follow that justice may be wholly beyond the reach of poor and destitute strangers. A foreigner who, like this American seaman, possesses no property except that of which he has been deprived, who has not the means to employ a lawyer, or to maintain himself during the many months or perhaps years which it is in the power of the prosecutors to prolong the suit, has no remedy but to lie and rot in jail, or to buy his ransom, by yielding to the extortionate and inhuman demands of the unfeeling and rapacious wretches who have despoiled him of his property, and deprived him of his liberty.

The undersigned cannot doubt but that the case here represented will be considered in the light of one which deeply concerns the honor and the character of the Brazilian nation. A citizen of the United States, who has been guilty of no crime, to whom no offence can possibly be imputed, greater than that of an intention to deprive the revenue of Brazil of a sum less than six Spanish dollars, a duty of two per cent. upon the export of foreign coin, has been languishing for seventeen days in an odious jail, confined in the same apartment with criminals and convicts of all colors, who are fed by the charity of the Miseracordia hospital. And not only this, but he is under the same roof with prisoners who are sick and dying of the smallpox, a disease which he has never had, and for the prevention of which he had never been vaccinated, until it was done on the 11th instant, by the direction of the undersigned, who has visited him in his awful abode, and is able to pronounce, from personal inspection, that the place of his confinement is not such a one as is called for by the constitution of the Empire or the lights of civilization.

The undersigned offers to his excellency, on this occasion, the renewed assurance of his respect and consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 17, 1826.

The Marquis de Inhambupe presents his compliments to Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, acknowledging the receipt of the note which he addressed to him, under date the 13th instant, in relation to the seizure of a number of Spanish dollars from a seaman of his nation. All he can do at present is to inform Mr. Raguet that information has been asked from the Minister and Secretary of State for Affairs of Justice, and that the decision in this transaction will, in due time, be communicated to him.

The Marqnis de Inhambupe renews to Mr. Raguet the expression of his esteem and respect.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, October 20, 1826.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, having, by his note of the 25th ultimo, called upon Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affairs of the United States of America, for a suitable satisfaction for the irregular proceeding of the Commodore of the frigate Macedonian, in taking from the French prize Juno, two American seamen belonging to the brig Leonidas, and whose surrender was also demanded by the undersigned, Mr. Raguet has not, as yet, given the satisfaction demanded, which cannot be considered as contained in his notes of the 26th of the same month and 5th instant, of which one merely confines itself to an acknowledgment of the receipt of that which had been addressed to him, and the other to announcing the departure from this port of said brig, which fact had already been communicated by the Department of Marine, carrying away one of the seamen in question, and that the other remained a prisoner at this place.

It is, therefore, the duty of the undersigned to signify to Mr. Raguet that the Government of his Imperial Majesty still persists in its reclamation, expecting that Mr. Raguet will not delay giving a determinate answer on the subject in question. The undersigned renews to Mr. Raguet the expression of his respect and esteem.

MARQUIS DE INHAMBUPE.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, October 23, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt, on the day of its date, of the note addressed to him on the 20th instant by the Marquis of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, signifying that the Government of his Imperial Majesty insists upon the demand (reclamacao) made by his excellency in his note of the 25th ultimo, and intimating that the undersigned had been tardy in giving the "satisfaction" which had been required of him.

The undersigned is now, for the first time, made acquainted with the fact that any satisfaction had been demanded of him, further than the surrender of the two seamen in question, one of whom is already in the power of the Brazilian Government, and the other has been represented to his excellency to have sailed for the United States. It is true that his excellency, in his note of the 25th December, did express his assurance that the undersigned would be instrumental in procuring from Commodore Biddle "the due satisfaction;" but as that officer has not been in port since the 15th of the same month, a fact with which his Imperial Majesty's Government could not but have been acquainted, it has been, up to the present moment, altogether impossible for the undersigned to have acted upon that suggestion. This explanation, it is hoped, will exonerate from any imputation the conduct of the undersigned, who has never unreasonably delayed in his correspondence with his excellency or any of his predecessors, and who has never attempted to avoid meeting any question which has been the subject of discussion between any of his Imperial Majesty's ministers and himself.

The affair, however, having now assumed a new aspect, and a formal demand having been made for satisfaction upon the undersigned, he has no hesitation in replying, that, as he is not accountable for the actions of any of the naval commanders of the United States, who, like others, act under the instructions and responsibility of their Government, he is not aware of any reparation which is due from him, or which the Government of his Imperial Majesty has a right to require. All that could have been expected of him is that he should state the case to his Government, which he has already done, and leave the matter to its decision; not doubting but that his excellency would give to the Brazilian minister at Washington instructions to make such representation as the affair might seem to demand.

As the undersigned, however, has no disposition to withhold his particular views in relation to this subject, he will, agreeably to the promise contained in a former note, take the liberty of stating them.

The circumstances of the case, as collected from the testimony of the two men, and other sources, are these: In the month of June last the brig Leonidas, of Boston, bound from China to Buenos Ayres, was captured by the Brazilian squadron in the river Plate, and sent into Montevideo. At that port five of her seamen, in violation of the immunity of the flag of their country, were forcibly taken out of the vessel and conveyed on board the imperial frigate Piranga, wheret hey were required to perform duty, and, in consequence of refusing so to do, were put upon short allowance and treated as prisoners of war. After a detention of about a month, they were placed on board different prize vessels, of nations other than their own, for the purpose of assisting to navigate them to Rio de Janeiro. Two of them were placed on board the French brig Juno, where one, named Watson Farris, in consequence of refusing to do duty, which the prize-master had no right to require of him, was severely beaten. In that vessel they arrived at this port, in company with the American brig Ruth, captured by, and then under convoy of, the imperial brig-of-war Independencia on Morté, on the 29th of August. On the following day the master of the Leonidas, who had previously arrived, and had obtained possession of his vessel under bonds, hearing of the situation of his two seamen, whose services he needed, went on board of the Juno and requested their release, which was refused by the prize-master. The matter being then represented by him to Commodore Biddle, who had just heard that the supercargo, master, and crew of the Ruth, after a long confinement as prisoners on board the Independencia on Morté, had been sent, like a gang of convicts, from that vessel to the common depot of criminals, the Prézéganga, and having understood that the two men in question were fearful that they would be that night impressed on board the said brig-of-war, immediately sent an officer in a boat to demand their discharge; the time happened to be eight o'clock in the evening. This demand, as will appear from the accompanying extract from a letter addressed by Commodore Biddle to the undersigned on the 6th of September, to which the undersigned is bound to give credit, although it differs from the statement which appears to have been made to his excellency, was not accompanied by the employment of force, or the threat that any force would be employed. Indeed, the silence of the prize-master on the subject is entitled to great weight, as it is hardly probable that, in a harbor protected by the forts and ships-of-war of his nation, he would have complied with the demand as he did, had it been accompanied by force.

The abstract question now is, whether the surrender of American seamen, under the circumstances here represented, would be allowed by the Government of the United States without any offer of a previous redress for the injuries previously inflicted upon the said seamen by unlawfully taking them from on board of an American vessel by an armed power, and subsequently forcing them on board a foreign vessel, to perform, under pain of corporal punishment, services which, as neutrals, they were not bound to render to a belligerent. The undersigned does not hesitate to say that, upon the reflection which he has given to the subject, he is clearly of opinion that, without the express command of his Government, he would not be justified in making such surrender. This opinion, however, is advanced with all deference, and cannot affect any claim for reparation which may be supposed to be due from the Government of the United States for the acts of its officers.

The undersigned cannot close this note without expressing the satisfaction he has derived from the warm and zealous manner with which this subject has been treated by his Imperial Majesty's Government. If so much sensibility has been awakened by a transaction which the prize officers who witnessed the act never considered to be a ground of complaint, or of representation to their superiors, his excellency will be able to form some opinion of the feeling which will be experienced by the Government of the United States when the President shall have learned that the wrongs and indignities experienced by the supercargo, master, and crew of the Ruth, who have been pronounced by a judicial tribunal to have been wholly innocent of the offence which formed the pretext for their degradation and oppression, have been considered by his Imperial Majesty's Government as amply atoned for by the mere restoration to liberty of the injured individuals.

With this exposition the undersigned begs leave to correct two errors which occurred in his note of 5th instant. It appears that the Leonidas sailed from this port on the morning of the 2d instant, and not on the 1st, as was supposed; and it seems, by a reference to the American consulate, recently made, that the seaman named Christian Brehan, who was supposed, until then, to have departed in that vessel, did not so depart, but has never since been seen by the consul or heard of by the undersigned. These facts, however, not affecting the principle of the question as it is viewed by the undersigned, are merely submitted, in order that the whole case may be laid open to the two Governments, to which the adjustment of the affair belongs.

In making this first communication to the Minister of Foreign Affairs since his elevation to the distinguished rank of Marquis, the undersigned begs his excellency to accept of his congratulations upon this mark of the sovereign approbation, and of the assurance of his great respect and consideration.

CONDY RAGUET.

Mr. Bond to Mr. Raguet.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Montevideo, October 16, 1826.

MY DEAR SIR: I had the satisfaction of receiving last evening your favor of the 4th instant, by the United States sloop-of-war Boston, enclosing a letter from Mr. Forbes, which will be forwarded by the English packet that is now daily expected.

By the English frigate Doris I sent you the correspondence with Admiral Pinto, referred to in a former letter, and at the same time I informed you, in a short note, of the seizure and detention of the brig Sarah George, of Portland, M. S. Gordon master, from Callao, bound to Montevideo and Rio de Janeiro. The captain, supposing himself to be near Point Indio, and not having seen land after passing Cape Horn, bore down to speak a vessel which was seen at a distance to inquire his situation, when he was taken possession of by the Brazilian brig-of-war Caboclo, the crew and papers taken out, and the vessel ordered (in charge of a prize-master) to the squadron under the command of Commodore Norton, then lying at anchor between Cusenada and the outer roads of Buenos Ayres, by whom, after a short detention, she was sent to this port. Commodore Norton informed Captain Gordon that his vessel would be liberated upon arriving at Montevideo; but that his orders compelled him to send in every vessel under similar circumstances. Soon after the arrival of the Sarah George I called upon the Commandant of Marine to inquire the cause of her detention, but he was not able to give me any information concerning it; at the same time referred me, as in the case of the Pioneer, to the Judge of Prizes, in whose possession the papers had been placed. Upon making inquiries of him, I was informed that there appeared no legal cause for her seizure, but that, according to the orders he had received, he was obliged to proceed in the trial of the vessel, as well as in that of all the others; that he had no discretionary power to order her release; that his decision, whether favorable or not, would not be conclusive; and that the papers must be sent, from the nature of his instructions and limited powers, to Rio de Janeiro for a final sentence. Under these circumstances, seeing they have no authority to liberate the vessels detained, and that the papers will have to be forwarded to Rio, I have only been able to hasten, as much as possible, the decision of the Judge of Prizes, who has most unaccountably delayed the business of the Pioneer, as well as that of the other vessels.

By the Boston I purpose to forward to you copies of the protests of the masters of the Pioneer and Sarah George, as well as copies of the charter parties, instructions, &c., and of the notes which have passed between the authorities here and myself.

For information concerning local news of this place I beg to refer you to Mr. Cornelius Dow, who will present you this.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

J. BOND.

"Watson Farris took the smallpox in prison before his release, but has, fortunately, recovered. He has not, however, the most distant prospect of getting his money, and may even consider himself lucky to have escaped with his life."

"The cargo of the Leonidas has been sold for about 60,000 milreas; but it has not yet been formally condemned, as I supposed in my letter of 31st ultimo."

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, October 31, 1826.

The undersigned, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has to inform Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, that the Minister and Secretary of State for Affairs of Justice, to whom have been communicated the contents of his note of the 13th October, 1826, respecting the American seaman who has been arrested with a quantity of Spanish dollars for which he had not paid the export duties, has just informed him that, from the investigation made by the Superintendent General of Customs, it appears that the arrest in question was made while the said seaman was in the very act of embarking, accompanied with many sufficient proofs of irregularity, since the money was concealed in boots. That your request to that officer for the release of the seaman cannot be granted, unless security be given; but suggesting that, as it is declared that the man is poor, you should request that the persons who arrested him be required to institute legal proceedings against him; with this view, this magistrate has delayed the release asked for since the 6th or 7th instant, and it remains now with you to make the application.

Seeing, therefore, the situation of this affair, already in possession of the judicial authority, over which, as you well know, the Government has no control, and, moreover, involving the lawful interests of private individuals, the Government has dispensed with the application mentioned above, and given orders to proceed in the case, with all possible despatch, to its final decision.

The undersigned cannot refrain from remarking to you that, having always endeavored in the course of his correspondence with you to treat you with all due courtesy, he has seen, with much regret, that, in your note above referred to, you have used the most acrimonious language, regardless of the harmony and friendship happily subsisting between the Empire of Brazil and the United States of America. It is to be hoped that in your future communications you will use more moderation.

The undersigned renews to you the expression of his respect and esteem.

MARQUIS DE INHAMBUPE.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, December 4, 1826.

[Extracts.]

"You will have observed in the note addressed to me on the 31st October by the Minister of Foreign Affairs (of which a copy has been transmitted) relating to Watson Farris, a positive refusal of the Government to interfere in the case, an argument to justify his imprisonment, an attempt to throw upon me the odium of his long detention, as well as the consequence of his exposure to the smallpox. This sort of management is entirely characteristic of the mode of thinking and acting uniform with this people. It is true that Farris at the time of his arrest had his money in a pair of boots which he was carrying on board for the mate. He had put it there because fifteen or sixteen pounds of silver could be more conveniently carried in that way than in the pockets of a sailor's jacket. It is, however, not true that the Judge of Contrabands would have discharged the man in any other event than that of bail being given, or than with the consent of his copartners in the distribution of the property. This he explicitly declared to Mr. Wright; and my note of the 13th October to the minister was not written until after this assent was refused by the parties. It is, however, on the other hand, a fact that the judge endeavored to induce Mr. Wright to become security, by assuring him that it was a mere matter of form. To this note I returned no answer. The man had been released a week before it was written, (unquestionably by order of the Government, and probably on finding him with symptoms of disease,) and that was all I had expected. In relation to the latter part of the note, charging me with using a style of acrimony, the remark was too true to be controverted; and as one of my colleagues learned from the Foreign Office that this note was considered there as a severe dressing for my want of moderation, I had no objection to let it stand as a set off."

"The brig Flora, of Philadelphia, bound to Buenos Ayres, was detained in the river Plate in October, sent into Montevideo and liberated. The brig Constitution, of Philadelphia, bound to Montevideo, was detained off the island of Lobos by a schooner, and sent into that port on the 11th instant, where she was soon after liberated; but her crew, which had been taken out by the schooner, had gone upon a cruise in her, and consequently could not be given up until her return into port. I shall renew my remonstrances against this unlawful practice."

"I learn, not however with certainty, that the inferior tribunal decided on the 29th ultimo in favor of the release of the Ruth; and Captain Elliot informs me that, on the 21st ultimo, the Minister of Marine, whom he visited, stated to him that it was the intention of his Government to adopt our rule of not capturing neutral vessels, except in cases of previous warning. In my note of 30th November I used the term 'authorized' upon the strength of the following paragraph in Captain Biddle's instructions: 'The letter of Mr. Raguet to the Government of Brazil contains the views of your Government.'"

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Rio de Janeiro, November 14, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his respects to the Marquis of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honor to invite the attention of his excellency to the following cases of the capture of American vessels:

The brig Leonidas, of Boston, Bartlett master, on a voyage from Canton to Buenos Ayres, was captured in the month of June last, by the Brazilian blockading squadron, on her entrance into the river Plate, sent into Montevideo, and subsequently ordered to Rio de Janeiro, upon the ground of being destined to a blockaded port, and of having on board enemy's property, as announced in a note of his excellency dated on the 14th of August. At this port, where she arrived on the 10th of July, her cargo was discharged, and after a detention, from the time of her capture, of upwards of three months, the vessel was liberated upon bonds given for the amount of her estimated value, but without the payment of her freight or damages for her detention. The property reputed to belong to citizens of Buenos Ayres has been sold, without condemnation, for about 60,000 milreas, but no decision has yet been made in the case of the vessel.

The brig Ruth, of Philadelphia, Jefferson master, was captured on the 5th of August, at sea, by the imperial brig-of-war Independencia on Morté, and sent to this port, where she arrived on the 29th of same month, and where she still remains without a decision. This vessel was bound from Gibraltar to Buenos Ayres, with the intention of proceeding to Montevideo, in case, upon arrival near the river Plate, the blockade should be found still to be in force, and was, at the time of capture, actually destined to the latter port, as appears by her log-book, in consequence of having received such information on her voyage.

The brig Pioneer, of Salem, Potter master, bound on a voyage from Havana direct to Montevideo, with a stipulation in the charter party to proceed to Buenos Ayres in case the blockade should, on arrival in the river Plate, be found to be raised, was captured on the 3d of September, off cape St. Mary's, by the squadron under the command of Admiral Pinto Guedes, and sent to the port of her destination, where she arrived on the 8th of that month, and where she still continued without a trial, as late as the 28th of October.

The brig Sarah George, of Portland, Gordon master, bound from Lima to Montevideo, was captured on the 23d of September, in or near the river Plate, by the imperial brig-of-war Coboclo, and sent into the latter port, where she arrived on the 26th of the same month, and where she still remained without a decision, on the 28th ultimo, the date of the last advices.

The undersigned, in a note addressed to his Imperial Majesty's Government under date of the 13th of December, 1825, had the honor to state the rules which the Government of the United States would expect to be observed in the conducting of blockades as regarded American vessels; one of these rules was distinctly declared to be that the United States did not acknowledge general and diplomatic notifications as binding upon their citizens; they would not admit the validity of any capture except that of a vessel arrested in the attempt to enter a blockaded port after having been warned off by the blockading force. In answer to the said note, dated on the 23d of December, the minister then occupying the Foreign Department having made no objections to that rule, nor indeed to any of the others advanced, but having, on the contrary, declared in general terms, on the part of his Government, that "the sentiments of justice and impartiality expressed in the said note corresponded with those which his said Government had manifested," the United States had a clear right to expect that no departure from the rule would have taken place in the conducting of the blockade of the river Plate. Such has been their impression up to the present moment; and the President will learn with surprise, as well as regret, that, in the cases of the Ruth, the Pioneer, and the Sarah George, the captures were made without any previous warning, and upon grounds which the undersigned is warranted in asserting will never be assented to by the American Government as justification of their detention.

The undersigned is extremely gratified to observe the satisfaction with which his excellency, in his note of the 31st ultimo, received on the 1st instant, seems to speak of "the harmony and friendship which happily reign between the Empire of Brazil and the United States of America," inasmuch as he has a right to anticipate from this gratuitous profession of amity an early and a favorable decision in regard to the matters herein represented. He, therefore, with great confidence, relies upon the expectation that his Imperial Majesty's Government will order the restoration of the said three vessels and their cargoes, with damages, and an adequate indemnity for the injuries and losses they will have sustained by their detention.

In regard to the Leonidas, the undersigned also feels assured that the bonds given in her case will be cancelled, and that the agent of her owners will be paid the amount of her freight and damages. He also respectfully submits to the consideration of his Imperial Majesty's Government the advisableness of detaining in the public coffers the proceeds of the property condemned* as belonging to the enemy until an opportunity shall be afforded for the Government of the United States to present to that of his Imperial Majesty the arguments and reasoning which have induced it to adopt the doctrine of the flag's covering the property—a principle which, it is confidently expected, will be embraced by all the Powers of America as essentially connected with their true interest and prosperity. In making this request the undersigned conceives that he is asking nothing unreasonable. The case in point is probably the only one which has arisen during the present war; and the advantages resulting to the captors by a hasty distribution of the fund are not, by any means, sufficient to counterbalance the benefits which the nation may derive from the delay solicited.

The undersigned has the honor, herewith, to transmit to his excellency authenticated copies of the protests of the masters of the Leonidas, the Pioneer, and the Sarah George, and of an extract from the protest of the master of the Ruth.

The undersigned offers, upon this occasion, to the Marquis of Inhambupe the expression of his esteem and consideration.

CONDY RAGUET.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Rio de Janeiro, November 30, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, had the honor, under date of the 14th instant, to address a note to the Marquis of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, relating to the American vessels recently captured by the blockading squadron of the river Plate. As the undersigned has not yet been favored with a reply to the same, he takes this occasion to call the attention of his excellency to the case in order that the Government of the United States may have the earliest advice of the intentions of his Imperial Majesty's Government in relation to neutral vessels captured for breach of blockade without previous warning. It is hardly necessary for the undersigned to state that this point is regarded by the American Government as of vital importance to the peace and prosperity of all the States of this continent, and that the President would learn with the greatest satisfaction that the Government of Brazil had decided, in relation thereto, in conformity with the views which were advanced by the undersigned in his note of the 13th December last, and which he is authorized to assert are those which his Government will maintain.

The undersigned renews, upon this occasion, to his excellency the Marquis of Inhambupe the assurance of his great respect and consideration.

CONDY RAGUET.

* Note by Mr. Raguet, attached to the copy transmitted to the Department.—"This word should have been 'considered.'"

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, December 5, 1826.

[Extract.]

"The delay of the Sylph for another day enables me to add a few lines in addition to my letter of yesterday, and to transmit to you a copy of a short note from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, dated on 4th instant, but not received until to-day, acknowledging the receipt of my communications of the 14th and 30th November, respecting the captured vessels, and promising a full reply. I understand that the decision of the lower court has been in favor of the restoration of the Ruth, without damages, and the claimants paying costs. No appeal, I have reason to think, will be made by the captors; and I am inclined to the opinion that this decision has been made by the positive order of the Government, which, it is said, has issued instructions to Admiral Pinto not to capture any more American vessels without previous warning. It is probable that the other three vessels will be restored in the same way; that is, that damages and costs will not be awarded, the Government calculating that the injured claimants will prefer to submit to the losses they have sustained rather than enter appeals, which may prolong the suits for years, as in the cases of the Spermo and Exchange, which remain yet undecided. The sentence in the case of the Ruth requires the confirmation of the Superior Court, and the lapse of some days, perhaps weeks, to render it final."

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

OFFICE OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, December 4, 1826.

The Marquis de Inhambupe presents his compliments to Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, and has to inform him that he has applied for further explanations to the Minister and Secretary of State for Affairs of Marine, in order properly to answer his two notes of the 14th and 30th November.

The Marquis de Inhambupe renews to Mr. Condy Raguet the expression of his esteem and respect.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, December 22, 1826.

[Extracts.]

"Mr. Bond, whose intelligence and attention to the interests of our commerce and seamen at Montevideo deserve my warmest thanks, has advised me, under date of 30th November, of the capture of the brig Matilda, of New York, and of a Swedish brig from Malaga, with an American cargo, by the blockading squadron, both of which vessels are expected daily at this port, with several other neutrals, English, French, &c. From his letter I extract the following: 'The cases of the Sarah George and Pioneer remain in pretty much the same condition as before, but very little progress having been made in the trial of these vessels. It is my opinion, from what I can hear, that they will be condemned by the judge at this place.'

"The definitive decision in the cases of the Ruth, the Leonidas, and the Spermo, have not yet been given, and I am of opinion will not be given until it be ascertained what course will be pursued by the British Government in relation to their vessels. Mr. Gordon told me on the 11th instant that his Government would not claim the restoration of British vessels upon the ground of a want of a previous warning; and he had in a former conversation signified to me that there was some force in Admiral Pinto's reasoning in the letter addressed by him to Mr. Hood, of which a copy accompanies this. I am of opinion that, upon that ground, he has made no movement. A decision for damages in the case of the Exchange has been lately given against the captor, who is non est inventus; and the master, whose patience is untiring, has now commenced an action against the crown, which may possibly occupy him a couple of years more.

"The document E is an answer to my notes of 14th and 30th November respecting the captured vessels, accompanied by a copy of new instructions given by this Government to Admiral Pinto under date of 29th November, as also by a copy of a letter respecting the brig Pioneer addressed by that commander to Mr. Hood, British consul at Montevideo, on 24th October. It is proper, however, here to remark, that this latter document, having already appeared here in the Spectator of 20th November, I send you the printed copy instead of a manuscript one.

"In perusing these documents you will discover that, although the doctrine of previous warning by the blockading force is not admitted in the minister's note, yet that the instructions given to the admiral are calculated, considering the actual locality of Buenos Ayres, to remove a great part of the difficulties heretofore resulting from the mode of conducting the blockade, inasmuch as it is ordered 'that only those neutral vessels shall be detained which it is manifestly known intend to infringe the blockade, directing themselves towards it, and not those which may be fallen in with on the high seas, or may be entering Montevideo, even though their passports be for the said ports,' (i. e., the blockaded ports.) The point now to be ascertained is, whether, after abandoning so much of the original ground, the vessels which have been detained in opposition to the new rule will or will not be released. The Christmas holidays will suspend all public business. The absence of the Emperor will preclude the possibility of procuring any new concessions, and some time must elapse before any step which I can take would be likely to be efficacious. I sent to Mr. Bond, without delay, a copy of the new instructions to the admiral, that he might exhibit it to him in case the original should not have arrived."

Admiral Pinto to Mr. Hood.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, October 24, 1826.

In acknowledging the receipt of the letter addressed to me, under date the 22d instant, by Mr. Thomas Samuel Hood, his Britannic Majesty's consul at Montevideo, on the question of the legality of the capture of the cargo of the United States brig Pioneer, (the brig itself being judged free,) I shall state, in reply, that, as the settlement of this question of validity belongs to the judicial power, it is to that that arguments, explanations, and proofs should be addressed: my business is simply to declare what I claimed as being, in my opinion, a good prize, and what I left at liberty, whether because no express law was recognized, or in consequence of the compromise which the laws of the Empire of Brazil permit me to make in such cases.

In order to make this matter more clear, I will transcribe here an article of the decree of the 21st February, 1824:

"5th. If it should happen that, at the time of the search and examination made on board, the capturer relinquishes the prize, or by agreement, * * * * * in order that the prize may be released, all which may likewise take place in the case of the parties coming to a compromise, or making any agreement."

The consul will find that I am here empowered to enter into an agreement in favor of some, which the law does not permit with regard to others, and it is easy to conceive the justice of that power which every one has of disposing of what belongs to him, or waiving the rights which he believes himself to possess. But, as the consul wishes to rest his doubts upon the explanation and distinction which I made between the circumstances of the captain and of the supercargo, and requests of me the reasons of that distinction, I am glad to have this opportunity of gratifying the consul, whose intelligence and transcendent talents are far above matters so plain as that which he desires to have more elucidated. However, I shall proceed to satisfy him.

The brig Pioneer was bound to Montevideo; she took her passport for that place, and did not pass to the westward of it, and therefore I do not consider her a good prize. The supercargo brought two sets of papers—one for Montevideo and one for Buenos Ayres, (two neighboring ports of belligerent Powers.) Therefore he is subject to lawful capture.

Mr. Bayard, the supercargo, uses the natural argument, how could I seize the cargo and not the vessel? I will answer this plain objection.

It is easy to comprehend and believe that the vessel was under engagement to go to Buenos Ayres, but presumptions and indications still stronger do not determine me to act. Believing, therefore, that the brig Pioneer intended to proceed with her cargo to Buenos Ayres, I exercised the authority given to me by the article above quoted, and released her, because I had no legal evidence against her. As to the cargo, without wishing to penetrate the mystery of the means by which Mr. Bayard would have conveyed it to Buenos Ayres, I will confine myself to the consideration that Mr. Bayard had committed an illegal act, by which he risked the loss of his property, without having any claim, in such case, to the protection of his Britannic Majesty, although the merchandise belonged to subjects of his said Majesty. I proceed to demonstrate this proposition.

The Government of his Britannic Majesty declared its recognition of the blockade decreed by his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil against Buenos Ayres. Any subject of his Britannic Majesty who, after this, engages in any enterprise hostile to the right acknowledged by his Government is thereby thrown out of its protection; for, in committing the act which is declared unlawful, he commits hostility against the power offended by it.

As soon as Mr. Bayard took out his clearance for a port blockaded with all the formalities prescribed by the law of nations, he incurred the risk of the penalties resulting from the law of war. That the papers comprised the port of Buenos Ayres there is no question; that it was not lawful to clear for a blockaded port there can be no question; that it is not lawful to go to the blockaded port to ascertain whether the blockade is in vigor; and that the information or certainty of its non-existence should be obtained from the same quarter whence its existence was made known, and that the English courts have condemned prizes on such grounds, no one will doubt. Here, then, we have the law established with regard to the cargo of the brig Pioneer, without entering into any arguments as to the probability of bad faith in the destination of the brig. As to the latter, there are presumptions, and perhaps very strong ones, but there are no legal proofs, and therefore I desisted. Against the cargo, destined for a port blockaded more than six months, there are facts, there are documents, and therefore I shall prosecute the affair until it is determined in the Council of Justice of the Admiralty in Rio de Janeiro. According to good faith, the papers ought to have been for Montevideo alone; and if, upon arriving there, the blockade should have been found not in vigor, another direction might have been given to the merchandise, if convenient. But its direction was already to Buenos Ayres.

It will not be irrelevant to state some facts which show the good faith of Mr. Bayard in directing his cargo to the port of Montevideo.

By the 9th article of the decree above cited, both the captor and the captured are authorized to demand that the cargo shall be discharged, and even sold, in case it should be liable to damage from delay of judgment, and no one can object to this unless he binds himself in sufficient securities to pay the losses which may result from keeping the merchandise and cargoes in their original condition. The prize agent demanded that this should be done in the case of the cargo of the brig Pioneer, but Mr. Bayard opposed it, and, until now, successfully, although the 10th article of the said decree imposes this duty upon the officers of ports where prizes may be carried. As to the place of deposit, the custom-house is the proper place, especially as this is the port to which Mr. Bayard protests that he was, in good faith, destined. So that he comes with a cargo to Montevideo, and yet refuses to enter it at the custom-house. It is not possible that there could be a stronger proof of good faith.

The objection made by Mr. Bayard, according to his own statement of it to me, is, that he had not the means of paying the freight; to which I replied, that, as the brig was considered free, the freight could not be denied to her, and that the cargo was liable to it, whether belonging to the original owners or to the captors. Mr. Bayard was not convinced. But why? The question is so easy to answer that I shall conclude with assurances of the respect, &c., &c.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, December 10, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, having received from the Secretary of State for Naval Affairs the information necessary to enable him to reply to the note addressed to him on the 14th November last by Mr. Condy Raguet, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, in which he protests against the detentions made by the Brazilian squadron blockading the river Plate of the vessels of his nation called the Leonidas, the Ruth, the Pioneer, and the Sarah George, and demands that they be restored, and compensation made for the losses and damages which they may have sustained, informs Mr. Raguet that the trials of the first two vessels are still pending before the competent tribunal at this place; and that, as to the latter two, they are in Montevideo, where their respective trials have probably already commenced before the Chief Judge, acting as Auditor General of the Navy, and will afterwards be carried by appeal to the Supreme Military Council, in case the admiral commanding the said squadron should not, as he intended, send the last prizes that have been made to this place, to be tried, in the first instance. In the meantime the said admiral has been commanded to render an account of his reasons for these captures, it appearing that the brig Pioneer has been released, and her cargo only brought to judgment, upon the ground of the supercargo having been possessed of two sets of papers, and thus committed an unlawful act, which renders the cargo liable to confiscation, as you will see more fully by the annexed copy of a letter addressed by the said admiral to his Britannic Majesty's consul in Montevideo.

With regard to the previous notice which Mr. Raguet requires to be made to the vessels of his nation of the existence of the blockade, the undersigned has to inform him that the blockade existed as soon as adequate notice of it was given to all nations, and that a sufficient space of time was allowed for all to be informed of it. Neutral vessels, therefore, cannot be allowed to attempt a violation of the blockade upon the pretence of being ignorant whether it existed or not; for they may ascertain this fact by proceeding to the nearest neutral port, and a contrary course to this would be an unequivocal indication of sinister purposes. However, as vessels have been detained, even on the high seas, in consequence of their having passports for the blockaded ports, his Majesty the Emperor has determined, as you will see by the enclosed copy, that those vessels only shall be detained which evidently intend to violate the blockade.

The undersigned renews the assurances, &c.

THE MARQUIS DE INHAMBUPE.

[Documents referred to in the foregoing.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, November 29, 1826.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Repeated protests having been made to his Majesty the Emperor by the ministers of foreign nations residing in this place against the detentions of the vessels of their respective countries made by the squadron under the command of your excellency upon the ground of their sailing with passports for the blockaded ports, and his Majesty wishing to avoid such disputes as that which exists with respect to the brig Ruth, which was detained upon the high seas, he has resolved that those vessels only shall be detained which manifestly evince an intention to violate the blockade, and not those which may be found upon the high seas, or which may enter the port of Montevideo, even though they should have passports for blockaded ports. In addition to this, your excellency will enforce a compliance with the regulations contained in the orders of the 17th and 24th of December last year, which were transmitted from this Department to your excellency's predecessor in the command of the squadron.

God preserve your excellency.

THE MARQUIS DE PARANAGUA.

BARON OF RIO DA PRATA.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE, December 6, 1826.

JOAQUIN FRANCISCO LEAL.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Raguet.

[Extract from a despatch dated Department of State, Washington, October 22, 1826.]

"The President has seen, with approbation, your zealous exertions to prevent, in the existing war between the Brazils and Buenos Ayres, an abuse of the law of blockade. The principles of that law are so well expounded and explained in our correspondence with European Governments that they are familiar to you and to all. You will, on every suitable occasion, insist upon those principles, and whenever any instance shall present itself of their violation, promptly and firmly remonstrate against it."

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, January 9, 1827.

[Extracts.]

"On the 27th ultimo I had the honor to receive, by the hands of Mr. Oliveira, who arrived in the new Brazilian frigate from Baltimore on the 25th, your communication of 22d October. It is highly gratifying to me to be informed that my feeble exertions for the protection of our commerce against abuses arising from a violation of the law of blockades have received the approbation of the President. It would have added much to that gratification were I able to announce in return that those exertions had been successful.

"On the 26th ultimo the brig Matilda, of New York, arrived here under convoy, with seven other neutral vessels, detained in the river Plate, amongst which was the Swedish brig Anders, Haeger master, from Malaga, with a cargo belonging to Mr. George Loring, an American merchant residing there. The former vessel was cleared out for Montevideo, and was captured about 15 or 20 miles from Buenos Ayres, towards which she was driven in distress, having been a long time out from New York. The Anders was chartered for Buenos Ayres, and, in case the blockade should be found to be still in existence, she was to go to Montevideo, but was captured before reaching the latter port. The Chargé d'Affaires of Sweden has made a representation in this case, the result of which I shall wait to see before I make one in relation to the cargo.

I have the honor to enclose herewith a copy of a note addressed by me, on the 3d instant, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in answer to his note of 10th ultimo, which refused to admit the doctrine of previous warning. Upon the ultimate decision on this point will probably depend the case of the Matilda; for, let the evidence of her distress be ever so strong, I doubt if it will be allowed to weigh against the fact of her having passed the port of Montevideo. I shall not relax my efforts in any of the cases of capture; but I have no hopes that anything I can say will make any impression.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, January 3, 1827.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, in presenting to the Marquis of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the compliments of the season, cannot permit the occasion to pass without offering to his excellency his sincere condolence upon the late mournful event which has deprived the people of Brazil of an Empress beloved by all, and his Imperial Majesty of a consort so distinguished for her exalted virtues and benevolence of character.

A becoming respect for the memory of the august deceased has induced the undersigned to delay, until the present moment, a reply to the note with which he was honored by his excellency, under date of the 10th ultimo; and it would have afforded him peculiar pleasure had he been able to enter upon the duties of the new year with the cheering prospect that the relations between his Government and that of Brazil were likely to be placed upon a footing calculated to conciliate the interests of the two nations, and to strengthen the harmony which it is so manifestly the true policy of both to cultivate. It has, therefore, been with concern that he has not discovered in the note just referred to a willingness on the part of his Imperial Majesty's Government to acquiesce in the admission of a principle respecting the law of blockade for which the United States have unceasingly contended, for which they ever will contend, and against every infraction of which, as relates to American vessels, they have commanded the undersigned promptly and firmly to remonstrate.

In expressing this regret, however, it would not be just in the undersigned to omit to mention the satisfaction which he feels assured will be experienced by the Government of the United States on learning that the Government of his Imperial Majesty has been pleased to modify its instructions relative to the mode of conducting the blockade in such a way as that neutral vessels shall not be detained either upon the high seas or in proceeding to Montevideo, even though their passports be for the blockaded ports. This new determination cannot fail to be regarded by the American Government as an evidence of a friendly disposition, inasmuch as, whilst it removes the ground which has hitherto given occasion for all the complaints which the undersigned has found it his duty to make in relation to the capture of American vessels, it holds out the assurance that those vessels will be speedily released from their actual detention.

The principle above referred to, the admission of which has not been acceded to by his excellency, is, that a neutral vessel is not liable to detention for a breach of blockade, unless arrested in the attempt to enter a blockaded port after having been warned off by the blockading force. It would have been gratifying to the undersigned had his excellency deemed it expedient to combat this proposition by the reasoning upon which he no doubt forms his opposition to it. Free and argumentative discussion is the only practicable mode of arriving at truth; and if the undersigned has not, in his former communications, been so successful as to establish the correctness of his positions, he would have been pleased to have seen the errors of his arguments pointed out.

Nor has, indeed, his excellency, in support of the opposite doctrine—that a general notice of a blockade in a foreign country is alone sufficient—advanced any arguments, it being merely contended that neutral vessels can ascertain whether a blockade be still in existence by calling for information at "the nearest neutral ports." Whatever force such a suggestion might possess if applied to the States of Europe which are proximate to each other, it certainly can have no weight as applied to most of the nations of America, and particularly to the parties engaged in the present war. The whole inhabited territory, from the river Amazon to Cape Horn, is in possession of the belligerents. The nearest neutral frequented ports are Valparaiso and the Cape of Good Hope; a voyage to either of those places would render the inquiring party, as to time in one case, and as to recency of information in the other, as far from the scene of the blockade as when he commenced his voyage. In a war between the United States and any other Power, where could a neutral vessel, destined to the former country, find a neutral port at which to call for information respecting a blockade? Certainly nowhere but in Europe, or British America, or the ports of the West Indies, or Mexico. And would it not appear extraordinary, even to the most unenlightened citizen of this Empire, were he to hear it asserted that a Brazilian vessel, bound from Maranham to New York, which would occupy a passage of twenty days, must go to Lisbon or Liverpool, or encounter the frigid climate of Halifax, or the unhealthy one of Vera Cruz or Havana, to inquire concerning a matter of which the inhabitants might not possess as recent information as had been received at the port of her departure? And yet this is what may happen, and against which Brazilians yet unborn may have to complain, because their Government did not unite with its sister Governments in putting an end to an absurdity so inconsistent with the interests and the geographical positions of the nations of this hemisphere.

If, however, his excellency had used the term "belligerent ports," the force of the position would not have been more convincing to the undersigned. By the chances of war each belligerent is liable, in turn, to have his ports blockaded; and the inquiring neutral, on reaching his destination, might find himself in danger of capture by the other party, or, at least, of having the object of his voyage defeated. In truth, however, neutral vessels, during the actual war, have usually adopted the course of proceeding to a neighboring port for information. They have gone to Montevideo, or have attempted to go there, but what has been the consequence? A number of them, and amongst them several Americans, have been seized on their way, upon the ground that a destination to a neighboring port was presumptive evidence of an intention to violate the blockade. In some cases it is true that the vessels detained had clearances for Buenos Ayres; but these documents, so far from strengthening suspicions against them, should have produced the opposite conclusion. In no part of the world is a vessel under any obligations to proceed to the port for which she obtained her clearance. The violators of blockades understand too well the risk of declaring their intentions to be guilty of the indiscretion of proclaiming them in a custom-house and in a gazette, and much better that of carrying with them the evidence of their designs. It is the fair and honest trader alone who clears out his vessel direct for a blockaded port, relying upon his own innocency and the justice of others; and it is, no doubt, a conviction on this point which has recently induced his Imperial Majesty's Government to modify its instructions relative to the blockade in the manner above noticed.

The undersigned cannot but think that the suggestion of his excellency relative to the neutral vessels stopping at an intermediate port for information is a partial abandonment of the original ground, which maintains the all-efficiency of the general notification, inasmuch as it admits the justice of the neutral's claim to information of a later period than that first received. The point contended for is, that he shall receive the latest possible information before he shall be driven to the extremity and sacrifice of giving up his voyage.

The undersigned cannot persuade himself that there is any substantial reason why Brazil, upon the doctrine of blockades, should embrace a system different from that which is maintained by the United States and all the nations of Europe, one only excepted, and which, in all probability, will be adopted as a leading feature of what may be emphatically styled the American policy by the great Congress of American plenipotentiaries now assembling at Tacubaya, near Mexico, at which it is expected his Imperial Majesty's Government will be represented, in order to participate in the discussions connected with neutral rights, navigation, and commerce, and the general interests of America which will there be brought forward. He therefore conceives it to be his duty to sustain the policy of his Government, as regards the question at issue, by the production of every argument which he can call to his aid, and, in addition to those contained in his note of the 13th of December, 1825, begs leave to submit the following:

The Government of the United States, as above asserted, maintains that no notice of the existence of a blockade is valid, as relates to neutrals, except one given on the spot by the blockading force, which is called a warning, and is usually expressed by endorsement on the register of the neutral ship for the information of other vessels which may fall in with her. This sort of notice is the only one which is consistent with the just and indefeasible rights of neutrals. It is the only one by the demanding of which the neutral is enabled to have positive evidence of the existence of such a blockade as is called for by the law of nations; and it is the only one by which the belligerent is restricted to the true and legitimate exercise of his belligerent rights, which do not authorize him to exclude neutral vessels, not laden with articles contraband of war, from the port of his enemy, even for a single moment, when no efficient blockade exists. If general and diplomatic notifications made in foreign and distant countries were to have the validity of an actual warning, weak nations would be invested with an artificial power to distress their enemy and to disturb the commerce and industry of the world, (the fatal effect of blockades,) which they do not physically possess; for, in relation to distant countries, the fact of the efficiency of the blockade, and of its uninterrupted continuance, upon which its legality depends, could not be known, and, in relation to others, it could not be proved. Under the impression that the blockade would be sustained by a competent force, the commerce of neutrals would be suspended, and many months might elapse before it was ascertained that the real blockading force was not adequate to accomplish half the injury which resulted from an acquiescence in the notification. But this is not all. Notifications might be given of blockades which might never be laid, or which might be continued but for a very short period, and thus the neutral would be visited by an evil to which he ought not to have been subjected. Such instances have already occurred; and, in regard to the United States, the absurdity of the doctrine of general notifications was once displayed in the case of a blockade of a port in Europe, wherein the notice was not received until after it was known that the blockade had been raised!

In every case, too, the distant nation which submits to the rule of general notifications must needs be deprived of its fair and legitimate commerce for a considerable time after the blockade is at an end, and this, in proportion to the distance, is more or less oppressive. She has not even, as a set-off against this hardship, the reflection that she has suffered no more than other neutrals; for, as the blockade begins with all at the same moment—that is, when it is actually laid—it terminates, as to its effects, at different periods, according to distance from the spot. It can neither be just nor generous in a belligerent, even if he had the right to impose upon his distant friends so great a sacrifice; nor can it be humane in him to entail upon a nation with which he has just concluded a peace all the privations and sufferings originating in a siege now at an end.

The history of Europe for the last twenty years, which may be styled the era of maritime aggressions, affords abundant examples of the injustice of the belligerents, in violating the established law of blockades, and from the unexampled series of outrages and lawless spoliations committed against the commerce of the United States. Brazil, destined, as she is, to become a great agricultural and commercial nation, might take a profitable lesson. If the evils resulting from a departure from the sound maxims taught by that law have been severely felt in the intercourse between Europe and North America, how much greater will not be their extent if false principles be introduced into the practice of South America? From the river of Plate to Europe or the United States, sixty or ninety days are requisite for a passage. Admitting the doctrine of a general notification, all who submit to it consent to part with the natural right they possess to trade with a friendly port for double that time after the blockade shall have been raised; and if the rule were to be considered in relation to the ports of Chili, or others more distant, eight months or a year of fair and profitable intercourse would be lost without an equivalent.

The undersigned cannot but flatter himself with the hope that a more minute examination of this principle, regarded by the United States as one of vital importance to the interests of America, will induce his Imperial Majesty's Government to give it a more favorable reception. The Government of Colombia has already adopted it, and it is believed that the Government of Mexico has imitated the example. The actual and temporary state of war in which Brazil is engaged is certainly not a sufficient reason for embracing a system so injurious to her friends, and so adverse to the sound and philanthropic rules which are clearly pointed out by an enlightened policy. Although to-day a belligerent, she may to-morrow be neutral; and it can scarcely be doubted but that, like her sister States of America, she must ultimately seek her true interests and prosperity in the paths of peace. A single departure from the just maxims which are to guide her general and permanent policy may occasion, at a future time, a motive for an oppressive retaliation, which cannot be opposed by the irresistible argument which is presented by a wise and uniform conduct.

The benefits which belligerent nations derive from their general notifications of blockade are, of themselves, of sufficient magnitude. The ordinary cautious calculation of merchants leads them to abstain from voyages to blockaded ports, where the chances are that the blockades will not have been raised prior to their arrival; and thus, by a voluntary act of the neutral, the belligerent is aided in his endeavors to distress his enemy. The operation of this silent acquiescence has been conspicuously displayed during the existing war, as relates to American commerce. In a former year as many as 160 American vessels have visited the ports of Buenos Ayres. During the last twelve months, it is believed that not half that number has entered the river Plate, including all which have arrived at Montevideo. This fact, whilst it establishes the truly prudent conduct of the merchants of the United States, presents, however, a sad picture of the losses they have sustained from a diminution of their trade. Of this their Government does not pretend to complain; but it does complain that a practice should have been adopted which is calculated to increase, instead of mitigating, the evils, already sufficiently great, resulting to neutrals from a state of war.

The undersigned trusts that, in this representation, his excellency will discover the evidence of a true desire on his part to assist in the establishment of those firm and sincere relations of amity between Brazil and the United States, which can best be perpetuated by a conviction that identity of interests should lead to identity of policy.

The undersigned offers, upon this occasion, to his excellency, with his best wishes that he may enjoy many happy years, the assurance of his esteem and high consideration.

CONDY RAGUET.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, February 7, 1827.

[Extract.]

"I have now the honor to inform you, and I do it with great satisfaction, that I have reason to believe that our affairs with this Government are in a train of adjustment; and I flatter myself that much time will not elapse before I shall be enabled to advise you of the restoration of all the captured vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, with adequate damages for their detention. A new ministry, which entered into office about the middle of January, immediately after the Emperor's return from the south, appears to be resolved upon a change of the system pursued by their predecessors; and from the actual Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Marquis of Queluz, I have received such strong assurances of his Imperial Majesty's friendly disposition towards the United States, which he is declared to regard as his 'natural ally,' that I can have no doubt of the most favorable result to our just representations.

"You are already in possession of the copy of my note of 14th November to this Government, claiming the restoration of the Leonidas, the Ruth, the Pioneer, and the Sarah George, as well as of that of the 30th of the same month, calling for a reply thereto, and urging a definitive declaration of his Imperial Majesty's intentions in regard to neutral vessels detained without previous warning. You have also been furnished with the answer received by me under date of the 10th of December, wherein the right to a warning by the blockading force was refused to be admitted; whilst, however, at the same time I was advised that orders, under date of the 29th of November, had been transmitted to the admiral commanding the naval forces in the river Plate, by which he was instructed only to detain neutral vessels which appeared resolved to violate the blockade by proceeding towards it, 'and not those which may be fallen in with on the high seas, or may be entering Montevideo, even though their passports be for the blockaded ports.' With a copy of the said orders you have also been furnished, as also with one of a note addressed by me, on 3d of January, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, entering more minutely than upon any prior occasion into an examination of the doctrine of previous warning.

"That note was particularly intended to prepare the way for the case of the Matilda, captured, subsequently to my representation of the 14th of November, under circumstances which in a manner shut her out of the new rule; and, after giving time for the requisite deliberation upon the abstract principles therein discussed, I claimed the restoration of that vessel, as well as of the cargo of the Swedish brig Anders, belonging to an American citizen, in a note dated on the 17th of January, of which a copy is enclosed, marked A.

"Having found it impossible to persuade myself that, after the abandonment of the original system respecting the blockade, any condemnation of vessels could take place in opposition to the principles assumed in the new instructions, I foresaw that the chief difficulty in the way of a speedy decision was the idea that, in a constitutional Government, the Executive Department had no power to interfere in matters pending before the judiciary. This opinion had been advanced, in correspondence with me, by different ministers of this Government, and had been recently urged with great force in reply to remonstrances made against the capture of vessels by my colleagues of France and Holland. Although it was a subject of which I did not consider myself master, yet I thought it worth while to attempt its refutation; and, in the best manner of which I was capable, offered my sentiments in relation to it in the note last referred to.

"On the 19th of January I received from the Marquis of Queluz, who had taken the portfolio of the Foreign Department on the 17th, three notes dated on the 18th, of which copies are enclosed, marked B, C, D.

"The first of these merely states that amongst the papers of his predecessor he had found the minutes of an intended answer to my note of 3d of January, which he considered it his duty to transmit to me, signed by himself, expressing, at the same time, his assent to the reasoning therein contained.

"The note marked C is the answer thus referred to. In this document was I first officially made acquainted with the fact that, with the orders of 29th November, transmitted to Admiral Pinto, instructions of a more liberal character than those communicated to me had been also furnished to him, by which he was, in substance, commanded not to capture neutral vessels without previous warning. This modification, however, of the rigor of the original system is pronounced to be matter of favor rather than of strict obligation; although it is admitted that the instructions originally given to Vice Admiral Lobo were of a general nature, and that those given to Admiral Pinto were for the purpose of preventing him from giving a construction to them more in conformity with his own doctrines than those of his Government. In this note it is expressly declared, as the sentiment of the Government, that the executive power is prohibited, by the constitution and the laws, from interfering in matters which are of the legitimate competency of the judiciary.

"The paper D is an acknowledgment of the receipt of my note of the 17th, addressed to the late minister, promising a more full reply after the Emperor should have been consulted; professing much friendship for the United States on the part of his Imperial Majesty; repeating that the modification of the blockade was an act of condescendence; and signifying that the prize cases must take their course before the ordinary tribunals of law. By the language of this note, however, it is observable that the minister's opinion respecting the non-interference of the executive with the judiciary had been somewhat shaken; that is, if the one pronounced by his predecessor in the note C was included amongst those deemed by his excellency as 'conclusive.'

"In this state of things matters stood, when all at once the sudden and unexpected news was divulged that the Superior Court (Conselho Supremo Militar) had decided definitively in the case of the ship Spermo, of New York, by condemning vessel and cargo, and sentencing the claimants to pay the costs. A copy of the sentence was shown to me on the 19th of January by Mr. Kirkpatrick, the agent of the owners, who sailed with it on the next day for New York, and I have not yet procured another. It was dated on the 10th, but no knowledge of its existence was public until the 18th. Knowing the case to be one of the most palpable injustice, I lost no time in preparing a representation in relation to it. This I did on the 24th in a note, of which a copy is enclosed, marked E, and in which I contented myself with a simple statement of the facts of the case, and the expression of my conviction that his Imperial Majesty would order this sentence to be reversed, and that of the inferior court, which had restored the ship and condemned the captors in costs and damages, to be affirmed. In this note I also took occasion to call the attention of the new minister to the numerous causes of complaint which had formed the subjects of my prior correspondence, and to express my hopes that the recent change of ministry was ominous of change of measures. To this note I received on the 26th a reply, dated on the day preceding, in which I had the satisfaction to perceive it to be admitted, as the opinion of his excellency, that the Executive Department not only had the right to interfere with the courts in prize cases, but that it was its duty to do so, and that that duty would be performed in a manner, it was hoped, which would put an end to complaints. In regard to the Spermo, it was promised that, after the minister had procured a copy of the decision complained of, to compare it with the first one, a specific answer should be communicated to me; and this answer I cannot imagine will be other than a favorable one.

"Since the date of the last mentioned note (of which a copy is inclosed, marked F,) I have not seen or heard from the Minister; but I have reasons for believing that on the 29th ultimo a council was held for the purpose of deliberating upon some general and definitive measures in relation to the prize cases of all nations, and that the Government is now occupied in maturing arrangements for the termination at least of our difficulties. In the meantime I learn by the Boston, which arrived on the 26th ultimo from Montevideo, that Admiral Pinto had, in December, begun to act upon his new instructions. The American schooners Homer and Armstrong, which sailed for Santos, a Brazilian port, early in that month, were captured by the blockading squadron near Buenos Ayres and sent to Montevideo, where they were instantly given up. The ship Pactolus, taken at sea, was also immediately released by the admiral on reaching Montevideo. Commodore Biddle writes me from that port, under date of the 11th of January, 'There is nothing to be asked or desired by us in regard to the blockade.' With respect to the practice of taking out the seamen from our vessels, which has been pursued in every case of detention, that must now cease. I learn from the master and supercargo of the Matilda that, on board the ship of war which conveyed them to this port, they were treated with great civility, and that they had nothing to complain of on their own account or that of their crew.

"By the brig St. Thomas, from Boston, we received, on 22d ultimo, the President's message, delivered on 5th December. The remark respecting Brazil and the blockade produced a great excitement with the public. It flew about with the rapidity of lightning, and assumed in its progress a variety of forms, even putting on the armor and attitude of 'grim-visaged war.' All the suffering neutrals of all nations hailed it as the fulfilment of their predictions that the United States alone could save their property from condemnation. Even our good friends the English, whose minister I imagine has never claimed a single vessel, placed their hopes upon our stubborn adherence to principles rejected by their Government, whilst the French were rejoiced to have us as coadjutors in a cause of which their Sovereign is not ready to admit the justice when claims for indemnity for spoliations are urged upon him by our citizens. That the rumors reached the Emperor on the same day I have no doubt. My colleague of Portugal tells me that on the 23d his Majesty said to the Marquis of Queluz, 'You must settle all these difficulties with the United States.' On the 25th the Marquis, for the first time, saw the message, of which not a word has been said in the Government paper, or any other that I have seen up to the present day. With a knowledge of these circumstances, I have no hesitation in expressing my belief that the language used by the President went very far to convince this Government that the executive power has a right to interfere with the judiciary, and I am equally sure that the previous symptoms of a disposition to conciliate were the result of the little power with which I felt myself armed by your letter of 22d October. On the 19th of January I know, from one of my colleagues, that the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who had spoken to him about my note of the 17th, had not yet made up his mind as to the right of the Executive to interfere; and I also know that one of the principal lawyers concerned in the prize cases for the claimants told one of the latter, a few days before that period, that he was persuaded that all the vessels would be condemned on account of the wants of the Government, even at the hazard of being obliged to make ultimate indemnity."

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, January 17, 1827.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his respects to the Marquis of Inhambupe, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and in obedience to the orders of his Government, which require him to remonstrate against every violation of the law of blockades which may be practiced against the vessels and property of American citizens by officers acting under the authority of the Brazilian Government, has the honor to call the attention of his excellency to the following two cases of capture:

The Swedish and neutral brig Anders, Haeger master, chartered by an American citizen resident at Malaga, and laden with a cargo wholly American property, was captured on the 19th of November last, in sight of Cape St. Mary's, by a Brazilian vessel of war, sent into Montevideo, and subsequently to this port, where she arrived on the 26th of December. This vessel was bound from the said port of Malaga to Buenos Ayres under a stipulation that, in case, on her arrival in the river Plate, that port should be found still to be blockaded, she was to proceed to Montevideo.

The American brig Matilda, of New York, Marshal master, bound from that port to Montevideo, was captured on the 22d of November last by the blockading squadron, in the river Plate, and, after having had her crew taken out, as in all the former cases, in violation of the immunity of the American flag, was sent to this port, where she arrived on the 26th ultimo.

A copy of the protests of the masters of these two vessels will be found enclosed, by which his excellency will perceive that neither of them had received the previous warning requisite by the laws of nations to establish the validity of a capture for a breach of blockade. The undersigned, therefore, cannot doubt but that his Imperial Majesty's Government will speedily adopt, in relation to these cases, those just and equitable measures which are so confidently expected by the Government of the United States.

The undersigned is aware of a difficulty which may possibly appear to his excellency to stand in the way of a prompt decision in regard to these measures. It is the opinion of some that, in matters pending before the judicial tribunals of the country, the Executive Department has no power to interfere. This idea, founded, no doubt, upon the article of the constitution which establishes the independence of the different branches of the Government, has been suggested in correspondence with the undersigned, at different times, by several ministers of his Imperial Majesty's Government, and was once maintained, by counsel learned in the law, before the Superior Court, (Casa da Supplicao,) in the case of an attempt by judicial process to eject the undersigned from his dwelling-house. As the undersigned conceives that a right understanding of this important subject may be the means of removing the causes of dissatisfaction which now exist, and which may prevent a true and lasting harmony between Brazil and the United States, he will take the liberty of advancing his individual sentiments upon it, with the assurance that, should he not be so happy as to carry conviction to the mind of his excellency, he will listen with great deference to any arguments which he may be pleased to adduce in opposition to them.

The relation in which Governments stand towards each other is like that of individual towards individual, each, however, having a code of laws peculiar to itself. The laws which define and regulate the rights and obligations of individuals as respects each other and their Government are called municipal laws. Those which regard communities or States are called the laws of nations.

All Governments must needs regard each individual Government as one and integral, without any reference to its peculiar form. As the former have no right to interfere with the internal organization of an independent State, so, on the other hand, are they not liable to have any of their rights impaired by any changes which the latter may think proper to make in the same.

A constitution or charter introduced into a State where an arbitrary Government before existed can only alter the relations which subsist between citizen and citizen, and between these and their Government. It can have no influence beyond the jurisdiction of the municipal laws, and cannot in any degree affect the interests of foreign nations or individuals. To suppose the contrary would be to suppose that a single nation possessed the power to make laws obligatory upon all, which would be manifestly absurd.

If these positions be true, it follows that the relations between Brazil and foreign States have not been changed by the new form of Government. The obligations which she owes to other nations, and the rights which these latter possess, are the same now as they formerly were, and as they would be under an arbitrary Government. The reasoning, therefore, which is applicable to one case is applicable to the other; and the mere fact of the division of the political powers into a number of independent branches can only be regarded as a measure of internal arrangement for internal convenience. It is, therefore, only necessary to see how the case stands with nations which have no division of the political powers in order to form a correct judgment in relation to the matter under investigation.

Governments can only come into contact by the instrumentality of their citizens; and, as these have not the right or the power, individually, to redress themselves for injuries inflicted by foreign Governments, they must appeal for satisfaction to the sovereign authority of their respective nations. Governments are responsible for the conduct of those who act under their authority. Qui facit per alium, facit per se, is as true of States as it is of individuals, and hence arises the chief necessity of diplomatic missions and correspondence. Now, without any absolute division of the political powers, there must of necessity be, in every Government, of whatever form it be, a distribution of employments. There must be a department for the promulgation of laws, one to judge of and punish their violation, and one to superintend the affairs, foreign and domestic, of the nation. By this distribution, the external relations of a Government are always placed in the hands of the Executive Department, which is thereby invested, in whole or in part, with a species of legislative power such as is exercised in the making of treaties. With this branch of a Government is it, through the Minister of Foreign Affairs, that foreign States negotiate and correspond, and to which alone they address all their complaints for injuries inflicted upon their citizens. With other branches of the Government foreign nations have no concern. They are not bound to apply for the redress of wrongs to the legislative department or to the judicial; and if their just demands be not complied with, if their appeals to the laws of nations in a just cause be not regarded by the Executive to which they are addressed, an appeal to the ultima ratio, as well of people as of Kings, becomes their political right. To suppose that the Executive power would not be competent to interfere in a case pending before the judiciary, when upon such interference might depend the salvation of the State, would be to suppose the existence of a Government so badly constituted as not to possess even the very elements of a self-preserving principle.

It is true, however, that a regard for the convenience of each other, and a belief that justice will be best administered by the Sovereign through the instrumentality of tribunals before which facts may be minutely investigated, have caused amongst nations a general acquiescence in the ordinary process of courts of admiralty. This acquiescence, however, is not founded on any supposition that such courts are independent of the executive power. They are too well known to be the mere organ of that power, and the channel by which it declares its sentiments and its policy towards other States. In Great Britain these courts are bound to execute the King's orders in Council, whilst in other States of Europe the simple mandate of the Sovereign constitutes the law.

It is true that in ordinary cases involving simply questions of fact, a direct interference of the Executive may not be necessary. Foreign Governments are not disposed to complain, except where principles sanctioned by the use of nations are violated, or where justice is too tardily rendered, as often happens with Governments which are not actuated by a true spirit of equity, or which calculate upon the weakness or forbearance of the injured party.

If these arguments be sound, it is evident that in Brazil the Executive Department has the power to interfere in matters relating to foreign nations or their citizens which are pending before her courts. Indeed, the right of a direct interference with the judicial branch of the Government has already been recognized by his excellency in the case of the ejectment above referred to, wherein, as Minister of Foreign Affairs, he issued an official order for the discontinuance of the suit and the suppression of all judicial proceedings.

But, independent of this right to interfere, it is, in all cases, the duty of the Executive in every country to see that justice be administered to foreigners without unreasonable delay. The damages and expenses which accrue to ships and cargoes must always be multiplied by detention; and these, if the vessel be condemned, add to the original loss of the captured, and if acquitted, to the amount for which the captors and their Government are liable. The cases of the American ship Spermo and brig Exchange present calamitous examples of the march of justice in this Empire. They have both been pending more than two years, during the whole of which time the owners have been obliged to maintain special agents in this country, whose unwearied exertions to procure redress by the ordinary process of law have, to this day, been unavailing; whilst they have incurred a mass of expenses which can never be refunded by the decisions which must ultimately be given in their favor.

The undersigned, in former communications addressed to the Government of his Imperial Majesty, has endeavored to explain the rules established by the laws of nations respecting blockades, and has remonstrated against their violation in regard to American vessels.

In this communication he has undertaken, and he trusts with success, to show that the interference of the Government in those cases is not only a right, but a duty; and in urging his arguments he appeals not only to the justice of Brazil, but to her feelings as an American Power equally interested with the other States of this hemisphere in the preservation of the true principles of public law. He therefore cannot but be persuaded that the claims of the United States will be listened to in a spirit of equity as well as of conciliation, and that the cases of the American vessels now under detention will meet with the early and favorable decision to which they are entitled.

The undersigned offers to his excellency, upon this occasion, the renewed assurances of his esteem and consideration.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, January 18, 1827.

Having found among the papers which I received from my predecessor, the Marquis d'Inhambupe, Counsellor of State, the minute of a reply which he intended to make to the note which you addressed to him on the 3d instant, I deem it my duty to send you this reply, merely signed by me, as the reasons contained in it appear to me conclusive.

I have the honor on this occasion, &c.

THE MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

C

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, January 18, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in returning his sincere thanks to Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, for the expressions of esteem with which he honored him in his note of the 3d instant, and reciprocating them with assurances which his distinguished qualities deserve, has to inform him that in his official letter of the 10th of December last he believed that he had explicitly answered his questions in the most important particulars. For, as these inquiries related to the subject of captures made of Anglo-American vessels in the Rio de la Plata, and to the system which was to be pursued during the continuation of the blockade of the port of Buenos Ayres, he was persuaded that the Imperial Government had satisfactorily declared its intentions to all parties; and these being founded on principles of justice nothing remained which required a new explanation. However, the undersigned has now the honor to inform Mr. Condy Raguet that, when the orders were sent to the vice admiral who commanded the Brazilian naval forces in the river Plate when the blockade was decreed, he was instructed in very general terms as to the conduct which he was to pursue towards the ships of neutral and friendly nations. But, as these orders might be understood and executed by the intelligent admiral who now commands the said forces according to the doctrines which he entertains, his Majesty the Emperor, his august master, thought it proper to order that the necessary explanation should be sent to him through the Department of Marine. Accordingly, the order of the 29th of November of last year was sent to him, in which was established the rule that he was to adhere to in future with regard to neutral and friendly vessels, and which restricted him to the case of an attempt to violate the blockade and that of being detected with contraband goods, which rule is indisputably conformable to the maritime law of nations. It was provided, however, that vessels entering the La Plata with passports for Buenos Ayres, at a time when no official notice was given that the blockade was raised, (as it was usual to give such on raising the blockade,) should not proceed to the place of their destination without presenting themselves before some of the blockading ships for inspection, and to receive warning not to enter the said port under penalty of the confiscation of ship and cargo; or else touching at Montevideo to ascertain whether the blockade was effective, as it was; and also that, before entering the river La Plata, they should seek information as to that fact either in a port of the Empire or in some other. It is in this sense that the letter of the undersigned, of the 10th December last, must be understood when he says that merchant vessels must proceed to the nearest neutral ports in order to receive the necessary instructions; for the term neutral in that case relates to all these ports, including those of the belligerent States which should not be blockaded, for example those on the coast of Brazil, from Oyapok to the La Plata; and especially those from this capital to Montevideo, (Maldonado excepted,) as being the nearest. Any other construction of the term involves an absurdity which the most ignorant in geography could not be guilty of; and, therefore, there is no necessity for any exertions on the part of Mr. Condy Raguet to prove the inadmissibility of that proposition.

Thus the Imperial Government, proceeding on the basis of natural equity and a desire to render the system of blockade less hurtful to the commerce of neutral Powers, (for a continuance of the war demands a continuance of the blockade,) has established that rule as a proof of the regard which it entertains for friendly nations, and in order to avoid ulterior discussions; but, nevertheless, it is not, therefore, perpetually bound to refrain from taking such measures as circumstances may require. For its measures are either conformable to the general principles of the laws of nations and of the universal public, and such as any nation may freely adopt; or they are the result of conventional public law, established by especial stipulations which bind only the contracting parties. The system of one nation, or that of many nations, established by agreement between themselves, cannot destroy the general principles of natural law, nor be obligatory upon other free and independent nations that are not bound thereto by their promises, and that do not depart from those principles of universal justice which are binding upon all. This is proved by the diversity of the policy of the most civilized and enlightened nations on such matters at different periods, and is evident in the history of our own times.

The undersigned, confining himself to these reflections, must repeat to Mr. Condy Raguet that, with regard to the detained vessels whose cases are pending, it is necessary to wait the result of the trials; for the Imperial Government cannot encroach upon the judicial power by taking upon itself the decision of matters which the laws and constitution of the Empire assign to that power.

The undersigned renews on this occasion the expressions, &c.

THE MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

D.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, January 18, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, acknowledges the receipt of the note which Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, addressed to his predecessor under date of yesterday, and informs Mr. Raguet that his Majesty the Emperor, his august master, being still confined, he has not for that reason been able to receive the imperial orders with respect to the contents of the said notes, and therefore cannot reply to the judicious arguments which Mr. Raguet adduces in support of his claims.

In the meantime the undersigned deems himself empowered to suggest to Mr. Raguet that it appears most prudent to await the decision of the competent tribunal before which the trials of the vessels to which Mr. Raguet alludes have commenced; inasmuch as it is to be expected that the judges will proceed in the affair with brevity and according to the rules of equity and universal justice; and especially as his Majesty the Emperor, animated with sincere desires to preserve harmony and friendship with friendly Powers and allies, particularly with the United States of America, which deserve every consideration from him, will cause definite instructions to be issued (of which Mr. Raguet will be advised) tending to diminish very much for the future the rigor of the blockade of the river La Plata. Mr. Raguet, who has manifested so much acquaintance with the law of nations, cannot fail to acknowledge that this act of the Emperor must be viewed rather as a matter of pure condescendence on his part than one of strict obligation, considering the diversified policy which civilized nations have pursued on such occasions.

The undersigned offers, &c.

THE MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

E.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, January 24, 1827.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his respects to the Marquis of Queluz, Counsellor of State, and tenders to his excellency, upon his recent appointment as Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the compliments which he should have offered in person had he found his excellency at home when he had the honor to call upon him on the 19th instant.

During a residence near this Court since the 8th of September, 1822, the day succeeding that upon which his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, now his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, identified himself with the interests of America by proclaiming the independence of this his Empire, it has been the painful lot of the undersigned to appear on too many occasions before the Government of his Imperial Majesty in the character of a complainant for injuries inflicted upon the seamen or the commerce of the United States by officers acting under the authority of that Government, but who have not been influenced by that spirit of amity towards the American nation which has been so uniformly professed by his Imperial Majesty's ministers. Each change of administration, therefore, has been regarded by the undersigned as an event which, by some decided and peremptory orders of the Government, would put an end to the causes which had occasioned such reiterated complaints, and which would consequently exempt him from those duties belonging to a diplomatic station which can never be executed but with regret. Thus far, however, he has been disappointed. Within the last six months occasions for complaint have been multiplied. A number of American vessels have been captured by the blockading squadron in the river Plate, upon grounds even deemed by his Imperial Majesty's Government to be untenable; whilst their crews have been forcibly taken out and turned on shore, or have been detained as prisoners of war on board the capturing vessels. Against these unlawful captures the undersigned has remonstrated, but he has remonstrated in vain. It is true that an assurance was given by his excellency the Marquis of Inhambupe, in his note of 10th December, that measures had been taken to prevent for the future captures similar to those which had been represented against; yet none was given that the vessels taken in opposition to the principles assumed in the new instructions would be given up. On the contrary, they have all been held under continued detention, whilst their crews have been scattered abroad, or have been maintained at great expense on shore after their liberation from confinement.

In this state of things, the undersigned could not but hail the nomination of the Marquis of Queluz to the Foreign Department as ominous of a change of measures; nor has he, in this pleasing anticipation, been mistaken. The three notes of his excellency, dated on the 18th instant, evince that spirit of conciliation towards the United States which the latter are so desirous to cultivate; and the undersigned now reposes in the confidence that the future relations between his Government and that of Brazil will be such as cannot fail to result from a rigid observance, by both parties, of those "rules of equity and universal justice" which are declared to actuate the Government of his Imperial Majesty, and which should ever be adhered to by the rulers of nations.

With these preliminary and general remarks, the undersigned begs leave to call the attention of his excellency to a decision that took place before the Superior Court (Conselho Supremo Militar) on the 10th instant, but of which he was not apprised until after the date of his last communication. This decision was in the case of the American ship Spermo, of New York, Clarke master, charged with an alleged breach of the blockade of Pernambuco, in 1824; and as it involves an important question connected with the doctrine of blockades, already sufficiently discussed by the undersigned in his correspondence with the two immediate predecessors of his excellency, in notes dated on 13th December, 1825, 14th and 30th November, 1826, and 3d current, it is deemed advisable to state the whole case anew, in order that it may be submitted to his Imperial Majesty for his sovereign and definitive judgment. Fortunately, the case is one which is not dependent upon facts asserted by one party and denied by the other. The material circumstances are admitted by both, and some of them will be within the recollection of his excellency, as having occurred at the time when he so ably discharged the important functions of Minister of the Home Department. They are as follows:

1. The Government of his Imperial Majesty, under date of 29th February, 1824, communicated to the agents of foreign Governments residing at this Court its intention "to place in a state of effective blockade," by a naval force ordered to be fitted out and to sail as soon as possible to the port of Pernambuco, in case the factions, who then governed the affairs of that Province, should not acquiesce in the orders of the Emperor.

2. In conformity with that intention, a squadron, under the command of Commodore John Taylor, sailed from this port on the 3d of March, and on the 8th of April following instituted a blockade, of which notice was given by him to the foreign consuls on shore. The fact was subsequently, viz: on the 23d of April, communicated by his Imperial Majesty's Government to the foreign agents, as a blockade established according to the law of nations.

3. On the 11th of June succeeding, was published, in the Diario Fluminense, the celebrated and politic proclamation addressed by his Imperial Majesty to the people of Pernambuco, in which is announced his Majesty's intention to withdraw the naval forces from before their port; and, in pursuance of instructions received from his Government, in accordance with the declaration thus made, Commodore Taylor raised the blockade on the 29th of that month, gave official notice of the same to the foreign consuls, and returned with his ships to the port of Rio de Janeiro.

4. Under date of July 9 the Imperial Government announced its intention to renew the blockade, in a note addressed to the foreign agents, of which the following is a copy.

5. In accordance with this new intention, a second squadron, under the command of Captain Antonio Joze de Carvalho, was expedited on the 12th of July for Pernambuco, off which port he arrived somewhere about the 1st of August.

6. On the 13th of August a communication, dated on the 12th, was made by the said Captain Carvalho to the consul of his Britannic Majesty at Pernambuco, declaring the port to be in a state of blockade. None such was made by him to the American consul; and it does not appear in the documents of the suit (autos) that any notification had been given to the public, or to any other individual or authority, prior to the 17th of that month.

7. On the 18th of August Admiral Cochrane arrived off Pernambuco, and, on the 17th of September, a termination was put to the blockade by the surrender of the place to the imperial authority.

Thus far the facts are within the entire knowledge of his Imperial Majesty's Government. Those which remain to be told are established by the evidence given on the trial, and are as follows:

8. The ship Spermo, laden with a cargo of flour and other merchandise not contraband of war, sailed from the port of New York in the month of June, 1824, bound for Pernambuco.

9. On the 10th of August, at half-past one o'clock p. m., she arrived and anchored off that port, in the outer roads, at a distance of about two miles from the light-house, and one mile from a ship and brig-of-war bearing the imperial flag. This date, as established by all the testimony of the captors, differs from that given by the master of the Spermo, who, using in his protest the nautical time instead of the civil time, declared it to be the 11th of the month, inasmuch as, by the computation of mariners, the 11th of the month commences at noon of the 10th.

10. After lying at anchor, without receiving any visit from the said vessels of war, or having any communication with them, until 7 o'clock of the following morning, the master of the Spermo, conceiving his ship to be in great peril from a gale of wind which had been blowing ever since he came to anchor, and during which time he had parted his best bower cable, hoisted a signal of distress. This signal was not regarded by the ships-of-war, nor by any person on shore, until one o'clock p. m., when a pilot came to his assistance, who, seeing the vessel in danger of being lost, and finding it impossible to weigh the only remaining anchor, ordered the cable to be cut at two p. m., and steered the ship into the harbor, where she was made fast to another vessel, and by that means prevented from going ashore. It is true that she was fired at by one of the vessels of war, but the master did not deem it incumbent on him to heave to in his actual condition.

After the fall of Pernambuco, and the entrance into the harbor of the imperial naval forces, then under the command of the chief of division, David Jewett, Captain Carvalho instituted before the Juiz de Ford a process against the said ship Spermo for a breach of blockade, and the facts of the case were represented by the undersigned to his Imperial Majesty's Government, as soon as he became fully possessed of them, in a note dated on the 3d of March, 1825, but without securing the redress which was so manifestly due. In a subsequent communication, dated on the 19th of December of that same year, the delay of the suit was remonstrated against, and a fresh appeal for the interference of his Imperial Majesty's Government was urged; but it was productive of no other result than that the judge at Pernambuco, to whom the case had been remanded by the Conselho Supremo Militar, in consequence of a defect in his original decision, should be recommended to act with promptness. The note last cited, to which his excellency is respectfully referred, contains the history of the suit up to the period of its date, and it remains now to relate its subsequent progress.

After the lapse of some additional months, a decision took place at Pernambuco, on the 11th of April, 1826, before the imperial tribunal, by which the ship was declared to be bad prize, and the captors were condemned to pay all the costs, damages, and losses. This decision, which is as honorable to the intelligence of the judge who pronounced it as it is to his integrity, and which displayed not only a sound and clear knowledge of the law of nations, but a spirit of equity and justice, is expressed in the following terms:

[Translation.]

Having seen, therefore, the allegations made, and proofs adduced, on both sides, and it appearing from the documents, p. 27 and following, that it was on the 17th of August that the blockade was formally declared, so that it cannot be said to have existed before that day; considering, also, the testimony adduced by the captor, and the extreme necessity in which the captured found himself, and which, according to sound justice, would have justified a violation of the blockade, if any had existed; that such violation was involuntary, and remains free from any imputation, I adjudge the justification to be sufficient and the capture illegal, and condemn the captor to pay costs, damages, and losses; and I appeal to the honorable tribunal of Supreme Military Council, where these proceedings shall be sent, and the parties cited to appear. Recife, April 11, 1826.

LUIS ANGELO VICTORIO DE NASCIMENTO CRESPO.

From this just and righteous sentence the captors, whose whole fortune and prospects were thereby involved, made an appeal. The papers were transmitted to the Conselho Supremo at Rio de Janeiro, and that learned tribunal, after deliberating for six additional months, solemnly reversed the decision of the inferior court, condemned the ship and cargo, and sentenced the claimants to the payment of the costs.

The undersigned has not yet been able to procure a copy of this sentence, and, consequently, in submitting this statement to the Government of his Imperial Majesty, will not suffer himself to indulge in any of the numerous reflections which such a decision is obviously calculated to call forth. He will merely say that such an extraordinary judgment, pronounced by the Supreme Court of Admiralty of the Empire of Brazil, was wholly unexpected by him; and that he entertains not the least doubt but that his Imperial Majesty will immediately order the same to be set aside, and the original sentence of the court below to be affirmed.

The undersigned offers, upon this occasion of first addressing his excellency the Marquis of Queluz, the assurance of his great respect and high consideration.

CONDY RAGUET.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, January 25, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, acknowledges the receipt of the note addressed to him, under date of yesterday, by Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, and thankful for the expressions of respect which it conveys, the undersigned feels gratified to see that Mr. Raguet does him justice in being persuaded of the wishes attributed to him of endeavoring, on his part, to put an end to the unpleasant altercations which have formed the subject of his last correspondence.

The undersigned, confiding in the disposition of his Majesty the Emperor to draw closer, every day, the bonds of friendship happily subsisting between Brazil and the United States of America, whom my august master considers as his natural allies, thinks it his duty frankly to declare to Mr. Condy Raguet his opinion that the Executive Government can, and ought, without violating the constitution of the Empire, to give such directions to the competent tribunals, in matters of prizes, as will prevent misunderstandings, as to their decisions, from becoming, on the part of friendly nations, the causes of discontent, which might produce deplorable consequences.

Acting upon this principle, the undersigned has been engaged, during the short space of time which has elapsed since his appointment to the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs, in collecting information respecting the various cases of detention of neutral vessels, in order that, possessed of a full knowledge of each case, deliberations may be had, which, it is hoped, will lead to a favorable result, and put an end to all causes of complaint in this respect.

With regard to the case of the American ship Spermo, as it is necessary to compare the sentence of the Supreme Military Council, complained of by Mr. Raguet, with that of the tribunal of inferior jurisdiction at Pernambuco, the undersigned will, without delay, call for a copy of the sentence of the Supreme Military Council, in order to give a suitable answer to his note.

The undersigned renews to Mr. Raguet the expression of his respect and esteem.

MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated Rio de Janeiro, March 12, 1827.

SIR: It now becomes my painful duty to announce to you that one of the most deliberate and high-handed insults against our flag and national honor has recently been committed by the express orders of this Government. After reading the contents of my last letter of the 7th ultimo, (per the Ruth and Fancy,) wherein I advised you of the strong professions of friendship towards the United States, on the part of his Imperial Majesty, which had been gratuitously advanced to me by his Minister of Foreign Affairs, you can hardly be made to believe in the existence of so much bad faith and unjustifiable deportment as has been exhibited in the transaction to which I allude. The circumstances are as follows:

The brig Spark, of New York, formerly a ship-of-war in the service of the United States, Clark master, early in this month cleared out for Montevideo, a port, as you know, in subjection to the Brazilian authority, being armed with four guns, the number expressed on her clearance, and having on board twelve or thirteen passengers, of whom five were females. On getting under way on the morning of the 4th instant, she received from the officers of the port the usual visit to which foreign ships are subject, and after the customary examination, she was permitted to pass out of the harbor as a merchant vessel of a friendly nation. During her stay in port she had increased the number of the crew to twenty-eight persons, in consequence of having found, on her outward passage, that she had not hands enough to navigate a vessel of her heavy tonnage and spars; a fact of which I have been assured by Colonel Palacio, the Colombian minister, who came passenger in her.

On reaching the ocean, at the distance of several miles from the land, her commander saw a steamboat ahead, which had gone out of the harbor an hour or two before him, waiting for his approach, as if desirous to speak him After coming within a short distance Captain Clark discovered that her decks were covered with armed men, and that a gun mounted on board was kept pointed towards his vessel. On arriving within hail Captain Clark was ordered to let go his anchor, and to proceed with his papers to the steamboat. With both of these orders he promptly complied, and on meeting her commander was informed by him that he had orders from his Government to detain the Spark by force; indeed, this was evident from the hostile attitude of the men on board the steamboat, who were armed with pistols and swords, as if prepared to board and carry an enemy. Upon this information, and upon the exhibition to him of a document signed by the Marquis of Massaio, Minister of Marine, which was declared to be the authority under which the steamboat had been despatched, Captain Clark ordered the American color to be struck, and surrendered his vessel as a prize, without the slightest resistance. Seventeen Brazilian seamen, a number of marines and officers, were then placed on board the Spark, whilst the American crew, who very properly and firmly refused to assist in weighing the anchor, or to perform any other duty under the Brazilian prize officers, were nearly all transferred to the steamboat as prisoners, where several of them were stowed so near the boiler that they nearly fainted.

An attempt was then made by the Brazilians, who were equal in number to the crew of the Spark, to raise the anchor, but after an unsuccessful struggle of near two hours, during which time they could not move it, they were ordered to cut the cable. This command was executed, and without the precaution of attaching a buoy, so that a loss was at once sustained of about $1,200, independent of $100 damage otherwise done by unskilful management. After this proceeding, the Spark was got under sail by the captors, and at 4 p. m. anchored in the harbor, under the guns of the imperial ship-of-the-line Pedro Primeiro. The steamboat was saluted as she approached that ship with the vivas and the shouts due to the victorious, and immediately afterwards the American prisoners were transferred to the man-of-war. After night an order came from the admiral of the port to send on board the flag-ship the residue of the crew of the Spark, including the cook and steward, which obliged Captain Clark to prepare the supper for his passengers with his own hands.

On the morning of the 5th, as if alarmed at the atrocity of these proceedings, the authorities withdrew from the Spark the whole of the prize crew, and sent back all the American crew with the exception of two men, who were retained in irons. The admiral, however, having subsequently received fresh instructions from the Government, took possession of the vessel again in the evening, by stationing on board of her ten marines and an officer, who forced the crew of the Spark to go below, where twenty of them were kept crowded in a space so small and confined that the actual fear of their suffocation, so great was the heat of the weather, afterwards obliged them to permit half of them to sleep on deck.

On the 6th instant, at 11 a. m., several officers went on board the Spark and, in the absence of the captain, proceeded to search and overhaul her. They commenced in the cabin, by turning the lady passengers out of their berths, and ripping and breaking up the berths, which were permanent fixtures.

An eager search was made through every part of the cabin. They then commenced in the ward-room, and entered the run by ripping up the deck. They broke the lock of the captain's chest, and overhauled everything in it. They proceeded to break the magazine lock, and overhauled four barrels of powder which were there; and finally went away, leaving the same guard that had been placed on board the preceding evening.

On the 7th two launches were brought alongside the Spark for the purpose of discharging her; but the wind not permitting it, they departed. In the course of the day several passengers went on shore in consequence of ill-treatment from the prize officer. In the afternoon an anchor less than half the weight of the one which had been lost was brought alongside, and a number of seamen were sent on board to shift the position of the vessel.

The captors, during this day, continued their search, overhauling everything, and putting everything in confusion, as it is expressed in the log-book. They had free access to the stores of the brig; and when a soldier was complained of as having been detected in stealing bread, his officer said it was too small a matter to take notice of.

On the 8th, early in the morning, two Brazilian launches came alongside the Spark, with officers and men, who got her under way, and anchored her in the inner harbor, near the island of Cobras. Here they began to discharge her by emptying some of the casks of fresh water among the ballast, and hoisting the empty casks on deck. They took all the firewood up out of the hold, and hoisted up the few bales of goods which were on freight. They shifted the ballast from stem to stern, and examined the very skin of the vessel. At length, not being able to find anything on board, except what appeared on ship's documents, the searching party withdrew at half past 3 p. m., leaving the brig in the possession of a midshipman, eight seamen, and six marines, and everything in the utmost confusion, sails half furled, cables full of grinds, and the wood, ballast, stores, &c., in the hold, hove promiscuously together. Since then no further search has been made, but the vessel still continues in possession of the captors.

From the foregoing details you will readily perceive that the whole of this transaction, from the beginning to the end, resembled more the ransacking of a vessel by a band of freebooters than the discharge of a civil duty within the jurisdiction of laws. At one time, as many as fifty or sixty Brazilians were on board. But the outrage against our national honor was not limited to these occurrences. To give a coloring to an act of hostility deliberately resolved upon by the Government, no doubt, many days beforehand, in the midst of solemn professions of amity for the United States, it was necessary to affect suspicions, which, had they really existed, could have been at once removed by the demanding of bonds or a reference to me. It was necessary, I say, for the Government to pretend a belief that the Spark had on board a Buenos Ayrean commission, a conjecture wholly discountenanced by the circumstance of her being freighted by women and children. The ministers had no such suspicion; but they had a suspicion that, as the Spark was for sale, having been first offered to them, she might be purchased at Montevideo by some agent of the Buenos Ayrean Government, and fitted out to cruise against Brazil. The officers of the steamboat who captured the Spark indiscreetly suffered this secret of state to escape them in the presence of American hearers; and, in my own mind, there is not a shadow of doubt but that the whole of this disorderly proceeding was to break up the voyage of the Spark. So certain was the officer above referred to of the adequateness of the means to accomplish this end that he actually offered for sale his share of the prize money.

Let us now examine these means and see how far they were such as become a civilized nation towards a Power recently declared to be regarded by the Emperor as his "natural ally." The vessel is within the jurisdiction of the civil authorities. She is notoriously destined for Montevideo, whither she offered to carry freight and passengers. She is allowed to clear out at the custom-house. No suspicions are there intimated to the captain. He is permitted to pass four or five forts on his way to the ocean, by either of which he could be stopped, and from one of which he must needs be boarded. He receives his visit as having his clearance and papers in regular order; and after passing out of the harbor, under the same good faith with which he entered it, he is made a prize of, and ignominiously brought back, not by a force sent in pursuit of him in consequence of information obtained after his departure, but by a vessel mysteriously fitted out and manned at midnight, and sent to sea before him, passing within hail of the very forts above referred to.

But even this is not all. To give eclat to this exploit, thus planned for no other purpose but to give lustre to the Brazilian arms and to stain the honor of our Republic, the insinuation is industriously circulated that the Spark is a piratical vessel. The crew of the steamboat, picked men from the line-of-battle ship, were harrangued and told that they were going in pursuit of a pirate; when the crew of the Spark were transferred as prisoners to that ship, they were told that they were pirates; the admiral of the port pronounced, in the presence of a number of persons, that an American pirate had been taken; and, finally, on shore, the respectable American merchants to whom the Spark had been consigned were charged, by common rumor, with being concerned in the fitting out of a pirate.

Such imputations against their countrymen and such atrocious conduct against their country's honor were calculated to arouse the indignation of all the American citizens on the spot. They felt as if their nation was degraded, and as if the star-spangled banner, so much boasted of at home, was no longer able to shield from insult and dishonor those who trust to its fancied protection. They looked at me, as their representative, to demand reparation. But what could I accomplish? I had been for years a witness of a series of the most unexampled wrongs, aggressions, and insults, inflicted by their Government and its authorities, upon the seamen, the commerce, and the honor of the United States. I had, against all these outrages, exerted, to the utmost, the feeble talents which Heaven has been pleased to intrust to my care, and all the little zeal which belongs to my temperament in complaints and remonstrances, but with what unhappy effect the records of your Department will show. In not a single instance that I can call to mind was redress ever afforded. The offence of impressing, of imprisoning, and of degrading an American citizen, was considered as amply atoned for by his mere restoration to liberty. Ships and cargoes have been unlawfully detained for months, and in one case nearly years; and have been either condemned by the corrupt decision of a court, or have been released without the allowance of a dollar for the damage sustained by the party acknowledged to be injured. In case of the ship Spermo, no promise, even of redress, has been afforded against the iniquitous decision pronounced against her on the 10th of January; but, on the contrary, a denial of reparation was indirectly proclaimed on the 2d instant, by the equally unjust condemnation of the English brig Rob Roy, detained at the same time and under circumstances precisely similar. For the detention of the brig Exchange, in the year 1824, pronounced by a Brazilian court to have been illegal, not a cent has been recovered, although the claimants have prosecuted a suit for more than two years by a special agent maintained on the spot. For the brutal deeds which accompanied the capture of the brig Ruth, the treatment of whose master, supercargo, and crew, has been unparalleled, except in the instance already communicated to you, wherein a Brazilian commander cut off the ear of one of his prisoners, and was afterwards promoted for the act, not the shadow of reparation has been afforded. After six months' detention, and suffering damages estimated at $20,000, she is merely allowed to depart free from confiscation; and, from recent decisions in other neutral cases, it is manifest to me that no indemnity for any of the spoliations committed against our citizens and commerce is intended to be allowed.

To remain longer a spectator of these multiplying wrongs was impossible. To make any appeals, in addition to those which had hitherto exhausted my slender stock of arguments, was only wasting time and permitting the honor of the country which I represent to be frittered away by degrees. I saw but one course to pursue, but I was resolved not hastily to adopt it. On the morning of the 5th, having heard of the return of the Spark, and supposing that she had been brought back in consequence of intelligence received subsequent to her departure, I wrote a short note to the minister, politely requesting that he would inform me of the grounds of her detention. To this note I received, at noon of the 7th, (the day after the overhauling had been commenced,) a reply, in which it was attempted to place me in the position of the party complained of, and to throw the onus probandi upon me. I was, forsooth, called upon for explanations as to the "true destination" of a vessel represented as detained by the Government on suspicion of intentions hostile to Brazil; and I was requested to weigh the mighty considerations which had led the Government to adopt this measure. In answering this note, which I regarded as an official insult, I did not long delay. I briefly stated that had I been informed, before the sailing of the Spark, of the existence of any suspicions of a destination different from that expressed in her clearance, I would cheerfully have lent my aid in causing them to be removed, but that, in the actual state of the affair, I declined giving any explanations.

On the following day another incident calculated to aggravate the insult against our flag, which had marked this transaction, was communicated to me. Mr. Wright, our consul, had demanded of the port admiral the release of the two seamen detained in irons on board the man-of-war. It had been previously reported that the ground of their detention was, that one of them, James Dwyer, an American, who has a wife and child in Philadelphia, was a deserter from the Brazilian service; and that the other, Henry Cook, was a deserter from a British frigate, neither of which allegations proved to be true. To this note an answer was returned on the 7th, in a style about as inappropriate and indecorous as that which Admiral Pinto employed at Montevideo in the case wherein he took upon himself, in the most unprovoked and insulting manner, to allude to the affair of the Chesapeake and Leopard. Mr. Wright received no satisfaction. The British seaman was sent to a British man-of-war, unasked for; whilst the American, after being kept in double irons for four days, and after having manfully resisted threats and offers to force or entice him into the Brazilian service, was sent back to the Spark, with the painful news that about twenty American seamen, who had been fraudulently inveigled on board the Pedro Primeiro, had been transferred to the brig-of-war Canioca, which sailed on the 6th instant on a cruise.

Under the influence of all these circumstances, seeing no middle course between national dishonor and a close of my mission, I adopted the latter alternative, on the night of the 8th, by a demand for my passports. On the 9th I received a note from the minister in answer to mine of the 7th, in which he undertook to justify the proceedings of his Government in relation to the Spark. And how do you imagine this justification to have been supported? Why, by a solemn declaration that the Spark was outside of the harbor before the Minister of Marine issued orders for her being stopped! Upon such a declaration from a Minister of State it is impossible to comment. There is scarcely a Brazilian or foreigner in Rio de Janeiro, so notorious is the fact, that does not know that the steamboat sailed before the Spark; and hundreds are acquainted with the additional fact that her commander received his orders the preceding night, when the Spark was safely moored at anchor, without the possibility of escape, had such an intention been suspected. In this note not a word was said about my passports; but on the following day I received official notice that the Emperor had ordered them to be made out. I am now, accordingly, making arrangements to return to the United States, which I hope to reach in June, under the blessings of Providence, and thus terminate an absence of five years, which might have been prolonged for two additional years had my sense of duty and respect for the honor of my country enabled me to pursue any other course than the one I have adopted, or had I been capable of sacrificing public interests to private considerations.

A copy of my correspondence with the minister upon these subjects, which is all that has taken place since the date of my last communication, I will transmit you by the next opportunity.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay.

RIO DE JANEIRO, March 17, 1827.

SIR: The duplicate of my last communication of 12th instant, per Virginia, will accompany this.

I have now the honor to inform you that, having understood that my passports were ready for me at the Foreign Office, I called for them on the morning of the 14th instant, and received them in due form from the chief clerk. I look now daily for the frigate United States; and if Commodore Hull can accommodate me with a passage, I will take advantage of the opportunity afforded by his ship for returning to the United States.

In relating to you the particulars, as I did in my last, of the unjustifiable proceedings of this Government in relation to the seizure of the brig Spark, I omitted to mention some circumstances which preceded that event, and which I shall now relate.

The Spark arrived here from New York on the 27th of January, with a cargo and a number of passengers, amongst whom was a Brazilian naval officer. The object of her owners in sending her to this port was to offer her for sale to the Brazilian Government, which was understood to be in want of ships of her description. After her arrival an inventory of her armament and stores was presented to the Minister of Marine, and she was accordingly so offered. The minister, however, declined the purchase of the vessel, but expressed a desire to purchase the guns, which the captain refused to sell alone. The Spark, it seems, had on board ten guns, mounted, when she was offered for sale, whilst the number expressed in her clearance was but four; and this irregular appearance having been communicated to the Government, I suppose by the Brazilian officer above referred to, an order was sent on board of her, intimating that the extra guns must be landed before the vessel would be allowed to go to sea. On the 18th of February Captain Clark called on me to take my opinion on this subject, which was looked upon at the time as a mere manœuvre to compel a sale of his guns to the Government, and gave me the first information which I possessed of the fact relating to his armament, declaring, at the same time, that he had told the Collector at New York, when he cleared out, that he had additional guns in the hold of his vessel. Although I knew he must have given bonds at home for double the amount of his vessel and cargo that his guns should not be employed during his voyage against any nation with which the United States were in amity, yet I thought that, as an irregularity had been committed in his clearance, and as he might be liable to detention by either belligerent on suspicion of conveying contraband articles, I recommended him to land his guns, and told him that I should report his case to your Department. With this recommendation he promptly complied; and after continuing in port, without the occurrence of any new suggestions from the Government, until the 4th of March, he attempted to proceed in his voyage to Montevideo, where, I presume, he intended to offer his vessel for sale, in the exercise of one of the legitimate rights of a neutral, of which it is not in the power of a belligerent to deprive him. With the subsequent detention of his vessel you have already been advised.

It is now very manifest that the Brazilian authorities seem resolved to interfere with our municipal regulations, and to make for us navigation laws suited to their own purposes, by declaring how many guns and men an American vessel shall carry. The Minister of Marine notified, on the 15th instant, the consignees of the Spark, Messrs. J. Brickhead & Co., that she should not leave the port with more men than she brought, although there are many American seamen here desirous to depart, nor without giving bonds conditioned that she should not be sold to the enemy. With these provisions the captain, who is a stranger in the country, could not comply; and, as he foresaw nothing but ruin in an endless delay at this expensive port, with a large crew upon wages, he resolved to abandon his vessel and leave her in the entire possession of the Government, which he did last evening. Hitherto there has never been a question respecting an addition to the crew of a neutral merchant vessel by the shipping of foreigners. This minister, however, now declares that hereafter no vessel shall take away more men than she brings; so that all the American seamen who may be discharged from vessels sold here, or from frigates built in the United States for his Brazilian Majesty, are to be deprived of the means of returning to their country, and thus compelled from necessity to enter his Majesty's service. Ships, too, which arrive short handed, as did the Spark, will not be allowed to place themselves in a seaworthy condition, and must encounter the storms of winter off Cape Horn and in the river Plate, with an incompetent crew, because the mild seas of a voyage from North America did not require so large an equipage as is requisite for a southern passage.

I have the honor to enclose herewith to you the correspondence which has recently passed between this Government and me relating to the Spark, and the demand of my passports, marked A to F, inclusive, upon which I shall trouble you at this time with no comments.

So strong and decided a measure as the one which I adopted as the ultima ratio of a people which sincerely desires to preserve the relations of peace with all the world upon honorable terms could not, as you may suppose, have been regarded by myself or others as an unimportant act. I am aware that I have taken upon myself a responsibility of no ordinary character, and am prepared to meet all the consequences, even though one of them should be my being offered up as a sacrifice at the altar of public good. What I have done I have done deliberately, and, so far from regretting the act, I should do the same thing to-morrow were I placed in the same circumstances. I shall leave Brazil at least with one consoling reflection, which is, that the honor of the nation, which it will ever be my glory to have represented, has lost nothing by this step in the estimation of my countrymen on the spot, or that of the foreigners, in public and private life, with whom it has been my happiness to associate.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

A.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, March 5, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor to state to your excellency that information was last evening communicated to me that the American brig Spark, Clark master, which left this port yesterday morning, after having been regularly cleared at the custom-house for Montevideo, and after having undergone the examination of the port officers, usual upon the departure of foreign vessels, was, in the course of the day, brought back into the harbor by an armed force sent in pursuit of her by some of the authorities of this place.

I will thank your excellency to make me acquainted with the ground of this proceeding; and have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

His Excellency the MARQUIS OF QUELUZ,
Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

B.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE, RIO DE JANEIRO, March 7, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, acknowledges the receipt of the note of Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, dated the 5th instant, in which he asks an explanation of the motive of the detention of the American brig Spark, Captain Clark.

Shortly after receiving this note, the undersigned received from the Minister of Marine a communication requesting this Department to ask from the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States explanations upon the true character of the said brig, which had been detained in strong suspicion of her being a privateer bound for Buenos Ayres, and destined to increase the number of those actually engaged in insulting the Brazilian flag and in interrupting the commerce of the Empire.

The undersigned calls the attention of Mr. Condy Raguet to the consideration of the circumstances which preceded the detention of the brig Spark, and determined the Government of his Imperial Majesty to order it. The first is, that, according to the official statement of the Minister of Marine, this brig has not exhibited the legal license for carrying a warlike armament. The second, that, without a permit to go thus armed, she sought to increase the number of her crew to nearly double what it was. This armament without license, and this unusual increase of the crew in this port, so far exceeding her proper allowance of men, and her destination for the waters of La Plata, raised strong suspicions that said brig was intended for a cruise against the commerce and navigation of the Empire.

The undersigned ardently wishes that Mr. Condy Raguet would take such measures in relation to this vessel as would cause the suspicions raised against her to be completely removed, that she may be permitted to continue her voyage.

The undersigned renews to Mr. Condy Raguet the expression of his respect and esteem.

THE MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

C.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, March 7, 1827.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, acknowledges the receipt of the note addressed to him, under date of this day, by the Marquis of Queluz, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honor, in reply to the same, briefly to state to his excellency that, had his Imperial Majesty's Government thought proper, before the sailing of the Spark, to have communicated to him its suspicions of any other destination than that expressed in her clearance at the custom-house, would most cheerfully have lent his aid in causing those suspicions to be removed. In the present state of the affair, however, he declines giving any explanations; and has the honor to subscribe himself, with due respect, his excellency's obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

D.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

RIO DE JANEIRO, March 8, 1827.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his compliments to the Marquis of Queluz, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honor to state to his excellency that recent occurrences induce him to withdraw from the Court of Brazil, and he therefore requests that his excellency will furnish him with the necessary passports.

The undersigned begs his excellency, upon this last occasion of addressing him, to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

CONDY RAGUET.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

PALACE, RIO DE JANEIRO, March 9, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, acknowledges the receipt of the note of Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, dated the 7th instant, in which he declares that, had the Government of his Imperial Majesty thought fit to inform him, previous to the sailing of the brig Spark, of the suspicions raised against her, he would, with great pleasure, have used his endeavors to remove those suspicions; but that, in the present state of things, he declines giving any explanations.

The undersigned, perfectly aware of the desire of the Government of his Imperial Majesty to maintain without interruption the friendly relations subsisting between the two countries, and to avoid all causes of the slightest displeasure, deems it his duty to enter into a frank exposition of the facts, with the certainty that he will convince Mr. Condy Raguet of the correctness with which the Minister of Marine has acted in this affair; and, at least, to persuade him that it never was his intention to interrupt, in the slightest degree, the harmony subsisting between this Government and that of the United States.

On the arrival in this port of the brig Spark, carrying a warlike armament, it became essentially the duty of the Minister of Marine to inquire into the character of this merchant vessel. This admits of no doubt. On its being ascertained that this brig was unprovided with legal papers, it was signified to her that she could not, armed in this manner, leave the port for a southern destination; and the captain, acknowledging the justice of this determination, agreed to leave on shore his guns, only on retaining his other warlike stores. The Minister of Marine, satisfied with these dispositions, thought fit to end here his agency without the necessity of Mr. Condy Raguet's intervention. Subsequently, however, the captain of the brig increased his crew to double the number of men allowed for her complement, since, having arrived with fourteen men, the vessel sailed with twenty-seven; and, which is more, the approbation of the American consul, and carrying, for all cargo, goods to the amount in value of eighty milreas only. Of this fact the Minister of Marine was not apprised until she had crossed the bar. In this conjuncture what could the minister do but to order the detention of this vessel, whose commander had, by his misconduct, excited so strong suspicions of hostile intentions against the commerce of this Empire? After the seizure of the vessel, the Minister of Marine, still animated by the pacific and friendly dispositions of the Government of his Imperial Majesty, instead of referring the matter to the tribunals, sought from Mr. Condy Raguet explanations which, without the formality of judicial proceedings, might remove the suspicions which had been entertained; and to this effect the undersigned addressed him a note which has drawn from him a negative and rude reply.

From this unreserved exposition the undersigned hopes that Mr. Condy Raguet will derive the full conviction that the Minister of Marine did not disdain his intervention, but, on the contrary, anxiously sought for it, preferring it to a judicial interference; and he now finds himself under the necessity of settling this difficulty by such means as are within his reach, and with which the Government of his Imperial Majesty must rest satisfied, since Mr. Condy Raguet cannot but see in all its acts a tendency towards the adjustment of all the differences which have arisen, and from which the best constituted Governments in the civilized world are not entirely free.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to offer to Mr. Condy Raguet the expression of his respect and esteem.

THE MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

F.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Raguet.

[Translation.]

PALACE, RIO DE JANEIRO, March 10, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has laid before the august person of his Majesty the Emperor the note dated the 8th instant, in which Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, states that recent occurrences have induced him to leave this capital of the Empire of Brazil, and requests that the necessary passports may be granted to him. The magnanimous spirit of his Majesty the Emperor could not but be surprised at this precipitate request, couched in abrupt and vague language, without any allusion to any such grave motives as usually determine ministers and diplomatic agents to withdraw from the countries to which they have been accredited. But as it does not accord with the high dignity of his Majesty the Emperor to enter into an investigation of the motives which have induced Mr. Condy Raguet to ask for his passports, and which he has kept to himself, the undersigned has been commanded by his august master to inform Mr. Condy Raguet that he has ordered those passports to be delivered to him for his departure; but that he will be answerable to his Government for the consequences which may result from this unexpected occurrence.

The undersigned seizes this opportunity to offer to Mr. Condy Raguet the expression of his respect and esteem.

THE MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

No. 6.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Raguet.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 20, 1827.

SIR: Your despatches from No. 14 to No. 19, inclusive, have been received and submitted to the President. He regrets the personal difficulties in which you have been placed in respect to the exemption to which you are entitled, in virtue of your public character, from the payment of duties on objects intended for your own consumption, and in regard to the house which you had hired for your residence.

In relation to the first subject I have nothing to add to my letter No. 5, under date the 22d day of October last. Foreign ministers accredited by this Government (including the Brazilian) are allowed the full benefit of the prevailing usage, in its most liberal extent; according to which, duties are not levied upon articles bona fide imported for the consumption of their families. The President hopes the case will not arise in which it may be necessary to consider the propriety of withholding the benefit of that usage from the foreign minister of any nation, in consequence of its not being reciprocated in behalf of our representative at such nation.

With respect to the embarrassments to which you have been exposed on account of the house which you had hired for your use, lively sympathy is felt on account of them, and if any assistance could be afforded from here to enable you to extricate yourself from them, it would be cheerfully rendered. Controversies of that description, when they unfortunately arise, must be determined, if the minister chooses to waive his privilege, by the local tribunal designated for that purpose, unless they can be otherwise arranged. Our own Constitution, you are aware, contemplates the existence of such disputes, and particularizes the tribunal to whose cognizance they are to be submitted.

From the long residence of the President abroad, he is fully sensible, from his own experience and observation, of these personal inconveniences, and justly appreciates the feelings which their occurrence naturally excites. In the general, it is best to avoid as much as possible a written correspondence with the Government where a minister is placed, on these topics. This remark, indeed, may be applied to many of the minor public duties of a minister. It is often much easier to effect an object by a personal interview and oral explanations, conducted with courtesy and kindness, than by an exchange of notes. The perusal of other parts of your despatches has occasioned the President the most lively regret. He sees that there has unfortunately arisen a state of relation between yourself and the Brazilian Government which may possibly affect the public interests committed to your charge. Our commerce and navigation have, undoubtedly, during the present war, respecting the Banda Oriental, been sometimes subject to aggravating perplexities, especially on the part of the Brazilian squadrons and cruisers. Redress for these injuries, and others of a similar character which we may experience in the future progress of the war, ought to be sought by you in a language firm and decisive, but at the same time temperate and respectful. No cause is ever benefitted by the manifestation of passion, or by the use of harsh and uncourteous language. If the remonstrances and reclamations which you have been called on during your mission to present have not always been attended with immediate success, several of them appear to have accomplished their purpose, although the measure of redress may sometimes have fallen short of just expectations. It is the fate of all maritime nations, neutral in maritime wars, to find their commerce and navigation often exposed to serious vexations. The existing Brazilian war forms no exception to their general character. But the United States do not appear to be the only injured Power; on the contrary, the commerce and navigation of England, France, and Spain have all suffered, and some of them to a greater extent than ours. War is the ultimate and last resort; and much ought to be borne before a nation, one especially whose interests generally are so obviously on the side of peace as are those of the United States, should appeal to arms. If we had declared war upon the occasion of causes of complaint of no greater amount than those which we have had against the South American belligerents, (and there is no disposition to underrate them,) the United States would have enjoyed scarcely a year of repose since the establishment of their present Constitution.

The case of the Ruth, which is described in your despatch under date of the 1st of September, was one undoubtedly deserving all your zeal, and of a nature to excite all your energies in behalf of her outraged crew. Still, the President believes that it would have been better, in the pursuit of your object, to have abstained from the use of some of the language which you employed in your interview with Mr. Lisboa, chief clerk in the Department of Foreign Affairs. No nation claiming to be civilized and Christian can patiently hear itself threatened to be characterized as an uncivilized people. It must be also recollected that one of the topics on which you animadverted (that of the personal outrage inflicted by the commander of the brig Emprehendedor on the supercargo of the Spanish vessel Escuderra) did not appertain to your official functions, but belonged to those of the representative of Spain, to whose judgment and discretion exclusively it would have been most proper to have left the conduct of it, according to his own sense of his duty.

The degree of service which a foreign minister is able to render his country depends much upon the respect and deference which he observes in his intercourse with the ministers and Government where he is accredited; and this is more especially the case in Governments constituted and administered like that of the Brazils. The President makes great allowances for the feelings which you naturally entertain as a free citizen of the United States and as a friend of liberal institutions, as well as on account of the strong character of some of those injuries sustained by our commerce and countrymen, for which it has been your official duty to demand redress. But he would have been better satisfied if you had never allowed yourself to employ, in your intercourse and correspondence with the Brazilian Government, provoking or irritating expressions. These, he thinks, ought always to be avoided. The effect produced on that Government by the character of your correspondence is noticed in your despatch No. 17; and you appear to have anticipated, as a possible consequence of it, that the Brazilian Government might decline all further intercourse with you. The President hopes that such will not be the termination of your mission; and he is desirous that you should, in future, whilst you assert with dignity, decision, and promptitude all our rights, carefully avoid giving any just dissatisfaction in the particular which it has been my painful duty to call to your attention.

With respect to the nature of instructions which may be sent to you, and of orders to the commanders of our public vessels, that must rest with the President, where the Constitution has placed it. If those instructions or orders do not correspond in all respects with your wishes or expectations, you must recollect that he is enabled, at this distance, to take a calmer view of things than you are; that we have relations with other nations besides those which exist with the Brazils; and that, even if we had not, war or threats of war ought not to be employed as instruments of redress until after the failure of every peaceful experiment. It is the more incumbent on the President to be guarded in throwing out warlike menaces, because, the Constitution having wisely confided to Congress alone the power of declaring war, it cannot be known in all cases, beforehand, that the denunciation will be certainly followed by the commencement of hostilities.

You will make to the Brazilian Government suitable acknowledgments for the accommodation afforded to our squadron in admitting, free of duties, the supplies destined for its use, imported in the Draco and Georgiana. It is believed to be according to usage to exempt from duties supplies belonging to the public imported under such circumstances, and not intended to enter into the consumption of the country, but designed for the use of public ships. You may, therefore, assure the Brazilian Government that, if hereafter any of their public vessels should be placed in our ports in an analogous condition, the like exemption from duties shall be extended to their supplies, according to what we understand to be the prevailing usage; or if, contrary to our belief, any defect of law should exist in that respect, the President will recommend to Congress to reciprocate the accommodation which has been extended to our public vessels.

A particular hardship appears to exist at Montevideo in the cognizance which is there exercised over admiralty cases. The tribunal appears to be unwilling to decide, or incapable of deciding, any question, but refers all cases to Rio. The delay, expense, and uncertainty incident to this mode of proceeding are grievous; you will remonstrate against it, and insist upon the prompt decision of all American cases that may be brought before it.

You will continue your exertions in behalf of such of our citizens as shall experience injuries in violation of the public law; and you will not fail to manifest the sensibility of this Government to any and every instance of impressment which may occur of any of our seamen.

Should the Government of Brazils decline all further intercourse with you, it is the President's wish that you should immediately return to the United States.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

CONDY RAGUET, Chargé d'Affaires to Brazil.

Mr. Raguet to Mr. Clay, dated New York, May 31, 1827.

"By the schooner Tandem, from New York, I had the honor to receive, on the 30th of March, your despatch of the 20th of January. Of that part which related to the duties on the supplies imported by the Draco and Georgiana I communicated to the Government a copy, in my note of 5th April, stating at the same time that, if it was not satisfactory, Commodore Biddle would pay the duties. I also wrote to that gentleman on the subject, advising him that the Minister of Foreign Affairs had given me no reply in relation to it."

"Up to the date of my departure from Rio no decisions had been pronounced by the Conselho Supremo in the cases of the Pioneer, Sarah George, Anders, or Matilda. In the inferior court of Montevideo the Sarah George had been condemned, as had also the schooner United States, of Baltimore, captured with a contraband cargo. No reversal of the condemnation of the Spermo had taken place, nor had the sentence in the case of the Ruth, which refused damages, been amended. The Spark was still in possession of the Brazilian Government, which had made some proposals for her purchase, which had not been accepted. The master of the Exchange was still prosecuting his claim for damages. The case of the Leonidas, (the vessel and freight,) of which the cargo had been sold as enemy's property, I believe had not been definitively decided.

"In the note of the Marquis of Queluz to me, of 9th March, it was asserted that no judicial investigation had been instituted in the case of the Spark before the date of his prior note of the 7th. It becomes my duty now to state to you that this assertion of the minister's was incorrect. The examination which was commenced on board that vessel on the 6th, and was terminated on the 8th, was conducted in person by the Auditor General of Marine, who is the Judge of the Inferior Prize Court, and his proceedings were altogether in the nature of a judicial process, precisely such a one as takes place in every prize case. Of this fact I was not aware when I wrote you the particulars."

Mr. Wright, Consul of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, to Mr. Clay.

RIO DE JANEIRO, February 2, 1828.

SIR: The last communication which I had the honor of making was under date of the 5th ultimo, via New York, per brig Chalcedonia.

This will envelope the copy of a decree lately put in force at Montevideo, exacting bonds from neutral vessels, conditioned for their not going to any Buenos Ayrean port, and copies of my correspondence with this Government upon the subject.

The operation of the decree was to extend the authority of Brazil to foreign vessels upon the high seas, which was too palpable a violation of the sovereignty of other Powers to admit of any justification. Some ambiguity, however, in the minister's reply to my first letter was the motive for addressing him the second, (understanding him to speak of the discontinuance of the bond measure as future and conditional.)

Commodore Biddle informs me, from Montevideo, under date of December 31, that the cargo of the brig Ruth has been condemned at Buenos Ayres. I have given you the circumstances of her capture in my previous communications. All the activity of the war is confined to the Buenos Ayrean privateers; their destruction of Brazilian property has been, and continues to be, immense, and neutral commerce (as per cases of Ruth, Patrick Henry, and others) is not free from their annoyance. The campaign is expected shortly to open in the south. I have received letters from Rio Grande, of the 13th December, which state that the Buenos Ayreans, in large force, were advancing upon that province.

No information of Mr. Tudor has been received here.

The Macedonian and Boston are both at Montevideo; the former expected here daily.

Most respectfully, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

W. H. D. C. WRIGHT.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, U. S. A.

Decree requiring foreign vessels to give bonds not to enter the ports of Buenos Ayres.

[Translation.]

DECREE.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, November 6, 1827.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND EXCELLENT SIR: His Majesty the Emperor, desirous of putting an end to the abuses committed by foreign vessels which, after clearing for other ports, sail for that of Buenos Ayres, which many have succeeded in entering, thereby eluding the blockade, has directed your excellency to issue the necessary orders to prevent any foreign vessel from sailing from this province, during the present war, without previously giving sufficient security not to enter the ports of that Republic, which I communicate to your excellency that you may cause the same to be carried into effect.

God preserve your excellency.

VISCOUNT DE ST. LEOPOLD.

DON THOMAS GARCIA ZUÑIGA.

A true copy.

GERMANO FRANCISCO DE OLIVEIRA.

Mr. Wright to the Marquis of Aracaty, Minister of Foreign Affairs, at Rio de Janeiro.

RIO DE JANEIRO, January 10, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: By a communication just received from Mr. Bond, acting consul of the United States of America at Montevideo, I am informed that, by a late order, foreign vessels are not permitted to depart from the ports of that province without bonds being previously given, conditioned for their not entering any of the ports of Buenos Ayres.

A similar order was given some months past, but, being immediately repealed, I supposed that the Government of his Imperial Majesty had become fully satisfied of its injustice and illegality, and felicitated myself that it would never become my duty to protest against its revival.

The right of every Government to establish laws for its own dominions is not contested; and, however oppressive and inhospitable those laws may be, foreigners who voluntarily place themselves within their sphere have no just ground for complaint. But, sir, the operation of the order in question is not confined to the domain of the enacting Power. Its effect is to extend the authority of Brazil to foreign neutral vessels upon the high seas, a right which has been seldom assumed, and never yet admitted.

The United States, scrupulously observant of the utmost good faith towards every friendly Power, will not sustain their citizens in the violation of any right of Brazil; and, on the other hand, equally tenacious of their own dignity and rights, will not permit any foreign Power to assume unjustifiable authority over their citizens or their property, by allowing it to prescribe the extent and character of their commerce with other nations, and to dictate the terms upon which they are to navigate the ocean.

"The United States, as a sovereign and independent Power, claim the right to use the ocean, which is the common and acknowledged highway of nations, for the purposes of transporting, in their own vessels, the products of their own soil, and the acquisitions of their own industry, to a market in the ports of friendly nations; and to bring home, in return, such articles as their necessities or convenience may require, always regarding the rights of belligerents as defined by the established laws of nations."

Many American vessels, bound to this port, to the United States, and elsewhere, are now detained at Montevideo. Among other cases, I will call your excellency's attention to one of peculiar hardship. The American brig Pioneer, of Salem, was captured, during the latter part of the year 1826, by his Imperial Majesty's squadron, for an alleged attempt to violate the blockade; after a detention of twelve months she was acquitted, her cargo was sold and delivered at Montevideo, and a return cargo of the produce of the country taken on board to be delivered at New York; her clearance was requested twenty-four hours before the promulgation of the order for the demand of bonds; notwithstanding which, and the fact of her cargo being the produce of the country, (which she certainly could not be suspected of intending to take to a Buenos Ayrean market,) she was refused permission to depart.

I feel, sir, that my duty imperiously commands me to protest, in the most solemn manner, against the application of this order to American vessels.

I protest against it as a system violating the sovereignty of other nations, confounding the innocent with the guilty, and obstructing the channels of lawful commerce.

Your excellency will readily conceive the difficulty which must be encountered in obtaining surety in a foreign land. The continuation of the system must give rise to the detention of many American vessels, and create large and just claims of demurrage against the Government of Brazil, which the Government of the United States will feel itself bound to sustain.

I beg your excellency to accept the assurance of my high regard and distinguished consideration.

W. H. D. C. WRIGHT.

His Excellency the MARQUIS OF ARACATY,
Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, &c.

Marquis de Aracaty to Mr. Wright.

[Translation.]

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, January 16, 1828.

The undersigned, of the Council of his Majesty the Emperor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, acknowledges the receipt of the note addressed to him on the 11th instant by Mr. W. H.

D. C. Wright, consul of the United States of America, stating that he had been informed, by intelligence received from Montevideo, that the authorities of that place had recently required the vessels of neutrals to enter into bond not to enter the ports of the United Provinces of La Plata, and protesting against this measure.

The undersigned hastens to assure Mr. Wright that the Government of his Imperial Majesty, always anxious to provide all the means of mitigating the evils accruing to friendly and neutral nations from the measures of rigor and severity which it has a right, and ought to adopt, in order that the strictness of the blockade may bring back to right reason the Republic, which impels it to this unjust war, has given the necessary orders to suspend, and never to renew, the exaction of these bonds, as soon as it has thought, in its wisdom, that the observance of the measure which forms the subject of Mr. Wright's note had ceased to be paramount to all other considerations.

The undersigned cannot do more, in replying to the above mentioned note, than repeat the orders referred to, and to seize this opportunity of renewing the assurances of his esteem.

MARQUIS DE ARACATY.

Mr. Wright to the Marquis of Aracaty, Minister of Foreign Affairs, at Rio de Janeiro.

RIO DE JANEIRO, January 22, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Your reply to my remonstrance of the 10th instant I have had the honor to receive.

Your excellency has been pleased to remark that the bond system (against which it has been my duty to protest) is a measure which the Government of his Imperial Majesty ought, and has a right, to take to strengthen the blockade, and to bring to reason the Republic which has moved so unjust a war.

The right of a belligerent Power to adopt any measures to give efficacy to its blockade is not questioned, provided those measures accord with the laws and usages of nations.

But it cannot be admitted that neutral rights are to be qualified by the justice or injustice of the war, or that any consideration of expediency on the part of the belligerent can justify their infraction.

The right to establish blockade is derived from the laws and usages of nations, and by the same authorities that right must be defined.

All the approved writers on national law concur in requiring efficient force to constitute legitimate blockade; and none have ever made the most distant allusion to a right to exact bonds for its support, or suggested any other penalty for its violation than the confiscation of the captured vessels and cargoes.

Whence, then, is authority to be adduced for this bond system? Are belligerents, at pleasure, to create decrees controlling foreign commerce on the ocean? Is their convenience the sole measure of neutral rights?

The only measures of parallel pretension within my knowledge were protested against by all neutral Powers, and being persisted in, were forcibly and effectively resisted.

I beg your excellency to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

W. H. D. C. WRIGHT, Consul U. S. A.

Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, &c.

PALACE, RIO DE JANEIRO, January 24, 1828.

I acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to me by Mr. W. H. D. C. Wright, consul of the United States of America, under date the 22d January, instant, and having examined its contents I only have to say, that having, in my note of the 16th of said month, assured Mr. Wright that the Government of his Majesty the Emperor had issued the necessary orders to suspend, and not to resume the exaction of the bonds which forms the subject of his representation, there appears to be no further reasons for a repetition of the protest made by Mr. Wright, since these bonds are no longer required, as I stated in my note above referred to.

I renew to Mr. Wright the expression of my respect and esteem.

MARQUIS DE ARACATY.

Mr. Wright to the Minister of Foreign Affairs at Rio de Janeiro.

RIO DE JANEIRO, January 25, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Fully sensible of the arduous duties appertaining to your excellency's important station, I, on every occasion, lament the necessity of adding to your labors, and should not have troubled you with a second communication upon the bond measure had I have conceived your note of the 16th as explained in that which you did me the honor to address to me on yesterday.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

No. 8.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Tudor.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 1, 1828.

SIR: From late communications received at this Department from our consul, Mr. Wright, at Rio de Janeiro, it is seen with surprise that the Brazilian Government persists in the measure of exacting from neutrals, clearing from the port of Montevideo, bonds obliging them not to enter any Buenos Ayrean port. That measure can find no justification whatever in the usage or laws of nations. Its pretext is the violation of blockade instituted by the Government of Brazils. A blockade must execute itself. The presence of the force which constitutes it is the means of its enforcement. The belligerent has no right to resort to any subsidiary means. Such a resort is a tacit submission of the incompetency of the blockading force to sustain the blockade, and, consequently, confesses its illegality. The belligerent can have no right, especially to exert any municipal authority, as the measure in question is over neutral vessels, to execute his belligerent designs. The belligerent has no more right to lay the neutral under bond to respect the rights of war than the neutral has to lay the belligerent under bond to respect the rights of neutrality. What would his Imperial Majesty think of a demand of the Government of the United States, if it could bring itself to make a demand, from all his cruisers that might resort to their ports to enter into bonds, with sureties, obliging them to abstain from all captures of American vessels?

The measure in question is attended with the greatest practical inconvenience. It must be often difficult, if not altogether impracticable, for our traders to obtain in distant and foreign ports the securities satisfactory to the local authority. We cannot submit to the measure. If it shall be in operation on the receipt of this despatch, you will remonstrate against it with an urgency proportionate to its manifest want both of principle and precedent; and, if necessary, you will notify the Brazilian Government that the commanders of our public vessels will be instructed to disregard and resist it.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

WILLIAM TUDOR, Chargé d'Affairs at Brazil.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Southard.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 19, 1828.

SIR: I have the honor to request that you will communicate to this Department copies of any correspondence which may have passed between the commanders of our squadrons on the coast of the Argentine Republic and the Brazils, with officers in the Brazilian service, relative to blockade, and of the Plate and ports of the Republic; the demand at Montevideo of bonds from neutrals not to violate the blockade; or to other belligerent operations of the Government of Brazils touching our interests. These copies are desired for the purpose of being laid before the House of Representatives.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Esq., Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Southard to Mr. Clay.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 20, 1828.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you the enclosed papers, which contain the information requested by your letter of the 19th instant.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

SAML. L. SOUTHARD.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State.

Extracts from the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy to Captain J. D. Elliott, commanding United States ship Cyane, dated November 23, 1825.

"You have been appointed to the command of the United States ship Cyane, and will make every exertion, in matters under your own control, to expedite the preparation of the vessel for sea, and will sail as soon as practicable after receiving these orders.

"The duty to be performed by you is a cruise on the eastern coast of South America, from the neighborhood of Pernambuco to Montevideo, for the protection of the commerce of the United States, which is increasing in value upon the whole of that coast. No specific directions can be given to you for the remedy of any particular evil known to be existing or which is anticipated. But your intelligence will enable you correctly to estimate, and your discretion will apply the proper remedy to such as may fall under your observation; being at all times extremely cautious, never compromitting the peace of the country, and using your force only when indispensably necessary. To acquire information and to exhibit your vessel and flag, you will touch at Pernambuco, Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, and other principal ports and harbors, and remain such time as you may judge necessary and proper. And wherever there is a consul or other public agent of the United States you will communicate with him, and receive from him such information as he may have to furnish either for yourself or the Government.

"You will be careful, on entering any harbor, or meeting a public vessel of any other nation, to manifest the accustomed civilities; as we require them to be paid to us, it becomes us to be prompt and accurate in tendering them to others. Our relations with the countries you visit are very friendly, and care must be taken to avoid everything calculated to impair or alter their present character, so far as this can be done consistently with the maintenance of our rights. In your discretion a willing confidence is reposed. You will report all your proceedings, and furnish copies of such correspondence as you may have.

"I enclose, for your information and direction, copies of the acts of Congress relating to piracy and the slave trade, together with the general instructions on those points given to the commanders of our cruising vessels. Hostilities still existing between some of the authorities on the eastern coast of South America, and the parties, respectively, being entitled to equal rights as belligerents, the utmost caution must be observed to abstain from any acts which may have a tendency to compromit our neutral character. Acts of kindness to either, though extended equally to the other, may be misconceived or misrepresented to the prejudice of the United States. You will, therefore, decline taking on board, for either party, men, money, provisions, or supplies, to be carried from such party to any port or country whatsoever."

Extract from the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore James Biddle, dated June 1, 1826.

"The war between Brazil and Buenos Ayres having rendered an augmentation of our naval force in that quarter necessary, you have been appointed to the command of the frigate Macedonian; and, as soon as that ship shall be prepared for a cruise of two years, you will hoist your broad pennant and proceed to the eastern coast of South America, and assume the command of the United States naval force on the coasts of Brazil and the La Plata.

"The squadron will consist of the frigate Macedonian and the sloops-of-war Cyane and Boston. The Cyane will probably be at Rio de Janeiro in the middle of July next; or, should circumstances indispensably require the services of that ship elsewhere at that time, Captain Elliott is instructed to leave there a communication for you, apprising you of the necessity of his absence, and the place at which your orders will find him. The Boston sailed from New York on the 11th April, and will probably, at the same time, be found at the same place.

"The interests committed to your protection are great and constantly increasing. It is impossible, however, to give specific directions in anticipation of cases which may arise to their injury. Much confidence is placed in your discretion, and no doubt entertained that the disposition of your force will be such as to afford all possible protection to the interests of the United States without violating the rights of others.

"I enclose, for your information and government, copies of the laws in relation to piracy and the slave trade; also, the general instructions prepared on these points and given to the commanders of all our cruising vessels. These instructions, though used for some time in the service and designed especially for another station, will probably be found, in substance, applicable to many cases which will occur in the course of your cruise.

"It is to be apprehended that some of the freebooters who have heretofore preyed on the commerce of the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico will change the scene of their depredations to the coasts of Brazil and La Plata. To guard against such an occurrence and give security to our extensive commerce with the ports of those coasts will require, on the part of the force under your command, the utmost vigilance.

"In the progress of the war now existing between the Governments of Brazil and Buenos Ayres, the belligerent parties will probably, to the great annoyance and injury of neutrals, have recourse to the system of blockades, without an adequate force to maintain that mode of warfare. Something of this kind has already occurred, and will no doubt be repeated. I enclose for your information copies of letters received from Captain Elliott, with a copy of a communication to him from Condy Raguet, our Chargé d'Affaires at Rio de Janeiro, from which you will learn what had occurred on this subject previous to our last advices from the coast.

"You will use your best efforts to afford relief and protection to the citizens of the United States and their property from an illegal exercise of power in this way, so far as the laws of nations can be urged in their favor. At the same time, you will avoid as much as possible all collision with either party, without compromitting in any manner our just rights or the national honor.

"You are well informed in the doctrines heretofore always maintained by our Government on the subject of blockade, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to furnish you with minute instructions respecting it.

"The letter of Mr. Raguet to the Government of Brazil explains the views of your Government. Such places only are to be considered blockaded as are 'attacked by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of a neutral.'

"It is desirable that you keep yourself correctly informed as to passing events; and for this purpose it will be well to commence and continue a regular correspondence with our political and commercial agents residing in Brazil and Buenos Ayres.

"You will be careful, on entering any harbor, or meeting a public vessel of any other nation, to manifest the accustomed civilities. As we require them to be paid to us, it becomes us to be prompt in tendering them to others.

"Our relations with both belligerents, as well as with all other powers, are very friendly, and care must be taken to abstain from everything calculated to impair or alter their present character, so far as this can be done consistently with the maintenance of our rights.

"The belligerent parties being respectively entitled to equal rights, the utmost care must be taken to abstain from any acts that may have a tendency to affect or compromit our neutral character. Acts of kindness to either, though extended equally to the other, may be misconceived or misrepresented to the prejudice of the United States. You will, therefore, if requested, decline taking on board the vessels of your squadron, for either party, men, money, provisions, or supplies, to be carried from such party to any port or country whatsoever."

Extract from Master Commandant B. V. Hoffman to Captain J. D. Elliott, dated

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, July 17, 1826.

"There have been two schooners from Baltimore, bound to this place, that have been captured by the blockading squadron under suspicious circumstances. One has been released, the other no doubt will be. There has been no complaint made to me for interference. The admiral has just returned to anchor off this place, having been up the river to water.

"P. S.—The other schooner mentioned has been released."

Extract from Captain J. D. Elliott to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Rio Janeiro, March 3, 1827.

"Herewith I have the honor to enclose you a copy of a corrected translation of the letter which I received from Admiral Guedes while at the La Plata.

"I was not enabled to give a true translation of this letter to the senior United States naval officer on this station, but was compelled to furnish such as I could then and there obtain. On my arrival here, through the assistance of the gentleman charged with the affairs of the United States at this Court, Mr. Raguet, I obtained a true translation, which I take the earliest opportunity to transmit to the Government, from the consideration that the papers may be of importance."

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Montevideo, December 26, 1826.

SIR: The undersigned, senior United States naval officer at the La Plata, with most perfect respect, desires to be informed by his excellency Don Rodrigo Pinto Guedes, Baron of the La Plata, Vice Admiral in the Navy of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, and commanding his squadron professing to blockade the ports of the La Plata, of the pretext on which a schooner called the Armstrong, whereof Edward Chamberlain is master, with the ship Pactolus, whereof John Girdler is also master, both vessels under the American flag, each legitimately American property, and have entered this port within the last two days, were, and are at this time, held in custody of an armed force of his Imperial Majesty, commanded, operated, and directed under your excellency's authority.

The undersigned had indulged the hope that in reaching this port he would not have had presented a subject which could in the slightest degree have caused a removal of those good and harmonious feelings with which he departed the port of Rio de Janeiro and entered that of Montevideo.

In the conference which the undersigned had and held, previous to departing the capital of his Imperial Majesty, with the distinguished minister who presides over the naval affairs of the Brazilian Empire, the Marquis of Paranagua, he had expected that previous to this date your excellency would have been put in possession of instructions which would have defined more particularly the powers of a belligerent, and the protection to which a neutral was entitled whilst conducting a trade not contraband of the principles of war, and have precluded the possibility of an American vessel's capture on first presentation before a blockaded port—an arrangement which had been concluded between the undersigned and the predecessor of your excellency a long time antecedent to the present date. This arrangement the undersigned feels well assured would entirely remove all unpleasant feelings which could have been presented between the Cabinets of our respective nations, and tend to bind still closer those that should exist with two Powers holding the naval supremacy of the American continent.

With due respect and high consideration the undersigned has the honor to subscribe, your excellency's most obedient,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

His Excellency DON RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of the La Plata,
Vice Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at the La Plata.

[True translation.]

ON BOARD FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, December 27, 1826.

The undersigned, admiral and commander-in-chief of the naval forces of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil in the river Plata, acknowledges to have received the note of S. Sa. the senior captain of sea and war, J. D. Elliott, commander of the ship of the United States, the Cyane, under date of yesterday, to which he now replies.

The undersigned does not consider himself bound by any stipulations made with his predecessor. He did not consider him authorized to alter points of the law of nations and of war, followed by all or by the chief part of maritime nations; that being a matter the discussion of which, whether it be to amplify or to restrict, belongs to the respective Governments, and never to the mere executors of orders, to whom, if they have not positive ones, it is only permitted to follow the general practice. On the contrary, S. Sa. may be assured (and it is hoped that he would be so without a special declaration) that the orders of the Government of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, transmitted to the undersigned, would be always religiously complied with, whatever they might be.

The undersigned does not consider as an act of violence the sending to Montevideo the schooner Armstrong, which, having taken in a cargo at the port of Santos, (where her master might easily have been informed of the existence as well as of the effectiveness of the blockade of Buenos Ayres,) and cleared out for Valparaiso, made her appearance off the blockaded port, which she intended to enter, conveying to the enemy the very productions of Brazil, with which she was at war. Notwithstanding this, however, the undersigned, supposing that some erroneous intelligence received at sea had made the master of the schooner believe that the blockade was raised, he had already allowed him to continue his voyage, when the note of S. Sa. was addressed to him, as will be seen from the date.

As to the ship Pactolus, the right of search by a belligerent on any part of the ocean is undeniable; for without it, it could not be ascertained whether a vessel met with conveyed articles contraband of war or not. For all this, however, in the case of the Pactolus, the undersigned could not omit to reprehend the commander of the brig Escuderra for having exchanged some of his crew, although he had only in view to prevent the Pactolus from going to Buenos Ayres, which could more prudently have been done by his accompanying her, without intercepting her voyage to Montevideo. And so unreasonable did the undersigned consider that incident, that, after causing to be delivered to the master of the Pactolus his papers, he sent people on board to manage his ship (which also took place before the note of S. Sa.) until the restoration of the seamen improperly detained on board the Escuderra, which vessel has not yet reached this port, but which cannot much longer delay her arrival.

The undersigned does not suppose that a difference of sentiments between the subjects of two nations (which, however, is not observable in the cases referred to) can alter the good understandings existing between their respective Governments; for, under such a hypothesis, he who should be in the wrong would be the victim of the just satisfaction which the offending Power would give to the offended one, in case the measure should have been adopted arbitrarily, either against law or against instructions.

The undersigned has the honor to present his compliments to S. Sa., and of making to him protestations of his high consideration and respect.

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Montevideo, December 28, 1826.

The undersigned has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter your excellency did him the favor to address, of yesterday's date, and to reply that, from respect, and a strict regard to the belligerent character of your excellency, in the transaction of both the Armstrong and the Pactolus, he was induced, uninformed of the merits of the cases, to call at once on the commander-in-chief of the Brazilian forces for that information, having no previous light on the subject, or knowledge of the course your excellency intended to adopt in relation thereto, or of the circumstances which led to the capture.

The undersigned is also pleased at being informed by your excellency of the prompt and spontaneous manner with which your excellency, unasked, released the vessels in question; and cannot otherwise than draw forth a strong expression of approbation that your excellency should have disavowed the principle of his officer, thus early, in relation to the transaction of the latter. Laws applicable to the subject of blockade have been subjected to such constant variance, and so frequently construed to answer the occasion suited to the interest of each of the contending European Powers, that it is found difficult to affix a uniform system for their guidance; but, in the practice and principle, the Government of the United States has been constant and uniform; and the undersigned relies greatly on the justice of the Government of his Imperial Majesty in applying the principles of blockade with consideration towards the commerce of the citizens of the United States, and trusts that, amongst the American family, each equally independent, the introduction of a system fraught with so much evident injustice in its practice on the European continent towards non-belligerents will never be adopted for a general rule and guidance; and as, with your excellency, it was not his intention to enter into a discussion on points of international law, more particularly on points which have already been advocated by the undersigned, and adopted by the civil judiciary of his Imperial Majesty, in their deliberations, and in a recent decision of the case of an American vessel at Rio de Janeiro, but merely to obtain information sought for and now possessed.

He will renew to your excellency his high consideration and regard, and subscribe your obedient,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

His Excellency DON RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of the La Plata,
Vice Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at the La Plata.

No. 11.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 24, 1827.

SIR: I arrived at this anchorage on the 30th ultimo, and found the Cyane and the Boston awaiting my arrival. I saluted the Brazil flag, and my salute was returned from the batteries, gun for gun, as had been previously arranged. I exchanged visits and salutes with Admiral Rodrigo Pinto Guedes, the commander-in-chief of the imperial naval forces. In coming up the river I experienced a blow from the southwest, and made a harbor at Maldonado, where I found a Brazil cruiser, having on board ten American seamen, the crew of the American ship Pactolus, which she had seized and sent to Montevideo. I sent an officer to demand these seamen, received them on board this ship, and upon arriving here I returned them to the Pactolus.

With respect to the blockade of the ports of Buenos Ayres, it is impossible, I think, now to take exception to it. It has been established by competent authority, that is to say, by the supreme authority of the State; a force adequate to prevent communication with the interdicted ports is employed for that purpose; neutrals bound to the blockaded ports are notified of the blockade, and warned not to enter, and are seized only upon attempting to enter after notification. Against such a blockade no ground of complaint, I presume, can be alleged.

Some injury has been suffered by the seamen of the neutral vessels heretofore seized by the blockading squadron, arising from the practice of separating the seamen from their vessels, and taking them on board the men-of-war. I did not expect that anything I could say would induce the entire discontinuance of this practice, so essential to the efficient exercise of the rights of the cruisers, but I was of opinion that something might perhaps be gained by a demonstration in the behalf of the American seamen whose vessels should hereafter be seized, and particularly by making known that all our citizens abroad, without regard to their stations in life, receive alike the protection of our Government—a doctrine not readily comprehended by a Brazil officer. I enclose copies of letters between Admiral Guedes and myself. Satisfactory evidence has since shown that my communication to the admiral has had a salutary effect.

The schooner United States, from Baltimore, was seized up the river by the blockading squadron, and brought to this anchorage on the 11th instant. The American crew had been taken on board the gun-boat which escorted the United States hither, but immediately on arriving, the Brazil admiral ordered the American crew on board their own vessel, and where they now are. The position of the United States when seized is strong presumption that she was destined to Buenos Ayres. Her cargo, consisting in part of gunpowder, muskets, and other munitions of war, is presumptive of the same destination; and other and more direct evidence of the same destination is, I understand, possessed by the captors. As the nature of her cargo, moreover, renders this vessel obnoxious, independently of the blockade, I presume there is but small chance of a favorable decision in her case. This is the only American vessel detained since my arrival here. The American schooner Homer, seized near Buenos Ayres, and brought to this anchorage on the 6th instant, was immediately released by the Brazil admiral.

In directing the Cyane and the Boston to meet me here, my object was to display the three ships together in the presence of the Brazil force; and also, in case of my visiting Buenos Ayres, to use both the Cyane and the Boston in passing through the blockading squadron, this ship not being able to get higher up the river than her present anchorage. I have, however, concluded not to visit Buenos Ayres at present. Mr. Forbes, in answer to my inquiry whether any advantage to the public interests would accrue from my visiting Buenos Ayres, informs me that there are no commercial interests there to protect. The blockade, as respects commercial vessels, is now conducted upon principles in which, I presume, our Government will acquiesce. The notification to vessels bound to a blockaded port is allowed expressly, I believe, with a view to conciliate our Government, and perhaps will be allowed to American vessels exclusively. For these and other reasons I have decided that it is my duty at present to abstain from visiting Buenos Ayres.

As soon as I had decided not to visit Buenos Ayres I sent the Boston to the north, to make short visits to Pernambuco and Bahia, and to arrive at Rio de Janeiro about the first of March. As soon as the Cyane was ready for sea I directed her to sail for the United States, touching at Santos, Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, and Pernambuco. I am assured, by well-informed persons, that the frequent visits of our ships-of-war to the different ports of Brazil is very advantageous to our trade, and I am persuaded that this is the case.

It is my intention to remain at this anchorage until the return of the Boston to it, and longer if it should be necessary or advisable.

I enclose copies of the correspondence between Admiral Guedes and myself up to this date.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 3, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to acquaint your excellency that the force under my command has been commissioned by the Government of the United States for the purpose of protecting American citizens and American property against unlawful molestation, and for no other purpose.

I have learnt, with great surprise, that it has been the practice of the cruisers under your orders, upon making a seizure at sea, to separate the American seamen from the American vessel, and to take them on board the cruiser. I have learnt, with still greater surprise, that it has been the practice, in seizing vessels within the river, not to permit the American seamen to remain on board their own vessel, but to force them on shore in a destitute condition; in consequence whereof the consul of the United States has been compelled to subsist them at the expense of the Government of the United States. Against practices so incompatible with the just rights of American citizens it is my duty to protest in the most serious manner; and I call upon your excellency to adopt, on this subject, a course more in conformity with the amity and good will subsisting between our Governments.

I will state a few occurrences in relation to this subject of general notoriety, and which abundantly show the magnitude of the injury growing out of the practice of which I complain.

The American brig Ruth was seized at sea in August last by the imperial cruiser Independencia on Morté and part of the crew taken on board, where they were made to assist in navigating the Independencia on Morté to Rio de Janeiro; and they were also mustered at the guns, to be compelled, in case of battle, to fight against a nation with which their own was at peace.

The American brig Wetherill, from Canton, was seized off Cape St. Mary's by the imperial frigate Paula in July last, and the crew taken on board the Paula, and there detained for some time.

The American brig Sarah George, bound to Montevideo, was seized in this river in September last, a prize crew put on board, and she was brought into Montevideo, where, owing to the ignorance or the neglect of the prize-master, she received serious injury during a gale of wind. The American crew were taken on board the imperial cruiser Caboclo, where endeavors were made to induce them to enter the service; but refusing, they were turned on shore at Montevideo, and not permitted to go on board their own vessel, even to procure their clothing. These American seamen, while on board the Caboclo, were ordered to the guns when in chase of a vessel under the Buenos Ayrean flag.

The American brig Pioneer, bound to Montevideo, was seized off Cape St. Mary's in September last, and her crew taken on board the imperial fleet; and when the fleet returned to this anchorage the crew of the Pioneer were turned on shore, and permission refused for them to live on board their own vessel.

The American brig Constitution, bound to Montevideo, was seized in November last off this river by an imperial man-of-war schooner, the crew taken out, and detained until some time after the vessel was released. In fact, the man-of-war schooner sailed from this anchorage on a cruise, carrying with her the crew of the Constitution.

On the 25th ultimo the American ship Pactolus, bound to Montevideo, was seized off Cape St. Mary's by the imperial brig-of-war commanded by Luis Clementi Poulthier, all her men taken out, and the Pactolus, with an insufficient prize crew, ordered to Montevideo, where she might have been lost but for the assistance which was afforded to her on her arrival.

More cases of a like nature might be mentioned, but I will not weary your own patience or mine with more. In fact, in every case of seizure, injustice, more or less aggravated, has been committed against the crew. Your right to seize and detain neutral vessels, under certain circumstances, and upon your responsibility, is indisputable; but you have no right whatever to separate the crew from the vessel; and should there be any reason to apprehend an attempt at rescue, your only just remedy is to place on board an adequate prize crew. In exercising an acknowledged right, in regard to neutral property, I am persuaded it is not in the disposition of your excellency to exercise power, without regard to right, over neutral persons, and still less to exercise it in a spirit of unkindness towards the unoffending seamen.

A perfect equality of political rights is a fundamental principle of the Government of the United States; and every citizen, whatever may be his station in life, claims and receives equal protection from the Government. The practice of forcibly removing American seamen from American vessels, and taking them on board foreign men-of-war, is a wrong towards American citizens, and a violation of national sovereignty, against which it is my duty to interpose; and if your excellency recognizes peace and friendship as subsisting between the United States and Brazil, I trust you will, without delay, give the necessary orders to the cruisers under your command to abstain from a practice tending so seriously to interrupt harmony between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, abreast Montevideo, January 4, 1827.

EXCELLENT SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of the letter which your excellency addressed to me under date of yesterday.

If the forces intrusted to the command of your excellency have for their object the protection of the citizens and property of the United States against every kind of oppression, as says your excellency, those which have been confided to me have the same end with regard to the Brizilian citizens, and that of preserving in all their integrity the independence and sovereignty of the imperial flag, and the rights of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, particularly as a belligerent.

I could say much upon some of the principles which your excellency considers as incontestable, but, as the last orders which I received from the Government of his Imperial Majesty forbid me to enter into any controversy, I shall be silent, as much to share the patience of your excellency as my own.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, your excellency's obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 5, 1827.

SIR: I have received your excellency's letter of the 4th instant, in which you decline to notice my complaint of certain wrongs committed against the citizens of the United States by the cruisers under your command, stating that the last orders which you received from your Government forbid you to enter into any controversy.

It only remains for me to inquire of your excellency whether the last orders which you received from your Government also forbid you to give me any explanation in regard to every other kind of injury which may be committed against American citizens or American property by the cruisers under your command.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of the La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at the La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, abreast Montevideo, January 6, 1827.

EXCELLENT SIR: My letter of the 4th instant was not well translated to your excellency. I did not say that the orders lately received forbid me to enter into controversy, but I said suspended the motives to controversy. I proceed to explain myself better.

I do not find any difficulty in refuting principles which are not followed by maritime nations in general, and which aspire to be exclusive, not having been able to obtain their adoption by others, not even with sacrifices; but as I know, positively, that the vessels referred to in your excellency's letters, and some other points, are at present in discussion between the Government of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil and the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of Rio de Janeiro, and what will be there established must serve as a rule, any further discussion would be useless before their decisions.

If, after having received them, your excellency judges that they are in any way transgressed, and will demand an explanation, I will most willingly give it.

With respect to the galley Pactolus, a more recent case, I have already replied to Captain Elliott, who will have probably informed your excellency; and even in the cabin of this frigate, when your excellency was on board, this subject was discussed with your excellency, who spoke to me respecting it. If it is not sufficient I have nothing more to say.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 22, 1827.

SIR: I take leave to ask, as a particular and personal favor, that your excellency will be pleased to release and deliver to me James Connell, an American seaman, at present detained as a prisoner on board the imperial frigate Piranga.

This man, by entering the service of Buenos Ayres during the existing war, offended against the laws of his country and forfeited his claim to the protection of its Government. But your excellency well knows the pernicious habits and careless disposition of seamen, and how frequently advantage of these is taken by designing men for the worst purposes. Seamen are enticed into a state of intoxication, and while in that degraded, irresponsible state they are impressed into the service. It is impossible, in such cases, to judge the offenders with severity, or to avoid feeling compassion for their sufferings.

From these considerations, as well as from your excellency's known love of humanity, I am confident you will accede to my request, and deliver James Connell to me. I promise, on my part, that he shall not again have an opportunity of entering the Buenos Ayrean service.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at the La Plata.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, January 23, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Although prisoners of war, besides being incapacitated from committing hostilities, are also valuable to exchange for others, yet, to gratify your excellency, I liberate the seaman James Connell, in accordance with your excellency's request.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 14, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose the deposition on oath, taken before the American consul, of Jesse Powell, second officer of the American brig Sarah George, now under seizure, and lying in this harbor, and from which deposition it appears that the said Jesse Powell was, on the 9th instant, severely beaten by the prize-master in charge of the Sarah George.

The cause of this outrage, if any cause exists, is not known to the officer on whom it was committed; but I am sure your excellency will be of opinion that no provocation whatever could justify a subaltern officer lying in this harbor, where immediate reference could be had to your excellency, in inflicting upon an American citizen, whether officer or seaman, any punishment other than confinement, and that only in case of absolute necessity, and until your orders could be received.

It is my duty, therefore, to complain to your excellency, in the most serious manner, of this outrage committed against a citizen of the United States; and I call upon your excellency for such redress in the premises as shall be a security for the future against outrages of a similar character.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of the La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at the La Plata.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, at Montevideo.

Personally came and appeared before the undersigned, consul of the United States of America at Montevideo, Jesse Powell, second mate of the American brig Sarah George, of Portland, now lying in the harbor, under detention, and in charge of a prize crew, consisting of a sergeant, three soldiers, and three seamen, who, being duly and solemnly sworn, did depose and say: That, about sunset on the 9th instant, on his return from on board the schooner Beauty, of Baltimore, in the boat of the Sarah George, which was lent to them, in company with the first mate, John McGraff, the sergeant began beating him very severely with a broomstick, which he continued until he had given him from twenty to thirty blows, without his knowing the cause of such abuse.

And also appeared, as above, John McGraff, first mate of the said vessel, who, being duly sworn, did depose and say: That, upon his return to the Sarah George, about nine o'clock on the same evening, he was hailed by the prize crew, and ordered to keep off, or they would fire into the boat, which he was compelled to do, and remained for the night on board the American ship Pactolus; no explanation having been made by the officer of his conduct next day when he went on board.

Also, personally came and appeared, as above, John Hall Cook, of the brig Sarah George, who, being duly and solemnly sworn, did depose and say, that the facts and circumstances related in the foregoing depositions are just and true, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of my office, in Montevideo, this thirteenth day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, abreast Montevideo, January 14, 1827.

EXCELLENT SIR: I hasten to assure your excellency that the case to which your letter refers was, till this moment, entirely unknown to me, and that I shall immediately take steps to inquire into the causes of an action so arbitrary and unreasonable, and which can only be justified on the ground of self-defence. Your excellency shall be informed of the result, and every satisfaction will be given that justice requires; and, with me, it will be sufficient that justice requires it, in order that it may be given.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 18, 1827.

SIR: The American schooner United States, from Baltimore, and bound to this port of Montevideo, was brought here on the 11th instant, and is still detained. This vessel, conscious that she was prosecuting an innocent voyage, anchored at Colonia, which she knew to be in possession of the Imperial Government of Brazil. This circumstance, together with the information which it appears by her log-book she received at sea from a Brazil brig-of-war, does away all suspicion that she was destined to a blockaded port.

Under these circumstances, no just cause for detention can exist; and I request, therefore, that your excellency will cause the vessel to be released and restored to her American owners.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant.

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of the La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at the La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, January 19, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have received the letter which your excellency addressed to me yesterday, relating to the detention of the schooner United States.

The captain did not inform your excellency of the true circumstances of his case; and it was not to be expected that he would willingly pronounce his own condemnation, and confess the abandonment, as it ought to be considered, of the protection of the Government of the United States.

The schooner United States was carrying to a port belonging to the enemies of the Brazilian Empire contraband of war, viz: 200 barrels of gunpowder, 39 chests of muskets, many military equipments, and more than 1,400 cannon balls. Contraband of war always was excluded from the commerce with belligerents in every treaty; even in that of the armed neutrality, which was in force from 1780 to 1782, and which had for its object the protection of the commerce of neutrals. All writers on the laws of nations (publicistas) condemn it, and say that it ought to be deemed, as it were, a pestilence infecting the rest of the cargo and the vessel; and they grant a right over the carriers as over prisoners of war. I forbear citing authors who support this side of the question; you surely cannot be ignorant of them. Let us see what was the career of the schooner, and what are the excuses of the captain.

She entered the Rio de la Plata at a point unfavorable for reaching the port of Montevideo, (onde apenas tinha para poder entrar.) She passed its meridian, passed the banks by the south channel, and was sailing for Buenos Ayres, but when she saw the vessels in the entrance of the harbor she fled; and as she could not be chased because it was night, she made for the offing of Colonia, wishing to enter there, for she had no longer the means of escape; if she turned to the south she was prize to the vessels from which she had fled, and coming by the north channel she would be captured by those she confesses to have seen off Montevideo. She even came armed with a pivot gun, without due license; for we cannot view as such the clearance, (despacho da alfandega,) the only paper that speaks of it, and which merely consists of what the captain represents. Let us proceed to the excuses.

The captain says, (and inserts it in his log-book, now in Montevideo, in comparatively recent writing, com tinta fresca, of which the judge and his clerk have made declaration, fez termo de declaracao,) that a Brazilian brig-of-war informed him that Montevideo was blockaded by the Buenos Ayrean squadron. He saw vessels, and supposed them to be Buenos Ayrean. Let it be so. By this fact the captain learnt that the war between Brazil and Buenos Ayres still existed; he sought this port, laden with contraband of war, that is, in the case stated above. Now, with such merchandise it is not necessary that the port be blockaded; it is sufficient that it be a port of the enemy. He ran for Colonia because he was not able to avoid both divisions; and that of Colonia, forming part of this squadron employed in the service of the blockade, guards the north channel. Nor was Colonia a port in which he could enter without being in distress, (avaria,) which he neither professed nor suffered; since he could not sell where there is not nor ever has been a custom-house.

From the moment the schooner passed the banks she could have no other destination than Buenos Ayres. And if the captain says (as I understand your excellency, como me constou ter nito a N. Exc.) that he wished to go that way to Montevideo, it would be the same were he to say that he would go to Rio de Janeiro by Cape St. Augustin or St. Roque. Not having shown that he discovered a mode of navigating by land, your excellency well knows how inadmissible is such an excuse.

I regret that this disgust has been given to your excellency; but your excellency remaining in the Rio de la Plata, will have repeated occasions for witnessing the bad faith with which they navigate in this quarter; and it is owing to moderation that the knowledge of it has not extended to a greater distance.

My concession to Captain Hoffman, of the corvette Boston, compelled me to invent arguments to palliate my desisting from the exercise of the conceived right over the brig Pioneer. The consequence has been that the captain has availed himself of my generous conduct to afterwards enter protests, and to prosecute a suit against me, with the arms I myself have furnished; and however ill judged it may be on his part, it at least shows his perfidy.

In consideration of the foregoing, those vessels, although they may not be considered in the same case with the schooner United States, but which I conceive myself justified in stopping or detaining, shall be decided upon by the competent courts, after which they must remain as matters of controversy between the respective Governments.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

U. S. FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 22, 1827.

SIR: Owing to the difficulty, at this distance, of communicating with the shore I did not receive until to-day a translation of your excellency's letter to me of the 19th instant.

All that your excellency says against a neutral trading with a belligerant in articles contraband of war is just, and might, with great propriety, be urged against the schooner United States had she been seized by a cruiser of Buenos Ayres; but I cannot admit its applicability to the present case on the part of your excellency. This vessel cleared out for Montevideo; and although, when seized, she was not in the direct route for that port, she assigns a satisfactory reason for the deviation.

Your excellency argues, as the captain saw ships off Montevideo, and which he judged to be Buenos Ayrean, that therefore he knew the war still continued, and his seeking this port of Montevideo, laden with contraband, subjects him to condemnation. But here your excellency forgets that Montevideo is a port of Brazil, and not that of an enemy; and I should rather infer, from the captain's avoiding the Buenos Ayrean blockading squadron, that his destination was bona fide Montevideo, and that he apprehended molestation from the Buenos Ayrean cruisers, and from no others.

The inference which your excellency draws from this vessel's anchoring at Colonia does not appear just, since she anchored there in open day, and sent her boat on shore for information.

I indulge the hope, therefore, that your excellency will, upon further consideration, deem the suspicion against the schooner United States not such as to justify her detention, and will cause her to be released.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of the La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at the La Plata.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, January 23, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have received the letter your excellency had the goodness to address to me yesterday, and I see by it that the translator of my letter, not understanding the Portuguese language, has made me appear to your excellency to have written an absurdity. How could it be possible that I would write that contraband of war would be fairly condemned by the Brazilian authorities, upon the basis of its coming for Montevideo, this being a part of the Empire? It is for the wishing to carry it to Buenos Ayres that they view it as a good prize. I will be more laconic, in order to be better understood, and briefly state the tenor of the schooner's log-book, (termo do diario da Escuna,) and the improbability that a Brazilian armed brig should have said that Montevideo was blockaded by the Buenos Ayrean squadron—a plea very difficult to be received.

The schooner United States, laden with contraband of war, entered the river de la Plata, passed Montevideo, and made for Buenos Ayres; but, seeing that she could not stand on without being taken, immediately, on being chased, ran for the north. Her offence is the having wished to enter Buenos Ayres with contraband of war, and her flight to Colonia the consequence of having no longer the means of escape. If she turned to the south, she was captured by the vessels from which she had fled; and if to the north channel, she would be pursued either by the vessels of Colonia, stationed to blockade that channel, or by those others anchored east of the channel.

To the questions put to the pilot in Colonia, he answered, confessing that they sailed for Buenos Ayres, supposing it to be no longer blockaded. But if he learnt by the Brazilian brig-of-war, which he says he met, that the war continued, to contraband of war the blockade was a matter of no consequence. That is the fact, and this the confession made in Colonia; and if they now say otherwise to your excellency, it is because they discover that they have confessed an act which they at first did not suppose to be criminal, in case the blockade no longer existed—an act which, though denied, is proved by their course after they entered the river de la Plata; for, after passing the banks, they could be bound to no port other than Buenos Ayres. They did not reach there, because chased by the Brazilian vessels; they went to Colonia to endeavor to elude by appearances, because they had no means to escape.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

No. 12.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 21, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose copies of my correspondence since my letter to you of the 24th ultimo.

In consequence of the order of Admiral Guedes to the different commanders of his squadron, dated the 25th ultimo, I received on board this ship thirteen American seamen. They were sent on board without pay; but, upon my application to the admiral, the pay was subsequently brought on board, and given to each man respectively. I also received from the Brazil squadron two American seamen who were detained as prisoners of war, having been taken in the Buenos Ayrean service.

On the morning of the 10th instant the Brazil squadron weighed and stood out of the harbor; and after it was under way, Admiral Guedes' letter to me, dated the 9th instant, was brought on board. It was hastily and imperfectly translated, and I understood the letter to state that I could not enter the port of Maldonado on account of its being blockaded. I deemed it advisable to make known at once that I did not recognize a blockade as extending to public ships; and as he was obliged by head winds to anchor within a few miles of us, I wrote in haste my letter of the 10th instant to that effect. But, upon a more accurate translation of his letter, I perceived that the admiral claimed to exclude foreign ships of war from Maldonado upon the ground that it was a port of his Imperial Majesty, and in a state of revolt against his authority. The exclusion upon that ground, I presume, is tenable. Congress, on the 15th of May, 1820, passed an act designating the ports of the United States within which foreign armed vessels were permitted to enter, and excluding them from all other ports. Believing, from the fairness which has uniformly charaterized our Government in all its foreign relations, that it was necessary I should abstain from all untenable pretensions, I addressed my letter of the 11th instant to the admiral, and sent it on board, as he was still detained near us by head winds. It is of course quite impossible any duty can require me to visit Maldonado, other than that of communicating with the admiral; and his letter to me of the 9th instant provides the modes by which prompt communication with him may be had.

By a regulation adopted at the custom-house soon after the present war had commenced, foreign vessels, taking on board any cargo at this port, are not allowed to depart without giving bonds to the full value of vessel and cargo, to be signed by a resident holding real estate in Montevideo. The condition of the bond is that the vessel shall not enter a blockaded port. As American vessels usually have assorted cargoes, it frequently occurs that parts of cargoes only are saleable here. There are several American vessels now here in this predicament. The amount of cargo on board any one vessel is not so large as to make it an object for any one vessel to proceed with it elsewhere for a market; and the American owners of unsaleable property here wish to transfer the whole of it to one particular vessel to be sent to the Pacific. This cannot be done, according to the existing regulation, without giving bond; and our citizens here asked my interposition, with the view to their being excused from complying with the regulation. I transmit, herewith, a copy of my communication to the Governor of Montevideo on the subject, and a copy of his answer. It happened, very inopportunely for my application, that on the very day it was made the masters of two American vessels, who had sailed from this port for the Pacific, but went to Buenos Ayres and there sold their vessels and cargoes, arrived here passengers in the British packet from Buenos Ayres.

It was represented to me, in the first instance, that a foreign vessel entering this port, and selling a part of her cargo, could not depart with the remainder without giving bond; and this is stated in my communication to the Governor, but I since find that I was misinformed. Bonds are not exacted from foreign vessels that do not break bulk, and vessels selling a part of their cargoes are allowed freely to depart with the remainder. It has, however, been in contemplation by the authorities of Montevideo to require bonds from all vessels whatever quitting the port. If the regulation be thus extended, it will operate very injuriously upon the American vessels.

No seizure of American vessels, by the Brazil squadron within the river, has occurred since that of the schooner United States, mentioned in my letter to you of the 24th ultimo.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, January 27, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The continual demands of consuls and of some naval commanders, requiring to be delivered to them those seamen of their respective nations who, without having contracted any engagement, or who, having completed their engagements, remain on board the different vessels of the squadron under my command, obliged me (to prevent the persons charged with the shipping articles from committing abuses injurious to the honor of the commanders, without their participation in the improper conduct) to issue a general order, a copy of which I have the honor to send to your excellency, in order that complaints of the violation of a right which all nations, with just cause, guard and defend, may at once cease. The result of the most scrupulous examination, with regard to the citizens of the United States, will manifest to your excellency that they will be sent on board the frigate Macedonian, and set at liberty on shore, when they happen to be on board a vessel whose examination may be made during the absence of your excellency from this port, and while no other vessel of war of the United States may be present.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, January 25, 1827.

All commanders of vessels which compose the squadron under my command will make a return, so soon as may be, of the foreign seamen that they may have on board their respective vessels who have not voluntarily entered, or who have completed their terms of service and do not wish to remain, in order that they may be dismissed from the service; delivering on board the Ganges seventy-four the subjects of his Britannic Majesty; on board the frigate Macedonian the citizens of the United States; on board the corvette La Zelee the subjects of his Christian Majesty; and conducting those of other nations, which have no vessels of war here, either to Rio de Janeiro or suffering them to go on shore, at their choice.

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 1, 1827.

SIR: In answer to a complaint made by me of an outrage committed by a Brazil officer upon an American citizen on board an American vessel in this harbor, your excellency informed me, on the 14th of last month, that immediate inquiry should be made into the affair; that the result should be communicated to me; and that every satisfaction which was due should be given. Nearly three weeks have since elapsed, and, as yet, neither redress nor any information have been given.

Regarding, as I do, the least outrage committed by a foreign officer upon the person of an American citizen as a matter of great public interest, I again address your excellency on this subject, and I trust that suitable atonement will no longer be withheld.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, Off Montevideo, February 2, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: In answer to your excellency's letter of yesterday, in which your excellency speaks of the delay of satisfaction for the outrage done to a seaman, a citizen of the United States, on board the brig Sarah George, which is detained in this port, and judged good prize in the first instance, it is proper to say to your excellency that, as yet, no examination has come to my knowledge that may determine with certainty who was the aggressor, and therefore I know only that the quarrel did not take place with the prize-master, as your excellency was informed, it having occurred with a sergeant of the army, who was detached and relieved before I received your excellency's letter.

Your excellency complains of arbitrary punishment inflicted on the seaman before his offence was proven, as it ought to have been, in order that the punishment might correspond with the crime he may have committed. This rule must of necessity apply to both the contending parties; for it would be an act no less grievous to punish a Brazilian without due process of the laws than any citizen of the United States whomsoever.

I have charged myself with a particular investigation, through obsequiousness to your excellency, that, by the result, I may be able to make concession or withhold it according to the development of the circumstances, having it in my power to reiterate the assurance that, in case they prove to be such as represented, satisfaction shall be secured by the chastisement of the offender.

But as your excellency complains that three weeks have passed without the desired end being obtained, that the delay may no longer continue in consequence of the other cares I have in charge, I leave an opening for your excellency, if it be desirable, to apply to the competent authorities, that all may be terminated by legal means in conformity with the laws.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 4, 1827.

SIR: In answer to your excellency's letter of the 2d instant, I state that, from your long silence, I had feared your other avocations might have caused you to forget my complaint of the outrage committed upon an American citizen. I learn with satisfaction, however, that the investigation is still continuing, and I shall await with much interest its result, expecting that your excellency will communicate it to me as soon as it is made.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 9, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that the commerce of the United States with this port labors under great embarrassment, in consequence of a regulation, recently adopted by your excellency, of exacting from vessels departing with cargoes of foreign articles bonds to the full amount of vessel and cargo, to be signed by a responsible resident of Montevideo.

Your excellency is aware that nearly all the American vessels arriving at this port have supercargoes on board, and that, consequently, the resident consignee does not derive large profits from an American consignment. The stay of the American vessels here is usually short, affording but little time for personal acquaintance; and the American owners may be regarded almost as strangers to the resident merchants. From these two circumstances, it is frequently impracticable for the American citizens here to comply with your excellency's regulation.

It is known to your excellency that American vessels, in general, have on board assorted cargoes, and that the sale of parts only of these cargoes can be effected here. To deny them the privilege of carrying the remainder to a favorable market, except on a condition which, to them, is impracticable, for the reasons which I have stated, is at once unjust and impolitic.

The condition of the bond is, that the vessel shall not proceed to a blockaded port; but I submit to your excellency, whether it is not more dignified and correct to rely upon the number and the activity of his Imperial Majesty's cruisers for the enforcement of the blockade, rather than upon a regulation which, besides being inhospitable, tends greatly and inevitably to discourage the visits of foreign vessels to this port.

From your excellency's enlightened character, I am sure that you recognize the commerce between the United States and this port to be highly and mutually beneficial, as well directly, in the exchange of products, as indirectly, by cultivating, which intercourse is sure to do, respect and good will between the two nations. I trust, therefore, with confidence, that your excellency will revoke entirely a regulation which experience has shown to be so disadvantageous to the trade of this port, and so injurious to the interests of American citizens frequenting it.

Should it occur, however, that my just and reasonable expectation of a revocation of this regulation, in all cases, be disappointed, then it becomes my duty to call to the serious attention of your excellency the very embarrassed situation in which the citizens of the United States now here are placed.

There is a large amount of American property at present here. It consists of parts of cargoes of different vessels, and for which this port offers no market.

The representatives of this property are anxious to place the whole of it on board one particular vessel, probably the ship Governor Hawkins, and send it to the Pacific for a market there. To comply with the existing regulations, I have already shown to your excellency, is impracticable: to sell here, would occasion a sacrifice far exceeding the profits of the parts of the cargoes which have been disposed of here, and make the whole voyage ruinous.

Under these peculiar circumstances, I respectfully, yet earnestly, request that your excellency will be pleased to direct that the different American vessels now in this port be permitted to tranship the unsaleable parts of their cargoes to one vessel, and that she be permitted to depart for the Pacific without being required to give bonds.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency BARON DA VILLA BELLA, President of the Cisplatine Province.

[Translation.]

MONTEVIDEO, February 14, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: To satisfy well your excellency of my regard to your appreciated correspondence of the 9th of this present month and year, I commanded the judge and administrator of this custom-house to examine into the matter, in order that he might declare the imperial will itself upon the object sought, viz: exemption from bond for the Anglo-American vessels, which, having disembarked in this port some part of their cargoes, wished to carry the remainder to ports affording a better market, according to reasons, otherwise plausible, advanced by your excellency in your note. I assure your excellency that I regret extremely my not being able to assent to your proposition (or request, á sua pertençao) in opposition to the imperial decree, a copy of which is enclosed; and if I might, on one hand, attend to reasons adduced by your excellency, which are, perhaps, weighty, on the other I could not subject myself to being taxed with the inobservance of a decree so determinate and so general, as your excellency will see, by which it is not permitted that he who executes the law may interpret it; and less, can he modify his precept, rigidly drawn up—a prerogative which belongs only to the Emperor, to whom your excellency may have recourse by petition.

I regret no less to say that the decree issued, upon the giving bonds, mentions expressly as a motive (por causal) the entrance into Buenos Ayres of an American schooner, by eluding the blockade, a reason which, though it had not been given in so express and general a decree, would induce the taking of all means of precaution for the good of the Government and of the State.

May God preserve your excellency many years.

BARON DA VILLA BELLA, President of the Cisplatine Province.

The Most Excellent Signior JAMES BIDDLE.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, March 2, 1826.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The Viscount of Laguna, in an official paper of the 21st of January of the present year, stated that he had taken measures to subject the captains and consignees of national and foreign vessels, sailing from that port, to giving bond to the value of the goods which they might export, for the purpose of preventing their entering secretly into any ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, and affording succor to the enemy, as has been done already by a schooner of the United States of America eluding the vigilance of the blockading squadron. I have to say to your excellency that this precaution merited approbation; that it is proper that it should be rigorously observed, your excellency using all other means that it shall be in your power to prevent similar attempts.

May God preserve your excellency.

VISCOUNT OF BAEPENDY.

Senhor FRANCISCO DE PAULA MAGGESSI NAVARES DE CARVALHO.

ON BOARD HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, February 9, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Your excellency having communicated to me, in the last interview which we had on board this frigate, your intention to accompany me when I should sail for Maldonado, for the sake of more ready correspondence with me upon whatever might occur relating to affairs of the citizens of the United States, the continuance of your excellency in that port being impracticable, since his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil has prohibited entrance where possession is held by rebels who refuse him due allegiance, and it possibly becoming the seat of war, as has been already stated to your excellency, renders it incredible that your excellency will attempt to violate those orders of his Imperial Majesty, issued as means conducive to subdue insurgents, to preserve the integrity of the Empire in his charge, and given within the limits of dominions where he had exclusive right to govern, especially when neutral vessels of war suffer no inconvenience from their proximity to Montevideo, as merchant vessels are not allowed to disembark there their merchandise, through want of a custom-house, and there remaining only cases of distress, in favor of which hospitality makes exception, and when the vessels of his Imperial Majesty stationed in that port will afford all the assistance they may need, until it be possible for them to go where they may receive more efficient aid, desiring not to be deprived of communication with your excellency, which I prize very much, on the contrary, to remove all difficulties that may hinder it, it is proper to inform your excellency that Pedro Antonio Nunes, chief of division, who acts as Inspector of the Marine Arsenal in Montevideo, has been charged to remit whatever documents and letters that shall be directed to me. Through him your excellency will be able to send yours, which shall receive the most prompt reply. Through the same channel I will receive with pleasure your excellency's commands.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 10, 1827.

SIR: I received to-day the letter of yesterday's date, which your excellency did me the honor to address to me. It is my duty to acquaint your excellency that I cannot recognize in a belligerent the right to exclude a public vessel of the United States from a blockaded port, and that I shall visit any port in this river which the duties intrusted to me by my Government may require me to visit.

But your excellency, in the last conference I had the honor to have with you, informed me that all vessels seized upon the pretext of intending to violate the blockade, would, in your absence, be conducted to this port. If, then, the facilities stated by your excellency of communicating with you, during your stay at Maldonado, be sufficiently maintained, I shall remain at this anchorage; as at this achorage I shall receive the earliest information of any incident requiring a communication from me to your excellency.

I cannot sufficiently express my regret that your excellency should depart from this port without making known to me the result of the investigation into a complaint of an outrage upon a citizen of the United States, made by me to your excellency so long ago as the 14th of last month.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 11, 1827.

SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 9th instant was sent on board this ship yesterday morning early, after your excellency was under way, and was hastily and therefore imperfectly translated. I understood your excellency's letter to say that I could not enter the port of Maldonado in consequence of its being blockaded. I deemed it necessary to apprise your excellency that I could not recognize a blockade to extend to ships-of-war, and sent my letter to that effect as soon as the wind obliged you to anchor. But I perceive since, from a more accurate translation, that your excellency claims to exclude foreigners from Maldonado upon the ground that it is a port of his Imperial Majesty, and in a state of revolt against his authority.

I therefore now acquaint your excellency that, in consequence of your excellency's communication to me of the 9th instant, I shall not, either in this or any other ship under my command, enter the port of Maldonado without necessity.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

No. 13.

Extracts of a letter from James Biddle, dated United States Frigate Macedonian, off Montevideo, March 20, 1827, to the Secretary of the Navy.

"SIR: I have the honor to report that there has not been any American vessel seized by the blockading squadron, or at least brought to this anchorage, since the date of my last communication to you. All seizures, either within the river or on the coast of its vicinity, are brought here in the first instance. Recent decisions at Rio de Janeiro, by which damages have been awarded against the captors, cannot fail to render the Brazil cruisers more circumspect in their future conduct towards neutral vessels."

"The British loss in this case is serious, and is without any redeeming consideration; while, in regard to our country, I incline to the opinion that the additional activity of our trade to Brazil, caused by the war, fully compensates to us for the partial deprivation of our ordinary trade to Buenos Ayres. The Brazil Army and Navy consume an immense quantity of provisions from the United States, and pay well for them. Many of our citizens have sold their vessels to the Brazil Government at large profits, and others have procured from it good freights. It seems probable, too, that not a single American vessel seized by the blockading squadron will be confiscated finally. On the other hand, our vessels occasionally succeed in eluding the blockading squadron, owing, however, to the grossest neglect of its officers, and get war prices for every thing at Buenos Ayres."

No. 15.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, Rio Janeiro, May 15, 1827.

SIR: I sailed from the river Plate on the 25th ultimo. Owing to the prevalence of cold damp, winds for the last fortnight of our stay at Montevideo, and some blustering weather afterwards at sea, my crew were attacked with dysentery, which went nearly through the ship. The attacks were, however, in general of a mild character, and began gradually to disappear upon our reaching a more favorable climate.

I remained in the river Plate exactly four months. I am of opinion that the number of vessels commissioned for the purpose by the Government of Brazil is adequate to maintain, lawfully, the blockade. It may, however, be doubted whether the officers employed in this service are vigilant in the performance of their duty; and it is, I think, upon this ground only that any question as to the legality of the blockade can now be raised.

While lying off Montevideo I procured the release of twenty-five American seamen from the different Brazil men-of-war at that anchorage. Of these twenty-one either had been impressed into the service, or, having entered voluntarily, had served out the term for which they had entered. All these men received their pay up to the day on which they were sent on board this ship. The remaining four were prisoners of war, having been captured under the Buenos Ayrean flag; and they seem to have suffered, as indeed they deserved, harsher treatment than the prisoners who were citizens of Buenos Ayres. By entering a foreign service these men had forfeited all claim to the protection of their Government; but it was impossible not to feel an interest in their situation, and I asked their release as a matter of personal favor to me.

I enclose copies of my correspondence with Admiral Guedes. The day before sailing from Montevideo I sent an officer to acquaint the admiral that I was about to sail and would call to take leave of him but that I was indisposed. He immediately sent an officer to inform me that he would release to me Barratt and Brown, the two American seamen. I accordingly took them out of a most loathsome prison in which they were confined in irons, and they are now on board this ship. With respect to the American schooner Hazard, she entered Salado from a Brazil port, with a cargo of sugars. Salado is a small port on the south side of the river Plate, and bearing to the southward and westward from the anchorage of Montevideo. Admiral Guedes' letter to me, dated April 23, was sent on board this ship at the moment I was getting under way from Montevideo.

I arrived here on the 11th instant. Mr. Raguet, in consequence of the conduct of this Government, was constrained to resort to the ultima ratio diplomatica, and has sailed for the United States. I am not acquainted with the particular circumstances which determined Mr. Raguet to this course; but from an intimate knowledge of Mr. Raguet's official conduct generally, as well in 1823, when I was here in the frigate Congress, as during my present cruise, I may be permitted to say that he has been a faithful, zealous, capable representative of his Government. Foreigners visiting this port, especially those engaged in commerce, are continually suffering unjust and vexatious molestation; and redress is so often denied or unreasonably delayed that all the gentlemen of the diplomatic corps here experience frequent chagrin and mortification.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter from Mr. Forbes, which I received here. This letter was addressed to me at Montevideo, and endorsed to be opened in my absence by Captain Hoffman, who accordingly opened it. Captain Hoffman will, of course, not deem himself authorized to accede to the wish of Mr. Forbes that he should visit Buenos Ayres. Nevertheless, I shall write by the earliest opportunity, and direct him to continue at Montevideo, according to my orders to him previous to my leaving Montevideo.

Mr. Garcia, appointed by the Government of Buenos Ayres its minister to the Court of London, arrived here on the 9th instant in the British packet, which usually touches here on its way from Buenos Ayres to England. The packet sailed on the 11th instant for England, but Mr. Garcia did not proceed in her, and no doubt the main object of his mission is here. He is at present engaged negotiating with this Government for peace.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, April 14, 1827.

SIR: James Barratt and Jacob Brown, two American seamen, are confined in the common jail at Montevideo. They were both taken in Buenos Ayrean vessels, and both of them state that they had been forcibly impressed into the Buenos Ayrean service. As it is well known that the Government of Buenos Ayres does impress foreign seamen into its service, there can be no doubt of the truth of the statement of these men. I have the honor, therefore, to request that your excellency will be pleased to direct that these American seamen, James Barratt and Jacob Brown, be released and delivered to me. I promise, on my part, to detain them on board this ship until there is an opportunity of sending them to the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, April 17, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: By letter of the 14th instant your excellency exacts of me the delivery of two prisoners of war, citizens of the United States, founding your demand in that the Government of the Republic of Buenos Ayres obliges foreigners to take up arms against their enemies, and that they have been so compelled.

An act so extremely contrary to the rights of neutral nations plainly shows the condition of that people, and how little they merit acknowledgment of their independence, admitting them into the catalogue of nations whose sovereignty they offend and deny.

I will not presume to point out the means of hindering so scandalous a proceeding, because your excellency cannot be ignorant of them; nor will the Government of the United States fail to put them in practice, in order to punish a national stain, alike contrary to the usage of civilized nations, as opposed to their independence and high standing. Nevertheless, your excellency will permit me to make a remark that will render doubtful the assertion made to your excellency by the prisoners, and which your excellency appears willing to believe.

If those men were constrained, as they wrote to your excellency, the Chargé d'Affaires and the consul of the United States in Buenos Ayres would not have passed in silence a business of such great importance; and, in the incredible case of their just demands being unattended to, or of the inevitable posterior proceeding, (perhaps even the retirement of the Chargé of the United States in Buenos Ayres,) we would have certainty of the facts, which now only appear from the assertion of the prisoners, who are parties too deeply interested in this matter to receive from us entire credit. Besides, the first having been shipped (contratado) in Valparaiso, and having come thence in the corvette Chacabuca, deceived your excellency in saying that he had been forced by the Government of Buenos Ayres; and the second being prisoner for more than a year, in the attack made on Colonia by the Buenos Ayrean vessels of war.

The Chargé of the United States in Buenos Ayres, Mr. J. M. Forbes, up to the 31st of March last, was exercising his diplomatic functions, of which I am assured by a document now before me.

But, ceasing to speak on this point, which does not concern me, and of which I have spoken only in conformity with what your excellency has communicated by your letter of the 14th, I will turn to the demand for the two seamen.

Your excellency knows the right of war possessed over the life of any person met bearing arms against Brazil, and also that the more lenient fortune of those already disarmed and conquered is that of remaining prisoners of war, without having a right to their liberty before peace, or being exchanged for others according to established usage. Nor can such men obtain protection of any Power without shameful infringement of neutrality. There are Brazilian prisoners in Buenos Ayres, and they would suffer great injustice if those of Buenos Ayres should be set at liberty while they remained prisoners.

I believe I have answered your excellency, showing the moral impossibility of granting what your excellency desires.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, April 20, 1827.

SIR: Your excellency's letter to me of the 17th instant was received yesterday. No one can feel more indignantly than myself the impressment of American seamen by any foreign nation, and the compelling them to fight in a cause of which their country is not a party. The people and the Government of the United States have great sensibility to this subject; and the impressment of their seamen by the Governments of Brazil and of Buenos Ayres, if persevered in, cannot fail to change the subsisting relations of peace. It is not possible to imagine a more justifiable cause for war.

I have conclusive evidence in my possession that the Government of Buenos Ayres has impressed American seamen into its service. I have conclusive evidence that the Government of Brazil, also, has impressed American seamen into its service; and, in proof of the latter, it is sufficient to refer to the order of the Minister of War of Brazil, dated November 18, 1826, published at Rio de Janeiro, in the Diario Fluminense, of November 20, 1826, and to your excellency's letter to me of January 27, 1827.

I regret that your excellency declines to release James Barratt and Jacob Brown. If your excellency will turn to my letter of 22d January last, you will perceive that I admit your right to detain an American seaman similarly situated with Barratt and Brown, and that I requested his release as a particular and personal favor to myself. Your excellency having had the goodness to gratify me in two similar cases, I had indulged the hope that your excellency would have gratified your own feelings and mine by the release of Barratt and Brown, since few things can be more grateful to an officer than to lessen to individuals, as far as possible, the calamities of war.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

FRIGATE PIRANGA, April 20, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: If the letter I received to-day were not signed by your excellency, I would say that it contains a formal contradiction when it accuses the Government of Brazil of obliging citizens of the United States to serve against nations with whom that Power (the United States) is not at war. Your excellency says that you have in your hand documents to prove it, and refers to the order of the Department of State, published in the Diario Fluminense, of November 20, 1826, and to my letter of the 27th of last January. That proves the contrary to what your excellency supposes; because, as it may have happened that some officer had been ignorant of what was due to neutral Powers, the Department cautions them, and obliges them to confine themselves to the duties prescribed by justice. Whence it follows that the Government took a course opposite to that which your excellency reputes offensive. And with respect to my letter, it has the same tendency; because, although when the period contracted for may have expired, yet, if the seamen wish it, they may have liberty to remain; but many of them, instead of addressing themselves to the commanders or to me, are silent, and apply to the consuls or to the military authorities that may be here; and hence results an erroneous opinion, as may be shown from their silence, which evinces the contrary to what they assert. My order, which accompanied the letter, and which your excellency takes for a document in proof, produced a general examination, and occasioned the delivery of many, not claimed, on board the Macedonian; for your excellency did not agree to my ordering them (as I did all the English, with the consent of the English Admiral, and of the consul) to be carried in some vessel to Rio de Janeiro, the place where they had shipped, in order to prevent their going over to the enemies of Brazil, which, by releasing them in good faith, I yielded them the greater facility of doing. Already I have since made some of them prisoners of war.

Already will plainly appear that any person who may have been claimed or demanded, of whatever nation, his contract fulfilled, shall be set at liberty, with no other motive than that required of all Governments by the laws of nations.

I shall speak in particular of the two whom your excellency desires to see absolved from the condition of prisoners, and of the mode by which the peculiar circumstances of their case deprive me of the obligation to release them. They both applied for leave to serve on board this frigate, to exonerate themselves from the imprisonment on shore. It was not only agreed upon, but I commanded that they should be considered as volunteers, as much from reason as from generosity. One night, in the port of Maldonado, they were detected in lowering a boat to escape to the enemy. What black ingratitude! Besides the two for whom your excellency interests yourself, there were three of other nations. I did not punish them; I commanded them to be secured and returned anew to the prison, from which, at their request, they had been taken. Well may your excellency perceive that benevolence is misplaced on such subjects. I wished to spare your excellency this narrative, but your second letter obliges me to recount it. I feel well assured that your excellency would not have interested yourself for them if these particulars had been known to you.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, in front of Montevideo, April 19, 1827.

SIR: The American schooner Hazard, bound from the port of Salado to the United States, was seized at sea, on the 15th instant, by one of the cruisers under your excellency's command; and I learn, with surprise, that it is the intention of your excellency to detain her for adjudication, under the pretext of having violated the blockade.

The severity with which violations of blockade are visited upon the offending party renders it obligatory upon a belligerent to conform exactly to all the requirements necessary to constitute a lawful blockade. One of these requirements, as your excellency well knows, is the application of force, to every part of the coast blockaded, in such manner as to render access to it dangerous. It is an acknowledged principle that, if, to any part of the coast in a state of declared blockade, force be not applied, a blockade cannot be recognized to exist with respect to that part. Such is the doctrine of Great Britain—a nation disposed, from her numerical superiority at sea and the frequency of her wars, to carry belligerent rights as far as they can be carried. It is true, indeed, that Great Britain, under the pretext of retaliating the injustice of her enemy, violated, in 1807, the principles which she had previously admitted in regard to blockade; but it is also true that the Government of the United States preferred the alternative of war to submission to British edicts violating its neutral rights. These principles appear to be well understood by his Imperial Majesty's Government, inasmuch as the Viscount St. Amaro, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in his note to Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of Rio Janeiro, under date of December 6, 1825, states that "his Majesty the Emperor had ordered to be fitted out a naval force, with the object of placing in effective blockade all the ports belonging to the Government of the United Provinces of the River of Plate."

Now, it is a matter of notoriety that not a single cruiser of any kind has been off the port of Salado for several months past, and that vessels have passed in and out as freely as if war did not exist. Many prizes have been sent into that port; privateers and neutral vessels have entered and departed.

If, then, the relative state of the two belligerents has materially changed since the blockade was proclaimed—if circumstances now render it necessary to employ, up the river, so large a portion of the force under your excellency's command as to leave no force to be employed off Salado, it is manifest that the blockade cannot be deemed to exist with respect to the port of Salado.

I trust, therefore, that your excellency, on further consideration, will cause the American schooner Hazard to be released.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, April 20, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: By your excellency's letter to me of yesterday, upon the detention of the schooner Hazard, I see the whole question is reduced to the consideration whether or not the port of the river Salado, situated near the bay of San Barragam, be blockaded.

That all the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres were declared blockaded, your excellency affirms by your letter assenting that this intimation had been made to Mr. Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of Rio Janeiro; the doubt may then consist only in regard to the having force which may sustain the blockade, and make the entrance of vessels attempting to violate it hazardous.

That in the Rio de la Plata there is maintained a squadron of very many vessels employed in this service your excellency knows; and that the enemy have not been able, with their forces, to drive away the imperial fleet from their ports your excellency also knows. On this account, your excellency, considering all the ports within the Rio de la Plata in a state of blockade, in the middle of last February directed an officer to inquire of me if a vessel of the United States could go to a port without the Rio de la Plata without being molested by the cruisers of the squadron, seeing that there an effective blockade did not exist; and I replied frankly to your excellency that I did not consider the ports without the Rio de la Plata as blockaded, from not having force employed in that direction.

By these, the question and the reply, it clearly appears that, previous to the detention of the schooner in question, there was no doubt of the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres within the Rio de la Plata being blockaded. The schooner was able to elude in the ingress, but she was not so fortunate in the egress; and her detention is proof that she could not make the attempt without peril; that is one of the circumstances detailed by your excellency as essential to a valid blockade.

The retiring from (I do not say the abandonment of) the blockaded ports, which may be occasioned by stress of weather, by want of provision or water, by distress, or by other causes, never were good arguments to show a blockade raised. I do not transcribe what authors say on this head, because your excellency is aware of it all; yet, it being important, I shall copy the most modern and the most esteemed to support the proposition.

Far different is our case from the parallel your excellency adduces as argument. The blockade of 1807 was, on the part of the belligerents, carried to the extreme of declaring as blockaded some ports which perhaps never had seen, nor would see, a ship-of-war. But can your excellency associate these ideas with the blockade of the Rio de la Plata, thickly sown with Brazilian vessels of war?

The entering of privateers, prizes, and neutrals into the river Salado is not a circumstance that can annul the blockade. Your excellency knows that even squadrons have sailed out of blockaded ports without having to resort to force.

As your excellency is fully informed of all that has passed in the blockaded ports, you must have seen with surprise that the neutrals who have made, as it were, open war against Brazil, from erroneously supposing themselves protected, have been, with little exception, all citizens of the United States; but it is impossible that the Government of the United States, wise, just, and illustrious, should wish to afford its protection to those who, instead of using without evasion the right of neutrals, offend so directly the rights of an amicable belligerent. I take the liberty of transcribing here a few words of an author who cannot be unknown to the very extensive erudition of your excellency, that your excellency may reflect upon them and determine who have assailed the right, whether of neutrals, whether of friendly belligerents. "A nation which, without any other motive than the allurement of gain, labors to strengthen my enemy, and fears not to cause me irreparable injury, that nation certainly is not my friend; and she invests me with the right to consider her and to treat her as the ally of my enemy." I have inserted this principle to show more plainly to your excellency how incredible it is that the Government of the United States should desire to confound such offences with the right of neutrals, or to afford protection to the captains of merchant vessels, who, with shameful want of good faith, come to the very ports of Brazil to seek, by means of counterfeit and treacherous clearances, succor for the enemies of Brazil. Almost daily this is done before our eyes in Montevideo; and if bonds are required of them, they draw up successive protests to gain time, and never give them. Perhaps the excessive tolerance has led them on to such high-handed audacity.

I now learn, since your excellency asserts it, that the last war between the United States and England arose from the right established in the blockade in 1807. Without distrusting what your excellency says, I hope I shall be allowed to make a few reflections.

It is difficult to comprehend how that political doctrine of England should have offended so greatly the United States; and that, being proclaimed in 1807, the war should have taken place not until five years afterwards, its declaration being made in June, 1812. And it is still more difficult to conceive that, such being the motive or cause of war, it should have produced this effect with England and not with France, which was the first to establish, to declare and practice that principle, the proceeding of England being a natural consequence and a right of reciprocity, for the opposition ought to go to the fountain head, or to the trunk from which it was produced. Not to continue to urge objections, since your excellency avers it, it remains for me to ask of your excellency a condescension, and even a favor. The right of blockade having been the cause of war, it is an infallible consequence that peace could not be made without some understanding upon this point of maritime right; and, as I never yet have been informed of the manner in which that difference of opinion was set at rest, I entreat your excellency to point out the article which settled this principle, in a convention between the United States and England, that this very case may serve as a guide upon some occasions of our correspondence; because if there is not, then the principles of England should continue in force, at least by a tacit right. That which surprised your excellency, the necessity of the schooner's case being litigated, I find most reasonable and just; there the pro and con may be discussed. The judgment of such cases, your excellency knows, is committed to the tribunals of the capturer; but, that they may not judge of good or bad prize by the peculiar laws of their own country, rather, on the contrary, by those of nations—that is, by public right, which is regulated in many modes. Your excellency will permit me here to transcribe what sound authors say, of which your excellency cannot be ignorant, and for that reason I do not venture to put name, date of edition, the section, or the pages; I shall do so only for your convenience. In short, although it may be acknowledged that the capturer has no right to dispose of his prize before it has been adjudged to him, usage and treaties grant jurisdiction in disputes that may arise, in respect to this, between the capturer and the claimants, only to the Sovereign of the former; while, at the same time, the capturer is not obliged to carry his prize to the port of a third Power. And although the courts of admiralty may be sensible that it is according to treaties, and, in the want of them, according to the general and universal law of nations, and not according to the peculiar laws of the country that ought to determine, (c) yet the single-sided interpretation of treaties, and, in defect of them, the diversity of principles that may be adopted as the law of nations, furnish vast ground of complaint to neutral Powers against the proceedings and the decisions of these tribunals, either upon the nature of the case, upon the admission of ulterior proof, or touching the finding in the often enormous costs of suit, &c.

(c) Answer of the Duke of Newcastle to Mr. Michel Ezzählungen Merkwündigen, page 258. Answer of Great Britain to the Declaration of Russia, of April, 1780, vol. 4, page 345. Ordinances of the United Provinces of the Low Countries, 11th December, 1747, and 14th February, 1748, &c.

After this conclusion, I have reason to believe that, if injustice be done, there will be an opening for diplomatic correspondence; yet it never can be a matter the determination of which I ought to take upon myself.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in the Rio da Prata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, April 22, 1827.

SIR: The circumstance of your excellency's letter of the 20th instant having been sent to me through the American consul delayed my receipt of it.

The captain of an American merchant vessel lying in Montevideo called upon me, in February last, to know whether Rio Negro was a blockaded port, and I informed him that it was not, inasmuch as no force was then employed on that part of the coast. He expressed a wish to know your excellency's opinion, as he would not attempt to enter Rio Negro if your excellency deemed it in a state of blockade. I therefore sent an officer to make for him the inquiry of which your excellency speaks; but I do not perceive, as your excellency does, that it clearly appears from the question and the reply in regard to one port, that there was, therefore, no doubt of certain other ports being blockaded.

Your excellency is correct in believing that the Government of the Unites States does not afford protection to its citizens who offend against the belligerent rights of nations in amity with it. Your excellency well knows that, when, unhappily, war breaks out, neutral nations have an indisputable right to trade with both belligerents, with the exceptions only of blockaded ports, and in articles contraband of war. In cases of blockade affecting the property of its citizens, the Government of the United States only requires that the blockade should be maintained according to the principles of international law. Against a blockade not so maintained the Government of the United States does and will protect its citizens.

I state in my letter of the 19th instant that the United States had declared war against Great Britain in consequence of her edicts of 1807. Your excellency finds it difficult to comprehend how this is possible, because the war was not declared until June, 1812. It is the policy of the United States to cherish peace, and she has always cherished it with great sincerity. A war cannot be just when its object can be obtained by negotiation. When, therefore, Great Britain violated the just rights of the United States, the latter sought redress by amicable negotiations, and continued to negotiate as long as there remained any hope of amicable arrangement. But in 1812, Great Britain still persevering in her injustice, the Government of the United States, to vindicate the national honor, declared war against her. Your excellency states that, if the British edicts had been the cause of the war, it is an infallible consequence that peace could not be made without some understanding upon the subject; that you have never been informed of the manner in which that difference was set at rest; and your excellency asks me for information. The treaty of Ghent is silent upon this subject. It is not difficult to explain the cause of this silence. In the first place, peace was restored in Europe, thus suspending the exercise of all belligerent rights; and, in the next place, Great Britain, during the existence of the war, had revoked these very edicts. The reason, perhaps, why the United States did not go to war with France was that the United States, while negotiating with England, negotiated also with France, and France repealed her obnoxious decrees as respects the United States. If your excellency continues to doubt the cause of the war with Great Britain, and desires to be further informed, it will give me much pleasure to show your excellency the State Papers of the United States for the year 1812, which are now before me.

But to return to the more immediate object of my addressing your excellency. In all cases of alleged breach of blockade, the tribunal trying the same is bound by the law of nations to ascertain the existence of an actual blockade, and the employment of such a force as is adequate to prevent communication with the interdicted ports. If the blockading force be withdrawn for any cause other than distress of weather, or if it appears that vessels have frequently entered and departed, the party accused has a right to an acquittal.

Since your excellency has decided that the American schooner Hazard must undergo a trial before the competent tribunal, I shall await its result, confident that, under the circumstances, she must be acquitted.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Seignor RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation]

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PIRANGA, April 23, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I could never entertain a doubt but that the motives of the last war were those asserted by your excellency. What surprised me was, that France, being the cause of putting in execution such an extraordinary blockade as the one decreed by Napoleon, and from which he never would deviate, should be exempted, and that very nation solely involved which had adopted it by right of reciprocity—a right which ought to have ceased the moment the neutrals obliged the nation which had caused the mischief that so much exceeded all known practices of right and reason to desist from putting it further into execution.

It might have been the case that some convention had fixed this right or altered the existing one; but, through your excellency's answer, I learn the contrary, and therefore we remain with the same rules of right which we previously possessed. It is to them that I adhere; and as the schooner Hazard was captured in the act of leaving the river Salado, and not, as your excellency had been informed, "at sea," an expression which your excellency makes use of; and, although literally correct, as she was unquestionably not captured in a port, still conveys an erroneous idea thus far, that it may signify that the capture did take place at sea, distant from the blockaded port.

An accidental absence of a blockading squadron on account of some urgent motives does not destroy the validity of the blockade if it is shortly re-assumed; such is the opinion laid down by Chitty, a more modern writer, in his work published in 1812, and strengthened by the authority of Sir William Scott, who frequently has given decisive sentences in favor of the United States ships captured by the English.

It is not in the power of your excellency to be acquainted with the orders transmitted by me to the vessels performing the blockade of the river Plate; still your excellency may have perceived that more than forty ships have been employed on that service; thus, with above forty vessels employed in blockading the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, it cannot reasonably be said that a blockade of those ports does not exist.

A possibility to elude blockades does not amount to annul them; it is a chance productive of benefit to those who succeed in the attempt, and disastrous to them that fail; which latter was the case with the schooner Hazard.

In March, 1799, (previous to the rules of 1807, which originated the war between the United States and England,) England declared all the ports of Holland to be in a state of blockade by the British forces; and that any vessel, whatever might be her flag or cargo, which should attempt to enter, would be condemned, according to the laws of nations, as trying to afford assistance to places besieged or blockaded. The same right that exists to blockade one port, does also exist to blockade many when the forces are sufficient. Your excellency will find these doctrines laid down in the respectable works of Mr. Sergeant Marshall and before-mentioned Chitty. Holland could certainly not be encircled by a close line of vessels; yet none of the neutral Powers did oppose the said declaration or the effects arising from it.

It being my duty to address your excellency on this occasion, I avail myself of the same opportunity to state that the officer lately sent by your excellency to reclaim four individuals witnessed that none of them were under circumstances of being discharged according to their contracts, and that one of them was an Englishman. Other individuals of that nation have been demanded by your excellency in consequence of letters written by them, although I have several times assured your excellency that no foreigner is detained on board the ships belonging to the squadron under my command after he has asked for his dismission and served the time of his engagement. The above stated will happen when faith is given to their own assertions; and, moreover, a prisoner of war has already been reclaimed from the frigate Paula, as having served his time of engagement; besides this, a demand has been made for the delivery of a Portuguese sailor from on board of the said ship, as being a citizen of the United States.

As his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil is at the same time King of Portugal, who can have a right to claim a Portuguese subject which is on board of a Brazilian ship-of-war?

England has frequently been at war without Hanover partaking in the same; if, under such circumstances, a Hanoverian was to be on board of a ship belonging to his Britannic Majesty, no one could certainly have a right to claim him. I am aware that your excellency has desisted from making such demands, and it was in order to prevent similar occurrences that I gave orders to signify to your excellency that I could not admit of any reclamation which was not made in writing.

Your excellency will find this method, which I have established and communicated to your excellency, to be far better than to give credit to letters from sailors, which may be conducive of disagreeable occurrences, which prudence bids to avoid.

As a proof of the esteem which I hold your excellency in, I have the pleasure to deliver up the two sailors, prisoners of war, and citizens of the United States, which your excellency desired to be set at liberty. Wishing your excellency a happy voyage, and envying to see your excellency delivered from the place of banishment in which I still must remain, I have the honor to be, with much consideration and profound respect, your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in South America.

No. 16.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, Rio Janeiro, May 22, 1827.

SIR: I enclose a copy of a letter addressed by me to the Marquis of Queluz, the Secretary of State of this Government for Foreign Affairs, and also a copy of his answer.

The negotiations for peace still continue. Nothing definitive has as yet taken place, or at least has yet transpired; but peace is so very necessary to both belligerents that I think the present negotiations must effect it.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, Rio Janeiro, May 17, 1827.

SIR: The Government of the United States not having at present a diplomatic representative at his Imperial Majesty's Court, it devolves upon me to acquaint your excellency that the American brig Calista, which arrived last evening at this port, has on board provisions consigned to me, as per bill of lading herewith enclosed. These provisions are for the sole use of the squadron under my command, and have been sent from the United States by order of the honorable the Minister of Marine of the United States at Washington.

I have the honor to request that your excellency will be pleased to give the necessary instructions to the officer of the customs, to enable these provisions to be discharged in the same manner as was done in November last, in a similar case. By the terms of the charter party, only fifteen days are allowed for the discharge of these provisions. I beg leave, therefore, to state that it will be a great accommodation to me if your excellency will be pleased to give instructions to the officer of the customs as soon as your excellency conveniently can, as, in the event of any part of these provisions remaining on board the Calista at the expiration of fifteen days, I shall be subject to the payment of a heavy demurrage daily.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency the MARQUIS OF QUELUZ,
Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 19, 1827.

The Marquis of Queluz presents his best compliments to Commodore James Biddle, and acquaints him that he has received his letter of the 17th instant, enclosing a bill of lading of provisions on board the American brig Calista, consigned to him by the honorable the Minister of the Marine of the United States for the sole use of the squadron under his command, requesting the same to be delivered to him free of duties.

The Marquis of Queluz has the pleasure of acquainting Commodore Biddle that his Imperial Majesty has agreed graciously to his requisition, and that orders have been issued on this date for that purpose.

The Marquis of Queluz avails himself of this opportunity to renew to Commodore Biddle the assurance of his esteem and consideration.

Extract of a letter from Master Commandant B. V. Hoffman to Captain James Biddle, dated United States ship Boston, Montevideo, May 13, 1827.

"The American schooner Montezuma has been sent in here by the blockading squadron, and expect she will be released as soon as the Brazilian admiral is made acquainted with the circumstances."

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, May 25, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to acquaint you, since my last, that nothing has transpired of consequence. Three American vessels have been sent in here under suspicious circumstances, and released immediately by the admiral, warning them of the blockade by endorsing their registers.

I regret to learn, by the late advices from Rio, that instead of peace there is every prospect of a continuation of the war.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

B. V. HOFFMAN.

JAMES BIDDLE, Esq.,
Commanding United States Naval Forces, Coast of Brazil.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Biddle to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

RIO JANEIRO, August 3, 1827.

"Enclosed is a copy of a letter from the Marquis Queluz to Mr. Wright, dated the 25th of May last. When Mr. Wright received this letter I requested him not to transmit it to Washington until we ascertained that there was actually an intention to restore the schooner Hazard. I now send a copy of this letter, because I learn from Montevideo that the vessel and cargo have already been restored

"I procured the other day the release of four American seamen, who had been impressed into the Brazil frigate Donna Paula, lying in this harbor."

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, May 25, 1827.

The Minister and Secretary of State for the Affairs of the Navy having communicated to me the correspondence carried on between Commodore Biddle, at present in this port, and the admiral, commander-in-chief of the Brizilian squadron in the river Plate, relative to the American schooner Hazard, detained by the aforesaid squadron, I have to inform Mr. W. H. D. C. Wright, consul of the United States of America, that I am about to carry this affair to the knowledge of his Majesty the Emperor, and already anticipate that the motives alleged against the detention of the aforesaid schooner appear to me worthy of attention.

By this opportunity I reiterate to Mr. Wright the protestation of my esteem and consideration.

MARQUIS OF QUELUZ.

Mr. W. H. D. C. WRIGHT, &c.

No. 21.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Pernambuco, August 27, 1827.

SIR: I sailed from Rio Janeiro on the 8th instant, remained several days about Cape Frio without seeing any privateers, and to-day arrived off this port. As the anchorage here is exposed I shall not myself leave the ship. I am about to send in a boat, with a communication to our consul, and the length of my stay here will depend, in some degree, upon the information I may derive from him.

I enclose a copy of a note from the Marquis Queluz to Mr. Wright. The allegation against the two seamen, Perry and Finchem, is, that when the schooner Leopard was boarded at sea by a Buenos Ayrean privateer, they informed the privateersmen that a Brazil officer was secreted below in the schooner; in consequence of which the Brazil officer was taken on board the privateer and detained. Upon the arrival of the Leopard at Rio Janeiro these two seamen were taken to the prison-ship; and subsequently, upon the application of Mr. Wright for their release, the order issued for their delivery to me. I sent the order to the prison-ship, received the two men, and they are now on board. I shall take an opportunity of sending them on board some homeward-bound American vessel. By the note of the Marquis Queluz you will perceive that these men are released upon an implied condition that they be remitted to our Government for punishment. These men owed no duty to the Brazil Government, nor could they properly be punished by it for any offence committed on board an American vessel at sea. It possessed, in fact, no right to imprison them, and, consequently, was bound to release them without conditions of any kind. Under these circumstances, and feeling a deep interest for every citizen who is unjustly deprived of his liberty by any foreign Power, I was of opinion that it would be fastidious in me to decline receiving these men because I did not intend to conform to this implied condition of their release. It would be absurd to send these men home for any trial or inquiry, since the Brazil Government has furnished no evidence to convict them, and the men themselves deny what is alleged against them. I presume, indeed, that the Government of Brazil never intends to inquire about these men; and if it does I should have no difficulty in giving a satisfactory explanation.

When I sailed from Rio Janeiro the Peacock was expected, and I left a letter for Captain Jones stating that, should circumstances admit of his doing so, it would be advantageous to the public interest if he would touch at Bahia and Pernambuco on his way home.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, August 6, 1827.

I have to acquaint Mr. Wright, consul for the United States of America, that the Minister and Secretary of State for the Marine Department has communicated to me his Imperial Majesty's determination that the two sailors, John Finchem and Isaac Perry, belonging to the American schooner Leopard, be placed at the disposal of the commander of the American forces in this port, declaring that his Imperial Majesty expects the said two seamen will be remitted to their Government in order to receive their due punishment.

By this opportunity I reiterate to Mr. Wright the protestation of my esteem and consideration.

MARQUIS OF QUELUZ.

Mr. W. H. D. C. WRIGHT, &c., &c., &c.

No. 22.

Extract of a letter from Commodore James Biddle to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, Rio Janeiro, October 21, 1827.

"My last letter to you was dated August 27, off Pernambuco. I sent in a communication to Mr. Mansfield, our consul at Pernambuco, inquiring of him whether the public tranquillity was still disturbed, whether the local authorities had unlawfully molested our citizens or their property, and whether the Buenos Ayrean cruisers on that part of the coast had interrupted our trade. Mr. Mansfield's answer, as you will perceive by the enclosed copy of his letter, being satisfactory upon all these points, I did not deem it necessary to anchor at Pernambuco.

"I arrived here on the 29th ultimo. From Captain Hoffman's different communications to me, it appears that since my leaving the river a number of American vessels have arrived safely at Buenos Ayres, and that two American vessels have been seized by the blockading squadron, namely: the brig Nile, from Canton, bound to Buenos Ayres, seized within a few miles of the city of Buenos Ayres; and the brig President Adams, from Montevideo to Baltimore, seized in the river about forty miles above Montevideo. The Nile has been released; the President Adams detained for adjudication. The cargo of this latter vessel is of small amount. The master of her having sent me his protest, and requested my interposition with the Government here for his release, I availed myself of the notification contained in the letter of the Marquis of Queluz to Mr. Wright, our consul, and sent him a certified copy of the protest. I have no answer to my note to the Marquis of Queluz. I do not expect any, nor is any necessary."

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Pernambuco, August 27, 1827.

DEAR SIR: I have to acknowledge the pleasure of your communication of to-day. I shall be greatly disappointed if I do not have the pleasure of seeing you on shore, and sincerely hope the weather may be so favorable to-morrow as to induce you to anchor and remain with us a few days. I believe you may anchor three miles from the shore with perfect safety.

As regards the political tranquillity of this province, I am happy to inform you it is perfectly restored. In fact it can hardly be said to have been disturbed by the late events. A conspiracy, emanating from an obscure source and confined to a few discontented individuals, was fortunately discovered in season to prevent any ill effects from it, and the principal actors arrested.

The President, general, and some others, were to have been assassinated, and the most direful consequences would have followed.

Our citizens and their property are respected by the local authorities, and every facility granted which we can require.

The commerce of the country has been greatly annoyed by the Buenos Ayrean cruisers; but in no instance have they molested the vessels of the United States. On the contrary, they have always been treated with the greatest civility; and when supplies have been drawn from them, ample returns have been made. This I attribute mainly to the presence of our ships-of-war on this coast.

You will be pleased to learn that our mutual friend, Captain Elliott, of the Cyane, has arrived home in safety.

The brig Ruth arrived here a few days ago from Philadelphia, and proceeded to Bahia, having, I believe, letters for the Macedonian. We are expecting the Adriana from Philadelphia in a few days.

Mr. Lees, supercargo of the Ruth, and a personal friend of Mr. Raguet, informed me that Mr. Raguet had been well received by the Government.

I am enabled, by the politeness of Captain Wm. Austin, to send you the latest papers here. He begs me, at the same time, to present you his most respectful compliments. He has a letter of introduction from a friend of yours.

Hoping for the gratification of seeing you, I am, dear sir, with sincere respect and regard, your most obedient servant,

JOHN T. MANSFIELD.

JAMES BIDDLE, Esq., United States Frigate Macedonian.

PALACE OF RIO DE JANEIRO, October 1, 1827.

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to communicate to Mr. W. H. D. C. Wright, consul for the United States of America, that his Majesty the Emperor has just appointed a consulting junto, composed of men of great confidence, to review the processes on maritime prizes made by the ships-of-war blockading Buenos Ayres, and others, a review of which has been or shall be requested, that, upon the report of the said junto, the imperial decision may be founded; that, in consequence, those reclamations may be addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in petitions made by the same parties, or in notes by their respective ministers plenipotentiary or agents, if they shall judge it necessary, giving a brief exposition of the grounds of the said reclamations.

The undersigned has deemed it necessary to make this participation to Mr. W. H. D. C. Wright, for the advancement of this business; and profits of his opportunity to reiterate the protests of his perfect esteem and obsequiousness.

MARQUIS DE QUELUZ.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, Rio Janeiro, October 9, 1827.

SIR: The consul of the United States at this port has furnished me with a copy of your excellency's letter of the 1st instant, notifying to him that his Imperial Majesty had appointed a consulting junto to review the processes on maritime prizes made by the ships-of-war blockading Buenos Ayres, and stating that the reclamations of the neutral parties may be addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

I have the honor, therefore, to transmit herewith to your excellency a certified copy of the protest on oath, made at the consulate of the United States at Montevideo by the commander, the officers, and two seamen of the American brig President Adams; which vessel, after disposing of all the saleable part of her cargo at Montevideo, sailed from that port, bound to the United States, and while prosecuting her homeward voyage was seized and detained by one of his Imperial Majesty's cruisers.

Under the hope that his Imperial Majesty will give such orders as may prevent the recurrence of similar outrages, I beg leave, on this occasion, to call your excellency's attention to the treatment experienced by the citizens of the United States composing the officers and crew of the President Adams, as detailed in the accompanying protest.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency the MARQUIS OF QUELUZ,
Counsellor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Rio Janeiro.

No. 23.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 19, 1827.

SIR: I reached this anchorage on the 6th instant from Rio Janeiro. Enclosed are copies of the letters which passed, during my absence from the river, between Admiral Rodrigo Pinto Guedes and Captain Hoffman. I also enclose a memorandum of the American vessels seized by the blockading squadron during my absence. The particulars in these cases are extracted chiefly from the protests made by the masters of the vessels. No vessels other than American have been seized; no others now attempt to force the blockade.

About two months ago the practice obtained here of endorsing the registers of all neutral vessels about to leave the port, notifying to them the blockade; and in some instances recently vessels have been prevented from sailing during strong easterly winds, upon the ground that sailing under such circumstances was violent presumption of an intention to break the blockade. These measures have been adopted in consequence of the number of vessels cleared from this port for Valparaiso that have arrived at Buenos Ayres. They have caused great clamor among those who are likely to be affected injuriously by them; but I shall find it difficult to bring myself to make any serious remonstrance upon the subject. Neutral vessels are allowed freely to come to this port; but it is, I think, asking too much to be allowed to sail from this port further up the river for information as to the blockade.

I enclose a copy of a letter to me from Mr. Forbes, our Chargé d'Affaires at Buenos Ayres. It behooves Mr. Forbes to be circumspect in giving such information as to any particular vessel, and I presume he has been so. It is, I think, certain that many vessels and cargoes leaving this port under the American flag, for Buenos Ayres, belong to foreigners residing at Buenos Ayres. The motives of these foreigners in wishing their property to appear as American until its safe arrival at Buenos Ayres, are sufficiently obvious; and as their secrecy may be depended upon as long as their interest requires them to be secret, it is difficult to detect foreign ownership in the case of any American vessel that may be seized.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, July 8, 1827.

The undersigned presents his compliments to the Baron of the Rio de la Plata, and commander-in-chief of his Imperial Majesty's naval forces in the Rio de la Plata, and requests he will inform the undersigned of the cause of the capture and detention of the American brig President Adams, whereof Albert P. de Valengin is master, taken on the morning of the 6th instant by one of the cruisers under his command.

The above vessel pursuing her legal voyage, and not having violated the blockade, it is presumed she is not liable to detention under that pretence.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

B. V. HOFFMAN.

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, off Montevideo, July 16, 1827.

The undersigned having received a note from Captain Hoffman, commandant of the corvette of the United States of North America, the Boston, under date of the 8th of this month, in which he expresses a desire to learn the motive for the detention of the brig President Adams, and adds that she was pursuing her voyage, and had not violated the blockade, proceeds to reply, having delayed for certain facts for his better instruction. Although intimation had been given to neutral nations that all the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres are blockaded by the maritime force of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, in order that no captain of a merchant vessel may plead ignorance, from time to time its continuation has been published, and even in Montevideo it was published on the 28th of last April in the gazette entitled Seminario Mercantil, and also by public notifications on the 21st of the said month of April, this place being, as it were, in the midst of the blockaded ports, and where neutral vessels came (for mere excuse or rather pretence) to make inquiry. Hence they cannot be ignorant of the blockade; and, in the centre of the blockaded ports, they may receive intelligence from their consuls, (preface 2d,) an anticipation perhaps unnecessary, because the United States will accede to the convention of 1780, which equally binds all other maritime nations. Nor is there discrepancy in the article which treats of the circumstances under which a port ought to be considered blockaded; for a vessel attempting to elude is deemed good prize if she be taken, since the last article of the same convention refers for elucidation to the preceding ones. The undersigned having thus laid down the principles, he proceeds to discuss the case in question. The brig President Adams loaded with provisions in Montevideo, and after it was known in the garrison (na Praca) by many and various gazettes of Buenos Ayres, and by official documents transcribed in them, that peace was not made, she sailed with a clearance for Boston on the 3d of this month, and was stopped at 6 o'clock in the channel between the Chico and Ortiz banks, heading W.NW., the direction in which the division blockading the more western ports has vessels stationed to prevent entrance into the Bay of Barragan, one of the blockaded ports, and the direction in which now there are no other than blockaded ports, having made a course totally opposite to that of her clearance. See how, abusing the hospitality and the good faith with which, in a garrison besieged by land, the sale of provisions is permitted for a neutral and friendly port, these same provisions were destined for the enemies of Brazil and for blockaded ports, making use of a friendly port to draw from it sustenance for the enemy, and using it also as a lookout where to wait and profit by the occasion favorable for doing it.

No one can doubt that this proceeding is more a means of making war with impunity than the liberty of trading as a neutral.

It is not to be believed that such cases, clothed with so iniquitous circumstances, can ever be sanctioned or justified by the President of the United States, whose learning and justice are admitted and well known; but it seems to be impossible to deter avaricious speculators from bad faith, (and Captain Hoffman has witnessed it here often enough,) whom only ruinous consequences can restrain. The papers of the brig, and the report of her case, are about to be delivered to the proper tribunal, where the parties interested will test its justice, remaining free from all future proceeding on my part. The undersigned presents his respectful compliments to Captain Hoffman, and assures that he is, with much consideration and respect, his attentive venerator and servant,

BARON OF THE RIO DE LA PLATA.

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, July 18, 1827.

SIR: On the 8th instant the undersigned had the honor to address your excellency a note requesting to be made acquainted with the cause of the capture and detention of the American brig President Adams, by one of the vessels of his Imperial Majesty acting under your command.

It ought not to be concealed that, to the undersigned, it has become a source of sincere regret that so long a time has elapsed without his having been honored with any communication from your excellency in reply to an inquiry involving no other points than a demonstration of the facts in relation to the aforesaid capture and detention. As it has been made a part of the duty of the undersigned, to the Government under which he has the honor to serve, to watch over and protect the maritime interests of his country, so far as the same may fall within his province, and to avail himself of every justifiable and honorable means within his power to accomplish the object of his trust; and believing your excellency has delayed an answer through a misapprehension of the motives of the undersigned, or from some other unforeseen cause, the undersigned begs leave to urge this subject again for your excellency's consideration; and, at the same time, to avail himself of the occasion to express the sentiments of high respect and esteem with which he has the honor to subscribe himself your excellency's most obedient servant,

B. V. HOFFMAN.

His Excellency the BARON OF RIO DE LA PLATA,
Admiral and Commander-in-chief of his Imperial Majesty's Naval Forces, &c., &c., &c., Rio de la Plata.

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, July 20, 1827.

SIR: The undersigned, in behalf of the master and passengers in the American brig President Adams, now under seizure in this port, has the honor to solicit your excellency's permission for them to take out of that vessel their private baggage, papers, &c., to be subject to such inspection as your excellency may please to direct.

The undersigned has the honor to renew the assurances of his highest respect and esteem.

B. V. HOFFMAN.

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, July 20, 1827.

SIR: The undersigned has the honor to transmit herewith the copy of a letter this day received from the master of the American brig Nile, bound from Canton to Buenos Ayres, but intercepted and brought to this port by the blockading squadron of his Imperial Majesty stationed off Buenos Ayres. Upon examination your excellency will find the following points clearly demonstrated: That the brig left Canton in total ignorance of the continuation of the war which so unhappily subsists between his Imperial Majesty and the Republic of Buenos Ayres, and, of course, could not be aware of any impediment in the pursuit of the voyage; that she was not boarded by any vessel, prior to her capture, by which she could have been furnished with the necessary information of the blockade of Buenos Ayres; and that, upon the strictest scrutiny, it will be ascertained that the whole cargo, as well as the vessel, is bona fide the property of citizens of the United States. It ought also to be remembered, in corroboration of the legality of the voyage and of the purity of Captain Forbes' intentions, that, in consequence of having no prize crew placed on board, it was at his own option to obey the orders of the commanding officer of the blockading squadron or evade them.

Under all the circumstances of the case, and considering the liberal construction which his Imperial Majesty has been pleased to place on the laws of blockades, and so very honorably conceded to the Government of the United States, the undersigned flatters himself that your excellency will find no difficulty in awarding to the American brig Nile a fair and honorable acquittal.

The undersigned has the honor to be your excellency's most obedient servant,

B. V. HOFFMAN.

His Excellency the BARON OF RIO DE LA PLATA,
Admiral and Commander-in-chief of his Imperial Majesty's Naval Forces, &c., Rio de la Plata.

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, September 6, 1827.

SIR: The undersigned has the honor to address your excellency in behalf of a number of citizens of the United States of America, now serving on board the fleet under your excellency's command, whose terms of service are represented to have expired. The Government of the United States has ever viewed the employment and detention of its citizens by foreign Powers as a subject of special care and interest, requiring from its officers a strict investigation, so far as the same may be practicable, of every case of involuntary detention that falls under their observation. The undersigned refers particularly, at this time, to the case of George Brown and others, on board his Imperial Majesty's ships Emperatrie and Isabella, and a seaman by the name of Elliott, now on shore at the hospital. But the undersigned places implicit reliance upon your excellency's sense of justice, and due regard to the present good feeling manifested towards each other by our respective Governments, that, should other cases of the like nature appear, your excellency will, as in those now complained of, cause a free and impartial investigation to be instituted; and the undersigned pledges, in all cases where similar complaints may be made by the officers of his Imperial Majesty to those of the United States, that every facility shall be afforded to effect a full and ample restitution. The undersigned would also respectfully call your excellency's attention to the course of conduct which, during the absence of your excellency, has been pursued towards the crew of the American brig President Adams. My communication of the 20th of July, in behalf of the passengers and master of that vessel, was designed to include all concerned, nor did the undersigned consider, in asking for their rights, it was necessary to designate the particular persons in the roll of equipage. It never could have been intended that the crew of any vessel, captured under whatever pretext, should, when turned on shore, be deprived of their bedding and clothing; notwithstanding, however, the undersigned has the mortification to inform your excellency that these poor men have been prohibited from touching a single article belonging to them on board the brig President Adams. The undersigned renews the assurances of his high respect, and begs to offer his congratulations on your excellency's return to this anchorage.

B. V. HOFFMAN.

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, October 23, 1827.

SIR: The undersigned is truly mortified that it should ever again become his duty to address your excellency on the subject of alleged grievances inflicted on the citizens of the United States by the authorities of his Imperial Majesty on this station, but the undersigned must permit no regrets or feelings to swerve him from his duty. By the statement of Jacob Goodrich, master of the brig Caspian, of Boston, (detained by the blockading squadron, and sent in for adjudication,) it appears that the register of that vessel had, prior to her sailing, been endorsed by an officer of the customs in this harbor. It also appears, by a statement of Oliver G. Lane, master of the American brig Frederick, that the register of that vessel has been forcibly and surreptitiously taken and withheld while lying at anchor in this port, by an officer acting, as I have reason to believe, under the immediate orders of your excellency. The undersigned begs leave hereby to protest against such acts, and every such proceeding, in future, in regard to American vessels; and flatters himself that your excellency will perceive at once the impolicy of the authorities on shore persisting in the continuance of such a feeble and futile auxiliary to an alleged blockade as the endorsement of the papers of vessels while lying at anchor in port. It requires no profound knowledge of the policy of the Government of the United States, or the principles by which it is guided in its intercourse with other nations, to predict that such a course of proceeding, if persisted in, will only tend to multiply claims on the Imperial Government, while it will keep alive certain rancorous feelings that have unhappily arisen out of acts of a similar nature during the present war. The undersigned has the honor to request of your excellency an answer whether the endorsements of the papers of the brig Caspian and the forcible seizure and detention of the register of the brig Frederick are acts authorized by your excellency. The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to remind your excellency that his letters of the 20th of July and 6th of September last remain unanswered, and that the requests therein contained are not yet complied with. The undersigned has the honor to subscribe himself, with all due consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

B. V. HOFFMAN.

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, October 23, 1827.

The undersigned acknowledges the receipt of the note, dated this day, addressed to him by Mr. Hoffman, which contains three principal objects, viz: the want of reply to his notes of July; the detention of the hermaphrodite brig Caspian; and the visits made to vessels of the United States in the port of Montevideo. With regard to the first, Mr. Hoffman, recollecting that he sent his notes at the moment in which the undersigned made sail, could not expect him to defer going upon what he conceived to be a necessary service merely to answer concerning subjects about which it was not well to ask him; because all that appertains to prizes may be pleaded in the court and tribunals where those causes are lodged; and, in connexion with this, the second object mentioned above remains answered. As to the third, the undersigned, aware that Mr. Hoffman is not ignorant that merchant vessels are subject to the regulations (registros) of the ports into which they enter; that they ought to present their papers on their arrival, in order that their circumstances may be known; and, also, before their departure, that they may show full permit for getting under way, he (S. Sa.) cannot deem himself authorized to make opposition to these measures of policy, which are general, and in which the practice of all nations has not been exceeded; besides, (because the conditions of the war so require,) it must be stated on the registers (nos passaportes) of all merchant vessels, without exception, that the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, within the Rio de la Plata, are blockaded. This is a measure that you (S. Sa.) ought to esteem, for it obviates inconvenience to vessels of the citizens of the United States making voyages to those ports, through ignorance that commerce with them is prohibited; because, otherwise, it would be to give declared protection to those who attempt to perform them with full knowledge of the fact, abusing the good faith with which cargoes are allowed them in the very ports of the Empire, near to those blockaded, for the purpose of carrying them to aid the enemies of the Emperor—a protection not to be hoped for, from the known honor of yourself, (de S. Sa.;) nor would it be possible that the wise and just Government of the United States should confound such insidious operations with the well-defined rights of neutral commerce. Moreover, merchant vessels being obliged to submit to the visits of belligerents wherever they may be met with, cannot be less so in the very ports of the belligerents, it is only from bad faith that merchant vessels can complain of so prudent a measure—one which warns them that they may not incur risk.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew the assurances of consideration with which he is your (S. Sa.) most attentive venerator and servant,

BARON OF THE RIO DE LA PLATA.

Most Illustrious D. HOFFMAN.

UNITED STATES SHIP BOSTON, Montevideo, October 28, 1827.

The undersigned returns his thanks to his excellency the Baron of Rio de la Plata for the prompt attention which his note of the 23d instant received. The undersigned would have considered it his duty to have rejoined immediately, but some circumstances prevented him. The undersigned is somewhat perplexed to perceive that your excellency must have misunderstood him in the extent of the subject touched upon. It was not contended by the undersigned that American vessels ought not to submit to the visits of belligerents, either at sea or in the ports of the latter; nor is he ignorant that these vessels must subject themselves to the rules of the port in entering and clearing at the custom-house; in which measures of policy the undersigned is not aware that the exactions of the authorities of his Imperial Majesty exceed those of other nations. But to these positions your excellency is pleased to subjoin, that "it must be stated on the register (nos passaportes) of all merchant vessels, without exception, that the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, within the Rio de la Plata, are blockaded." The undersigned confesses he does understand how far this is intended by your excellency as a declaration that the endorsements of the registers of vessels, warning them of alleged blockades, will, in future, be delegated to the authorities on shore. If the undersigned is to understand your excellency that such will be the future course of procedure, all further discussion on this question will be most cheerfully yielded to other hands. The undersigned referred, in his communication of the 6th September, to the alleged detention of several American seamen in the imperial squadron beyond the time for which they were enlisted; and, in one of his communications, of the 20th July last, the undersigned complained in behalf of the master, &c., of the brig President Adams, that they had been deprived of their clothing, &c. This latter complaint was reiterated in the undersigned's note of the 6th of September, yet the clothing has been withheld, subject, as is stated, to the orders of your excellency. On all these subjects, therefore—1st, the endorsement of the registers of American vessels while lying at anchor in port; 2d, the alleged detention of some American citizens on board the fleet under your excellency's command; and, 3d, the withholding the personal effects of the crew of the brig President Adams—the undersigned is at a loss to discover distinct answers in your excellency's note of the 23d instant.

The undersigned has the honor to subscribe himself, with all due respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

B. V. HOFFMAN.

His Excellency the BARON OF RIO DE LA PLATA.

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, October 30, 1827.

The undersigned having received to-day the note dated, the 28th instant, addressed to him by Señor Hoffman, commandant of the corvette of the United States of North America the Boston, and seeing that it essentially resolves itself into three articles, specified by him, (S. Sa.,) proceeds to answer to them separately, in the same numerical order.

1. The declaration on the registers of vessels, without regard to their nation, is made, before they make sail, by an officer and boat of the squadron, to whom it is not possible to deny the right to visit, either on the ocean or in a national port, and has for its object to warn neutral vessels of all nations, and in that manner to prevent them from proceeding, through ignorance, to the blockaded ports.

2. There was no seaman, citizen of the United States, who had completed his term of service at the time the demand for such was made. Several times, and in the port of Montevideo, the military authorities of the United States have been assured that no individual of a neutral State has ever been detained against his will after the service to which he had bound himself by contract had been performed; and in case the term expires while out of port, they remain absolved from all duty whatever until they arrive at a place where they may disembark; but an inclination to take cognizance of letters of seamen who are destitute of truth will lead to a needless augmentation of correspondence and to a useless waste of time.

3. The effects of individuals attached to the detained vessels, which, from their nature, are known not to be intended for commerce, are always delivered to their owners. This being the general rule of the squadron, was particularly declared with respect to the brig President Adams. Still, if in its execution there may have been neglect, on notification from Sr. Hoffman it shall be corrected.

The undersigned has the honor to declare himself your (S. Sa.) attentive venerator and servant,

BARON OF THE RIO DE LA PLATA.

Most Illustrious Sr. B. V. HOFFMAN.

Memorandum of American vessels seized, &c., by the blockading squadron, between the 24th of April last (the date of the Macedonian's leaving Montevideo) and this 19th day of November, 1827.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 19, 1827.

1. Schooner Montezuma, of Baltimore, 147 tons; cargo, sugar, tobacco, and other articles; sailed April 13 from Rio Janeiro for Valparaiso; put into the river in consequence of experiencing bad weather and being short of water; was seized May 6 by a Brazil corvette, sent into Montevideo, and released by the admiral; she afterwards went to Buenos Ayres.

2. Brig President Adams, of Baltimore, 199 tons burden, partly in ballast; sailed from Montevideo for Baltimore July 5; about 2 o'clock the next morning, being forty or fifty miles up the river, and steering to the westward, was fired at by a vessel, from which she endeavored to escape, but at daylight was captured and sent into Montevideo; released November 6 by the admiral, the master consenting to waive all claim for damages and to withdraw his protest.

3. Brig Nile, of Boston, 193 tons; with teas, silks, and other articles, from China, bound to Buenos Ayres; was seized July 11 in the outer roads of Buenos Ayres, sent to Montevideo, and released by the admiral.

4. Brig Brutus, of New York, 212 tons burden; cargo, sugar, tobacco, and other articles; sailed September 14 from Santos for the Pacific; September 28, found it necessary to put into the nearest port for supplies; October 2, grounded upon the Spit of Ensenada, (which is up the river, about ninety miles above Montevideo;) was taken possession of by the Brazil squadron; the Buenos Ayrean fort then commenced to fire upon the Brutus, and the Brazil squadron, unable to get her afloat, burnt her.

5. Brig Caspian, of Boston, 160 tons burden; cleared from Montevideo September 29, with her register endorsed that all the ports of Buenos Ayres were in a state of blockade; the master of the Caspian deemed this endorsement illegal, and proceeded up the river to obtain correct information relative to the blockade, and was seized October 2, near Ensenada, sent into Montevideo, and is now awaiting trial.

6. Brig Velocity, of Salem, 119 tons; cargo, bread, rum, and other articles; from Salem to Valparaiso; October 23, was captured by a Brazil cruiser at sea, in the latitude of 41° south, sent into Montevideo, and released by the admiral on the day she arrived at Montevideo.

7. Brig Tuscaloosa, of New York, 228 tons; captured while at anchor off Salado, taking in a cargo of jerked beef, by a privateer launch; the privateer's commission was signed by the President of this province; the Tuscaloosa, Mr. Forbes says, belongs, with her cargo, to foreigners residing in Buenos Ayres. The master has not made a protest before the American consul, nor has he asked my interference in his behalf.

No. 25.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 9, 1827.

SIR: I enclose copies of my correspondence with the Brazil admiral up to this date. The Boston got under way from this anchorage for Buenos Ayres on the morning of the 13th ultimo, and returned yesterday. I considered it due to Mr. Forbes to leave to his discretion the length of the Boston's stay at Buenos Ayres. Enclosed is a copy of my orders to Captain Hoffman, also a copy of his report to me.

In the frigate Congress, in 1823, my order from the Navy Department was not to enter Cadiz if a blockading squadron should object to my doing so; but I consider the order as applying only to that particular case, and not as governing me in all cases. A great desire has been felt by my countrymen and others, since my first arrival on this station, that I would test the principle as to the applicability of a blockade to a ship-of-war, but this I considered improper. My impression was, that I ought to communicate with Buenos Ayres if any public object rendered a communication necessary, and that otherwise I ought not. My reasons for sending the Boston to Buenos Ayres are stated in my communications to the admiral and in my letter to Mr. Forbes of the 12th ultimo, a copy of which is enclosed.

With respect to the American seaman, William Nye, I received information from our consul, on the afternoon of the 20th, that Nye had been impressed the preceding night. I sent an officer to state this to the admiral, desiring also that he would release Nye, and his answer was that he would inquire into the circumstances. At the end of two days, not hearing from the admiral, not hearing from the consul that the man had been released, and knowing the frigate was about to sail, I wrote my note to the admiral. Nye was released, not on the 20th, as stated by the admiral, but on the succeeding day.

No vessels have been seized by the blockading squadron since the date of my letter to you of the 19th ultimo. During the last month six American vessels entered the blockaded ports, of which number five had sailed last from Montevideo.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

[Translation.]

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, November 10, 1827.

The undersigned has the honor to thank his excellency Commodore Biddle for the polite message of compliments sent him this morning, which he duly reciprocates.

His excellency Commodore Biddle having, at the same time, requested that the pilot (o piloto practico) of the Rio de la Plata be lent to bring the frigate Macedonian nearer the harbor, and also to conduct the corvette Boston to the port of Buenos Ayres, the undersigned conceives it his duty to make some observations to his excellency Commodore Biddle with regard to the second object. In consequence of the war between the Empire of Brazil and the Republic of Buenos Ayres, his Imperial Majesty declared the ports of his enemies within the Rio de la Plata under blockade; and blockades, (declaration of war having preceded, whence alone that right can be derived,) it has been constantly admitted by all nations, should not be violated by their vessels of war. From this general consent, by natural consequence, the practice to the contrary is regarded as a positive offence, and it does not seem reasonable, the two nations, Brazil and the United States, being as yet amicable, each party endeavoring to continue so, that this state of things should be altered without, perchance, there appearing to be any necessity for such a misunderstanding.

The undersigned desiring to obviate as much as possible a measure that may excite discord, and at the same time to improve the occasion of having it in his power to render to the Government of the United States, and also to his excellency Commodore Biddle, the services always due to friends, offers to his excellency any vessel whatever of the imperial squadron to carry his officers to Buenos Ayres under a flag of truce; in that manner some person, whom his excellency may designate, will be able to go with them if it should be found necessary.

The undersigned deems it proper to make to his excellency Commodore Biddle some explanation concerning the entrance of English vessels of war into the port of Buenos Ayres, to prevent that fact from being adduced as a precedent.

England, as mediatory nation for peace between the Empire of Brazil and the Republic of Buenos Ayres, had, for that reason, to send there a corvette which carried one of the negotiators and the treaty. Reports being in circulation that it would not be ratified, the populace of the capital became riotous, and lampoons against the British envoy and the English in general were posted. Lord Ponsonby judged it prudent to exhibit there more British force to compel respect, and then the frigate Forte went up; to her I lent my pilot, because as yet there was hope of peace, for there had been no movement which indicated in fact a rejection of the treaty; they all retired, a brig having gone twice afterwards with despatches in furtherance of that end by the mediatory nation.

From the above his excellency Commodore Biddle will perceive that the British vessels of war went to Buenos Ayres not upon the service of England, but upon that of the Empire of Brazil, and that, with the exception of these, no other vessels of war have hitherto gone there.

If the United States were the mediatory nation, (as surely they would have been, from the good understanding and the friendship which they have for his Imperial Majesty, if his Britannic Majesty had not anticipated them,) the same would have happened with their vessels that has occurred with the English, and the latter would not have gone up.

Possessed of all that has been recited, his excellency Commodore Biddle will form the resolution that may appear to him most suitable to the occasion, remaining responsible for the consequences.

The undersigned will have the pleasure of sending the pilot to obey the orders of his excellency in shifting the birth of the frigate Macedonian, not being able to spare him for a longer time, because affairs wearing a different aspect from what they did when he allowed him to carry up the frigate Forte, it may be necessary to him at any moment to get under way.

If in anything else his excellency Commodore Biddle shall find that the undersigned have it in his power to oblige, he may count upon his willingness to the utmost of the ability of the squadron under his command.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency Commodore Biddle assurance of the highest consideration with which he has the honor to be his excellency's most attentive and obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

Most Excellent Sr. JAMES BIDDLE,
Commandant of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 11, 1827.

SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 10th instant has been received and attentively considered.

A number of American vessels have recently arrived at Buenos Ayres; and the seamen belonging to them being there discharged, are often compelled, by their necessities, to enter a foreign service. It is my duty to endeavor to relieve these seamen as far as practicable, by furnishing them the means of quitting Buenos Ayres in a public vessel of the United States.

Outrages of an aggravating character have recently been committed upon the lawful commerce of the United States by the private armed vessels of Buenos Ayres, and particularly the American brig Ruth, bound to Santos, and the American brig Anna, bound to Rio Janeiro, have been captured by Buenos Ayrean privateers, and the crews of both vessels have been abused. To ascertain if these captures and this abuse be sanctioned by the Government, and to decide in what manner I shall in future treat these privateers at sea, it is indispensable I should communicate with the diplomatic representative of the United States at Buenos Ayres. These are the considerations which have determined me to send the Boston to Buenos Ayres; and in communicating them I give to your excellency a new proof of my respectful and amicable disposition. It was not necessary I should communicate them, since, in the case of the Boston, all that a blockading squadron can rightfully claim is to be satisfied that she is a public vessel of the United States; and to this end I have already ordered Captain Hoffman to show his commission from the President of the United States to any Brazil cruiser that may ask to see it.

I must be permitted to say, notwithstanding your excellency's observation to the contrary, that blockades never have been deemed to extend to public ships. Great Britain, almost perpetually at war, and numerically superior at sea to any other nation, never for a moment pretended that neutral ships-of-war could be affected by blockades. During several years of the war in Europe, the Government of the United States maintained its diplomatic intercourse with France exclusively by means of its public ships entering the French blockaded ports. In 1811, in the United States ship Hornet, I myself went into Cherbourg, then blockaded by a British squadron; was boarded as I went in by the blockading squadron, but merely for the purpose of ascertaining our national character.

To the list of neutral ships mentioned by your excellency as having gone to Buenos Ayres your excellency might have added the United States ship Cyane, in April, 1826, and his Britannic Majesty's packet regularly every month since the first establishment of the blockade.

It results, therefore, that in sending the corvette Boston to Buenos Ayres, I exercise an indisputable and customary right. At the same time, I fully recognize the relations of amity happily subsisting between the United States and Brazil, and am disposed to preserve them so far as may depend upon me.

When at this anchorage in February last, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Buenos Ayres expressed a desire that I would visit Buenos Ayres; but I then declined, because then no object of a public nature existed to call me there. I did not consider the blockade as at all interfering to prevent my going to Buenos Ayres, but as long as I had no public duty to perform there, I deemed it proper to abstain from going there. Now, however, as your excellency must perceive, objects important to the interests of the United States require that I should communicate with Buenos Ayres; and these objects, your excellency must also perceive, I cannot, consistently with my duty, neglect.

As it is necessary to my views that Captain Hoffman should have a personal interview with our Chargé d'Affaires at Buenos Ayres, and as it is not prudent, at this exposed anchorage, that he should be separated from his vessel, I must decline your excellency's offer of one of the vessels under your command to convey my officer to Buenos Ayres, while I duly appreciate the kindness of the offer.

I will add that, upon my arrival here, on the 6th instant, I received communications from the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Buenos Ayres, urging strongly, and upon public grounds, the presence of a public vessel of the United States there.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, November 11, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Although I might have been ignorant of some facts which your excellency recites as having occurred in the late war, I am now informed of them; yet I beg leave to make some remarks upon the same subject, impelled to do so by the station I occupy in the Rio de la Plata.

Your excellency knows perfectly well that, in the late war, monstrous transactions had taken place, such as are no longer received in the law of nations. He who was then chief of the French nation for many years, holding his will alone as legitimate right, forced other nations to resort to extraordinary measures to counteract disorganizing attacks. Your excellency, therefore, must see that examples drawn from that war cannot well apply to periods in which more regularity existed.

The English nation itself, from whom your excellency argues, has given a decision, and consequently pursues a different course in the present war between his Imperial Majesty and the Republic of Buenos Ayres. Some of the English authorities, as well in Rio Janeiro as in the La Plata, pretending to establish the same doctrine which your excellency lays down as certain, the question was referred to the Cabinet of London, and his Britannic Majesty decided that vessels of war could not enter blockaded ports, and such has continued to be the practice of the English.

Permit me, your excellency, to deny the argument of the Packet, because it proceeds from a special convention, and therefore cannot enter into the general rule. No one can forget that that establishment being entirely commercial, its continuance was indispensable for the adjustment of accounts and the liquidation of funds, from the different circumstances which the war and the blockade were about to impose on mercantile transactions. But it does not appear to me that Brazil, in similar cases, and by means of similar vessels, would deny the communication to any other Power. As to the case of the Cyane, though I respect much Captain Elliott, who commanded her, still I cannot admit, before the act be proven a proper one, that it should authorize others.

I cannot agree in opinion with your excellency in adducing arguments from the English because their maritime force exceeds that of other nations. The right of blockade emanates from sovereignty, and as this consists in independence, the small State is sovereign as well as the greater; the rights are equal; otherwise, we are to be considered as degenerated to a state of nature, out of society, where force alone has the right to govern. From this general rule, without making relative application, concerning which I would have much to say, your excellency will see that the comparison does not sustain them. Besides, in conflict with the arguments drawn from the principles of England, the decision of the English Government mentioned above will convince your excellency that there is uncertainty in the opinion affirmed.

I cannot believe that the just requisition of the President of the United States depends for its satisfaction by the Government of Buenos Ayres on a show of force, which could only be employed in case of obstinacy; and therefore I must hope that your excellency may order detention; and, that all may terminate according to your excellency's desires, I again offer any vessel to the orders of your excellency, as, in the same manner, I remain obedient in all things.

I renew my assurances of being, with the greatest consideration and respect, your excellency's most attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

Most Excellent Sr. JAMES BIDDLE,
Commandant of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 12, 1827.

SIR: Your excellency's letter of yesterday's date I received this morning.

The usage of nations is not to apply a blockade to ships-of-war; and this usage is conformable to reason, since the legitimate and only object of a blockade is to exclude supplies; and your excellency well knows that a ship-of-war never carries supplies of any kind, except for her own use.

I beg leave to state, in addition to my letter of the 11th instant, that, in 1818, while in command of the United States sloop-of-war Ontario, I entered the port of Valparaiso, then blockaded by a Spanish squadron. The Spanish commodore notified to me the blockade, and requested I would acknowledge the notification of it; which I accordingly did in writing, and then entered the port.

In 1819 the United States frigate Macedonian, Captain Downes, entered the port of Callao, then blockaded by the Chili squadron, commanded by Lord Cochrane, who boarded the Macedonian as she went in.

In 1802 I was a junior officer in the American squadron then blockading the port of Tripoli. A Danish frigate came off the port, which our squadron boarded, and permitted to enter.

Independently of this general usage in regard to blockades, the ships-of-war of another neutral nation have, during the present blockade, passed up to Buenos Ayres. It matters not whether these ships went to Buenos Ayres in their own right, or by the relaxation of your belligerent rights, since your excellency knows that a belligerent is not permitted to apply different principles to different neutral nations, but is bound to conduct towards all alike. Submission to so injurious a distinction is inconsistent alike with national honor and the principles of strict neutrality.

Embargoes are analogous to blockades, and they do not extend to ships-of-war. On the 13th of November last his Imperial Majesty's Government notified to the foreign ships-of-war at Rio Janeiro that an embargo was laid on all the vessels in port. I was lying there with three ships; and the service for them admitting of delay, I deemed it proper, in courtesy to a friendly nation, to respect the embargo. Commodore Jones was lying there with two ships-of-war of the United States under his command; and, as the service in which he was engaged admitted not of delay, he declined, on that account, to respect the embargo, and accordingly put to sea. In 1818, while I was in command of the United States sloop-of-war Ontario, at Valparaiso, an embargo was laid by the Government; and Lord Cochrane, then commanding the naval forces of Chili, requested me to continue in port during the continuance of the embargo. I declined, however, and went to sea. In 1817 an embargo was laid at the port of Callao, and the Vice King of Peru requested Commodore Bowles, of his Britannic Majesty's frigate Amphion, to remain. He refused, however, and went to sea.

I have entered thus largely into the subject in the hope of satisfying your excellency that I have a perfect right to communicate with Buenos Ayres. The public objects requiring my communicating with Buenos Ayres I have already explained, not that I deemed it obligatory upon me to do so, but from sentiments of personal esteem for your excellency. It would give me great pleasure to conform in all things to your excellency's wishes; but my public duty must be performed, and it only remains to me to acquaint your excellency that the Boston will proceed up the river to-morrow if the wind permits.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 17, 1827.

SIR: The schooner "Joven Emelia," under the Buenos Ayrean flag, and bound from Rio Negro to Salado, was captured on the 17th ultimo by his Imperial Majesty's cruiser Independencia on Morté, and brought into this port. Mr. Ebenezer K. Battelle, a citizen of the United States, was a passenger on board the "Joven Emelia" at the time of her capture; and he had with him a small amount of property, as the accompanying documentary evidence will satisfactorily show. Mr. Battelle was at Rio Negro when the war commenced between his Imperial Majesty and the Government of Buenos Ayres. He was unable, for the want of opportunity, to leave the country; and had, at length, no other means of doing so than by embarking in the "Joven Emelia." Among the accompanying papers, your excellency will perceive certificates from some of his Imperial Majesty's officers, who were prisoners of war at Rio Negro, of Mr. Battelle's hospitality and kindness to them while prisoners. Mr. Battelle had among his papers an order upon the Government of Buenos Ayres for thirty dollars. He informs me that this was for money which, by a forced contribution levied upon all foreigners, he was compelled to pay. From Mr. Battelle's respectability of character, I presume that there can be no doubt that he was compelled to pay this money; and he informs me that he can prove it by persons now in Montevideo. All Mr. Battelle's clothing, bedding, &c., was lost on board the Independencia on Morté.

"The effects of neutrals," says Vattel, Law of Nations, book 3, chapter 7, "found in an enemy's ship, are to be restored to their owners, against whom there is no right of confiscation, but without any allowance for detainder, decay," &c.

I have the honor to request that your excellency will be pleased to give directions that this property of Mr. Battelle be restored to him.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD H. I. B. MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, November 18, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The letter which your excellency wrote me, under date of yesterday, contains a proposition of maritime rights that your excellency upholds as the opinion of Vattel.

Without doubt, Vattel, in his work, entitled Rights of Nations on Principles of the Law of Nature applied to the Conduct and Affairs of Nations, in the 3d vol., 3d book, 7th chap., and page 116, treating of neutral property shipped on board of enemies' vessels, expresses what your excellency refers to, and declares that there is no right to appeal for loss sustained on the occasion—that is, it is a risk to which the shipper is exposed when he embarks it on board of enemies' vessels; for example, if a shot should kill on board of her a passenger of a neutral nation. Your excellency gave me, under this principle, an opportunity of speaking of another, which was particularly connected in controversies of maritime right; and I embrace it, and implore your pardon if it should be too voluminous, but the subject requires it.

The enemy's flag to condemn the cargo, and the neutral's not to save, are principles still more ancient, and formed an example or rule before Vattel (who approved of the second, as I will say) cited in his above mentioned work, which were written by Grotius, Gentilis, and others. But, after Vattel had written, many treaties and ordinances established the doctrine to be good prize all property found at sea under an enemy's flag; and so numerous are the opinions given in favor of this doctrine that it would be irksome to quote them.

With regard to the flag not covering property at sea, Vattel himself, folio 116, above quoted, to whom your excellency refers, affirms it. But he is not the only author; the same doctrine your excellency will find in Valin, vol. 2, book 3, article 19, of prizes, page 233; Azuni, in his Universal System of Maritime Rights, published in Paris, and translated from Digeon, vol. 2, page 190; Chitty, London edition of 1812, chap. 4, page 118; Consulat de la mer Artigo, 273; Grotius de jure belli ac pacis; Locinius de jure maritimo; Cavalleiro de Abreu, in his Treatise on Prizes made at Sea, founding himself on treaties of Perineus and Utrecht; Lampredi on the Commerce of Neutrals, page 174; and others. Here, now, your excellency has this principle well authenticated by respectable authors, including those cited by your excellency. But, notwithstanding, I observe, in the letter which your excellency wrote me on the 3d of January, this year, complaining of detained vessels, you included in the list the brig Leonidas, which went to bring cargo of the enemy of his Imperial Majesty, and merely on this charge was a good prize, paying her freight; and Mr. Raguet communicated to the Brazilian Government on this subject that the United States never acknowledged the principle that the flag did not cover the cargo. Without doubt, Mr. Raguet did not remember at that moment that the United States had made a treaty with England, in which the 17th article was contrary to what he quoted.

I have trespassed thus far on your excellency, with the sole intention of explaining to your excellency that I never act without having the support of the best authors or treaties, and never from my own judgment.

In fine, I will say to your excellency that I am of Vattel's opinion in the case of which your excellency treats; and that my principles, with respect to these two points, only allude to the nature of the property, and not to that of the vessel. Consequently, your excellency can have it made known to Mr. Battelle that he can receive the bales he claims, as I send orders for them to be delivered to him.

I return to your excellency the papers you sent me, and also others, with a memorial that Mr. Battelle had addressed to me a little prior to the receipt of your excellency's letter.

I do not enter into an examination of the forced or gratuitous contribution of Mr. Battelle; but it appears, without his having adopted the Republic of Buenos Ayres as his country, he could not have more outraged or violated the laws of neutrality; and Mr. Battelle's complaining to his own proper Government would atone for it. Let us waive this subject, which is very delicate, and let us judge of it as a matter of little moment.

I have the honor to be, with consideration and respect, your excellency's most attentive and obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander of the United States Naval Forces on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 20, 1827.

SIR: I am honored with your excellency's letter of the 18th instant, and I have made known to Mr. Battelle the orders which your excellency has been pleased to give for the restoration of his property.

Your excellency states that, in my letter of the 3d of January last, complaining of detained vessels, I had included the case of the brig Leonidas. Your excellency has been led into this error by quoting my letter from memory only, since, in my letter to your excellency, of January 3 last, no mention is made of the Leonidas.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 21, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to acquaint your excellency that James Willis, Ebenezer Clark, John George, John Canty, William Barry, and Charles Haydman, all of them American seamen, were captured, by his Imperial Majesty's frigate Dona Paula, in the month of April last; and that, after their capture, Captain Norton made an agreement with these seamen to enter the Brazil service for the term of six months, promising, on his part, to give them their pay and their discharge from the service at the expiration of the six months. Having served seven months, these seamen were recently sent down from the inner squadron, commanded by Captain Norton, and are now confined in the prison at Montevideo. During my former visit to this river, I had reason to believe that Captain Norton did not always act with good faith towards the American seamen who happened to be under his command. I have, however, implicit confidence in the justice of your excellency; and I pray your excellency to cause the necessary inquiries to be made into the circumstances of these men, after which I am sure your excellency will do what is right and proper on the occasion.

Your excellency well knows the deep interest it is my duty to take in the behalf of every American citizen unjustly deprived of his liberty by any foreign Power; and that a main object with me, in sending the corvette Boston to Buenos Ayres, was the hope of bringing away the distressed American seamen who otherwise might be forced, by their distresses, to enter the service of Buenos Ayres.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD H. I. B. MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, November 21, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have just received your excellency's letter, dated to-day, in which your excellency demands the liberation of six prisoners of war.

No one knows better than your excellency that a prisoner of war cannot have any right to the protection of a neutral Power; he cannot have any other than that of force; and the using of it would make the neutral a belligerent. The act of taking up arms against a nation in amity with his own deprives him of the protection it was bound to afford him before the commission of a hostile act, and placed his own nation in a state of war if it should pretend to support such an aggression; it would, therefore, approve of the act in defending the aggressor.

It is also an incontrovertible principle of the right of nations and war that no prisoner ceases to be considered as such while the war exists, if he be not exchanged previously, or his liberation agreed upon.

In consideration of these two unquestionable principles, let us consider the circumstances in which the seamen demanded by your excellency are placed.

They were taken, on the 8th of April, on board a Buenos Ayrean brig-of-war, after having fought for some hours (owing to local difficulty) with some small vessels of the squadron under my command. To avoid going to prison, they offered to remain on board in the service of the squadron. I agreed to it, and rated them as seamen; and to make them more contented, I ordered them a gratification, declaring, however, that they should only serve while the war lasted, being the time I had a right over them as prisoners.

At the expiration of six months they declared they did not wish to continue in the service and wanted their liberty. I cannot deny the right to their first request; and the contrary belongs only to barbarous nations, and is what is daily practiced in Buenos Ayres; however, with regard to liberty, they can have no right, rather let them remain prisoners of war as formerly.

It is evident, therefore, the little foundation the reclaimed have to request the protection of your excellency.

I will now treat the question on the grounds your excellency establishes.

Though Commandant Norton should accept the offer of the prisoners to serve, who could support with good reasons that he was obliged to retain in the service men whom he should afterwards suspect? And, if the act of not retaining them would give them a right to obtain their liberty, therefore, they would render themselves suspected, as a sure way of doing away with their being considered in class of prisoners.

I regret I cannot agree to what your excellency desires and demands, for the reasons set forth, the good foundation of which will satisfy the probity, wisdom, and vast knowledge of your excellency.

I have the honor to be, with much consideration and respect, your excellency's obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander of the United States Naval Forces on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 22, 1827.

SIR: I am honored with your excellency's letter relative to the six American seamen now in prison at Montevideo. My application for their release was founded upon the belief that, after these seamen had been made prisoners of war, Captain Norton had stipulated with them that, if they would enter the Brazil service for six months, he would, at the expiration of that period, give them a full discharge. I find, from your excellency's letter, that I had been misinformed, and that these seamen are not entitled to their discharge; nevertheless, I indulge the hope that, before I quit this anchorage, your excellency, from kindness to me and compassion towards these seamen, will cause them to be released.

During the present war the Government of Brazil has built two frigates in the United States, and the American seamen who navigated these frigates to Rio Janeiro being there discharged, many of them were destitute in Rio Janeiro, and on that account entered the Brazil Navy. On the other hand, many American vessels have arrived at Buenos Ayres, and the seamen composing the crews of these vessels have, in like manner, been forced by their necessities to enter the service of Buenos Ayres. Under these circumstances, and considering the character and the habits of seamen—considering, also, the artifices employed by the subordinate officers to induce them to enter a foreign service, I am persuaded it is not the disposition of your excellency to judge or treat these seamen with severity.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 22, 1827.

SIR: William Nye, a citizen of the United States, was impressed on the night of the 19th instant, and taken on board his Imperial Majesty's frigate Piranga, at present at this anchorage.

As the United States does not and cannot permit its citizens to be impressed into any foreign service, I have the honor to request that your excellency will cause William Nye to be released and sent on board this ship.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY'S FRIGATE PIRANGA, November 22, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I received the official note of your excellency, under date of to-day, in which you demand the delivery, on board the frigate Macedonian, of William Nye, an American seaman, who was impressed on the 19th instant.

If he who informed your excellency of this first affair had had due care of informing himself, also, that William Nye had been placed at liberty as soon as he was known to be a stranger, your excellency would not have had the trouble of making your official demand, nor of having a reply.

It were a difficult thing for the officer who made the impressment, by night, on board of Brazilian vessels, to know that a seaman, whom he found there among others, was of this or of that nation, he speaking very well the language of the country, and did not even declare himself a stranger.

No offence is committed, in such cases, until the proper investigations are made; these were done, and the seaman set at liberty, as he ought to be, in quality of a stranger, whether he might belong to the United States or any other nation, because the right is equal to all; and so much is this my political doctrine, that a Neapolitan, who was impressed at the same time, in whose favor no body wrote, having the same reasons and privileges, was put at liberty on the same occasion with Willliam Nye.

I have the honor to be, with much consideration and respect, your excellency's very attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander of the United States Naval Forces on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 3, 1827.

SIR: John Walker and Seabrit Sollers, two American seamen, arrived at Rio Negro in American vessels, and both of them were left there sick. Upon recovering, as there was no opportunity of returning direct to the United States, they went on board the "Joven Emelia," as their only means of leaving Rio Negro. The "Joven Emelia" was captured by his Imperial Majesty's cruiser Independencia on Morté; and, upon arriving here, Walker and Sollers were thrown into prison, where they still remain.

I have the honor to request that your excellency will cause these two citizens of the United States to be released.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, December 4, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I did not reply immediately to the note of your excellency of the 3d of this month, because I wished to investigate the circumstances of John Walker and Seabrit Sollers, whom your excellency reclaims as citizens of the United States, coming as passengers on board the schooner "Joven Emelia" from Rio Negro da Patagonia for the Salado, as your excellency assured me (recomendaber) in your letter.

The schooner was a prize, made by the enemies of Brazil, and was recaptured by the brig Independencia on Morté of the squadron under my command. It is clear that the persons found on board of a prize of Brazil are prisoners of war, particularly not having the title of legitimate passengers. This neither of them had; and, with regard to Seabrit Sollers, he was even entered (matriculádo) on the roll of equipage as an Englishman, although he may now say another thing, which avails him nothing.

Notwithstanding what I have just said, I desire to serve your excellency, and shall set free the first, being an American citizen, because there is no certainty of his belonging to the vessel; and also order the liberation of those of other nations gratuitously (per se, of themselves) who came under similar circumstances, in order that partiality may not become a motive of well founded complaint.

I have the honor to be, with much consideration and respect, your excellency's most attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

Extract of a letter from Commodore James Biddle to John M. Forbes, Esq., Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, Buenos Ayres, dated United States Frigate Macedonian, off Montevideo, November 12, 1827.

"It is an indisputable principle, that where the officers employed in enforcing a blockade are negligent in the performance of their duties, a blockade cannot be deemed to exist. I am of opinion that the Brazil officers have been so negligent as to raise, by that circumstance, the blockade proclaimed by the Brazil Government. My opinion is founded upon the fact, that, while very few vessels have been seized, a great many have arrived safely at Buenos Ayres. The very essence of a blockade is, that access to the blockaded port be rendered dangerous by the blockading force; and the multitude of arrivals proves the absence of any serious danger. I wish, therefore, you would transmit to me a certificate from the consular office, stating the number of vessels that have arrived at the different ports of Buenos Ayres, specifying the different ports, from a certain fixed period, the first of May last, for example, to the present day. Let there be no flaw in the certificate, and have the consular seal affixed to it, that I may use it as a document with the Brazil admiral. Perhaps it would be best not to insert the names of the vessels."

No. 27.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 20, 1827.

SIR: I enclose a copy of my letter of the 13th instant to the Brazil admiral; also a copy of his answer. I did not deem it necessary or advisable to pursue the argument with the admiral after the receipt of his answer, and therefore I wrote him only a short note, a copy of which is enclosed.

Mr. Tudor, I understand, is appointed our Chargé d'Affaires at Rio Janeiro. As he will, I presume, have some discussion with the Government respecting this blockade, I shall send him some documentary evidence upon the subject of the licenses granted by the Brazilian authorities to trade with the blockaded ports; and also a certified list of the number of vessels that have entered the blockaded ports, thus proving that the blockading force is inadequate or remiss.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 13, 1827.

SIR: As property belonging to citizens of the United States is at present detained here, upon the allegation of attempting to violate the proclamation of blockade, the duties intrusted to me by my Government require that I should address your excellency upon the subject of it.

It is the established law of nations that, when war exists between any two States, all commercial intercourse between them is prohibited, and must cease. Yet it is a matter of notoriety that vessels with cargoes have cleared at the custom-house of Montevideo for the ports of the United Provinces of La Plata, and that vessels with cargoes from Buenos Ayres, first touching at Calonia, have been admitted to enter at the same custom-house. Of the extent to which this trade has been carried I am not informed; but I am informed, upon unquestionable authority, that the vessels the Bella Louisa, the Santa Ana, the Feliciana, the Hermosa Louisa, and the Buena Ventura, all of them under the Brazil flag, sailed from Montevideo for Santa Fé. The Buena Ventura was boarded up the river by the frigate Piranga, then under your excellency's immediate command, her papers exhibited to the boarding officer, and she permitted to proceed.

His Imperial Majesty's Government has an undoubted right to permit this commercial intercourse with its enemies, notwithstanding that it is incompatible with a state of war; but his Imperial Majesty is too just and too enlightened to expect, while he permits to his own subjects trade with his enemies, that he may deny it to neutrals. It would be extraordinary, indeed, if a belligerent is to be exempt from the evils of his own blockade, while all its evils are to be enforced against neutrals, thereby placing the neutral in a worse condition than the belligerent. These relaxations must alone render the blockade entirely null and illegal.

As a blockade is, in its operation, one of the severest of belligerent rights, the law of nations has clearly defined the measures necessary to constitute it. Among these are, that a force be employed fully adequate to prevent all communication with the interdicted ports, and that the officers appointed to this duty be vigilant in the performance of it. If the force be inadequate, or if the officers be negligent, a blockade cannot, in either case, be deemed to exist. This is the doctrine laid down by Sir William Scott; it is confirmed by Chitty, in his valuable treatise, London edition, 1820, and is indisputable.

The legality or the illegality of a blockade may, therefore, best be determined by a reference to its results. Now, your excellency well knows that a great number of vessels have entered, and continue to enter, the blockaded ports; and that this number so greatly exceeds the number of those which have been intercepted as to establish clearly that there is, in reality, but little risk in entering these ports. Unquestionably the facility of entering them is both the motive and the excuse for the frequent attempts that have been made by neutral vessels.

It is manifest, therefore, either that the force is inadequate, or that the officers are remiss in their duty; and that, consequently, a court of justice cannot condemn a neutral vessel, seized under any circumstances, for a breach of the proclamation of blockade.

I trust, then, your excellency will perceive that the ground of the defence of the seized property is such as to entitle and secure its acquittal in any court of justice; and that your excellency will prefer to release this property, rather than incur further responsibility for the damages of illegal seizure and detention.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency SR. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE THE IMPERIAL PRINCE, December 14, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have received your excellency's letter dated yesterday. It abounds with such a variety of ideas that it is necessary, in order to be clear, to discuss each point separately. I will begin by the circumstance of a blockade. In order that it be acknowledged lawful, I will state what is conformable to treaties, and will avail myself of the opinion of the writers cited by your excellency in this and other letters; and will afterwards reply to matters of less importance, (although they are beyond my sphere,) only for a regard to your excellency, who has inserted them in your above mentioned letter of yesterday.

The right of blockade is fixed by one of the articles of the convention of 1780, to which all the maritime Powers, the United States included, did accede. It would be as needless as easy to cite the dates of all those treaties and conventions, as likewise the volumes and pages of Martin's collection, in which all of them are to be found. The article in question says: "In order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, they agree in giving this denomination to that one where, by the disposition of the attacking Power, were to be found vessels in station, and close enough as to make evidently the entrance dangerous."

Here we have, then, a principle of positive right of nations—a point of public maritime right by convention, and signed by treaties, which forms a general law of nations; it is from it that the consequences will be drawn. Any vessel which met with danger in the blockade, and which, without being capable to get in, is captured, she is a lawful good prize. It will be more evident by transcribing the last article of the same convention of 1780, saying, "That these principles are the rule in the proceedings and judgment on the legitimacy of prizes."

Your excellency well knows that these principles being agreed upon, the same constitute an unquestionable right, against which the opinion of writers avail nothing. But as your excellency adduces the authority of Sir W. Scott, let us not remit his doctrine to what your excellency refers; let us see all that he says with regard to blockades; and I will cite the same author, Chitty, as your excellency has done, with reference to his edition of London, 1812, page 134: "It would be the most material thing in the world if individuals were allowed to allege ignorance of blockade. It is the duty of nations to notify it to their subjects, whose property they must protect. A master of a neutral vessel never can, alleging ignorance of a blockade, go and explore whether it is in force."

Page 135. "A merchant ought not to send his vessel to the mouth of a river, saying, should she not meet with the blockading force let her go in; should she meet with it, and be warned off, let her proceed to another port. Who does not perceive at a glance the fraud which such a principle would not give rise to?"

Page 139. "After the notification of the blockade is made, (nations, which ought to have in mind the safety of their subjects, see the same author, page 134,) the fact of departing for a blockaded port, on a contingent destination, in order to get in, should the port be already open, or to proceed to another one if it is not, is sufficient to constitute offence. I presume that a formal notification is to be made when the blockade is taken off, and till then a port is considered blockaded; and from the moment in which a vessel goes away from a port with destination for the blockaded one, the offence and violation of blockade is complete, and the property exposed to be confiscated."

Page 141. "It would be impossible to sustain a blockade if a vessel could go close to the blockaded port; then she would station herself in a suitable latitude, in order to get in clandestinely, without possibility of impediment. I am of opinion that it would not be out of evidence, the principle of taking her on presumption 'de jure,' that she was going there with the intention of forcing the blockade; and supposed there may be cases in which they may be innocent, it is a severity necessary and essential to the effectual exercise of this right of war."

Being thus put into practice, this doctrine of the two writers (and founded on treaties) which your excellency cites, whose opinions you call weighty and say to be indisputable, certainly your excellency would not have to use arguments resulting favorably to neutral vessels, as such results proceeded from the generosity with which his Imperial Majesty of Brazil treated them when met upon the blockaded station.

Your excellency then availed yourself of the arms of generosity to offend the generous; but you will not forget that the adopted custom of this Navy towards neutral vessels in the act of violating the blockade, being founded on mere favor, is very far from being a maritime right, so that it may be withdrawn, since, in such case, being a favor, its duration depends on the will of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, who grants it.

I cannot agree with your excellency that the vessels which got in are more numerous than those captured. Your excellency ought to include in this calculation those ordered off by the favor granted by his Imperial Majesty, which, without this grace, would unquestionably have been good prizes; which was facilitating to them an entrance; and many of these, after being advised of the blockade, have infringed the same, which would not have happened if they had been arrested. Being thus judged by the general right of nations, your excellency had no occasion for the arguments you have used, turning into offensive arms the favors received.

For the right of blockade in the said form it is not necessary to have recourse to that above mentioned epoch; we may refer to ages more remote, and there we will find it in practice. Vattel, the writer whom your excellency refers to in another letter, treats upon this matter, and says, vol. 3d, chap 7th, page 116, art. 117, Lyons edition, 1802: "If I lay siege to a place, or only form the blockade, I have a right to hinder any one from entering, and to treat as an enemy whoever attempt to enter the place, or carry anything to the besieged without my leave; for he opposes my enterprise; may contribute to the miscarriage of it; and thus cause me to fall into the evils of an unsuccessful war. King Demetrius hung up the master and pilot of a vessel carrying provisions to Athens."

Your excellency will find this very case referred to by Plutarcus, "in Demetrio," vol. 1, page 904, Frankfort edition. In the same Plutarcus your excellency will find, page 639 of the above mentioned edition, that Pompey, being at war with Mithridates, King of Pontus, he sent vessels to the Thracian Bosphorus, in order to intercept provisions, imposing the punishment of death upon any one who would be so bold as to sail for that Kingdom.

Here, then, your excellency will see that this right comes from antiquity, and always acknowledged by nations. Let us see, likewise, what says the professor of natural right and of nations of the University of Gottingen, G. F. De Martin, edition 1801, reprinted from the first oldest edition, article 320: "The positive right of nations, and likewise natural law, authorize a belligerent Power to prohibit all commerce with the blockaded place, and punish, by the confiscation of the vessel and cargo, and also by corporal pains, those who would be so bold as to infringe against this prohibition." This work has been so much appreciated that it has been translated into English and reprinted in London in 1802.

What has been the generosity with which his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil has treated the neutral Powers in this blockade your excellency will better know by the system of judging the prizes without reference to the laws peculiar to the nation which has enacted them. I shall transcribe here, in his own words, what the aforesaid professor of natural right and of nations says in his edition of Gottingen, 1801, section 322, page 474. "Enfin quoiqu'il soit reconnu en Europe, que le capteur n'a pas le droit de disposer de sa prise quelconque, avant qu'elle lui ait été adjudgée l'usage et les traités, attribuent la jurisdiction, dans les disputes qui s'elevent á cet egard entre le câpteur et les reclaments au seul souverain du capteur, lors même que celui-ci se seroit ou forcé de conduire sa prise dans le port d'une tierce puissance. Et bien que les Tribunaux d'Amiranté reconnoissent qu'il est d'aprés les traités et à leur defaut d'aprés le droit des gens general ou universel, et non d'aprés les loix particulieres du pays qu'ils doivent juger."

Should these regulations, on sure principles of maritime right, have been put into practice, and if the vessels which have had the audacity to tarnish the rights of the belligerent were not suffered to escape through favor with impunity, thus going, without fear, to the blockaded station; coming, likewise, to the port next to the blockaded ones, in order to wait for an opportunity and wind with which they may the easier evade the blockade; and going away from here, in sight of us, when the wind is favorable to them and contrary to the course which would be in conformity to their feigned and deceitful clearances, to place themselves in such a point as to be able to evade the blockade during the night, although they receive some balls, the harm of which is taken in exchange for profit; should they, I repeat, have not this liberty, which has been allowed them by the generosity of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, your excellency would not have to turn, as I have said above, the condescension and favors received into offensive arms against him who has granted them, and who can, when he thinks proper, put an end to them, because they are gratuitous favors (em cauza) in cause the good principles of which are in opposition to the arguments.

How extraordinary has been the generosity of his Imperial Majesty in behalf of neutrals! But such is not the behavior of his appointed authorities, whose pretensions, beyond the limits of reason and justice, seem to multiply as the serpents from the blood of Medusa's head. Everything has its limits.

I have already said too much upon a principle unquestionable in good reason. I now reply to other subjects of your excellency's letter, which have little affinity or none with my concerns.

I did not seek to know, nor pretend to discover, whether cargoes proceeding from blockaded ports have been entered in the custom-house. But if it has been, and it was, for an abuse of any territorial authority, it would be very far from establishing a rule, from the principle that an error does not authorize another error. If the concession was on the part of the Government of his Imperial Majesty, it is then that your excellency's arguments might be of effect in establishing a general principle; but never for an abuse, if it is true there were any, that would entitle one to claims, but never to precedents.

It was also out of my jurisdiction to know from the President why he gave a license for the province of Santa Fé to a vessel I met with, nor annul such a license from an authority of the Empire independent of mine. But if that was in opposition to my instructions, it was incumbent on me, and was my duty, to give information of the case to the Government of his Imperial Majesty, in order to receive either analogous orders or to avoid the continuation of them; so I did. Should your excellency be well informed, you would know that such licenses are now abolished; it is for that reason that your argument is ill-timed, in spite of what you might say thereupon.

I know your excellency must be continually applied to by the captains of merchant vessels, so that it is only the consideration I entertain for the person of your excellency which could oblige me to write on such subjects, already too tiresome.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander of the United States Naval Forces on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 19, 1827.

Owing to the other avocations of the gentleman who undertook to translate the letter of his excellency the Baron of La Prata of the 14th instant, the undersigned did not receive the translation of it until last evening.

Without entering at this moment into further discussion upon the subject, the undersigned will observe that he cannot accede to the principles of blockade as asserted by his excellency the Baron of La Prata.

His excellency the Baron of La Plata quotes an authority to show that a blockade, once established, is deemed to exist until a formal notification of its repeal. The undersigned will only say that his Imperial Majesty's order of December, 1825, declared to be in a state of blockade "all the ports belonging to the Government of the United Provinces of the River of Plata;" that, at a subsequent period, the blockade was so modified as to be limited to the ports within the river of the Government of the United Provinces; and that no formal notification has ever been given of this modification of the blockade.

The undersigned renews to his excellency the Baron of Da Prata, the assurances of his great consideration and esteem, and hopes that his excellency may enjoy the festivities of the season.

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

No. 28.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 26, 1827.

SIR: I enclose copies of letters between the Brazil admiral and myself relative to James Ring, a seaman, who entered on board a Brazil cruiser in violation of his contract and against the protest of the master of the American vessel to which he belonged. I allowed the admiral to have the last word, because it was evident that I could not by perseverance recover the seaman, and because, had I pursued the subject, it must have led to irritation. To avoid irritation as much as possible I consider, under existing circumstances, to be politic and advisable. James Ring is, as the admiral states, an Englishman.

I also enclose copies of some letters relative to the exportation of specie from the ports of Brazil.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 20, 1827.

SIR: I have the honor to acquaint your excellency that the American brig Ospray fell in with his Imperial Majesty's corvette Liberal on the 11th instant; that the master was ordered on board; that on going on board, one of the seamen of his boat, James Ring, entered to serve on board the Liberal; that the master demanded his restoration, which was refused; and that, in the place of restoring the said James Ring, the commander of the Liberal sent on board the Ospray Michael Richardson, a wounded seaman, who, upon the arrival of the Ospray at this port, was sent to the hospital.

I transmit, herewith, the shipping articles of the Ospray, by which your excellency will perceive that the crew have stipulated to perform the voyage and back again to the United States.

Comment upon conduct such as this of the commander of the Liberal is superfluous. I have the honor, therefore, to request that your excellency will be pleased to direct that the seaman, James Ring, be brought forthwith from the Liberal and be restored to the American vessel from which he was taken.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE THE IMPERIAL PRINCE, December 20, 1827.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have just received the letter which your excellency addressed to me this day, and regret that they are continually incommoding your excellency with incorrect statements, concealing circumstances which, if they came to your excellency's knowledge, would be enough to make you depreciate their pretensions.

The case of the seaman James Ring differs greatly from what they have told your excellency, as I perceive from the manner in which your excellency expresses yourself, supposing that the commander of the corvette Liberal conducted himself wrong, on the occasion of the seaman's remaining on board the corvette; but, as I was soon informed of the occurrence, I shall just relate it to your excellency.

On the blockading ground of the port of Buenos Ayres there appeared the American merchant brig Ospray; the corvette chased her, and ordered the master to come on board with his papers; he came, brought the papers, and the commander of the Liberal, seeing that he was cleared for Buenos Ayres, endorsed the intimation of the blockade on his passport, and ordered him about his business. When the master of the Ospray left the ship he missed one of his men in the boat. He was searched for, and, on appearing, said "hence I will only go if they carry me by force; I want to remain in the service of the Brazilian Empire; and sooner will I lose my wages than go on board with a man who has treated me so cruelly. I am an Englishman, and ask for the protection of the flag under which I find myself."

Now, even had he been a citizen of the United States, and even criminal, he would have found the same shelter; and for the contrary case, it would be necessary that some treaty should stipulate it.

The commander of the Liberal was too good in giving, in the place of the English sailor, another who is a citizen of the United States, a circumstance which may make your excellency estimate how faithfully you were informed. He might have come with a wound, but his going to the hospital was a means to make his case appear aggravating; if he was under that necessity, he would not have gone out of the corvette, for he was not compelled to do so.

For a twenty-four hours' voyage to Montevideo the seaman could not have been wanted; (how many do not die on voyages?) and in this port the captain would find hundreds of them thus profiting the Englishman's wages because he violated his contract. Perhaps in the territory of the United States he would receive another punishment, though not elsewhere.

I have replied to your excellency as I would to any authority in the like case; but to one belonging to the United States there is more to say.

The political doctrine of the United States is not to deliver from their ships-of-war even deserters from the ships-of-war of other nations; notwithstanding that these, by a tacit right or usage, (I am not aware of a treaty on this subject,) reciprocally deliver them to each other. And such is the firmness of the Government of the United States on this point that it preferred in 1807 a naval combat, not being at war, to the delivery of reclaimed deserters.

I do feel much mortified when I receive a letter from your excellency, and see myself deprived of agreeing to what your excellency requires of me; but considering that the requisition proceeds from incorrect information, and that your excellency always guides your feelings by reason, I doubt not that your excellency will do justice to my indispensable refusal.

I return to your excellency the roll of equipage of the brig Ospray, and complain to your excellency of sending to me any paper whatever in evidence of what your excellency says—for me always the greatest evidence (document.)

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander of the United States Naval Forces on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, December 21, 1827.

SIR: I received to-day your excellency's letter dated yesterday, and I am greatly surprised that your excellency should be so misinformed with regard to the Government of the United States.

The treaty of 1822, between the United States and France, stipulates (article 6th) not only that deserters shall be mutually delivered up, but that, in case the deserters be not apprehended until after the departure of the vessel to which they belong, they may be imprisoned until an opportunity occurs to send them home: provided, however, that the imprisonment shall not continue more than three months. A similar stipulation is contained in the treaty of 1788 (article 9th) between the same nations. But in the absence of any treaty stipulation, the civil authority within the United States delivers up deserters from foreign vessels whether of war or of commerce. Seamen from a vessel of war are always presumed to be deserters, and the evidence of an officer suffices for their apprehension. In the case of commercial vessels, if it appears by the shipping articles that the seamen had bound themselves to perform the voyage to the United States and back, they are always compelled to do so. In the United States we have seamen enough and good enough; but even was it otherwise, foreign seamen would not be encouraged or permitted by the civil authority of the United States to violate their contract.

The only exception to what I have stated that ever has taken place within the United States, is with regard to deserters from British ships-of-war; and the only cause of this exception was, that the British Government resorted to impressment to man its ships-of-war, and frequently impressed citizens of the United States. I can very safely put it to your excellency, whether an American seaman who had been impressed into the British service and made his escape to the soil of his country should be driven by the Government back to the British man-of-war. In the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, (article 27th,) it is stipulated that all persons charged with murder or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, who shall seek asylum in the country of the other, shall be delivered up to justice. Nothing is stipulated with regard to the delivery of deserters; and unquestionably the silence of the treaty is to be attributed to the extreme delicacy of the subject growing out of the impressment of American seamen into the British service. Your excellency refers to an outrage upon the sovereignty of the United States committed in 1807, and imputes it to the doctrine of the Goverment of the United States of not delivering up deserters from the ships-of-war of other nations. The proclamation of the President of the United States upon that occasion is now before me; and it is there expressly stated that the seamen in question had been previously ascertained to be native citizens of the United States. During my present cruise I have had a correspondence with Rear Admiral Sir Robert Otway upon the subject of deserters, and I volunteered to him the assurance that British subjects deserting from their own ships should never receive any countenance from me.

Yesterday morning, as your excellency may have observed from your own frigate, two launches belonging to your squadron were driven to leeward, but gained this ship, and remained alongside until evening, when the weather moderated. At dinner time I directed their crews to come on board to get their dinners. Four of them were American citizens; your excellency would do me great injustice, if you suppose that I would have afforded any protection whatever to these men, had they asked it of me. Your excellency has already assured me that no American seamen are now impressed into the Brazil service, and has promised me that none shall be detained beyond the term for which they enter. I desire no better security.

With regard to the seaman James King, I did not inquire to what country he belonged, because I did not consider such inquiry necessary. I only examined the shipping articles to ascertain if he had contracted to perform the voyage back to the United States. Such was the contract; and I must say, that no commander of a public vessel of the United States would have suffered to remain on board his ship any seaman belonging to a Brazil merchant vessel in violation of his contract, and contrary to the wish of his captain.

But your excellency has expressed the determination not to restore the man; I shall, therefore, say nothing further on the subject, but simply report the affair to the Government of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. Rodrigo Pinto Guedes, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

On board the Frigate the Imperial Prince, December 22, 1827.

Most Excellent Sir: I have received the letter which your excellency directed to me under yesterday's date, and observe what your excellency says relative to the case of the sailor James Ring; and, from my reply to your excellency, your excellency must have remained convinced of the rule which I took for the basis of my answer, as your excellency, to establish a contrary case, must recur to stipulated (convencionadas) exceptions, which could only be necessary to prevent the general rule to be followed.

I acknowledge to your excellency, frankly, that I was not acquainted with the preliminary convention to a treaty of peace, concluded on the 24th of June, 1822, between the United States and France; notwithstanding that, there being no similar one with the Brazilian Empire, this neither is obligated to the exception established by the 6th article.

But, even in the case of its being applicable, the delicacy of the subject clearly shows that the article only speaks of the subjects of the two nations; because it is incredible that any nation should consent that, under the safeguard of her flag, a foreigner be punished by authorities being neither of his nation nor of the one among which he is, and less would the latter give aid for the former doing so; and on this principle only, the English sailor, James Ring, if he were a deserter from a man-of-war, could be given up, this being the general practice, independent of treaties, and forms an implied law, (direito tacito.)

But notwithstanding there is no convention between our respective nations, there being neither a prohibitory one, and desiring to follow the sentiments which your excellency manifests in your letter, which give me the assurance that your excellency will be disposed to reciprocity, your excellency may count upon, as long as we both are at the head of our present commissions, my acting on the following principles: first, the deserters from the men-of-war of the United States coming on board of vessels of the squadron under my command, and being reclaimed, shall be given up, saving that being subjects of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, who have served out their time of contract; second, the sailors, deserters from merchantmen of the United States, who may come on board of vessels of the said squadron, being citizens of the United States, and duly (competente mente) reclaimed, shall be given up if their vessel is in Montevideo, or in sight of any of the vessels of the squadron.

The master of the brig Ospray did not proceed well; if he intended to lay complaints, he ought not to have agreed to the exchange of the English sailor for the one from the United States. Your excellency very well knows that they would not have put him on board by force of arms; he carried him himself, in his own boat.

As your excellency has assured me that you will bring my refusal to the knowledge of the Government of the United States, I hope your excellency remains certain that the sentiments which always guide my actions never caused me apprehensions, even allowing that I was susceptible of such feelings.

I am much obliged to your excellency for the goodness you had with the launchmen of the squadron under my command, all in accordance with your excellency's generous and humane sentiments.

I have the honor to be, with much consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander of the United States Naval Forces on the Eastern Coast of South America.

[Translation.]

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, January 24, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: After the letter which I had the honor to address to your excellency on the 14th instant, and to receive your excellency's answer on the 15th, I have nothing to argue respecting the schooner Shillelah or any other question, be it with the supercargo or be it with the owner. I shall treat, in writing, for the purpose of better understanding each other, and of coming to an agreement or compromise. It is true that I did not answer your excellency's letter of the 15th instant, in order not to make our correspondence more angry on a subject which was following its judicial course; but as your excellency advanced some propositions I shall reply thereto.

Your excellency, after having conceded the necessity of the search of merchant vessels, be it for the purpose of ascertaining the property or whether there be contraband goods on board, gives them right for avoiding such search on account of the vexations which they have suffered in the river Plate. This circumstance does not excuse them even if it was proved, but, in case of being so, gives them the right of demanding satisfaction or indemnity through their consuls, who are competent authorities for any purpose in relation to merchant vessels; and if the subject has to be carried to the cognizance of the Governments, it passes into the hands of the diplomatic representatives, if there are any; but consuls are not to be considered as such according to the convention of 1815.

Military protections cause no good effect in time of peace, nor serve for any other purpose but to encourage speculators, the number whereof increases in the belief that they have a support; it not being given to their ambition to foresee that without principle of reason it will avail them nothing.

Passing to the principal matter, I shall begin with treating of the search in general, and what in relation thereto is said by the most accredited writers.

Azuni, in his System of the Principles of Maritime Law, (vol. 2, art. 4, of chap. 3, of Digeon, edition of Paris, sixth year of the Republic,) says: "The primitive and universal right, and also the conventional right of Europe, permits to belligerents to prohibit to neutrals the faculty to carry to the enemy goods of that kind denominated contraband of war, to possess themselves of the vessels of their enemies, and even to sequester those covered by a neutral flag; and gives them likewise the faculty to employ all the means which they may judge to favor the exercise of the right above indicated." In the same place other authors are cited; and the citation from Vattel must be erroneous, or contained in an edition unknown to me. In that of Lyons, 1802, the matter is treated of in the 3d vol., 3d book, 7th chap., as Azuni says; but the article is the 114th and not the 44th, as it there reads.

Vattel says: "The transportation of goods contraband cannot be prevented without neutral ships found at sea being searched; there is thus a right to search them. Some nations, in former times, opposed this. At present a neutral vessel which should object to being searched would, by this only circumstance, cause her condemnation as good prize. In order to avoid inconveniences, vexations, and all abuses, the manner of making such search is stipulated by treaties of commerce and navigation."

Valin, also cited by Azuni, says, in the 2d vol., 9th Title of Prizes, 12th article, p. 250, of the edition of Rochelle, 1760, sec. 5: "Nothing can dispense the obligation to suffer themselves to be searched, (speaking of the captains of merchant vessels,) both on account of its being interesting to ascertain whether the vessel belongs to the enemy, or to ascertain whether, in friendly and neutral vessels, there be not goods of contraband or other effects belonging to the enemy." In the next following section he says: "Thence it follows that, in all cases, he (the merchant captain) must suffer the search of his vessel and papers." In same author, first cited, one reads, that of that opinion are also Lampredi, in his Treatise on the Commerce of Neutrals; the Chevalier Abreu, in his Treatise on Prizes; Cleinac, in his Marine Jurisdiction; and others.

The same rules are established in the ordinances of France, 1584 and 1681; of Spain, 1781; of Denmark, 1710; and, finally, (which for me would be sufficient,) by the 9th article of the Prize Regulations of the 7th of December, 1796, which is the law of the Brazilian Empire. Perhaps there is no marine ordinance without this disposition, which, after being fixed by the treaty of the Pyrennees in 1659, was adopted in every other. It is true that the abuse of good faith has sometimes caused a neutral flag to be affirmed by the firing of a gun; but, in the tribunals, prizes so made are never judged good to the captor-captains, who thereby lose their right, without the prize therefore being given free, if she is otherwise in the case of being condemned. This matter is scrupulously treated of in the Ordinance of France, March 17, 1696, declared and modified by that of the 18th of June, 1704; and particularly by the commentary of the one of 1681. The use of the neutral flag is permitted to a distance from the chase which may prevent her escape; but, affirmed by the firing of a gun, it is a criminal abuse. But if by this abuse, which has been practiced in some wars, the merchant vessel can have no certainty of the identity of the flag which the man-of-war shows, so the chaser can have none of the one shown by the merchantman, and therefore can compel him to be searched.

If this rule exist in any part of the seas where the merchantman be found, the right of the belligerent is increased on a blockading ground, where, by a conventional right, it is sufficient for a merchantman to appear, to be good prize, when a sufficient time has passed for him to know of the blockade. And when this circumstance, of itself, is sufficient to put the merchantman in risk, this right cannot be doubted when it is corroborated by flight or resistance to search, which indicates bad intention.

Even without searching the conventional right of all maritime nations, which your excellency knows to exist, let us examine the matter. The right to give orders, and to punish those who violate the laws, implies that of promulgating them and causing them to be executed.

A power at war has an incontestable right to attack and occupy the territory of its enemy, and must, consequently, in all places where it occupies the same, be considered as temporarily sovereign; thence emanates the rule of universal reason, according to which, every time that a belligerent acquires the legislative and executive powers, either by his troops possessing themselves of the enemy's territory, or because they placed it in siege or blockade, it has the right to impede to strangers all commerce and all communication with the towns or places so besieged or blockaded, and to prohibit, be it by land or be it by sea, any kind of traffic; for, by a country under the dominion of a belligerent is to be understood not only the one which he occupied before the war, but the places whereof his arms maintain possession, for this gives him a right to impose laws and to exercise jurisdiction. The liberty of the sea does not comprehend liberty of ports, or adjacent waters that have proprietors; and the possession whereof, sustained, gives a right to the occupant.

In consideration of what I have thus laid down, founded on the opinion of the most esteemed public writers on ordinances, treaties, positive and universal law, I cannot agree with your excellency that the Government of the United States cannot agree to the dispositions of the Imperial Government, which are founded on the firmest principles.

I have the honor to be, with consideration and respect, your excellency's very attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 25, 1828.

SIR: I have received your excellency's letter of the 24th instant. Although your excellency is of opinion that military protection in time of peace causes no good effect, the Government of the United States, when it ordered me to this coast, was of a different opinion; and my conduct will always be regulated by the opinions and instructions of my Government.

The various authorities cited by your excellency convince me that I was correct, in my letter of the 15th instant, in stating that "the right of a belligerent cruiser to search merchant vessels met with on the high seas is at present indisputable, though it has, at different periods, and by several nations, been disputed, and even resisted;" and that "this right is conceded, because, without it, the destination and ownership of the property could not be properly ascertained, nor whether there was contraband on board." In admitting this right to the belligerent cruiser, it does not follow that there is any obligation upon the merchant vessel voluntarily to deviate from her course in order that the cruiser may exercise this right, nor any penalty or imputation upon her for not doing so. The doctrine of your excellency is, that by endeavoring to avoid a cruiser, a merchant vessel thereby renders herself liable to confiscation; and I repeat, that his Imperial Majesty's Government deceives itself if it supposes that the Government of the United States will submit that such a doctrine be enforced against the property of its citizens.

In 1807 France decreed that every vessel, to whatever nation belonging, that should have submitted to be searched by a British cruiser, was lawful prize, and should be seized upon entering any port of France or her allies, or upon being met at sea by French ships-of-war or privateers. In consequence of this decree, it became the interest and was the practice of neutral vessels, bound to the ports of France or her allies, to avoid all cruisers at sea. But the Admiralty Courts of Great Britain never set up the pretension that a neutral vessel became liable to confiscation by endeavoring to avoid a cruiser at sea. The doctrine asserted by Sir William Scott was, that, "by the law of nations, as now understood, a deliberate and continued resistance to search, on the part of a neutral vessel to a lawful cruiser, is followed by the legal consequence of confiscation."—(Chitty, vol. 1, chapter 9.) And the same author, deducing principles from the decisions of Sir William Scott, continues as follows: "A rescue effected by the crew, after capture, when the captors are in actual possession, is considered a resistance within the application of the penalty. In the case of the Elsabe, it is laid down as settled that the resistance of the convoying ships is the resistance of the whole convoy; whence it follows that in such cases the whole convoy is subject to confiscation. But, from the case of the Pennsylvania, it appears that, if a neutral vessel has been captured, and the captors, whether from want of hands to navigate her, or for the sake of making other prizes, or from any other motive, allow the neutral commanders to resume the direction of the vessel, without any express agreement binding those commanders to bring her in for adjudication, in pursuance of the original capture, then the escape of the neutral will not be regarded as a rescue or resistance. On the same principle, it was said by the court that, in the case of the Saint Juan Baptista, that a mere attempt to escape before any possession assumed by the captor does not draw with it the consequences of condemnation. And the same case further establishes that, unless the neutral vessel have reasonable grounds to be satisfied that a war has actually broken out, even a direct resistance will not superinduce the penalty; for, without a war, there is no such thing as a neutral character, nor any foundation for the several duties which the law of nations imposes on that character. Nor has the penalty been deemed to attach in those instances where a disposition to resistance has at first been betrayed, but afterwards abandoned without being actually carried into operation."—(Chitty, vol. 1, chap. 9, pages 485, 486.)

As your excellency is responsible for the damages of illegal seizure and detention, it will be for your excellency to determine whether the schooner Shillelah shall undergo a trial before the tribunal of prizes.

The preliminary question will be, whether the blockade itself is lawful. On this subject will be produced, 1st, the order of his Imperial Majesty's Government, exacting from neutral vessels leaving this port bonds conditioned not to enter a blockaded port, thereby admitting that the force employed had not been able to maintain the blockade; 2d, a list of vessels under the Brazil flag, licensed by the Brazil authorities to trade with one of the blockaded ports, thus raising the blockade as to its own subjects while keeping it on as to neutrals; 3d, a list of vessels, both of commerce and of war, which have entered and departed the ports of Buenos Ayres, the number of which is so large as to prove that the danger from the blockading squadron is not such as the law of nations requires, in order to constitute a blockade.

In the trial of an American vessel, the Government of the United States is a party to the question of the legality of the blockade as well as that of his Imperial Majesty, and the decision of it, therefore, must be conformable to the established law of nations.

Should it happen that the tribunal decides the blockade to be lawful, then the investigation of the circumstances of the Shillelah, bound from one Brazil port to another Brazil port, will take place; and, although your excellency and I entertain different views of these circumstances, the legal investigation no doubt will disclose the truth. Should it happen that the tribunal pronounces unfavorable decision, it will be for the Government of the United States to determine its course, upon its own view of the question of the legality of the blockade, and of the particular facts in relation to this particular case. The Government of the United States is not willing to permit its neutral rights to be settled for it by either belligerent in the present war.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 26, 1828.

SIR: The master and owner of the American brig Rio has reported to me that the sails of his vessel have been unbent and taken on shore; that the consul of the United States had applied to his excellency the President to know the cause of this proceeding, and that the President had replied it was done at your excellency's request.

I request, therefore, that your excellency will inform me why the sails of the Rio have been taken from her and landed.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, January 26, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: If the orders were given by the President that the brig Rio should be held in security till she gives bonds, to him ought reclamations to be directed.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States in South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 27, 1828.

SIR: The President has informed the consul of the United States that he caused the sails of the American brig Rio to be unbent and landed in consequence of your excellency having acquainted him that you possessed satisfactory evidence (documents) that the Rio had been bought by the Government of Buenos Ayres. It is therefore to your excellency, and not to the President, that I must make reclamation.

It is quite evident that if your excellency possessed documents to show that the Rio was not American but Buenos Ayrean property, you would have taken possession of the vessel and at once produced your documents before the tribunal for prizes. The circumstance of your excellency not having pursued this latter course proves the insufficiency of your documents. The suspicions of your excellency cannot justify the harsh and irritating measure of taking the sails away from the Rio, especially as that measure was not necessary to secure her detention in port; nor ought your excellency, I think, to entertain any suspicion on this subject, after the offer made by the captain of the Rio to sell her to your excellency.

If your excellency is determined to persevere in withholding the sails from the Rio, under the pretext that she is Buenos Ayrean property, I shall recommend to the captain to abandon his property entirely, to return home, and seek reparation for all his losses and damages through the Government of the United States. The case of the Rio will then be analogous to that of the American brig Spark, at Rio Janeiro, in February last, and must be settled in the same manner.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 23, 1828.

SIR: James Jervis, a citizen of the United States, is now detained on board his Imperial Majesty's frigate Principe Imperial, although his term of service expired on the 12th of this month.

I request that your excellency will discharge James Jervis, and send him on board this ship, as he is desirous of entering the service of his own country.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

ON BOARD THE FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, January 23, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Just in time does your excellency claim the sailor James Jervis; because yesterday, the 22d, his contract expired, and not on the 12th as your excellency supposes, probably because so he had sent word. This day his discharge is given him. As the entry on board this frigate is different from what the man said, I ordered the book of his first engagement to be sent for, and there found it as I have said.

Perceiving that your excellency wants him on board of the Macedonian, he shall not land, but he goes on board; his written discharge remaining for the purpose of the money coming from shore.

I have the honor to be, with much consideration and respect, your excellency's very attentive servant,

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 25, 1828.

SIR: John Rodgers, an American seaman, now on board the Principe Imperial, entered the Brazil service at Rio Janeiro for twelve months, and his term of service expired on the 7th ultimo.

Edward Willet, also an American seaman, was impressed on board the frigate Piranga, and is now on board the Principe Imperial. I request your excellency will cause these two American seamen to be discharged and sent on board this ship.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The seamen, Edward Willet and John Rodgers, whom your excellency reclaims in your letter of to-day, are in circumstances very different from which your excellency writes.

The first contracted to serve till the end of June of the present year, with the condition of not being sent to Rio de Janeiro, and that at the expiration of that time he should be paid and set on shore at Montevideo; the second, having served in the brig Independencia on Morté, finished his contract on the 20th of last December, and entered anew for a year.

As soon as those terms of service are complete they shall be set at liberty on shore.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most attentive servant,

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, January 31, 1828.

SIR: John M. Forbes, Esq., Chargé d'Affaires of the United States to the Government of Buenos Ayres, is at present in Montevideo. He came here in the corvette Boston for the benefit of his health, and proposes to return to Buenos Ayres in the next British packet. I therefore request your excellency to transmit to me the necessary documents, in order that Mr. Forbes, together with Mr. Davison, his secretary, and his servant, may be received on board the packet.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

No. 32.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, March 5, 1828.

SIR: The American ship James Birckhead arrived at this anchorage the night of the 24th ultimo, from Rio Janeiro. On the 25th the Brazil admiral took from the master the ship's register; and on the 26th the President of the Province ordered the ship to be moved into the harbor. The master of the James Birckhead communicated these circumstances to me, and expressed his unwillingness to enter the harbor, as he would thereby become subject to the regulation exacting bonds from foreign vessels previously to their being allowed to depart. The seizure of the register indicated a design of further molestation as soon as the ship should be in the harbor, where I could not interpose with effect; and, at the request of the master, therefore, on the 27th, I sent an officer, with men, on board the James Birckhead, weighed her anchor, and brought her to near to this ship and outside the Brazil men-of-war.

This occurrence gave rise to a correspondence, a copy of which is herewith enclosed. Yesterday, with the consent of the master, I got the James Birckhead under way, and conducted her into the harbor.

As this matter is now settled, I am sending the Boston to Rio Janeiro, with a letter to Mr. Wright. I inform Mr. Wright that, notwithstanding the Marquis of Aracaty's letter to him of the 16th of January, bonds continue to be exacted here, and that the Boston goes to Rio Janeiro expressly upon this subject. I request him to say to the minister that the bond regulation is still enforced; that I had dispatched the Boston to Rio solely for the purpose of offering to bring here the Government's order repealing it; and that if he (the minister) will furnish a duplicate of the order the Boston will, without delay, bring it to Montevideo. Of course the Government cannot refuse to put a duplicate on board the Boston; and Captain Hoffman has my orders to leave Rio for this place as soon as it is on board. The bond regulation is so exceptionable in its character, and so burdensome in its operation, that it is important to procure its repeal with as little delay as possible.

The American schooner Shillelah was condemned on the 27th ultimo in the Admiralty Court here, and the captured have appealed to the superior tribunal at Rio Janeiro.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient, JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 29, 1828.

SIR: The master of the American ship James Birckhead informs me that your excellency has taken away his ship's register. The law of the United States requires the master of every American vessel to deposit his register with the consul of his nation; and, at any rate, your excellency has no right to detain so important and necessary a document.

I have, therefore, the honor to request that your excellency will transmit to me the register of the ship James Birckhead.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata

[Translation.]

FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, February 29, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: By the letter of to-day, just received, your excellency demands the register of the James Birckhead, a ship of the United States, which entered this port in the night of the 24–'5th of this month, and has not yet complied with the obligations a merchant vessel is under to the local authorities.

With the register the captain brought clearances under authority of the custom-house of Rio Janeiro for other than that of Montevideo, where he declared that he merely touched, (excala,) and I see it verified.

In consequence of such clearances, (despachos,) and of having stopped here, the ship ought to submit herself to the regulations of the custom-house. As this matter was competent to the authority to which the custom-house is subordinate, I therefore transmitted all the papers to the President, that the measures indispensable under such circumstances might be employed to ascertain either what might have induced those papers, or perhaps the want of others, the motives of which only ought to be examined and questioned before the authority which may legitimately decide; and so far, if they were still in my possession, without doubt, they should take the same direction they have already taken.

No authority of a neutral nation can impede the operations or measures of belligerents with regard to merchant vessels without infringement of neutrality; such proceedings have ever been considered as offending the flag or the nation it represents; on the contrary, they only turn on the mercantile interests, the canvassing of which is in the competency of consuls; or, in cases where they remain dissatisfied, they become diplomatic questions.

As I see your excellency takes direct part in this business, if your excellency continue to prevent the captain of the ship from complying with his obligations, leaving the situation where the custom-house may fulfil its duties to hinder the frauds of a vessel which came with clearances for this port, though it may be for merely touching, likewise preventing by that means the President from executing whatever orders of the Imperial Government which may have application to his local jurisdiction in the midst of the perfect peace which happily exists between the Brazilian Empire and the United States, it remains for me to assure your excellency that if such interference (euxevencia) continue, I will give information to the Imperial Government. Your excellency being responsible to the President of the Government of the United States for the act and for its consequences.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, February 29, 1828.

SIR: I have received your excellency's letter of this day's date. The American ship James Birckhead arrived at this anchorage on the night of the 24th instant from Rio Janeiro. On the 25th your excellency took from the master the ship's register, and on the 26th the President, in consequence of information from your excellency, ordered the ship to be moved into the harbor. The master of the James Birckhead communicated to me the circumstances, and expressed his unwillingness to go into the harbor, as he would thereby become subject to the regulation exacting bonds—a regulation with which he could not comply without considerable expense. He also acquainted me that at Rio Janeiro the consul of the United States assured him that the bond regulation had been repealed, and that otherwise he would not have entered the river. Coming directly from Rio Janeiro, it was and is inconceivable that at the instant of his arrival here he could justly be liable to molestation, either from your excellency or the authorities of the port. I therefore sent officers and men to get the ship under way and anchor her beyond the jurisdiction of the authorities of the port.

On the 16th of January the Minister for Foreign Affairs of his Imperial Majesty's Government informed Mr. Wright, the American consul at Rio Janeiro, that orders had been transmitted to this place for the repeal of the bond regulation. A copy of the letter to this effect, from the Marquis of Aracaty to Mr. Wright, is now before me; yet the regulation continues to be enforced by the authorities here.

Although, for reasons which I have already had the honor to state to your excellency, I do not consider the blockade as lawful, yet I disclaim any intention of aiding or encouraging American vessels to enter any port which your excellency deems to be in a state of blockade. But since the enforcement here of the bond regulation by which the Government of Brazil undertakes to prescribe the conditions upon which other nations shall navigate the ocean, and interdicts neutral trade to ports not blockaded, I have boarded the American vessels coming in, notified to them the regulation, and offered my protection in case they anchored under the guns of the ship.

When the sails of the American brig Rio were unbent and landed, the consul of the United States demanded from the President the cause of it, and the President replied that it was in consequence of information from your excellency that the Rio had been bought by the Government of Buenos Ayres. Upon my application to your excellency you refused to give me any explanation whatever, and the Rio is still detained. Some days ago I sent an officer of this ship to acquaint your excellency with the misconduct of an officer under your command in charge of the American schooner Shillelah, and for redress for the misconduct of one of your own officers. Your excellency referred me to the President. These circumstances seem to indicate a disposition on the part of your excellency not to treat my applications with the respect to which I conceive them entitled, and give me reason to infer that I shall obtain from your excellency neither satisfaction nor explanation for injuries committed upon American citizens or American property. Your excellency must not expect that I will remain passive if injuries are committed and explanations refused or evaded.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

[Translation.]

FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, March 1, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Your excellency has had most thorough explanations on those subjects concerning which I ought to give them; and about those which do not belong to me, questions are unavailing, because the answers should come from those who are responsible.

What your excellency informs me the President might have said through the consul of the United States in Montevideo is of little import; he cannot prove it. I notified him that the English ship Melpomene was in readiness for Buenos Ayres, a communication that had been made to me by a person worthy of credit; and that the brig Rio came to be sold, as appeared from the letter of instruction (cauta d'orders) found on board the schooner Shillelah, that she (the brig) probably would have the same distinction which she (the schooner) had attempted, because the captain of the Rio was interested in the schooner. That I had been informed the brig got under way in the night to avoid giving bonds, but was prevented from escaping by change of wind. I mentioned the making sail to run out in the night, according to the information of persons in the harbor, by way of caution. I did not say, nor could I say, that the brig was sold at Buenos Ayres, when, by the letter of instructions by the Shillelah, it appeared that she came to be sold, and even had been offered to me, but it was not convenient for me to buy her. It was the President who gave the orders; to him all communications relating to this matter ought to be addressed; but my intimations to the President are not orders, nor are his mine.

I was informed by five witnesses that the mate (piloto) of the Shillelah drew the bed of the sergeant, who commanded the detachment of soldiers on board, from the place where it had been from the first; and that when he attempted to put it back in its place the mate opposed him even with threats. The sergeant, being a man of great integrity, was put there when your excellency sent me to say that they had burnt some water casks. The investigation of this business did not result to the credit of the mate; but as there had been complaints before from the prizes, I wrote to the President, committing to him (as in fact appertaining to him) all that concerned the police and security of the prizes; charge of the cargoes only remaining with me, which should be confided to a prize-master and his subordinate to relieve him. Hence your excellency should direct to the President and not to me; and this your excellency may understand for the future.

No merchant vessel ought to be in the waters of a nation without submitting herself to the regulations of the custom-houses; because, without regarding it as a measure adopted by all nations to prevent fraud, it is always an attack on their authority.

Would it be permitted, even in time of peace, that a merchant vessel should anchor near one of the ports of the United States, or even on the coast, without entering and subjecting herself to the custom-house regulations?

From what your excellency says I feel assured that the order to require bonds is about to be repealed. I, also, have had some indications of it. The counter order must arrive before long, perhaps by the packet, or by the vessels of war I expect.

In this affair the captain of the James Birckhead would do better to allow the custom-house officers to perform their duty; he has conducted in a manner so unusual and offensive that it is not to be expected that it would meet the approbation of the President and the Government of the United States, should the case reach them officially.

It cannot be shown that citizens of the United States, or of other nations, have suffered injuries. If there have been cases of private individuals there are means of justice to sift them, and discover on which side is the right; any other expedients are arbitrary; and, on that account, their practice being criminal, they do not suit constitutional nations, such as ours. We are not in the state of war to decide such questions by force; but if, unhappily, it should so happen, as I shall not be myself the person to break and abuse the good harmony, my sorrow will not be so great, although I shall always regret it.

I answer thus the letter of your excellency more out of particular attention to your excellency than a sense of duty, since these are not objects which belong to me to contest, as I have already shown; only I will not treat of the invalidity of the blockade, that being a matter on which we have already written many times. Well it will be for the speculators that its invalidity should be verified.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, March 1, 1828.

SIR: I have received your excellency's letter dated to-day. The ship James Birckhead is at present in charge of an officer from this ship, and no violation of the revenue laws of Brazil can possibly take place. If she continues here without subjecting herself to the regulations of the port it is because the master has been deprived of his papers.

If the register of the James Birckhead be delivered to the consul of the United States, with whom the laws of the United States require it should be deposited, and if assurances be given that bonds will not be exacted when she is about to sail, I will immediately get the ship under way and conduct her into the harbor. Should these propositions not be accepted, your excellency must be responsible for the consequences of having forcibly and illegally taken from an American vessel a document without which she cannot, with security, navigate the ocean.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, March 1, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: In answer to your excellency's letter of to-day, it becomes me to say that, be the ship James Birckhead in the charge of whomsoever she may, she is not the less, on that account, a merchant vessel, which came with clearances for this port; and for that reason her papers are lodged in the hands of the authority that ought to operate on her, and to whom the delivery of the papers cannot be refused without violence to good order.

No secondary authority can hinder a compliance with the orders of Government. As for the condition that the ship be exempt from bonds before the order establishing them be abrogated, it is inadmissible, and discovers an open opposition to compliance with it while it is still in force. Besides, that condition ought not to be proposed to me, but to those charged with the execution of the order relating to bonds.

As your excellency has a copy of the affirmative note of the Minister and Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs of the Brazilian Empire to the consul of the United States at Rio Janeiro, it cannot be long delayed; but until it does arrive, if the ship does not submit to the measures the custom-house ought to pursue, the offence to the local authorities is confirmed and supported by your excellency, who will remain responsible for it.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, March 2, 1828.

SIR: I have the honor to state to your excellency that the register of a vessel is not a paper which appertains to the custom-house, and cannot rightfully be taken away.

I do not openly oppose a compliance with the order requiring bonds; I only detain the ship at the anchorage, without the jurisdiction of the local authorities, and where, consequently, she is not subject to his jurisdiction. So says the President in his letter to the consul of the United States.

Your excellency has deprived the James Birckhead of a document indispensable to her security at sea. In consequence thereof, if, when my officers and men are withdrawn, she dares not venture to sea, but seeks safety in some neighboring port, the fault will be with your excellency.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, March 2, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: As your excellency informs me that the President wrote to the consul of the United States, I will again treat of the subject under this point of view.

When I saw the papers of the ship James Birckhead, finding that they should be examined by the President, I told the captain that I had given them that direction, (the register is the most essential that should be presented to the local authorities.) I asked the captain if he would go with the officer that carried them; he said yes, and went on shore in the same boat with him.

To avoid another affair like that of the brig Rio, I wrote to the President, delivering the papers; and adding that I neither did nor would express my opinion. The President returned me the papers, saying that, as the ship had not gone in, (that is, where usually all go the convenience of the custom-house,) and with respect to the bond she ought to give, as she was outside, the administrator of the custom-house could not perform his duties of sealing the hatches and watching her; to me, who had the force, it belonged to provide.

I replied to him that I was authorized to employ force against neutral merchant vessels only when they did not permit themselves to be boarded, and when, under detention as prizes, they refused to submit; and that, for neutral authorities, reason was the only force that could be employed. Seeing, then, that he wished to absolve himself from his duties, and to make me responsible for them, I returned the papers to him and left the affair at his responsibility; because he returned them with the futile pretext of their having been sent by me, for the reason, that, as the knowledge of the circumstances were properly for him, so, also, was the decision.

Here, then, is explained to your excellency why I was, and shall be, unwilling to enter more into the question, or into any other that, by its nature, belongs to the President.

If the ship is now a greater distance, it is because she was conveyed, by military protection, from her first anchorage, which the harbor of Montevideo offers to larger vessels, where your excellency and I am, and on the coast, which ought to be subject to the police of the country in the branch appertaining to it.

If the President judges the ship to be without his jurisdiction, in his hands are the papers; he may surrender them; he is not under my orders; our commands are independent of each other.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, November 2, 1828.

SIR: In reply to your excellency's letter of to-day, I state that, upon your excellency's declining the propositions contained in my letter of the 1st instant, I requested the consul of the United States to offer the same propositions to the President; and, as these propositions appear to me too reasonable not to be accepted, I trust the difficulty in regard to the James Birckhead will in that manner be decided. I now only await the decision of the President; and, in the meanwhile, if it is the wish of your excellency, I will move the ships further out so as to be one league from the shore.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

His Excellency Sr. RODRIGO PINTO GUEDES, Baron of La Plata,
Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata.

FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, March 3, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: It is not my province to designate the situations vessels of war of friendly nations shall take in a port of the Empire; they have a right to choose one convenient to them, and from me they shall have only attentions and assistance if necessary, and although this is a general rule, it is so in an especial manner with regard to your excellency from the consideration in which I hold you.

But if your excellency treats of the distance of a league being the sea, and beyond the territorial jurisdiction, besides the diversity of opinions on such a subject as to the degree of distance from the coasts, (which I do not cite because they have a bearing on the question,) it is not to be understood in relation to harbors; and, in the present case, the ship James Birckhead having been further in and taken thence under military protection, the fact would not be affected by her going then or now going to a greater distance.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's very attentive servant,

BARON DO RIO DA PRATA.

His Excellency JAMES BIDDLE,
Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of the United States on the Eastern Coast of South America.

The following copy of a letter from the Admiral to the President was enclosed in the preceding.

FRIGATE PRINCIPE IMPERIAL, March 2, 1828.

Your excellency having informed the consul of the United States that I had stated to you that the brig Rio was bought by the Government of Buenos Ayres, which your excellency neither can prove nor has even learnt from me, (perhaps your excellency confounds the brig with the English ship Melpomene,) and having afterwards written a letter to the said consul declaring the ship James Birckhead without your jurisdiction, notwithstanding she has been and is in this port, as if for friendly nations I had other force than that of reason, as already I have written to your excellency in reply to one of your letters, your excellency counted as void all I had written to you in similar cases, only because in fact I sent you the papers as falling under your competency to be examined and decided upon as might most conduce to the service of his Imperial Majesty, your excellency may feel convinced that no other matter relating to your excellency's duties shall pass through my hands. Our authorities being distinct, the one from the other, each ought to proceed according to his own opinion.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Montevideo, February 26, 1828.

SIR: I have been informed by the master of the ship James Birckhead, of Baltimore, which arrived off this port yesterday from Rio de Janeiro, that the papers of his vessel were, soon after his arrival, taken possession of by his excellency Admiral the Baron do Rio da Prata, and were by him sent to your excellency.

It appears that this vessel was duly and legally cleared from the port of Baltimore, in the United States, and subsequently from Rio de Janeiro, and I cannot conceive any motive for the seizure of her papers while lying without the jurisdiction of this port. As the vessel is now in a very exposed situation, liable to be driven to sea by stress of weather, and to other accidents which, under her present circumstances, would subject her to very serious embarrassments, I request that your excellency will be pleased to cause the papers to be restored to the master or delivered over to me, unless sufficient reasons can be assigned for their further detention.

I am, sir, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

JAMES BOND.

MONTEVIDEO, February 28, 1828.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS SIR: The undersigned, President of the Cisplatine Province, in answer to the note of your worship dated the 26th of the current month, in which you reclaim the papers of the American ship James Birckhead remitted to me by his excellency the admiral, commander-in-chief of the squadron stationed in the Rio da Prata, has to observe to his worship the consul that the said ship having been cleared from Rio de Janeiro for Valparaiso, with permission to touch at this port, on information that she had not yet entered the harbor as she ought, I referred the papers to his excellency the admiral aforesaid, not judging her to be under my jurisdiction.

But the admiral remitted the papers to me again, making the responsibility rest on me, in consequence of which I intimated to the captain of said ship, through the captain of this port, that he should come into the harbor, which intimation he did not observe, contending that he would not obey it as long as remained unclouded any agreement I might have to make with the commodore of his nation, which, in truth, has not been made. I see here an American ship, the Birckhead, with a clearance for this port and Valparaiso; she brings despatches from the custom-house to this, in which it is recommended to enforce in relation to this vessel the formalities established by the laws; I think, therefore, that this ship ought to have acceded to the intimation given through the captain of the port.

I hope your worship, taking into consideration my exposition, will take the necessary measures to keep uninterrupted the good harmony which happily exists between the two nations, and which, at the cost of the great sacrifices, I shall always preserve in the fulfilment of the Sovereign's determinations, which alone govern my principles.

God preserve your worship.

THOMAS GARCIA DE ZUÑIGA.

His Excellency JAMES BOND.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Montevideo, March 1, 1828.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of yesterday, in answer to mine of the 26th ultimo, respecting the seizure and detention of the papers of the ship James Birckhead.

I regret to say that your excellency's note does not furnish either a satisfactory explanation or a sufficient argument in justification of the proceeding.

The reason which appears to be assigned is, that as the vessel was cleared for this port she ought to enter it. A clearance for any particular port does not imply a positive obligation to proceed thither; nor would the master of the vessel incur any penalty by going to another should he deem it expedient to do so. In the present instance the vessel was cleared for Valparaiso, with permission to go to Montevideo; and, as the captain was informed, on the authority of an official note received on the 16th of January last, by the consul of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, from his Imperial Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs, that orders had been sent to this place to suspend the execution of the Imperial Order of the 6th of November exacting bonds from neutral vessels leaving this port, he intended to avail himself of this license, and endeavor to dispose of his cargo at this port without proceeding further; and so confident was he that the restrictions were removed, that it was only owing to the circumstance of his arriving in the night that he did not come directly in. Finding, however, that the regulation was still in force, he declined subjecting himself to its operation, and very properly refused to comply with the orders of the captain of the port while he was, as your excellency admits, without its jurisdiction.

I am authorized to declare, on the part of the captain, that if your excellency will return the papers and give an assurance that the vessel will be permitted to leave the port without giving bonds, she will be brought into the harbor, and, as soon as the cargo can be disposed of, will return to Rio de Janeiro.

I beg your excellency to accept the assurance of my high consideration and respect.

JAMES BOND.

MONTEVIDEO, March 3, 1828.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS SIR: When I received the note of your worship, dated yesterday, I had already remitted the papers of the ship James Birckhead to his excellency the Commodore of the United States, James Biddle, Esq., who had required them of me, being myself desirous of preserving the best harmony with the constituted authorities of the United States, in spite of the responsibility which falls on me by delivering up the said papers.

Without the ship's coming into the harbor, with all confidence in the rectitude of the principles of the same, excellent sir, and of your worship, I have acceded to your request, certain that neither he nor your worship will permit the authority of this Presidency to be troubled, and that you will cause the said ship to come into this harbor, where no prejudice can arise to her.

I have the honor to renew my assurance to your worship of the high consideration and respect with which I am your worship's most attentive servant,

THOMAS GARCIA DE ZUÑIGA.

His Excellency JAMES BOND.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, March 1, 1828.

SIR: His excellency Admiral Rodrigo Guedes, Baron of La Plata, commander-in-chief of the naval forces of his Imperial Majesty at La Plata, &c., &c., &c., took from the master the register of the American ship James Birckhead, now at this anchorage; and, upon my application to him for it, he states that he has transmitted it to your excellency. I have, therefore, the honor to request that your excellency will be pleased to send me this register.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

MONTEVIDEO, March 2, 1828.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the respectable communication of your excellency dated yesterday, in which your excellency requests the papers of the American ship James Birckhead, which were remitted to me by his excellency the admiral, Baron of the river Plate; and notwithstanding this Government is in communication with Mr. James Bond, the consul of your nation, of which I consider your excellency already informed, with all the high consideration and respect which the dignity of your excellency merits of me, you oblige me, full of all confidence, to satisfy your desires, having the honor to enclose your excellency said papers, certain that your excellency, on your part, convinced of the just reasons which I have already shown, will not permit the decorum of this Government to be compromitted, and the Sovereign's determinations to be without effect.

I flatter myself with having this occasion to manifest to your excellency the estimation and respect with which I am your excellency's very attentive servant,

THOMAS GARCIA DE ZUÑIGA.

Most Excellent and Most Illustrious Sr. JAMES BIDDLE.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, off Montevideo, March 4, 1828.

SIR: I am honored to-day with your excellency's letter of the 2d instant, remitting to me the register and other papers of the American ship James Birckhead. The register I have transmitted to the consul of the United States, with whom the laws of the United States require it should be deposited.

As soon as I was informed by the admiral that to your excellency, and not to himself, reclamations were to be made in the case of the James Birckhead, I requested the consul of the United States to assure your excellency that, if the ship's register was returned, and assurances given that bonds would not be exacted when the ship was about to sail, I would at once send the James Birckhead into the harbor. Upon the subject of the bonds your excellency, in writing to the consul of the United States, is silent. But the admiral informs me that, although he is at present not authorized to dispense with the bonds, he is certain, from intimations already received from his Imperial Majesty's Government, that repealing orders will come in the British packet, or the ships-of-war he expects soon to arrive from Rio Janeiro.

I have before me a copy of a letter from the Marquis of Aracaty to Mr. Wright, the consul of the United States at Rio Janeiro, under date of the 16th of January last, in which his excellency assures Mr. Wright that orders had been despatched to Montevideo for the repeal of the bond regulation.

Convinced, under these circumstances, that orders for the repeal of the bond regulation must be received before the James Birckhead can be ready to sail, and relying upon the assurance contained in your excellency's letter to the consul that no prejudice shall arise to the ship, I have ordered her to be conducted into the harbor, and she will weigh as soon as the wind permits.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES BIDDLE.

20TH CONGRESS.] No. 500. [1ST SESSION.

ON CLAIMS FOR INDEMNITY FOR SPOLIATIONS BY FRANCE PRIOR TO 1800.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MAY 24, 1828.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the Select Committee, to whom were referred the several petitions and memorials of those persons who have lost property by French spoliations prior to the year 1800, praying for indemnity from the United States, made the following report:

The petitioners claim redress from the Government for losses sustained by the capture and condemnation of their vessels and cargoes by the French Government prior to the convention of 1800, and for which they allege the United States, by that convention, received consideration.

The petitioners form a portion of a class of individuals whose claims are entitled to the most deliberate consideration, as well because of the large amount involved as of the magnitude and importance of the principles upon which their pretensions are founded. The committee are not in possession of information which enables them to ascertain the extent of the claims with accuracy, but find that it has been variously estimated on different occasions, by those who had acquired some knowledge of the subject, to be from eight to fifteen millions of dollars.

The amount involved, large as it may be, is not, however, more calculated to invite the serious consideration of the Government than the very intimate connexion this subject has with the most important, and, perhaps, the most delicate events in the history of the nation. It is an incident to the investigation of these claims, not perhaps of fortunate influence to their final adjustment, that they date their existence from, if they do not owe their being to, that period in which the rights of the nation, however well understood, or the just demands of our citizens, however well urged, could not be enforced against the other nations of the world by the same efficient means which, happily, we now possess. Emerging from a long and expensive war, and from a state of colonial dependence, without the means of discharging even the obligations which secured the faithful services of her soldiers, without a naval force, and without a prospect of resources to provide the materials for another conflict, the United States, at the close of the war of independence, and for some years after, could find less inducement to be withdrawn from a peaceful attitude than at any other period during her existence as a nation.

But whatever recollections may be connected with these claims, they are now presented to the justice of the Government; and neither their amount on the one hand, nor the delicacy of reverting to scenes of national infancy and weakness on the other, can excuse us from the duty of a full and candid examination of their character, and an equitable decision upon their merits.

In the performance of this duty the committee will introduce no other facts than such as are believed necessary to make intelligible the views they have presented. The voluminous documents transmitted to the Senate with the message of the President of the United States of the 20th May, 1826, containing a history of the transactions connected with the subject, cannot be embodied in a report. To the information contained in these documents, as also to the facts set forth in a report of a committee of the Senate of 8th February, 1827, the committee refer in general terms, confining themselves to the introduction of such facts as are believed necessary to an understanding of the opinions which the committee have adopted.

The operation of the treaties of 1778 between the United States and France being at the foundation of most of the questions involved in this subject, the committee will briefly advert to the facts connected with those treaties.

The co-operation of some of the established Governments of Europe, in the early stages of the war of independence, was an object of the most anxious solicitude to the sages who directed the councils of this then infant nation, and pursued by them with a perseverance exceeded only by the dangers which must have ensued from disappointment. The injury threatened to our enemy by the loss of these States was too great to allow nations, habitually her rivals, to continue unconcerned spectators of the contest of which the colonies were the prize. The hopes of our people were directed more particularly to France, whose real interests, united with long-cherished prejudices, all led her to aid us in a struggle for national existence. France at that time was in a state of profound peace with England, and the mutual obligations of existing treaties imposed serious restraints on her disposition to assist us; and to induce her to gratify our appeal in its whole extent required the tender of some motive more powerful than those treaty obligations.

She had favorably received our first overtures to her aid; had opened her ports to our commerce; had offered every facility to uninterrupted intercourse with her people and the other friendly nations; and had openly proceeded to encourage our efforts by every means consistent with her treaties with the enemy, and had furnished, through her secret agents, succors of money and stores in the most dark and doubtful period of the war. But it was of the last importance to the interests of this nation that a more decisive and effective step should be taken by the French Government.

The common principles of policy which guide all nations, taught France to await the development of the moral, political, and physical resources of a people who had so lately claimed the right and the power of self-government.

No sooner had the patriotic fervor of our citizens effected some of those great achievements which crowd the history of our revolutionary conflict than the restraints which policy had imposed upon the Government of France yielded to the large and liberal offers presented by the American nation.

Our envoys were authorized to concede the most important and valuable commercial advantages, to commit the American Government to furnish means in provisions to the amount of $2,000,000, and in naval force to the amount of six frigates, manned and fitted for service, and any other assistance in their power to prosecute a war against the British West India possessions for the benefit of France, to whom, in the event of conquest, they were to belong.

The 11th and 12th articles of the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, are in the following words:

"ARTICLE 11. The two parties guarantee, mutually, from the present time and forever, against all other Powers, to wit: the United States to his most Christian Majesty the present possessions of the Crown of France in America, as well as those which it may acquire by the future treaty of peace; and his most Christian Majesty guarantees, on his part, to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, as well in matters of government as commerce, and also their possessions, and the additions or conquests their confederation may obtain during the war from any of the dominions now or heretofore possessed by Great Britain in North America, conformable to the fifth and sixth articles above written, the whole, as their possessions, shall be fixed and assured to said States at the moment of the cessation of their present war with England.

"ARTICLE 12. In order to fix more precisely the sense and application of the preceding article, the contracting parties declare that, in case of a rupture between France and England, the reciprocal guarantee declared in the said article shall have its full force and effect the moment such war shall break out, and if such rupture shall not take place, the mutual obligations of said guarantee shall not commence until the moment of the cessation of the present war between the United States and England shall have ascertained their possessions."

The treaty of amity and commerce of the same date contains, amongst others, the following provisions:

"ARTICLE 17. It shall be lawful for the ships-of-war of either party, and privateers, freely to carry whithersoever they please the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any duty to the officers of the admiralty or any other judges; nor shall such prizes be arrested or seized when they come to or enter the ports of either party; nor shall the searchers or other officers of those places search the same, or make examination of the lawfulness of such prizes; but they may hoist sail at any time, and depart and carry their prizes to the places expressed in their commissions, which the commanders of such ships-of-war shall be obliged to show. On the contrary, no shelter or refuge shall be given in their ports to such as shall have made prize of the subjects, people, or property of either of the parties; but if such shall come in, being forced by stress of weather, or the danger of the sea, all proper means shall be vigorously used that they go out and retire from thence as soon as possible."

"ARTICLE 22. It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers, not belonging to subjects of the most Christian King, nor citizens of the said United States, who have commissions from any other Prince or State in enmity with either nation to fit their ships in the ports of either the one or the other of the aforesaid parties, to sell what they have taken, or in any other manner whatsoever to exchange their ships, merchandises, or any other lading; neither shall they be allowed even to purchase victuals, except such as shall be necessary for their going to the next port of that Prince or State from which they have commissions."

The committee do not deem it necessary here to introduce the other provisions of these treaties. Their influence, and the faithful observance of her plighted engagements on the part of France, are facts as familiar to all as is the fact that "the essential and direct end of the alliance, to maintain effectually the liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, of the United States," was gloriously and triumphantly accomplished.

After the peace of 1783 the rapid advance of the American nation to wealth and power soon placed it in a situation no longer to feel the want of guarantees for its independence from any other arm than that of its citizen soldiers. In the multiplied pursuits and interests of its citizens, the inconveniences arising from the partiality which characterized the treaties with France became obvious. It was not, however, until the occurrence of a war in which France was a party and the United States neutral that these treaties began to produce effects which promised to France the greatest advantage and were the most offensive to the United States.

The committee do not assume the duty of deciding whether the war which succeeded the French revolution was offensive or defensive on the part of France. It is known that this question agitated the councils and divided the opinions of the great statesmen of this country at that period. It is not now to be doubted, however, that from the early stages of the French revolution the most flagrant acts of hostility were systematically, though sometimes secretly, perpetrated against the people of that nation by the neighboring Powers, in which England was most enthusiastically engaged, impelled by the recollection of ancient animosities, as also by alarm at the dangers which threatened the settled Governments of Europe from the political doctrines which that revolution proposed to sanction.

England was at first secretly, and afterwards openly, a party to the league of 1791, which contemplated an invasion of France and a partition of a portion of her territory. Arms and supplies were furnished by her to the emigrants who were in open hostility to France; a ministerial order directed the detention of French and neutral vessels in British ports bound to France; the British Parliament prohibited the exportation of provisions to France, and authorized aliens to be sent out of the country; French vessels endeavoring to escape from ports taken possession of by their enemies were seized and sent into England and detained; and, lastly, the French minister received a peremptory order to quit the British Kingdom.

During these transactions, it was not alleged that England had been provoked by a war against her in name or in fact. France, excited by a furious revolutionary spirit, goaded by oppression and insult from abroad, and by all the worst passions which are elicited in civil convulsions, declared and entered upon the war with a temper unrestrained by the laws which the common consent of nations has enacted to lessen its mischiefs and protect those who are not parties to it.

This exasperated feeling on the part of France was cultivated and increased by the occurrences which succeeded her declaration of war on the 1st of February, 1793. The maritime superiority of her enemies enabled them to inflict upon her the most distressing injuries, and sometimes of a character to countenance the application to them of the language used in one of the French decrees, in which they were declared to be "means disapproved by the laws of humanity and by those of war." The course of policy which prevailed in the United States did not dissipate the irritation which existed in France.

By the 17th article of the treaty of commerce it will have been seen that French armed ships and privateers, with their prizes, were to receive shelter and protection in our ports, and that our officers were not to seize or search them, or make examination concerning the lawfulness of their capture; while no shelter or refuge was to be given to her enemy's ships, but they were to be made to leave our ports as soon as possible, when forced in by stress of weather or dangers of the sea.

The consular convention of 14th November, 1788, had given to French consuls jurisdiction in specified civil cases, as also authority to arrest marine deserters.

In virtue of these stipulations French prizes found safe refuge in our ports; they were brought in, condemned, and sold here; commissions were issued, or at least delivered, by French consuls to privateers, and letters of marque, which were here fitted out and armed. These important interests were effected with the greater facility from the strong sympathy of a large portion of the American people, arising from a recollection of the efficient aid derived from France in the prosecution of our revolutionary struggle, and from the actual sufferings and injuries then experienced by the people of that country. A civil war raging in her bosom, the horrors of a famine in prospect, an actual and almost total failure of her crops, and a powerful league of the nations of Europe against her, openly avowing their determination to starve her into submission, did not fail to revive and bring into the liveliest operation every remains of generous feeling which their associations and a community of dangers and services had awakened in America.

The advantages to France from the treaty provisions alluded to, in the state of things which has been described, did not escape the observation of England, and complaint and remonstrance unceasingly announced to our Government the dissatisfaction with which she witnessed the progress of their operation. Another subject, of very serious consideration, could not fail to present itself to the notice of our Government. The exposed condition of the French colonial possessions to which the treaty guarantee had reference, and the possible or probable demand for the fulfilment of that guarantee, might embarrass the nation to an extent which it was difficult to anticipate. Whether, by the fair import of the treaty and the true character of the war, the obligation was imposed on the American nation, in conformity to established principles of international law, to furnish the aids contemplated in the treaty, or whether the casus fœderis did not exist, the committee do not feel themselves called upon to decide. Whatever might be the decision of an impartial Government or statesman, it will at once occur that France, in the excited condition of her councils, could find motives as well as arguments to convince herself; and that the only alternative would be to concur with France, and be at war with her enemies, or to differ with France, and be at war with her.

It was the opinion of those who directed the policy of this country that a proclamation of perfect neutrality, to be enforced as far as possible, would lessen the difficulties which were presented. The attempt to enforce a neutral policy did not satisfy the expectations of France. She had before enjoyed, in fact, as she had claimed of right, the benefits of the treaty stipulations which did not belong to her enemy; and the profession of neutrality was soon followed by measures which deprived her citizens of advantages too important to be abandoned without complaint.

The negotiation with England, and the conclusion of the treaty of 19th November, 1794, were additional causes of displeasure to France. She contended that the United States had thereby surrendered to England the right to capture our ships prosecuting a voyage to or from France, or her possessions, and sanctioned not only by the provisions of our treaties of 1778, but by the acknowledged laws of nations; that the articles of contraband were enlarged and extended beyond the list acknowledged by the existing practice of nations; and that facilities were granted in our ports and waters to British armed ships and their prizes, in direct violation of our ancient treaties with her, and calculated to operate injuriously to her upon the war then existing. The actual change required by the United States in the practice before pursued by French citizens in relation to rights claimed and exercised by them, as secured by the treaties of 1778, and referring to the provisions of the treaty of 1794, with England, for the foundation on which it was made, most certainly resulted in the great injury and loss to the owners of their private armed ships, and lessened materially the extent of their hostile maritime operations against their enemy. One instance, found in a report of the Secretary of State to the President, will illustrate the position that such change was made. That report says: "The 24th article of the British treaty having explicitly forbidden the arming of privateers and the selling of their prizes in the ports of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury prepared, as a matter of course, circular letters to the Collectors, to conform to the restrictions contained in that article as the law of the land. This was the more necessary, as, formerly, the Collectors had been instructed to admit to an entry and sale the prizes brought into our ports."

The committee repeat, it is not their purpose, and is not conceived to be their duty, to approve or censure the policy pursued by the United States. It is a part of the history of that period that great division of opinion on these subjects prevailed amongst the best and wisest men in the nation. To the merits of the claims now presented, it is not important on which side of that agitated question truth was to be found, as the committee will hereafter have occasion to show.

France, whether justified or not by the conduct of the United States, did, in fact, assume, as the foundation of her proceedings, that we had violated our treaty stipulations, and, in effect, if not in form, had made ourselves auxiliaries to the war carried on against her. Decrees and orders of the most violent and destructive character, in acknowledged opposition to her treaties, and, in truth, in opposition to the laws and usages of civilized warfare, were, from time to time, enacted against our commerce, and enforced under circumstances which put at defiance all hope of escape from their ruinous provisions. Repeated remonstrances produced either no effect whatever or a temporary suspension, which only served to invite our merchants to the ocean, when new decrees, passed without notice and of immediate operation, swept away the property of its unsuspecting owners. Attempts at negotiations with the French Government having proved abortive, the United States, by various legislative acts, made provision for the protection of our commerce, and to repel the aggressions and injuries of which our citizens complained. Naval armaments were directed; appropriations were made to put the ports and harbors in a state of defence, and to raise a military force. The strongest measures adopted by the American Government are to be found in the acts of Congress declaring that the United States were of right freed from the stipulations of her treaties with France, and that the same should not be thenceforth regarded as obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States; and authorizing the commanders of United States vessels or private ships, armed and commissioned, to capture armed French ships on the high seas.

Under these acts of Congress, and the Executive instructions made in pursuance to their provisions, it is known that eighty-four French vessels were captured, of which one was sunk; eleven were restored because not armed; sixty-eight (valued at not less than $600,000) were condemned, one-half to the captors and the other to the United States, and four public ships were either delivered up to the French or paid for under the convention of 1800. During the period of these hostile operations, the French Government uniformly declared its unwillingness to change the relations of peace which had existed, nor did they at any time admit those relations to have been changed. There was no period during which they did not receive and accredit a representative from the United States. After the recall of Mr. Monroe, when the excitement produced in France by circumstances connected with the British treaty was at its extreme, the French Government refused to receive Mr. Pinckney, who was sent out as his successor, and for a time withdrew their envoy from this country. At the same time, however, Mr. Skipwith was resident in Paris, the acknowledged consul general of the United States, and it is believed that, during nearly the whole period of our difficulties, an officer of the same grade also represented the French Government near the United States. The relations which existed between the two nations, in the interval between the passage of the several acts of Congress before referred to and the convention of 1800 were very peculiar, but, in the opinion of the committee, cannot be considered as placing the two nations in the attitude of a war, which would destroy the obligations of previously existing treaties. This opinion, however, is by no means a material link in the chain of facts and arguments by which the conclusion adopted by the committee is sustained. A very large proportion of the spoliations committed by France were prior to the acts of Congress of 1798; the several decrees of July 2, 1796, November 27, 1796, February 1, 1797, March 2, 1797, November 13, 1797, and January 18, 1798, had destroyed our commerce, and left little or nothing to be thereafter lost.

The injuries growing out of these decrees were inflicted during a period when the operation of the treaties was not matter of question. But again it may be remarked, that the violations of our neutral and maritime rights not only gave to the citizens of the United States just claim to redress by virtue of treaty stipulations, but they were such as to justify the United States to demand of the French Government ample remuneration, upon the acknowledged principles of international law, the plainest provisions of which were outraged by the decrees of France and the conduct of her authorized agents and citizens. Putting aside, therefore, the consideration of conventional engagements between the two nations, the right of our citizens to indemnity was absolute, and the Government which was instituted for their protection, and emphatically for their protection against the wrongs committed by foreign Governments, was the legitimate organ through which the indemnity was to be sought. This duty was too obvious and imperative to be neglected. A disposition on the part of France to terminate their differences with us was promptly met by a renewed mission, clothed with ample power. The discussions which occupied the ministers on this occasion were full of interest to both nations, and to none as interesting as to those numerous sufferers whose claims are now under consideration. The protection of the claimants who now present themselves to the Senate was the very first object of the American Government. The instructions to her envoys commence with a reference to this leading topic:

"GENTLEMEN: You have been witnesses of the enduring patience of the United States under the unexampled aggressions and hostilities authorized and sanctioned by the French Republic against the commerce and citizens of the United States. And you are well informed of the measures adopted by our Government to put a stop to these evils, to obtain redress for the injured, and real peace and security to our country. And you know that, instead of relief, instead of justice, instead of indemity for past wrongs, our very moderate demands have been immediately followed by new aggressions and more extended depredations."

The first in order as in importance amongst the objects of their attention, is then noticed by their instructions, thus:

"First. At the opening of the negotiation you will inform the French ministers that the United States expect from France, as an indispensable condition of the treaty, a stipulation to make to the citizens of the United States full compensation for all losses and damages which they shall have sustained by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from the French Republic or its agents."

The American envoys found no difficulty in obtaining from the French ministers an acquiescence in the principle of compensating the claims of our citizens, but they too had claims alleged to be founded on contract, treaty, and the laws of nations; and their earliest proposition suggested "that the first object of the negotiation ought to be the determination of the regulations and the steps to be followed for the estimation and indemnification of injuries for which either nation may make claim for itself, or for any of its citizens. And that the second object is to assure the execution of treaties of friendship and commerce made between the two nations, and the accomplishment of the views of reciprocal advantages which suggested them."

In the progress of the discussions, the anxiety of the American Government to avoid the onerous stipulations of the ancient treaties, and the unwillingness of France to yield the already important and daily increasing advantages secured to her by their provisions, opposed the most alarming difficulties to an adjustment. Large pecuniary advances proposed by the American envoys were insufficient to induce France to relinquish the benefits which she claimed by an adherence to the treaties of 1778 and 1788. It was then the American Government found in the claims of her citizens the means of effecting a result to which her pecuniary offers were inadequate, and to relieve herself from obligations of which it may be said it was as impossible to estimate their extent as it was dangerous to the peace and interest of the nation to allow their continuance.

It was declared by the French minister to be "their intention to reserve to France the right of choice between the restoration of her privileges (by the treaties) and the payments of indemnities which may be brought against her, so that they have never supposed that she would enjoy privileges without payment of indemnities, or could pay indemnities without the enjoyment of privileges," "since France regards those privileges as an advantage peculiar to her, and for the abandonment of which she may stipulate as she deems proper."

The American envoys, conforming to the views of their Government, whose just right to make the claims of its citizens conducive to the accomplishment of great objects of national interest is conceded, properly availed themselves of the only motive sufficiently operative to withdraw France from the determined perseverance with which she adhered to the treaties.

They proposed as the basis of the convention—

"1st. The former treaties shall be renewed and confirmed.

"2d. The obligations of the guarantee shall be specified and limited, as in the first paragraph of their 3d proposition of the 20th of August, [which is] 3d. The mutual guarantee in the treaty of alliance shall be so specified and limited that its future obligation shall be on the part of France, when the United States shall be attacked, to furnish and deliver at her own ports military stores to the amount of one million of francs; and, on the part of the United States, when the French possessions in America, in any future war, shall be attacked, to furnish and deliver, at their own ports, a like amount in provisions.

"3d. There shall be mutual indemnities, and a mutual restoration of captured property not yet definitively condemned according to their 5th and 6th propositions of that date.

"4th. If, at the exchange of ratifications, the United States shall propose a mutual relinquishment of indemnities, the French Republic will agree to the same; and in such case the former treaties shall not be deemed obligatory, except that, under the 17th and 22d articles of that of commerce, the parties shall continue forever to have for their public ships-of-war, privateers, and prizes, such privileges in the ports of each other as the most favored nation shall enjoy."

The answer to these propositions will fully evince the influence of the claims of American citizens in effecting what the offer of a very large amount of money had not been sufficient to accomplish. The French ministers say:

"They accede to the proposition of the first article.

"The second cannot be admitted, unless the 4th article give to the French Republic the assurance that, if she propose to the United States the reciprocal relinquishment of indemnities, this proposition will be accepted, notwithstanding the relinquishment of the right of guarantee, setting aside the treaty of alliance and the privileges resulting from the 17th and the 22d articles of the treaty of commerce. If the 4th article do not contain this stipulation, neither can this 4th article nor the 2d article be admitted.

"The third seems to require some explanation.

"The French ministers are of opinion—

"1st. That the regulation of indemnities for prizes captured, and which shall have been condemned at the time of the signing of the treaty, shall apply to individuals.

"2d. That the vessels or national ships taken shall be respectively restored or paid for.

"3d. That prizes captured from individuals and not tried at the time of the signature of the treaty shall be tried according to the provisions of the treaty of 1778, by the most exact interpretation thereof that can be properly given.

"The 4th article is inadmissible, as has been before observed, unless it offer to France the same right as the United States, and unless it maintain the ancient treaties with the exception of the obligation of guarantee and of privileges.

"To fulfil this object, and to confirm the 2d article, the 4th article must be expressed in these terms, or others of equal force: 'If, at the exchange of ratifications, the United States offer to the French Republic, or if the French Republic offer to the United States, the reciprocal relinquishment of indemnities, the proposition shall be accepted; and in this case the obligation of guarantee arising out of the 11th article of the treaty of alliance, and the privileges resulting from the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty of commerce, shall be reduced to the privileges which the most favored nation may enjoy.'"

The envoys approach the subject of a relinquishment of American claims with a caution suggested by their value and amount, as well as by the peculiar solicitude for their adjustment indicated in their instructions; and, as if unwilling to assume the responsibility of a positive abandonment of them, even on the terms of a surrender by France of reciprocal claims of her citizens and the obnoxious treaty obligations, they propose an arrangement which shall reserve that most important question for the deliberate decision of those who, by the Constitution, are intrusted, in the last resort, with the authority to regulate the terms of our national relations.

The convention ultimately formed, in connexion with the facts occurring in the progress of its ratification, will be found to have produced the precise state of things contemplated by the 4th proposition of the envoys. The second article of the convention, concluded September 30, 1800, for the avowed purpose of recognizing, reserving, and postponing the mutual claims for indemnities and ancient treaty obligations, declared as follows:

"ARTICLE 2. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of February 6, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of November 14, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and until they may have agreed upon those points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows."

The convention, with this article included, was ratified by the French Government, and by that act the claim to indemnities was certainly admitted, and a pledge given to negotiate at a future period, and provide for their payment.

The Senate of the United States, when the convention was submitted to them, ratified it, after first expunging the second article, and inserting an article limiting its duration to eight years.

When this ratification was presented to the French Government, the modifications made by the American Senate were reluctantly assented to, with the express declaration and provision that, by the retrenchment of the second article, the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

Mr. Jefferson had become the President of the United States in the interval between the ratification by the American Senate and the last ratification by France, and the ratification by the First Consul of France not being pure and simple, in the ordinary form, he thought it his duty, to avoid misconception, to ask a second advice and consent of the Senate.

That Mr. Jefferson believed the French ratification, in the mode returned, entirely consistent with the altered state of the convention, will appear from a communication of Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Mr. Livingston, then envoy to France, under date of December 18, 1801, in which he says: "I am authorized to say that the President does not regard the declaratory clause as more than a legitimate inference from the rejection by the Senate of the second article."

The Senate resolved that they considered the said convention as fully ratified, and the President thereupon promulgated it in usual form.

The American claimants were from that period deprived, by the act of their Government, from all right to indemnity from France. They do not complain of the measure of their Government in applying their claims to the discharge and satisfaction of reciprocal claims due to the citizens of France, or to purchase an exemption from onerous and offensive obligations due by the ancient treaties from the American to the French Government. They admit the authority and applaud the prudence which was exercised so advantageously for the general interest of the whole nation by the expenditure of means or property of a portion of its citizens. But they allege that the national faith, and the principles of national law, entitle them to expect remuneration for property thus disposed of, and for the recovery or indemnity whereof they would have had an acknowledged right against France, but for the satisfaction made therefor by France to the American Government, and the relinquishment consequent upon that satisfaction.

It is believed no principle can be more plain than that a Government taking possession of private property, and appropriating it to public service, is bound to compensate the owner. The Constitution of the United States has not, however, allowed this obligation to rest upon the authority of international law, but has sanctioned, by an express provision, the most sacred regard to the inviolability of private property. Its language is: "Nor shall private property be taken to public use without just compensation."

The committee have before intimated an opinion that the merits of these claimants are not dependent upon the considerations of policy or propriety which may have been observed or violated by the United States in their intercourse with France during the period of the aggressions complained of. The committee have assumed, on the authority of the concurring concessions of both the Governments, that the edicts of France, and the manner of their execution, were in direct hostility to the plain and admitted provisions both of the treaties and the laws of nations. If, then, these unauthorized captures of the property of our citizens were made without the palliation which might be furnished by the existence of just cause of complaint against the American Government, the conduct of France is, by so much the more, palpably culpable, and the unprovoked character of the aggression should remove all objection to the claim for indemnity. If, on the other hand, the United States, by a course of policy arising out of a cherished hostility to France, or a partiality to her enemy, or from any other cause, had given to the French Government just occasion of complaint or for reprisals, it would seem to result that the American Government should not now oppose a declaration of its own unwise policy to the claims of its unoffending citizens, whose property has been the victim of its own errors, and especially when, after the acknowledged impolicy of the Government by which the loss had been made to fall upon its innocent citizens, that Government had derived, from the property lost, the means of discharging itself, not only of the consequences of these errors, but also of other most important obligations.

The great difficulty with which the committee feel themselves pressed is to present to the Senate a fair and satisfactory estimate of the amount of loss sustained by our citizens, and the amount of gain to the Government.

In obeying the constitutional injunction to make just compensation, the committee do not believe the Government ought to grant, or the claimants to expect, a sum equal to the actual value of the property lost. The standard by which to arrive at a more accurate estimate of the just compensation, would seem to be formed from the probable benefit arising to the claimants, if their rights had remained to them unappropriated by the Government, and by the probable amount which the Government would have been required to expend, to effect the objects gained by the application of the claims. The difficulty of coming to a precise result in the investigation of either of these topics will be at once evident. The actual condition of the Government of France when the injuries were committed, and the changes it has since undergone, will not escape consideration. It is very certain that, in the revolutionary state of the country, and the frequent change of its rulers, the prospect of recovery was postponed to a distant period. The expectation of delay was itself a matter calculated to lessen the value of the claims.

That the claims were of value cannot with reason be denied. They were admitted by France, and whatever changes her Government might experience in its form, or in the title or powers or persons of its rulers, the obligations to discharge them remained, and pursued the Government through all such changes. They were considered valuable by both the Governments at the time they were released. France ultimately, though reluctantly, consented to receive them in discharge of claims due to her citizens, which she regarded as very important, and of the privileges of her ancient treaties, which she regarded as still more important than the claims of her citizens. The United States purchased with them the reduction of the rights of France in relation to privateers and prizes to those of the most favored nation, and an exemption from the guarantee, for the first of which she had offered three millions of francs, and for the last five.

It could not but occur, however, that France, whenever she should be willing to decide upon and discharge these claims, would assume to herself the privilege of estimating their amount, as also the circumstances connected with their origin and progress, and the consequent uncertainty of the principles of their adjustment, and of the degree of reduction to which they were subject, would necessarily have lessened their value. Various other considerations, which the committee will not pursue, could be suggested, to enlarge upon this particular view of the subject. The committee are not prepared to adopt the rule which obtains in the pecuniary transactions of individuals, by which the voluntary agent or trustee who compromises the claim of another, and receives less than the full amount, is made responsible for the whole.

The principle which lies at the foundation of this rule fails in its application to Governments. There can be no apprehension of impure motive, or of fraud, or connivance in the conduct of a Government over the claim of its citizens against foreign Governments. Its action commences at the period when individual effort has proved fruitless, and must be regulated by reference, not to the interests or the rights of the injured citizens alone, but of the whole community. A majority of the committee, after much deliberation on this most difficult branch of the subject, have concurred in adopting as the basis by which to arrive at a given sum the proposition suggested in the instructions to our envoys, dated 15th July, 1797, and which authorized them to stipulate for specific succors, to an amount not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars per annum, in place of a general guarantee. A difficulty, it is certain, yet remains to ascertain the gross sum which will be an exact equivalent for an annual subsidy of that amount, and the committee believe that any sum in gross should be adopted as a tender on the part of the Government, and voluntary acceptance on the part of the claimants. They recommend that, in the offer which shall be made to the claimants, the condition shall be annexed, providing for full notice to the claimants, and requiring from all who shall accept the terms, and become distributees of the fund, a full discharge to the United States.

The character and condition of the claims, after the lapse of so many years, will necessarily require the agency of a commission to arrange and establish their validity and amount, and apportion the distribution for which, at a future period, provision in detail will be necessary. In the meantime, and with a view to bring before the Senate the general merits of the claims, the committee beg leave to report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, at the conclusion of the convention between the United States and France, in 1800, there were large and just claims due from the French Government to citizens of the United States for spoliations on their commerce.

Resolved, That, by the terms of said convention, the United States relinquished the said claims, and released the French Government from the payment thereof.

Resolved, That it is proper and expedient for the United States to make just compensation to those to whom said claims are due.
